Yet would I not that your virtue should be austere and unmanaged, but seasoned with a good disposition and a certain cordialitie, which is the best temper of Amity. There are some who love so coldly, that their love is as a day in winter, when the Sun is involved in gross vapours, and shews nothing but sadness: which is extremely troublesom; for it is better to receive a manifest Correction, then to endure a hidden Amitie (to speak with the Wiseman) and you shall find many women who better love harsh men, then such as are neither one nor other.

Melior est manifesta correptio, quam amor absconditus. Prov. 27.

He is no good friend who rejoyceth not at the presence of his friend, who is not sorrie for his absence; yet not opposing the conformitie we should have with the divine Providence. S. Chrysostom in the letters he wrote to his dear Olympius observed these sensible affections in S. Paul, for he was much troubled at the absence of his best friends, and desired to see their faces (as he saith) where this great Prelate insisteth upon the word Face, and saies it is good right, that we desire the face of our friend, because it is the place where the soul sheweth it self in all its senses. There is not any man (saith Tertullian) unless he hath little to do, delighteth to hold long discourse before a face shut up, a visage sensible of nothing, and which to say truly, cannot but be melancholy in this posture.

Vid. Chrys. ep. p. 715. 716. 1 Thes. 2. & 3.

Tertul. de velandis Virg. c. 12. Quis audebit oculis suis premere faciem clausam, faciem non sentientem, faciem ut ita dixerim tristem.

This hindreth not, but that the use of veils is verie laudable in time and place among religious women, who make profession of penance, and the fore-alledged Author, who ardently argueth virgins to this observance, gives them an example of Arabian women, who were so veiled, that they had but one eye free to guide them, and to receive a half light: which caused a Roman Queen to say, that they were miserable women who went so, because they might take in love, but not give it out again. But contrariwise they were most happie, to be delivered from a thousand importunities of wanton eyes, which do nothing but court beauties.

Contenti sint dimidiato frui lucis quam totam jacere prostitutæ. Idem de velandis Virg. c. 14.

Howsoever, true amitie is necessarily accompanied with some tendernes and sensibilitie, which causeth one to be perpetually anxious for such as he loveth. Love in the heart is an exhalation in a cloud, it cannot continue idle there; it daily formeth a thousand imaginations, and brings forth a thousand cares; it findeth out an infinitie of inventions to advance the good of the beloved: it openeth it self in his prosperities, it shuts it self up in his adversities, it is appalled in perils, it triumpheth in glories. If it hear speech of his praises, it is Manna fallen from heaven; if he be blamed, it is a poysoned arrow which transpierceth the heart: The eye, the tongue, the arm, all the veins and arteries bend to his defence.

Conversation, and its contentments.

Add for the third Antidote, that Amitie is notably entertained by conversation and mutable communication, which should be full of libertie, freedom and confidence. There it is where one entreth into communitie of secrets, of thoughts, counsels, inventions, opinions, industries, affairs, and purposes. There it is, where hearts discover their nakednes, and where spirits going out of Christalline breasts, make a sweet mixture of fires and lights. There it is, where (saith the Wiseman) Iron sharpneth Iron, where one Intelligence awakens another. There it is, where the bottom of the heart becomes as a fountain of clear water wherein souls behold each other by admirable reflections. One reckoneth up his life, his courses, his voyages, his hazards, his enterprizes, his successes, his joyes, his annoyes, his Sympathies, his Antipathies. The other receiveth all this into his bosom, and reciprocally opens himself to his friend. Oh what sweetnes, oh what an Atom of the life of the blessed is this communication, when it is inviolably grounded upon virtue and honestie. What a contentment is it to see a poor man who was as a cloud surcharged with storms and darknes, to free himself and become bright by aspect of the beams, which reflect from the eyes of a friend, to clear up at the words which come from his lips, to receive infusions wholly celestial, which put in order things confused, give vigour to the languishing, comfort in affliction, and hope amidst despairs! Time stealeth away in these entertainments, and is not felt: hours are not numbred, moments are there precious; the space which intercurs between two Suns, seemeth but one. Whosoever importunely troubles these conversations, are like Birds of ill presage: and night which separates them (although it be the mother of Repose) is not always welcome, unless it in sleep restore those beloved delights it took away.

Prov. 27. 17. Ferrum ferro acuitur, & homo exacuit faciem amici sui, & v. 19. Quomodo in aquis respondent vultus prospicientibus, sic corda hominum manifesta sunt prudentibus.

Yet, it is good to moderate this conversation, the nature of humane things being such, that pleasure when it is arrived at the highest, is not far distant from distaste. The more that flowers breath forth their excellent odour, so much the soone-Conversation must be moderated. Humanarum rerum ita tribulationis, lætitiæ sunt vicinæ. Gregor. in Job c. 3.

sooner they wither; and by how much the more love produceth fires and sparklings, so much the more it is weakned, unless it be repaired by reason, which is swallowed by sense. Absence entertained by letters full of confidence, is not alwayes without its profit; for the soul by the memorie taketh what it hath taken in by the understanding, and gives it self more leasure to recogitate its pleasures, which are not so well perceived, when presence drencheth the mind in a deluge of contentments, and gives it not leasure to bethink it self. It is a goodly thing (verily) to behold these affectionate complacents, yet never is one a good friend, if he come not to the fourth point, which is, to wish, and to do good to those he loveth. It is nowadayes, a true testimony of Amitie, to give liberally of ones own, in a time when silver is the God of the world, and interest the mark, whereat all intentions aim. There are some, who would rather give the blood of their veins, then ought of their purse, would suffer incredible colls for a friend, and would not diminish for him the least part of their ordinarie expence; yet Amitie never is perfect, unless it enter into a free communication of necessarie helps, as much as abilitie and reason permit. Whosoever invented benefits gave wings to Amitie, and made arrows of gold which insensibly penetrate hearts the most unnatural.

Absence is sometimes a stratagem of Amity.

Bounty a true note of Amity.

Benefits of Amity.

An Elephant, who beareth Towers and Houses on his back, cannot carry a benefit without a grateful acknowledgment of it: It is that which quencheth the fire that sparkleth in the eyes of Lions, which stayeth their paws keen as rasours, and makes them adore that which is thrown out to them as a prey to be devoured. Liberalitie is a book we must ever hold in the water; we must not fear many times to lose, to confer once well, a good office done to a friend. That man deserveth never to get any thing, who thinks all he giveth is lost, and who gives not at all, but to receive double. His intentions are mercenarie, and his favours are like Lime-Twigs; he maketh a Market-place of the Temple of Amitie, and profaneth all that is sacred in it, to consecrate it to his own passion.

Glorificabit me bestia agri, dracones & struthiones. Isa. 34.

It is an excellent industry, to give well, and it requireth much study. There are such as give all they cannot keep, and are never liberal but in extremitie, like to the fountain of Spoleto which never appeared, but when the countrey was threatned with an approaching famine. Others send Presents to no purpose, and unfeelingly, as if one should give books to a Peasant, and arms to a Scholar. Their gifts are many times so unhappy, that they may be be reckoned among the mischiefs their enemies wish. Others throw largesses by starts, and distribute not favours, but cast them at random; and there are oft to be found such, who giving to all, for want of giving with judgement, oblige none. They hasten to those who desire nothing of them, not seeing it is a great torment to be obliged to one, to whom one would ow nothing. There are, who make themselves to be adored, before they open the golden gates of liberality, they are shut up within so many locks, that an age passeth before they succour the miserie of a friend; they put oyl into the lamp to light it when it is quite out, and do good to Hobgoblins and spirits in tombs. It is too late to give to a friend, if you stay till he demand it: you give him twice, when you deliver him out of his torment. Archesilaus well understood this mysterie, who laid a bag of money under the pillow of his sick friend, whom he knew to be in great necessity, without telling him from whence this supply came, and rather chusing he should have the pleasure to find it, then the pain to ask it. What good is it to do, as the officers of great ones who are stately in their distributions, and think not they ever have given ought, unless it were long asked? They make themselves to be waited on like Demi-gods, and magnifie what comes from their own hands, in such sort that their benefits are scorned, and we begin to hate that, which was too late resolved on, or too proudly afforded. He must give his Presents according to the common practice of men, observing circumstance of place, time, season, persons; guild his favour with the gold of graces, and not do, as they who give so sadly, that one would take them for men who deny.

A great industry to give well.

Leander in Umbria.

Senec. l. 3. de Benefic. c. 20.

Friends also who receive, ought not to be troublesom, there being not any thing which more offendeth firm Amities then the too great importunities of the bold, who ever have their hand open to receive, and never have a brow soft enough to blush. There are many Amities which are by this way dissolved; when friends perswade themselves to ask boldly, and will not be denied, but think one gives them nothing, if they give not all.

The fifth condition of a good friend, consisteth in a strong patience to bear with the defects of the person he loveth, whether they be in the mind, the bodie, or in the exteriour: Yet it is not that crimes and scandals, hidden under the shadow of Amitie, should be tolerated: for that were to be a traitor to the most innocent of virtues. Above all, it is expedient to observe, and in the beginning to touch the passion of one dear unto us with hands of silk, and words of sattin; not to distemper him, if he be somewhat sensible. But if light remedies make not impression, we must urge, sollicit, labour with all the libertie which confidence affordeth, and not forsake the sick, until we see some little hope of amendment. But if the evil daily increase by the contempt of remedies, & that it be such that it involves a friend within the danger of infamy; a man ought not to think it strange if he be abandoned, since he first of all degraded himself of the character of Amitie, which is virtue. Other defects of manners, which proceed not to crime, ought to be handled with singular sweetness and discretion, and these of nature and humane accidents cannot be taken by a good friend but as a decree from heaven, and an exercise of his goodness. There are some, who have their souls so generous, that they love miseries; they find deformitie to be handsom, when it is dressed up in the liveries of Loves, plagues and cankered sores breed neither fear, nor aversion in them: They digest all by the heat of an immortal affection.

Patience most necessary in Amities. Advice and correction of friends.

Non asperè, quamvis existimo, non durèter, non modo imperiosè vitia evellamus; sed magis docendo, quàm jubendo, monendo quàm imperando. S. Aug. in ep. ad Aurel.

Non cures scrupulosè scicitarie occultæ, qui manifestò infacinoris desinit obviare. S. Athanas. in Conc. Alexand.

Then it is, when we come to perfect fidelitie, which is the Basis that supporteth the whole house of Amities. It is a virtue really divine, and one of the most precious treasures in the heart of man. It is a Bud of Fidelitie, a proof of an invincible courage, a note of an inviolable goodness: It is an imitation of the order of the heavens, & of the elementarie world, where all persevere in the observance of the laws which were written by the Divine Providence from the beginning of ages, by the help of Fidelity, which the principal parts of the universe do observe one towards another.

Fidelity and its excellency.

Amor fœdus generale. Quæ sine vinculo pacem, nec æquora servant. Silius.

It is that, which is the cause that stars eternally circumvolve within their divisions, not usurping

one

one upon another: That, which causeth dayes and nights yearly to restore the time they had borrowed one of another, and so well to make up their accounts that they pay even to the utmost minute. It is that, which stayeth the waves of the sea, and current of rivers; That, which maketh Masters and Servants, Families and Provinces, States and Empires. All is quickned, all lives, all under the divine hands of this great Mistris. By it, Kings have subjects, Lords their officers, Commonwealths Magistrates, Communities, Administrators, Fields Labourers, Civil-life Merchants and Artificers, by it, the whole world hath order, and by it, order prospers in all things. One must rather break an hundred times, then once fail in fidelitie to a good friend. Were the devil capable of commerce with men, he must observe fidelitie: by how much a more just title ought we to preserve, love and honour it, even with veneration in holy Amities?

If a friend, one of those who have been very acceptable to you, chance to fail; whether it be by evil life, or through manifest contempt of you, or out of other ill dispositions; yet must you on the rotten trunk honour the last characters of Love, you must rather unstitch then break, you must keep the secrets he at other times hath committed to you, and not publish his defects. Amitie is so venerable, that we must honour even its shadows, and imitate the Pythagorians, who celebrated the obsequies of such as forsook their societie, to burie them with honour.

These precepts being observed; Children will live with Parents in great duty and submission; Husbands with Wives will hold together, not only by eyes, flesh and blood, which are too feeble ties, but by excellent conjugal virtues; Parents will live in all sweetness of nature, People will be fastned with the knot of indissoluble Concord; Great ones will be indulgent to inferiours; Inferiours pay obedience to the great; and intimate friends gather flowers and fruits of immortal delights in the sacred garden of Amity.

Sect. 6. Of sensual Love. Its Essence, and Source.

ὅτι πνεῦμα χειμέριον, ἢ αὐτὸ τὸ φιλαργυρίη διαδίδοικεν
Hippocrates in ep. ad Abderites.

I Here could wish my pen were born on the wings of winds from one pole to another, and that it might fall with a strong and impetuous flight upon a passion which maketh attractives, charms, and illusions to march before it, and after it draggeth along furies, disasters, and rapines.

The wise Hyppocrates in his time deplored the evil effects of Avarice, and said, the life of man was miserable, because insupportable Avarice, like unto a spirit of storms and tempests, had poured it self upon mortals, and that it were to be wished the best Physicians might meet together from all parts to cure this disease, which is worse then folly, and which occasioneth a mischief irreparable: Because instead of seeking remedies to drive it away, false praises are invented to flatter it.

Love is a strange malady.

I may say the like of Love, since it is the most fatal plague among all passions. It is not a simple malady, but one composed of all the evils in the world. It hath the shiverings and heats of Feavers, the Ach and prickings of the Meagrim, the rage of Teeth, the stupefaction of the Vertigo, the furies of Frenzy, the black vapours of the Hypocondry, the disturbances of the waking, the stupidities of the Lethargie, the fits of the falling sickness, the faintness of the Phthisick, the heavings of the passion of the heart, the pangs of the collick, the infections of the leprosie, the venome of ulcers, the malignity of the plague, the putrefaction of the gangrene, and all, which is horrible in nature.

After all this, it is made a God, to whom Elogies, Hymns, Songs, and victims are offered: Empire over the heart is given to it; a soul, not created but for him, who hath saved it, is subjected, fetters are honoured, and its Tyranny adored.

There are many millions of men in the world who would be most fortunate and flourishing, if they knew how to avoid the mischievous power of this passion: but, having not used any consideration nor endeavour; they have abandoned their bodies to dishonour, their reputation to infamy, their estates to pillage, and their lives to an infinitie of disturbances and torments. Hence is it, that virgins of noble blood are stolen away, that families are desolated, that parents are precipitated into their Tombs by ungrateful children, that so many young widows are dishonoured in the world, that so many miserable creatures, after they have served for talk to a Citie, die in an Hospital; that so many little innocents are made away by a death which preventeth their birth; that so many Infants are thrown into life as froth of the sea, exposed to povertie and vice, by that condition which brought them forth. Hence is it, that chaste wedlocks are disturbed, that poysons are mingled, that Halters are noozed, that swords are sharpned, that Tragedies are begun under the Coverture of night, and are ended in a full day-light upon a scaffold.

Disasters of evil love.

O God, how happy might a soul be which would well consider all this, and take what I am about to speak, as a letter sent from heaven, for the remedie of infinite many evils, which in this passion environ our miserable life! I invite hither every age, each sex, all conditions. I intreat my Readers to peruse these lines with the same spirit wherewith I address them: and although it befel me to treat of this subject in my other works; notwithstanding never have I (yet) undertaken it with so much method, vigour, or force, as at this present. I will shew you the Essence, the Causes, the Symptoms, and the Effects of love, as religiously as I can possibly, supposing my self not bound to follow Tertullians opinion, who though verie chaste, spared not to speak of this subject a little grosly, saying for excuse, that he had rather put himself upon the hazard of losing shame then a good argument. I made you see in the beginning of this Treatise, that love, considered in general, was properly an inclination to the good of Conformitie, which putteth on divers faces according to the sundry objects and ways it pursues to arrive thither. If it go directly towards God, and reflect on a neighbour, as his Image, loving the one for himself, and the other for his Author; this is charitie: If it diffuse it self upon divers creatures sensible and insensible, which it pursueth for its pleasure and commoditie; it is an appetite, and a simple affection, as that, which is towards hunting, birds, books, pictures, pearls, and Tulips: If it be applied to humane creatures, loving them with all integrity, by a reciprocal well-wishing; it is Amitie: If it regard the body for pleasures sake; it is a love of venereal concupiscence, which being immoderate (even in the intention of marriage) fails not to be vitious; which made Tertullian say, that the same thing an Adulterer would do, the married likewise did. If it be chaste, and guided within the Limits which the Law of God prescribeth; it is conjugal love: If it overflow to sensual pleasures; It is Luxury. S. Denis saith, It is not love,

love, but an Idol, and a fall from true love. And Plato in his Banquet addeth, that sober love is contentment of heart, eyes, and ears; but when it will content it self by the other senses, namely, that of touching; it is not love, but a spirit of insolency, a passion of a servile soul, a rage of a trivial lust which maketh shew to love beauty; but, through its exorbitancy, descendeth to the worst of deformities.

Plato in convivio.

Division of love.

I know there are learned pens, which here distinguish all love into two parts, & say there is one of consideration, and another of inclination. They call it love of consideration when one is therein embarked with a full knowledge, and a setled judgment; love of inclination, when one loveth, not able to give any reason. But I find this division is not exact enough, insomuch as it confoundeth the Genus and Species, and doth not clearly distinguish the members of this body, since all love is nothing else, but an inclination, and since that which is made by consideration, inclineth the loving to the thing loved. Whence it appeareth that to mention a love of inclination, is to say, love is love, without any further explication. I had rather say there are two loves, the one of Election, which resulteth from Consideration, and is formed, when after one hath acknowledged a thing to be fair, profitable and pleasing, he out of reason affects it: The other of humour, when without consulting with reason, one is suddenly surprized by some secret attractive in the thing loved, without giving himself leasure to judge what it is, and this properly is to love by humour and fantasie, which is now adays the most ordinarie love, but not the best. It is a kind of love which quickly beginneth, and which never ends slowly, so full it is of inconstancy. It seems to it self all its bands are silken, although they be rough chains: It will not take pains to consider them. It thinks not, it cherisheth the wound, nor looks it back on the hand which gave it. It is heedlesly engaged, and signeth transactions without reading them, that it may not be ashamed to abrogate what it made, or to entertain that which kills it. There are many miserable ones, who daily marry upon the first sight, and whose amities arise but from a glance which passeth away more swiftly then a shadow: and then there must be a thousand repentances to redeem the pleasure of one moment. It is ever better to preferr Election; for, though in the beginning it had not so much sweetness in the search, it hath less sorrow in the possession.

Love of humour.

But, to enter farther into the knowledge of Carnal love, it is good to penetrate the causes and effects thereof, which will the more perspicuously enlighten us in the choice of remedies. We see many people in the world, who being tormented by this evil even unto folly, seek for pretexts to cover their passions: some saying, It is a Touch from heaven, and an effect of their Horoscope, which cannot be diverted. Others complain they are bewitched, and that they feel the power of Magick: Others cast all the blame upon devils, who notwithstanding think not so much of them as they may imagine; for love comes easily enough from natural causes, without going about to seek for it in the bottom of the Abyss. I here remember what Pliny recounteth of one Cresin, who manured a piece of ground which yielded him fruit in abundance, while his neighbours lands were extremely poor and barren, for which cause he was accused to have inchanted them: Otherwise, said his accuser, his inheritance could not raise such a revenue, while others stand in so wretched a Condition. But he pleading his cause, did nothing else but bring forth a lusty daughter of his, well fed, and well bred, who took pains in his garden, with strong carts, and stout oxen which ploughed his land, and the whole equipage of his Tillage in verie good order; He then cried out aloud before the Judges, Behold the art-Magick, and charms of Cresin; willing to shew, that we must not seek for hidden and extraordinary causes, where ordinarie are so evident.

Filiam validam & bene curatam.

Hæc sunt veneficia mea Quiriten.

Cæsus in culpam transit. Velleius Paterculus.

Plin. l. 18. cap. 16.

So in the like case we may say it is a thing most ridiculous, to see a body composed according to nature, sound, and verie strong, which hath fire in the spirits, and blood in the veins, which continually feeds high, lies soft, and perpetually converseth among women the most handsom, to complain of celestial influences, or the sorceries of Venus. Total Nature, especially since the corruption of sin, conspireth to make love. It sets Reason to sale (if it carefully take not heed) and insensibly draweth it to its side. There is not almost a stone, whereunder some scorpion lieth not; there is not a place where concupiscence spreadeth not out some net for us. It fighteth against our selves, makes use of our members, as of the Instruments of its battels, and the Organs of its wiles. There is sedition within, and war without, and never any repose, but by the singular grace of God. Tertullian writes, the chastity of men is the more painful, the fervour of concupiscence being the more fierie in their sex; and one may justly say, that such as persist all their life time in great resistances and notable victories, are Martyrs of puritie, who, having passed through fire and water, hasten to a place of refreshment. We have all one domestick enemy, which is our own body, that perpetually almost opposeth the dispositions of the spirit. If I go about to fetter it (saith S. John Climachus) it gets out of my hands; If I will judg it, it grows into favour with me; If I intend to punish it, it flatters me; If I will hate it, Nature commandeth me to love it; If I will fly from it, it saith, it is tied to my soul for the whole time of my life: If I will destroy it with one hand, I repair it with another; Is it too much cherished? it the more violently assaults me; Is it too much mortified? it cannot almost creep; watching withers it, sleep, on the other side fatteneth it; whips torment it, and dandlings corrupt it: By treating it ill, I endanger my life; by pampering it, I incur death. This sheweth, how Saints fortified themselves with much precaution, diligently observing the condition of nature, the causes of temptations, and the maladies of the soul, thereby the more successfully to practise the cure. They who are most retired (said the fore-alledged Author) fail not to feel domestick wars, but such as indifferently expose themselves to objects, are violently both within, and without assaulted.

Interiour causes of love.

Tertul. de Velandis Virgin. Continentia majoris arduris laboratior.

Rebellion of the flesh. S. Climach. de castitate, grad. 15. in fine. Quomodo illum vinciam, quem ut amem à naturâ suscepimus. Est cooperator, & hostis, adjutor atque adversarius, auxiliator simul & insidiator, &c.

The beautie and handsomness of one sex, is a sweet poison to the other, which entreth in by the eyes, and maketh strange havock: And I wonder not at all, that the Scripture compares it to a Panther (a savage and cruel beast) which with teeth teareth those she hath amuzed with the mirror-like spots of her skin, and drawn to her by the sweet exhalation of her body; It is more to be feared (said an Ancient) then the horns of the Bull, the teeth of the Lion, the gall of the Aspick, yea then fire or flames: and the holy Abbot of Mount Sinai saith, that had not God given woman shamefac'dness, which which is the scabbard wherein this sword is kept, there would be no salvation in the world.

The love of women dangerous.

The love of women caused Sampson's, David's, and Solomon's shipwracks. It hath besotted Sages, conquered the strong, deceived the prudent, corrupted saints, humbled the mightie. It hath walked on Scepters, parched on the lawrels of victours, thrown trouble into States, schism into Churches, corruption among Judges, furie into arms. It hath entred into places which seemed inaccessible, but to spirits and lightnings. And if beautie be so much to be dreaded, when it hath no other companions; how dangerous think we is it, when it causeth to walk along with it, pomp of apparel, attractives, dalliances, conning wiles, libertie of conversation, merriment, Good cheer, Courting, Idleness, Night, solitude, familiaritie? Need we to require any other charms then those to work the ruine of a soul?

Yet, besides these open causes, there are other secret ones to be found in the love of humour and fantasie, which insensibly fetter a mind, and suffer it not to find its chains.

Monsieur de la Chambre.

A modern Author hath of late written a treatise of the love of inclination, wherein he speaks verie pertinently of its original, and doth (according to his saying) seem to draw it a second time out of its Chaos. To understand his opinion, we must presuppose that which S. Thomas saith; That total

Nature loveth to present it self in the objects proposed unto it: And as they continually proceed from all things, coloured images and figures as it were wholly spiritual, which makes themselves to be seen, as in looking-glasses, and are received into the eyes to contribute to the effect of sight: so everie bodie hath its projections, and unperceivable influences, as we find in the power of Amber and the Adamant, which attract Iron and straw by the expiration they scatter in the air, to serve as instruments and hands to their attractions.

This being common to other natures of plants, metals and living creatures; we must not think but that the bodie of man participateth therein, by reason of its vivacitie and the multitude of pores, which give a more easie passage to such emissions. There then cometh forth a spirituous substance, which is (according to Marsilius Ficinus) a vapour of blood, pure, subtle, hot and clear, more strong or weak, according to the interiour agitation of spirits; which carrieth along with it some qualitie of a temperature, friendly and convenient, which insinuating it self into the heart and soul, doth (if it there find a disposition of conformitie) abide, as a seed cast into the earth, or as a Leaven which swelleth up a piece of dough, and forms this love of correspondence, with an admirable promptness and vigour.

From thence it cometh that Brothers many times feel motions and affections of tenderness, one for another, without knowing each other, as it happened to S. Justus, who knew his brother Justinian, among sundrie slaves who were at the chain, by this notice, without any other forejudgment. Thence it comes, that at first we are passionate for persons we never saw, and that we wish them well, though they alwaies have not so much grace nor beautie: but there is some relation of humour, which weaveth the web, and tieth such affections.

All nature is full of such communications, which are effects of Sympathy, observed in the Corall, which sensibly changeth according to his disposition, who hath it about him; as also in the flesh of beasts, which boileth in the powdring tub, at the time of the furie of dogs, because they have been bitten by a mad dog; And in wine, which seems to be sprinkled all over with certain white flowers, when the vines are in the blossom.

Modification of their opinion who place love only in transpiration.

So it happeneth that the spirits, which do in our bodies, what the winds do in Nature, being transpired from one bodie to another, and carrying in their wings, qualities consonant, do infallibly excite and awaken the inclinations. But it is not credible, or at least, ordinarie, that this manner of working should be, as in things inanimate, and that it hath nothing to do with the senses; for it is principally the eyes, which are interessed therein, breathing thence the most thin spirits, and darting forth the visual rayes, as the arrows of love, which penetrate the heart, are united, confounded, and lost one within another; then, heating the blood, they strike the Imagination, and attract wills, which are so linked one to another, that one cannot perceive the knot which so fast tied them together.

Species formæ semel, per oculos illigata, vix magni Lateranitis manu solvitur. Hieron. in Threnos cap. 3.

If transpiration alone of spirit, indifferently proceeding from all the parts of the bodie, were able to inflame concupiscence; we must then say, that a blind man set at a certain distance from a perfect beautie, would become enamoured without beholding it, hearing it, smelling it, touching it, or by any sense, understanding it: which notwithstanding happeneth not in that manner. And if nature thus proceedeth, and that this passion were to be taken as a Contagion, we might extremely fear the approach of bodies, and persist in continual apprehensions to be infected by them. It is certain, that the senses being well guarded, shut up all the gates against love, since the Imagination it self stirreth not, but upon their report; but after they yield themselves up by a two familiar conversation, and resign their defences; a terrible havock is made in the mind: for love entreth thereinto as a Conquerour into a surprized Citie, and impriteth that pleasing face in everie drop of the mass of blood, It engraveth it on the Imagination; It figureth it on everie thought, and there is nothing any longer entire in the mind, which is not divided between slaverie and frenzie.

A Guard over the Senses.

Sect. 7. The effects of Sensual Love.

IT is a strange thing, that this furie hath a thousand hands, and a thousand attractives, a thousand wayes of working, quite different, and many times opposite. It takes by the eyes, by the ears, by the imagination, by chance, of purpose, by flying, pressing forward, honouring, insulting, by complacence, and by disdain. Sometimes also it layes hold by tears, by laughing, by modestie, and by audacitie, by confidence, by carelessness, by wiles, by simplicitie, by speech and by silence. Sometimes it assaileth in companie, sometimes in solitude, at windows, at grates, in Theatres and in Cabinets, Bals, at sports, in a feast, at a Comedie, sometimes at Church, at prayers, in acts of Penance. And who can assure us against it without the protection of God? Eustathius the Interpreter of Homer, saith, there are some who feign Love to be the son of the wind and the Rainbow in Heaven; in my opinion, to signifie unto us its Inconstancie and diversified colours: and this beautiful Iris in the beginning appears all in Rubies, in Diamonds and Emeralds over our heads, afterward to cause rain and tempests: So, love sheweth it self at first with such bright semblances to our senses, occasioneth storms and corruption in our minds.

Observe one transfixed with violent love, and you shall shall find he hath all that, in his love, which Divines have placed in Hell, darkness, Flames, the worm of Conscience, an ill Savour, Banishment from the sight of God. You shall see a man, whose mind is bewitched, brain dislocated, and Reason eclipsed: All he beholdeth, all he meditateth on, all he speaketh, all he dreameth, is the creature he loveth. He hath her in his head and heart, painted, graved, carved in all the most pleasing forms. For her, he sometimes entreth into quakings, sometimes into faintings, another while into fits of fire and Ice, He flieth in the air, and instantly is drenched in the Abyss. He attendeth, He espieth, He fears, He hopes, He despairs, He groaneth, He sigheth, He blushes, He waxeth pale, He doteth in the best companie, He talks to woods and fountains, He writeth, He blots out, He teareth, He lives like a spectre estranged from the conversation of men: Repast is irksom to him; and Repose, which charmeth all the cares of the world, is not made for him. Still this fair one, still this cruel one tormenteth him, and God maketh him a whip of the thing he most loveth.

Yet is this more strange in the other sex, which hath naturally more inclination to Honestie. A Ladie chaste, or a virgin well-bred, who begins to wax cold in the love of God, and in the exercise of devotion, & takes too much liberty in her conversation with men, finds her self insensibly surprized by the eies & ears, by the heart, by the Garb: the Humour, the smiles, the speech, the silence, the courage, the discretion, of a man, layes a plot with her passion, to betray her reason. The poison of love by little and little spreads it self throughout all the veins; the presence of the object begins to cause blushing, paleness, unquietness, disturbance of the mind; so that she cannot tell what she desireth, nor what she would have. Absence awakeneth the Imagination, which makes an eccho of all the discourses of all the actions, that past in presence. This man is presented unto her in a thousand shapes; there is not a lineament, a word, a gesture, but is expressed. The understanding quickly creates to it self too many ill lights, the will too much fire, and the soul wholly propendeth to the thing beloved. Yet the fire of God awakeneth her, and suffers her to have good respites, which makes her ashamed to tell her own thoughts to her proper heart. Conscience and Honour make some resistance and glimmering flashes; and if there be found some good director who may help them in this first battel; they manie times, get the victorie. But if a soul be deprived of good counsel, abandoned to it self, and which is worse, sooth'd in its maladie, by some soft and complying spirit, it is an unhappiness which cannot sufficiently be deplored. Reason is weakned, shamefac'dness flies away, passion prevaileth; there is nothing left, but wandering of the soul, a feaver, a perpetual Frenzie, a neglect of works, of affairs, of functions, sadness, languor, Impatience, Confidence and affrightment. Shall she say so? shall she do so? God forbids it, the law menaceth it, and honour cries vengeance, The pleasure of a dream, and beyond it nothing but Abysses. Love notwithstanding urgeth, & strikes at all considerations, they impute to stars, to destinie, to Necessitie, what is nothing but follie. They think business is done, when it is but thought on; that they must be audacious; and that there are crimes which are sanctified in world's opinion by the good hap of their successes. They come to that pass, that they no longer sin by method, but through exorbitancie, Præsumum ac falsa facta virtus vocatur. Senec.

In some, Love is sharp and violent; in others, dull and impetuous; in others toyish and wanton; in others, turbulent and cloudie; in others, brutish and unnatural; in others, mute and shamefac'd; in others, perplexed and captious; in others, light and transitorie; in others, fast and retentive; in others, fantastick and inconstant; in others, weak and foppish; in others, stupid and astonished; in others, distempered; in some, furious and desperate. Diversities of love.

It inflameth the blood, it weakens the bodie, it wanneth the colour, it holloweth the eyes, it overthrows the mind; it hath somewhat of being possessed and witchcraft; something of Idolatrie. For you behold in those who are entred far into this passion, floods and Ebbs of thoughts, Fits and Countenances of one possessed, and it is in all of them to deifie the creature of whom they are so passionately enamoured, and would willingly set it in the place where the Sun and stars are, yea upon Altars. All which proceeds from it, is sacred; chains & wounds are honourable with them, if they come from this beloved hand. They would die an hundred times for it, so it throw but so much as a handful of flowers, or distil but a poor tear on their Tomb. Mœchis affinis Idolatriæ. Tertul. de pudicitia.

It is to deceive, to say that love excludeth all other passions; it awakeneth them, and garboileth them, and makes them all wait on it; It causeth aversion, Hatred, Jealousie, envie, hope, sadness, despair, anger, mirth, tears, scorn, grief, songs, and sighs. And as it is thought that evil spirits shuffle in storms, to stir up lightning flasks, and make the thunderstroke the more terrible and pernicious: So is it likewise true that the angel of darkness involveth himself in these great tempests of love, manie times making use of the abominable ministerie of Magicians, and acteth Treasons, furies, fierings, poysonings, murders and ransackings. And how should it spare its enemie, since it is cruel to its self? It maketh some to sink in the twinkling of an eye: drinking their blood, and insensibly devouring their members. It confineth others into regions of Hobgoblins and darkness. It kills and murdereth those who have the most constantly served it. It sharpneth the sword which transfixed Amnon. It shaved and blinded Samson. It gave an Halter to Phyllis, A downfal to Timagoras, A gulph to Galeazzo; and caused Hemon to kill himself on the tomb of Antigone. Volumes would not be sufficient for him who should write all the tragedies which daily arise from this passion; all pens would be weak, words be dried up, and wits lost therein. Evil Angels intermeddle in the great tempests of love. Cruelty of love on the persons of lovers.

Sect. 8. Remedies of evil Love by precaution.

I Leave you now (dear Reader) to argue within your self, whether one who hath never so little humane judgment for his comportment and quiet, ought not to bend all his endeavours to banish the furie, which plungeth his whole life in so great acerbities and such horrible calamitie. But if you desire to know the way, the first thing I advise you while you are yet in perfect health, is seriously to consider, that one cannot be chaste, but by a most singular gift from God, (as the wiseman saith) and therefore it is necessarie to have a particular recourse to the most blessed Trinity, which according to S. Gregory Nazianzen, is the first of virgins humbly beseeching it, by the intercession of the most pure among creatures, & by the mediation of your Angelguardian, to deliver you from the reproaches of the spirit of impuritie, in such sort that you may pass your life innocently, and it may become inaccessible Distrust of ones self, recourse to God.

Love is sometimes the punishment of pride. Climach. de castitate.

accessible to the pollutions of flesh. If you feel your self free from this vice, yet enter not into any vain complacence of your self, as if it proceeded from your own forces, and not from heavens benignitie. Above all, take heed of pride, for the most illuminated Fathers have observed that God oft-times permitteth arrogant spirits to fall into carnal sins, to abate the fiercenes of their courage by the sensible ignominie of the stains of luxurie: and this is so proper to quail the exorbitance of humane arrogance; that God had not a better Counterpoise to make S. Paul humble, in such heighth of revelations, then the sting of the flesh. Pardon not your self any thing, no not so much as the shadow of this sin; but only excuse such as fall through some notable surprisal, or pitiful frailtie. Think, if you have not experienced the like falls, you are beholding to your good hap for it, rather then to your merit: presume not at all of your strength or integritie; but resolve with your self that the presumption of ones own power maketh up the moitie of Impudencie.

Ene magnitudo revelationis exollas me, datus est mihi stimulus carnis meæ Angelus Satanæ qui me colaphizet. Cor. 2. 12.

Knowledg of ones self.

Learn how seasonably you may know your self, by considering your own temperature, your humours, the inclinations of your mind, your judgment, your courage. Behold the part wherein you are the most sensible, and where you give most access to your enemie to tempt you. Endeavour to fortifie your self that way, and the more inabilitie you therein find, use the more precaution: if you be weak, fear nothing but your infirmitie: and if you be strong, fear all, yea even your own safetie.

Disposition of ages.

Sometimes the seasons of age, which might seem more to propend to lust, are peaceful and calm enough. In our bodies there is a spring-tide in winter, to become afterward a winter in the spring-tide. Youth transported by other purposes, or withheld by a serious education, is quiet enough, and riper years fall into the most stormie part of the tempest. It hath happened to divers to converse many years with a contrarie sex, and never to have felt any touch, from which, they have entered into a strong confidence that served for a bait in the peril, which had spared them in a thousand occasions, the more notable to ruin them in one sole accident.

Fly second occasions.

Flight from occasions is the most assured bulwark for chastitie, and who can carrie himself well in this affair shall be much stronger by flying, then were Conquerours in the bravest battels; a retreat in this, being as honourable as victorie. The world was never so beautiful, so gentle, nor so squarely disposed: Bodies, apparel, garb, civil behaviour, complement, wit, merriment, entertainments, books, songs, airs, voices, plays, balls, races, walkings, Banquets, Feasts, libertie (which at first seem innocent enough) Conversation, and great confidence; lastly, all we heard, all we see, all we smell, all we taste, all we touch in so great effeminacie of life, seems to be made to persecute puritie. I am almost of Tertullian's opinion, who saith, it is more easie to die for chastitie, then to live with it. Women were found in the world, who suffered themselves to be martyred under Tyrants, for the defence of chastitie; who, had they long continued among pleasure, Courtships, Curiosities, and the importunities of men, I should fear, might have yielded that to a lover, which they would have denied to an Executioner. There are a thousand, and a thousand creatures, infinitely much alienated from voluptuous pleasures. They love the dispositions to love, but hate the effects thereof; and it seems to them they may do as it is read in Romances, they will spend their time in the pleasing conversation of a friend, and talk of nothing else; but they perceive not that men seek them not, but for what they should fly, that they at length undermine them as a city besieged; and desire not to afford them any peace but by the conquest of their honour, which they ought more bravelie to maintain, then life.

Time videre, unde possis cadere, noli fieri, perversa simplicitate securus. August. in Psalm 50.

The attractives of the world were never so urgent. Tertul. in exhortatione ad castitatem.

Majus est vivere cum castitate quàm pro ea mori.

Compla-cence stronger then fire and sword.

We find an ancient Embleme of a Duke of Burgundy, where was to be seen a pillar, which two hands sought to overthrow; the one had wings, and the other was figured with a Tortoise, the word, Utcunque, as much as to say, which way soever, I will have it. There are Amourists, who take the like course; Some strike down the pillars of chastitie by the sudden and impetuous violence of great promises, offers, unexpected presents, pressing necessitie. Others proceed therein with a Tortoises pace, with long patience, daily assiduitie, faithful services, and profound submissions. They are not all so sottish, as to talk at first to an honest woman of her dishonour, they only intreat she will accept of a man, who will live or die for her, begging nought else, but a remembrance. They play not the rapt lovers, by everie moment declaring their fervours, their torments, and martyrdom; They serve, they sooth, they continually frequent, they spie out all occasions, they silently practise all the waies they can, to come to the end of their designs, and often it happeneth, that as drops of water incessantly falling, do hollow Rocks, so ceasles complements soften the most inaccessible rigours. What would not a man do who is so base, as to waste ten years of service to kiss a womans hand, and suffer for a shameful servitude, that, which others could not endure for an Empire?

Josuæs Dux burgundiæ in Symbolis Imperatorum. Great cunning of men who go about to surprise chastity.

It is evident, that the persecutions of chastitie being so manifest in all objects (as I said before) if you desire to be faithful to God, and charitably to preserve a precious treasure, you must necessarily either live with singular modestie in the world, or die out of it, if you cannot be saved in it.

Advice to Ladies and Gentlewomen.

You Ladies who read this, it is not required of you, that for the love of chastitie, you should be reduced to an affected negligence, to some ugly habits, to fashions rough and barbarous, as Roman women were when their husbands fed upon acorns, as yet unaccustomed to the use of bread. Some neatnes, some quaint trims must of necessitie be admitted in a woman, which seems to be bound with her bodie, and is the cause, why the wisest and most modest among them, do not (notwithstanding) renounce civil decorum, you must walk, and converse modestly within your self, remembring what the Apostle saith, That your apparel alone should make you be known for Ladies, who make profession of pietie.

1 Tim. 8. Quod decet habentes pietatem.

Whom would you be thought to be in the day of judgment? Would you be there accounted Christians, when you have all the signs about you of women the most wordly, that ever lived among Infidels? To what purpose are those garments so pompious, those stuffs so costly, those guizes so sought after, those colours so fantastick, those jewels so sumptuous, that painting so shameless, those curls so extravagant, those braveries, those patches, and those robbers, unless it be to cut the throat of chastitie? Is it not a reproach to Christianitie to say, that an infinite quantite of Hospitals might be founded out of the superfluities which so many Ladies unprofitably waste about their bodies? Is it not a point of cruelty, that there are so many lazars, who breath out the remnant of their days, laid upon ſtraw, where they are only covered with the putrefaction of their ulcers, whiles there are bodies, who drag at their heels the ſpoil of Elements, and riches of the Univerſe, to prank themſelves ſo induſtriouſly, as if they were of the matter of the ſun and ſtars? God, who hath a care everie year to make garments all ſprinkled over with the pearls of ſo many meadow-flowers, is not wiſe enough to inſpire you with the faſhion you ſhould entertain in your attires. Heaven and earth muſt be turned topſie-turvie, nature forced, and all arts wearied out to invent extravagances, to ſerve as inſtruments to Luxurie. I wiſh thoſe gorgets might be ſeen at the day of judgement, which we have beheld worn in Paris, worth the revenue of an honeſt family, and wherein Ingenious Artiſts had employed three years of their time: I much deſire to know with what arms theſe miſerable creatures would defend themſelves, who have made ſo proud a monument of their vanitie, to erect an eternal reproach of their puniſhment.

Tom. 10. ſer. 147. de Tempore

A diſſolute habit, ſaith S. Auguſtine, is a meſſenger of the adulteries of the mind; A woman, who will appear too quaint before the world, cannot have a chaſte heart before God.

They are not content with all this vaſt preparation, but nakedneſs of necks, muſt be expoſed, which is reprehended by God, ſhameful to their ſex, injurious to nature, and ſcandalous to civil decencie.

Lamiæ nudaverunt mammam, Lallaverunt catulos ſuos.

They are the breaſts of Lamia's whereof the Prophet ſpeaketh in his Lamentations, which ſerve not but to nouriſh the impurities of Gallants, and foſter their Luxurie. A woman who expoſeth that which ſhould be hidden, will one day be enforced to hide that which wil neceſſarilie be made publick. A Virgin who delights to ſhew the nakedneſs of her body, maketh it enough appear, ſhe is not a Virgin, by how much ſhe uncovers her ſelf on the one ſide, by ſo much on the other ſhe cloaths her ſelf with the brand of ignominy. God by his Prophet commandeth women to take adulteries out of their boſoms, but it is in the nakedneſs of the neck, where they begin, to conclude afterward in all the parts of the bodie. They make no ſcruple of it, becauſe this vice is an immortal evil, which having ſo many hands wherewith to do hurt, hath no eyes at all to underſtand it ſelf.

A ſmall expreſſion, and an odd one, Hoſ. 2.

Auferve adulteria de medio uberum ſuorum.

Alas! whoſoever had any (never ſo little) love of her Chriſtiantie, and reſpect towards God, would quickly within her ſelf condemn all this exorbitancie, and make a thouſand times more account of the counſel of Saints then of the cuſtoms of blinded ſouls. Tell me not (Ladies) you do it very innocently; for a woman diſſolute in dreſſes (which is the cauſe of the ſins men commit,) is as a land full of thieveries, where though the Lord be no robber, yet he becomes infamous. You on your bodie bear the Eve the penitent, who was cloathed with the ſimple skins, and you will inceſſantly carry her in worldly pomps. All that (ſaith Tertullian) is but the equipage and furniture of a woman half damned, which would be more fit for the ſetting forth of her funerals, then the ornament of her bodie.

Damnate & mortuæ mulieris impedimenta quaſi ad pompam funeris conſtituti. Tert. de hab. mulieris.

Take pity of ſo much of the world that periſheth, take pity of your ſelves, enter into the way of a modeſt life, regulated in your habits, your converſation, your recreations, that all may therein ſpeak, and breath the odour of virtue.

Then have you a ſingular means to free your ſelves from the importunities which aſſail chaſtity; for verily none would addreſs themſelves to women, if they thought not they were places that will render upon compoſition. A face which hath a Chriſtian aſpect drives away all the loves of the world, as the flower of the vine diſſipateth ſerpents.

Sect. 9. Other Remedies, which nearer hand oppoſe this paſſion.

Advices and remedies againſt this Paſſion in its full.

THeſe in my opinion are remedies which, at diſtance oppoſe this paſſion, & not only ſuffer it, not to come near us; but if it happen that we muſt grapple with it, and joyn battle with it in ſome urgent temptation; I adviſe you never to begin the combat, until you have well weighed the end of it. Love, at firſt, comes to us with the viſage of a Virgin, and returneth from us with the bodie of a Serpent. He, who will know the utmoſt limits of it, ſhould never make trial of its entrance.

The medal of love hath two faces.

The Antients heretofore delighted to make medals, the faces whereof were quite different and contrarie; ſo as, if upon one ſide of the medal they graved an Achilles, on the other they figured a Therſites; if upon one ſide an Abſalom, on the other an Eſop, if on the one an Hecuba, on the other an Helena, and if upon one ſide a Roſe, on the other an Onion. This is obſerved in the medal of Carnal Love, if you look upon it on one ſide, you ſhall ſee a figure infinitely ſweet and charming, on the other a moſt hideous furie. A thouſand and a thouſand Artiſts have ſet their hand, one to the pen, another to the graving-chizzel, another to the pencil, to write, inſculp, and paint the form of evil Love: but I think that Solomon, as he more ſenſibly felt the effects of it, gave us alſo more light, how to make a draught in deteſtation of this unhappy paſſion.

An excellent conceit of Solomon concerning Love. Prov. 7.

1. Intexui funibus lectulum meum.
2. Aſperſi cubile meum myrrhâ & aloe.
3. Victimati pro ſalute devovi.
4. Bos ductus ad victimam, agnus laſciviens, ovis ad laqueum.
5. Vas infernî domûs, &c.

I have noted in the Book of Proverbs, where it deſcribes the deteſtable loves of a poor young man deceived by a cunning Courteſan, that it gives four or five properties to Carnal Love, which very notably diſcover the miſerie & impoſture thereof. Firſt, That its bed is woven with cords in the form of a little labyrinth, with many intricate windings. Secondly, That its chamber is perfumed with myrrh and aloes, verie bitter drugs. Thirdly, That it in the beginning promiſeth a ſacrifice, and performs a ſlaughter. Fourthly, That the Lover who ſuffers himſelf to be deceived, is firſt an ox, then a ſheep, and laſtly, A bird, taken into a ſnare, and wounded with a mortal arrow. Fifthly, That the houſe thereof is in the ſuburbs of hell.

All this is ſpoken with great ſenſe, the beds woven with cords & hampered with ſo many Gordians knots, ſignifieth unto us the gins and attractives of evil Love. Falſe opinion is ever at the gates of its houſe, which deceiveth and bewitcheth all ſuch as come near it. It cares not in the beginning of the gain to diſcover to them the dreadful events and tragedies of this paſſion; but it ſhews them a chamber wherein beauty is preſented, which under a little white skin hideth groſs ordures: with it are ſmiles, glances, flatteries, courtſhips, overflow of words, kiſſes, fauſineſs, immodeſty, good chear, idleneſs; this ſeems a goodly thing to ſottiſh youth, which hath nothing ſo certain as ruine. Theſe are the ſnares wherewith it ſurpriſeth, and the knots which many times indiſſolubly fetters its liberty. After that coms the chamber perfumed with myrrh & aloes, wherein the ſlight expected pleaſures are drenched in great acerbities. There folly, temerity, liberty meet, mixed with care, terrour, diſtruſt, tears, ſighs, falſhood, perjury, dolours, jealouſies, execrations, rage, which cauſed an Antient to ſay, That the heart of a Lover

Plutarch. in Sympoſ.

Lover was a city, in which upon one and the same day were seen sports and banquets, battels and funerals. In the third place, a slaughter-house is opened, where we clearly behold, that false love, which insinuateth it self with so many fair resemblances, is nothing but massacres both of body and soul, and that it is not without cause, that a foolish Lover saith in the best of Comick Poets, that the first Executioner that ever was on earth, was Love, which he saith, taught men all cruelties & tortures: adding that to love fondly, and to be racked on a wheel, was in a manner all one. In this place of slaughter, there are likewise seen pictures of Samson, with his eyes pulled out pouring forth tears and blood through the same channel. Of Amnon who transfixed with a deadly and dreadful wound, yields up the ghost in a feast at the foot of his brother Absalom's table, for having violated Thamar. On the other side, two armies of Gods people, who cruelly kill one another for a luxurious act committed on the person of a married wife; so that of one part, eighteen thousand men were massacred, and of the other, more then twenty and five thousand. And round about, there is nothing but halters, poison, swords, blood, racks, gibbets, and precipices. See here the goodly Sacrifices of Lust. In the fourth chamber are beheld the transfigurations of sottish Love, where he who is strucken with it, becomes first stupid as an Ox; dull and benummed in his wits, as having a paralytick soul; and brutish, like Nebuchadnezzar, who forsook his Regal throne, to eat hay with beasts. Then he is shorn as a sheep, by taking away his fleeces, and despoiling him of the goods of soul, body, wealth, and reputation, and of all that, to which a reasonable creature may pretend unto. Lastly, to cut off all hope of recovery, he is unfeathered like a bird caught in a gin, yea, his wings are taken away, which are the desires of futurely doing well, that he may perpetually have the evil in object, and an inability towards good. The first chamber is very near to hell; there is to be seen darkness, smoke, flames, and from whence are heard gnashings of teeth, despairs, and enraged complaints of unfortunate Lovers, who vomit out their souls in sin, having made no expiation by a long penance. Oh God! what is he, who beholding this picture, would ever betray his soul, heaven, and his God, to yield obedience to loathsome lust?

Plautus in Cystellaria.

Jud. 16.

2 Sam. 13.

Judg. 20.

All this well considered, give your self a little leisure to rally your thoughts together, and to behold the disasters which wait on the experience of miserable sin. If you be a Virgin, stain not the honour of your body, vilifie not in your flesh on earth, a virtue to which Angels afford such glory in heaven. Above all, beware of a damnable curiosity, which cannot be known, but by becoming criminal. If you understand the sin, profit by your experience, and betray not an eternity of blessing, for a pleasure so short and wretched. If you be a master of a Family, and a man of quality, note what S. Gregory Nazianzen saith, That a man by his sin wholly ruineth body, soul, estate, and reputation. He is terrible in his house, shameful abroad, he serves for an executioner to a chaste wife, he is a tyrant to his children, a reproach to his friends, a scourge to his domesticks, a dishonour to his allies, a blemish to his renown, a shipwrack to his means, and a fable to all the world. If you be a maid, ever fear to become a woman, and cast not the garland of your virginity under the feet of hogs. Give not a hair of your head to them who promise you golden mountains, and when they desire you in the quest of marriage, then is the time you must least be for marriage. All you grant to their importunity, will be the subject of your disgrace; and when they shall have wedded you, should you live as chaste as Susanna, they will continually imagine, you will be liberal to others, of that, whereof you were prodigal to them. If you desire to marry by fancy, rather pursuing your own wanton humours, then the reasonable commands of those to whom you owe your being, hold it as a crime, the most capital you may undertake, and confidently believe, if so you do, you will open a flood-gate to a deluge of miseries and cares, which will flow upon you through all the parts of your life. Account the resolutions you make to this purpose, as treasons, and think whosoever shall to you suggest the execution of them, will poison you by the ear to murder your chastity.

Disasters of love in every age and condition.

Advice to all sorts of persons.

Greg. Naz. homil. de Famis.

If you be a married woman, and peradventure innocent enough, and of good reputation, what colour is there for you to engage your self in a crime for which husbands have furies, laws, thunders, threats, Judges for Sentence, punishments of gibbets and bloudy scaffolds, and for which, a thousand poor creatures have ended their miserable lives, surprised in the heat of sin, to pass from a temporal fire, to that which never is quenched. If you be a man of the sword, know it is given you to defend honour, not to violate it, & that a man who suffers himself to be led by women, what Rhodomontado's soever he make in words, he is ever a coward.

If you be a Judge or an Officer, raised up into an eminent place, degrade not your self of the honours which God hath imprinted on your forehead, and never mount you up to the throne of Judicature, to condemn your own act, and still think the purple, which will not be died but by virginal hands, ought not to be worn but on a chaste body.

If you be an Ecclesiastick, and which is more, engaged to Religion or Prelacy; will you be so unnatural as ever to consent to a sin, which cannot in your person but be a sacriledge? What a madness is it, that for to satisfie an infamous act of lust, you must be either an excommunicate, or a persecutour of Jesus Christ? Excommunicate (I say) if you forsake altars, and a persecutour of Jesus Christ, if you come to them in this horrible sin, where you strike a nail into his hand, a lance into his side, you devour his flock, and kill his brethren by your ill example.

Carnal Love, in what person soever, is still ill situate (said Epictetus) In a maid it is a shame, in a woman it is a fury, in a man a lewdness, in youth it is a rage, in mans estate a blemish, in old-age a disgrace worthy of scorn.

You will say, all these considerations are very effectual, but that they cure not passion already inflamed, and almost desperate of remedy.

To that I answer, we must proceed with more efficacie and address, among such as are surprised with vehement affection of which they would be free, but they find all possible repugnancies.

I approve not the course of certain directions, who think all maladies are healed by words, as if they had ears. To what purpose is it to hold long discourses, and to appoint many meditations to a sharp feaver, which is full of ravings and furious symptomes?

Diversity of the maladies of love, and their cures.

Albeit maladies of Love are not cured in one and the same manner: There are some who are engaged in the sense of the passion, but not in the consent to the sin; which is expresly sent by God to persons very innocent, but not entirely perfect, to punish some negligences or some slight liberties of conversation, whereinto they have suffered themselves to slide by surprisal; that they may feel the danger of sin by the torment they suffer, and may correct themselves by the scent of the smoke before they be involved in the flame. And this many times lasteth long, being ordained as under a sentence of the divine Providence, as a punishment to become afterward a bridle to negligence, and a precaution against peril.

to

Some also are permitted by heaven, and imposed upon certain souls who had a little too much rigour towards such as were tempted, to the end, they might learn by their experience more mildly to handle suffering hearts, and not exasperate their wounds by the sharpness of the remedie. Witness that old man of whom Cassian speaketh; who having roughly entertained a young religious man, that discovered his passion to him, was tempted so violently, that he thereby became frantick, and understood from the venerable Abbot Apollon, this had befaln him by reason of his great harshness; and that although he hitherto had not felt any rebellion against chastitie, it was because the devil either knew him not, or contemned him.

Cas. col. 2. de discret. Imitiga it, vel ignorans, subtrahitur à diabolo vel despectus.

There are some which like tertian and quartane agues, have their accesses and recesses measured; and what diligence soever be used therein (well, the pain may be mitigated, but) the root is not taken away till it arrive to a certain period of time, wherein the sick man is insensibly cured. There are some driven away by hunger, and others overthrown by a reasonable usage, as it happeneth to melancholy Lovers, whose bodies are dry, and brains hollow: if you appoint them fasts and austerities ill ordered, you kill them. Some advise them recreation, wine, bathes, honest and pleasing company, necessary care of the body.

Some, sweet and active entertainment, which gives not leisure to the wild fancies of the mind; but this must be taken with much moderation. There are some who expect a good sickness, and many blood-lettings, which may evacuate all the blood imprinted with Images of the thing beloved, to make a new body; others are cured by a suit, a quarrel, ambition, an ill business, great success, a new state of life, a voyage, a marriage, an office, a wife. There are now very few fools of Love to be found, who neglect worth and honour to serve their passion.

There are nice and suspicious Loves, which have more of vanitie then concupiscence; when one troubleth and hindreth them from honestly seeing that which they love, they are distempered, and if one resist them not, they vanish away as if they had not had so much intention to love, as to vanish. It were almost necessary for many, if it may be done without sin or scandal, to converse continually; for being somewhat of their own nature, coy, they still observe some defect in the thing beloved, which weakneth their passion, and find that the presence is much inferiour to their Idea, which is the cause they easily desist from their enterprise, having more shame to have begun it, then purpose to continue it.

Some are inflamed by denial, others become totally cool by contempt, as proud and predominate loves, who have not learn'd to suffer the imperious carriage of a woman; a disdain of their mistress, a cunning trick, a coldness, a frown, makes them quickly break their chains. One would not believe how many humane industries there are to cure the pain of Love, but ever it is better to owe ones health to the fear of God, to Penance, to Devotion, then to all other inventions.

Solid remedies.

For which cause, you must consider the glorious battles which so many heroick souls have waged to crush this serpent, and to walk with noble steps in the liberty of the children of God.

Admirable examples of the combats of Saints against love.

Some have fought with it on thorns, as S. Bennet; others on flowers, as the Martyr Nicetas, who being bound on a bed of roses with silken cords, to resign himself to the love of a courtesan, spit out his tongue in her face. Others have thrust sharp pointed reeds under their nails, as S. John the Good: others have quenched it in snows, as S. Francis: others in flames, as S. Martinian, who, being by an unchaste woman sollicited to sin, burnt his face and hands to overthrow the strongest passion, by the most violent pain. There are many of them in the new Christianity of Japonia, who pursue the same waies, & run to their chimney-hearths to vanquish the temptations of the flesh, thinking there is not a better remedie against this fire, then fire it self. Others have overcome this bruitishness by a savage life, as S. Theoclista, who, being taken by Arabians, stole from them, and was thirtie years hidden in the forrests, living on grass, and clothing her self with leaves. To say truly, there is not any virtue hath cost mankind so much, as invincible Chastitie.

But since these manners of conquests are more admirable then imitable; at least mortifie your bodie by some ordinary devotion. Make use of the memorie of death, make use of assiduitie of prayer, of labour, of care over the eyes, ears, heart, and all the senses.

Ubi fervor infedrit virus, libidinis quoque incendium necesse est pervenire. Cas. de Spiritu fornic. c. 23.

Humble your spirit, and submit to obedience, that your flesh may obey you. Be not transported with extravagancies, animositie, and revenge: since Anger and Love (according to the Antients) work upon one subject, and that the same fervours of blood which make men revengeful, will make them unchaste; sail not to heal your self by the practice of retirement, of penance, of hair-cloth, and fasting. A holy maid of Alexandria was twelve years in a sepulchre to free her self from the importunities of concupiscence; and cannot you be there one hour, so much as in thought? Another had this stratagem to elude love; for, she seeing a young man to be very much touched with her love, who ceased not to importune her with all the violent pursuits which passion could suggest; told him, she had made a vow to fast fortie daies with bread and water; of which she would discharge her self before she would think of any thing else, and asked whether he pleased not to be a partie for the trial of his love? which he accepted: but in few daies he was so weakned, that he then more thought upon death then love. Have not you courage to resist your enemie by the like arms? your heart faileth you in all that is generous, and you can better tell how to commit a sin then to do penance. Then chuse out that which is most necessary and reasonable, separation, from that body so beloved which by its presence is the nourishment of your flames. Consider you not, that comets which (as it is said) are fed by vapours of the earth, are maintained whilst their mother furnisheth them with food? so love which shineth, and burns like a false star in the bottome of your heart, continually taketh its substance and sustenance from the face which you behold with so much admiration, from the conversation which entertains you in an enchanted palace full of chains and charms. Believe me, unlose this charm, stoutly take your self off, dispute not any longer with your concupiscence; fly away, cut the cable, weigh anchor, spread sails, set forward, go, fly: Oh how a little care will quickly be passed over! Oh, how a thousand times will you bless the hour of this resolution! Look for no more letters, regard not pictures; no longer preserve favours; let all be to preserve your reason. Ah! why argue you still with your own thoughts? Take me then some Angel, some Directour, who is an able, intelligent, industrious, courageous man; resigne your self wholly up to his advice, he will draw you out from these fires of Gomorrah, to place you in repose and safety on the mountain of the living God.

The counsel and assiduity of a good Directour, is an excellent antidote.

I adde also one advice (which I think very essential) which is, infinitely to fear relapses after health, and to avoid all that may re-enkindle the flame. For Love oft-times resembleth a snake inchanted, cast asleep, and smothered; which, upon the first occasions, awaketh, and becomes more stronger and more outrageous then ever. You must not only fortifie your bodie against it, but your heart; for, to what purpose is it to be chaste in your members, and be in thought an adulterer! Many stick not to entertain love in their imagination, with frequent desires, without putting them in execution: but they should consider, that Love, though imaginarie, makes not an imaginarie hell; and that for a transitory smoke, they purchase an eternal fire.

Sect. 10. Of Celestial Amities.

But it is time we leave the giddie fancies of Love, to behold the beauties and lights of divine Charitie, which causeth peace in battles, conquest in victories, life in death, admiration on earth, and paradise in heaven it self. It is a strange thing that this subject (the most amiable of all) proves somewhat dreadful to me, by the confluence of so many excellent Writers, antient and modern, who have handled it so worthily, since their riches hath impoverished their successions, and their plentie maketh me in some sort to fear sterilitie.

They had much furtherance in their designe; they took as much stuff as they thought good, referring all that to the love of God, which is in nature, and above nature, in grace, and beyond grace. They have enlarged themselves in great volumes, the sight whereof alone seems to have much majesty: and to please their own appetites, they have said all they might possible. But here, forasmuch as concerneth my purpose, I have reduced my self into contractions of great figures, which will not prove troublesome, if measures and proportions be therein observed, and nothing forgotten of all that, which is most essential to the matter we treat. I find my self very often enforced to confine giants to the compass of a ring, and to cover ships under the wing of a fly, drawing propositions out of a huge mass of thoughts and discourses, to conclude them in a little Treatise, not suffering sublimitie to take ought away of their facilitie, nativeness of their majestie, shadows of their lustre, nor superficies of their dimensions.

Myrmecidia opera apud Æliannm.

Besides, that which renders this my discourse the less pleasing, is, that speaking to men of the world, I cannot disguise the matter in unknown habits, splendid & pompous words, conceptions exstatick; I cannot perswade them that a Seraphin hath penetrated the heart of one with a dart of fire, and that another hath had his sides broken by the strength of the love of God. I must pursue ordinary waies, and teach practices more nearly approaching to our humanitie.

I am then resolved to shew, there are celestial Amities, which great souls contract with God, that their condition is very excellent and most happy, and that the practice of them must begin in this world, to have a full fruition of them in the other.

Carnal spirits, which only follow animal waies, have much a-do to conceive how a man can become passionate in the love of God, and think there is no affection but for temporal and visible things: It is a Love too high (say they) to tranferre their affections into heaven: It is a countrey wherein we have no commerce, There comes neither letter nor message thence; No ships arrive on that coast; It is a world separated from ours by a great Chaos wholly impenetrable. How would you I love God, since he is all Spirit, and I a bodie? He is Infinite, I finite. He so high, and I so low. It is a kind of insolencie to go about to think of it. Behold, how spirits, ignorant of heavens mysteries, do talk. But I maintain upon good grounds, that we are made to place our love in the heart of God, and that if we do not seasonably take this way, well we may go on, but never shall we arrive at Repose.

That there may be a celestial amity by the commerce of man with God.

First, the Philosopher Plato hath worthily observed, that the love we have here below, is as a remembrance of the first, fair, sovereign, and most pure of all beauties, which is the Divinitie. Our soul, which is the blast of his mouth, the image of his bountie, the representation of his power, as it beareth so lively characters of his Majestie, hath (as it were) also, not heeding it, a generous passion towards him: unless it be infected by the breath of the serpent, and obstructed by vapours of sensualitie; it seeks for him; it speaks to him in all creatures: It beholdeth him through so many veils which nature hath spread before it in so divers objects. But it often falleth out, that, charmed with present pleasures, it is so much delighted with beautiful workmanships, that it forgetteth the workman: It embraceth momentary beauties for eternal verities: It takes the shadow for the bodie: It creates to it self an Empire in banishment, and a haven in shipwrack. This carnal piece, which is ravished with the contemplation of this goodly face, will not stay upon flesh: It feeleth there is some invisible hand which shoots arrows at it amidst the vermilion of roses, and the whiteness of lillies: It well knoweth not what transports it, what intranceth it, what worketh these transanimations in it: It is not the bodie which must rot, but it is the shadow of the first-fair, upholds it self in the frailtie of dying things, and incessantly causeth returns to the first origin, in souls which know how to profit by their wounds.

An excellent conceit of Plato. Plato in Sympos. & Marsil. Ficinus. Amor memoria primi, ac summi, & purissimi pulchri. Appetitus artis, desertor artificis, amplectitur speciem, cujus non miratur autorem. S. Eucherius ep. Parenti.

O how attractive is the Beautie! O should it on a sudden take away the veil from all mortal eies who court it; the world in an instant would dissolve under its much to be adored raies, souls would fly out of bodies, and total nature would impetuously affect its delights.

It is so naturally imprinted on the heart of man, that Hell it self cannot forget it, since the evil rich man laid on the coals of so unfortunate a lodging, did for his first act, lift up his eies to heaven, as desirous to look for the lovely face which he had eternally lost.

Aug. l. 2. conf. c. 6.

Secondly, I will deliver an excellent reason, which I draw out of S. Augustine, to convince us, that there is some very forcible inclination which insensibly moveth us to the love of God: which is the

An excellent reason of S. Augustine, to shew the inclination we have to love God.

the cause that even our vices and exorbitancies (not reflecting thereon) love some perfection of the Divinitie, although not regulated, nor limited in the bounds wherewith it ought to be beloved. Pride contends for heighth; and what is higher then God, who sits upon Thrones, predominateth over Dominations, who governeth Principalities, and makes Heaven bow even to the Abyss, under the shadow of his Majestie?

Ambition passionately seeketh after honours; and who hath more honour then God, who seeth Glorie to be hatched in his own bosome, for whom so many Altars smoke, for whom so many sacrifices burn, under whom so many Diadems bow, to whom so many Sceptres obey, before whom so many States, Kingdoms, and Empires, are but a drop of dew? Power will make it self great; and who is more formidable then this great Judge, for whom Thunders roar, Lightnings fly, Thunder-stones shiver lofty rocks, for whom elements fight, and nature dresseth up its scaffolds, to prosecute offenders even in hell; there being neither Place, Time, Heighth, or Power which hath abilitie to deliver it self out of his hands? Flatterie and Complacence will make it self to be beloved; and what is more lovely then the sweetness of the charity of this good Father, which distilleth like unto a celestial Manna upon all the creatures of the Universe? Curiositie affecteth the studie of wisdome; And what is wiser then God, who seeth all within himself, who hath Abysses of knowledges in his heart, riches of eternal Sapience in his bosome, for whom Time hath no prescription, nature no veil, Heighth no heighth, and abysses, no depth? Who is the Father of Sciences, Creatour of Thoughts, Treasure of Eloquence; who dazleth all humane abilitie, who taketh his Sages from among Ideots, and out of the dumb raiseth his Oratours? Lazinesse seeks out a life soft and peaceful, continually fixed upon its repose, and the contentments of the flesh and spirit; and where shall we find the repose out of God, since it is he who is perpetually engulphed in the delights of a pure tranquillitie? Luxurie ardently desireth pleasures, and will satisfie all the desires of its heart; And God, is he not the plenitude of joy, an Abundance which never fails, a sweetness incorruptible, a feast which consumeth not, perpetual Theatre of comforts, a Flood of most pure contentments, which floweth over all Paradise? Avarice will possess much, it stretcheth out the hands of an Harpy over the goods of another; It garboileth the world, it disquieteth the earth, It would willingly delve into hell, it pleadeth, it wrangleth, it assails, it defendeth, to satiate its covetousnes, yet still is hungry: For what is he that possesseth all, but the prime of the rich, who is the beauty of fields, the lustre of flowers, the fecunditie of fruits, the wealth of mineral's, and the fertilitie of total nature? Envie is troubled about supereminencie, and will have the highest place, accounting him an enemie who precedeth; And is it not the eternal Father, who is King of Glory, who seeth all to be much lower then himself, and seeth nothing beyond what he is? Choler will revenge for it, it striketh at heaven, it troubleth the earth, it causeth lightning and tempests, which raise so many Tragedies in the world; And who better knows how to avenge sins then the sovereign Monarch of the Universe, for whom exterminating Angels carry the sword of Justice, for whom hell reserveth treasures of flames eternal?

Tanta est ille, ut, quidem amant eum, injustè

Now, I demand of you, if it be true, that even our vices are in love with some perfections which are in God, how can our virtues but bear a singular affection towards him? why should they not be enamoured of his beauties? why not sigh after his attractives? since they are his real daughters.

quidem, non ipsi quoddam ejus amare possint. S. Eucherius

Some one will say, it were but reasonable, if God, to make himself beloved, would become visible to men; but he is a secret so hidden, that our poor spirit seeking for him, finds more confusion, then light. Verily, I like Mercury Trismegistus; for he stopping his mouth, who complained of the invisibilitie of God: Hold thy peace (thou profane fellow) saith he, and if thou hast eyes, confess God is visible, and that he sheweth himself in as many mirrours, as there are creatures in this great Universe.

Objection, about the invisibility of God. Mercur. Trism. Παῦσαι ἐπαλὺς ὦ, θεὸς πάντων αὐτὸς φάνεντος.

A man needs to be a Philosopher but a little, to learn to love; let him see, know and studie nature in all its works; let him hear the harmonies of Gods consort, to understand in some measure, the perfections of the workman. Those little golden and azure shels, which make a lodging for certain fishes, more magnificent then Solomons palace; Those Cob-web lawns, and those tiffanies, which compose the bodie of flowers with an exquisite delicacie; Those waves, which curle on the current of rivers; those gentle western blasts which bear comfort and health on their wings; those huge theatres of seas; that vast extent of plains; those meteors so artificially varied; those little eyes of heaven, which shew themselves so soon as night spreads its mantle on the inferiour regions of the world; all that is seen, all that is heard, all that is touched, all that is handled, cease not to recount unto us the love of our Father.

That God renders himself infinitely amiable in total nature. Synesius Hymn. 4. Naturam universam lyram aeterni Patris vocat, diversis fidibus intentam. Διὰ σῦ δ' φύσις ὕπαιδά σῦ θεῦ ἀπλάνου πατρὸς. Ubi alludit ad chordas cytharæ hypaten, mesenetem.

One must never have seen the sun, not to have love for God; he must have lived like a hog, with his head in the mire, and his eyes in a trough, to say, he knoweth not what the Divinitie is. To speak truly, this great star is the visible son of the first Bright; the Image of the sovereign King; the eye of the world; the heart of nature; it daily speaketh to us out of the gates of the East, with as many tongues as it hath raies. This great supervisor of the fornaces of the universe travelleth throughout total nature. He lighteth up the stars; in heaven he createth crowns, and rain-bows in the air; on earth, flowers and fruits; in the sea, pearls; and in the bosome of rocks, saphires and diamonds: he throws fire and vigour into all living creatures; his presence causeth alacritie, & his absence (insensibly) horrour and melancholy in all nature. His motion so rapid, his circumvolution so even, that so regular harmonie of nights and dayes, those reflections, which are as fathers of so many Essences, set the whole Divinitie before our eyes. O what a goodly thing it is to talk face to face with those great forrests, which are born with the world to discourse with the murmur of waters, the warbling of birds in the sweetness of solitude, and of so many creatures, which (according to S. Denis) are the veils and Tapistries of the great Temple! There it is, where God accoasteth on all sides, where our soul is stirred up with its own thoughts, discharged it self of matter, and entreth into a great commerce with Intelligencies. When I behold all the perquisites of Organs, where Musick is in perfection; I stay not on the Iron, Lead, Wood, the Piper, nor on the bellows; my spirit flyeth to that hidden spirit which distributeth it self with so melodious proportionable divisions throughout the whole Instrument. So when I contemplate the world, I stick not on the body of the Sun, the stars, the elements, the stones, the metals, the plants, nor the living creatures; I penetrate into that secret spirit which insinuateth it self thereunto, with such admirable power, such ravishing sweetness, & incomparable Harmony. I infinitely love him, because he is fair, since he made all the beauties which are presented before mine eies; Because he is good; because he is wise, since he communicateth himself with so much profusion: since he so well tempered the consonancies of the whole world; I love him, because I know he is mine, and I am wholly his. Were I not touched with his beauty, his wisdome, his goodness, perpetually his benefits would soften my heart; Me thinks I meet him every where, with a hundred arms, and as many hands to do me good. I neither see place, room, time, or moment, which is not figured with his liberalities.

Ψυχὴ πανοπτικὴ. Synesio. Quod colimus nos Deus unus est, qui totam molem istam cum instrumento elementorum, corporum, spirituum expressit in ornamentum majestatis suæ. Tertul. Apol. c. 17.

I am clothed with his wooll, fed with his Granary, warm'd with his wood, served by his officers; I live in him, I breathe by him, I have nothing which is not his Inheritance. It is neither Father nor Mother, great one, Lord or King, which gave me wealth, honour, and estate. Well they may be instruments of my happiness, but they are not the cause. They were nothing for so many years; They came into the world as poor as I; they daily return from it into dust; I feel my necessities and dependences; and I know they cannot be supplied but by a necessary and independent Essence.

The commerce of man with God. S. Maximus Cent. 5. ex variis. Deum extra se effici creaturis omnibus providendo. Meliora sunt ubera tua vino. Cant. 1. Quia vinum exprimitur cum labore, in torculari, ubera sponte fluunt.

We must not say, we have not commerce enough with him; great things are for the little, and the rich for the necessitous. See we not that heaven is all for the earth? doth it cause one sprig of an herb to grow in it self? produceth it one sole flower among its stars? It giveth all it hath, and is perpetually content with what it is. So God is all for us, as if man were his God, saith S. Thomas. If we be miserable, he is not therefore disdainful; if he be high, he is not therefore far distant from our inferiour condition. He is all, in all things; ever present; continually doing somewhat; He hath dugs of bounty which put him to pain, if he stream not upon us. We see him to come from all parts, and his approach is not mute; for, the best part of us is spiritual, which maketh commerce easie unto us, with a God, who is all spirit. How often find we our soul to be raised above it self, and to be transported with thoughts, knowledges, lights, joyes, pleasures, consolations, hopes, confidences, courages, and antepasts of glory, which we acknowledge to be above our strength! It is God then who worketh by them in us, who enters into our soul, as a master into his house, who becomes our guest, our friend, our Doctour, and our Protectour. We need not seek for him in heaven, he is in our heart (saith the Emperour Antonine) and there he uttereth his oracles. There it is, where he entertaineth us, and teacheth us we are his children, and reserveth for us an admirable inheritance.

Gloss in Daniela.

When it was said to little Nebuchadnezzar, who was exposed in his infancy & bred up in the house of a Peasant, whose son he took himself to be; Courage (childe) you are not made to drive Oxen, and till the ground; there is another profession expecteth you: you are the son of a great Prince, who keeps the prime kingdom of the world for you: These rags must be changed into robes of cloth of gold; this ugly Hat into a Diadem; this Spade into a Sceptre; this Cottage into a Palace, this servitude into an Empire: For whom shall treasures, officers, services, arms, greatness, pleasures, joyes, and feasts be but for you, who are the heir of the Assyrian throne? Do not we think that upon the recital of these words, this young man felt a flame which spread it self over his heart, that he was touched to the quick with his extraction, and ravished with love towards a Father, by whom he was born so great? And have we not the like apprehensions, when faith dictateth unto us; Thou art not created to live perpetually among mire and dirt, and to be tied to a wretched, frail, and perishable body, to walk upon thorns, and to embroil thy self in the toils and cares of a mortal life; there are above, palaces of stars, of Intelligencies, of incomprehensible lights, of ineffable beauties which expect thee, of crowns prepared for thee, of sceptres made to fill thy hands: All times are for thee, and all which Nature endeavoureth here below, is but to contribute to thy contentment? Thou art the son of a noble Father, who makes men happy at his pleasure. He loves thee as his heart, and would have thee near him, to accomplish thee with all his dearest delights and the heighth of his glories. And what can a soul do, which learns all this from faith; but raise it self above all concupiscences of flesh; but love, but dilate it self, but readily mix with this most pure spirit, which inviteth it in all creatures?

The conversation of God with man by the mystery of the incarnation, in the consummation of love. Leo serm. 3. de Passione. Venit in hunc mundum dives, atque misericors negotiator cœli, & commutatione mirabili inivit commercium salutis, nostra accipiens, sua tribuens.

Have we yet the heart to say, we have not familiarity enough with God; and that he is of too high a strain to love him, when we think upon Jesus, who for us descended from the highest part of heaven to the slime of Adam, who made himself our brother, who sucked the dugs of our Mother, who spake our tongue, who took upon him our semblance, who charged himself with our burdens, who on himself laid our miseries, to turn them into felicities? He is that Merchant, who is come out of a happy and rich countrey full of treasures, glory, and greatness, which were to him more natural then raies to the Sun, and yet, being lodged (as it were) with us, in a silly Cottage, hath dispoiled himself for us, wholly inebriated with the extasies of love; hath made himself poor to make us rich, weak to strengthen us, contemptible to render us glorious, full of sufferings to bearifie us, and a man that we might be Gods. This is the man who hath been able to contract all Gods extent under a little clay, who went not a step which was not worthy to produce a star, who carried the Divinity upon the ends of his fingers, whose life was a flash of lightning, his word a thunder, his virtues lessons, and actions prodigies. Hath he not loved the ungrateful, when he heaped on his own body the pains and sufferings of all ages, making himself of a King of glory, a man of dolours, to purchase pleasures for us with as many wounds as he had members, as many crosses as we have sins?

The Eucharist the last degree of love.

After all this, he gives himself to us in the Sacrament, which he hath instituted as an abridgement of his miracles, wherein he is incorporated within our heart, in our soul, as one piece of wax melted within another. I readily here remember what an antient lover said, that love made a Butt of his heart, where, so soon as it had shot all its arrows, it threw it self as an inflamed dart into the bottom of his breast, to set him all on fire. What arrows, and what shafts, flying on every side, in Nature, in Grace, what benefits, what favors, what amities, what forward affections, for which man still continued obdurate, till Jesus wholly gaining him, did descend into his entrails fully replenished with love & flames, and heavenly ardours? Is it not time to pronounce Anathema with S. Paul, against him who loveth him not, after his coming in this manner, to captivate us by his bounty?

since (according to the Canticles) he is wholly composed of desires, and satisfactions, and that all the just sigh after him. We have heard talk through so many Ages of the most accomplished beauties of certain creatures who have drawn many Amorists after them; but never have we seen one sole woman to gain the affection of an entire City, Province, or Kingdom. From whence cometh it, that there is not any beauty, but that of Jesus Christ, which enchaineth Cities, Empires, and Monarchies? From whence cometh it, that so many Kings and Queens have followed him through Forrests, Thorns, and among Rocks, even to the abandoning of themselves? From whence cometh it, that so many millions of souls, the wisest, most purified, and most courageous on the earth, have loved him even to the suffering of flames and wheels, in the dislocation of bones, & the dismembring of their whole bodies? From whence cometh it, that all, which is most pure, and most eminent in the world, daily dissolveth for him, and that so many hearts melt for his service in honourable flames which purifie them, without consuming them? Verily, we may say, there is nothing which equalleth the excellencie of celestial Amities; and that, well to place your love, you must fix it in the heart of God.

Sect. 11. Of the Nature of Divine Love, Of its Essence, Qualities, Effects, and Degrees.

Blosquerus in l. de amitia & amore.

THE great Anchoret Raymond went very high when he said, The love of God was an influence of Eternity: For it is true that we, coming from an eternal God, have an infinite desire to make our Being perpetual. And for this purpose, we tie our selves by love to so many things, to live again in them, and by them: but they being transitorie and frail, we there find no support, until God hath poured his holy love into our heart, which is the true influence of Eternitie, that alone can purifie our life, and eternize our souls.

Concilium Arausicanum. Deum Dei est diligere Deum, ipse an diligere-tur, se deditque non diligentes diligit, dilectores, amatrices sumus, ut esset in nobis unde placeremus.

We then must not feign to our selves, that the love of God proceeds meerly from our own strength, but we must hearken to the decision of the Council of Orange, which saith, that to love God is a gift from God: It is he who inspireth the love with which he will be loved, and who hath loved us even in disfavour, to transport us to favour: Whereby it appeareth, that this fair love is nought else but a celestial quality infused into the soul, by which we love God above all, and all for God.

The growth of Love like unto pearls.

Now I imagine with my self, that he is born in our hearts, in such a manner, as pearls grow in their shells. The mother of pearl is first pierced by a celestial influence, as with an arrow, fiery, and sharp, which sollicites and importuneth it, to dispose it self to this excellent production. Which is the cause, that it spreads, openeth, and dilates it self, to receive the dew distilled into it from the air; and having moistned it, it digesteth, concocteth, and transfigureth it into this little miracle of nature, which is with so much curiositie sought after. Behold what passeth in a soul, when it bringeth forth this precious love, it is prevented by a special grace from the Divine Goodness, which at first gives it a distaste of all things in the world, and fixeth a generous spur in the heart, to excite, awaken, and inflame it to the quest of so great a good. Then it extendeth, dilates, and opens all its gates to the holy Ghost, who descendeth into it, as the dew of Hermon, by qualities and effects admirable, which through free will it embraceth, and ties, and habituateth it self therein, conceiving and forming Jesus Christ (as saith S. Paul:) Then is the time when this divine love is conceived, which is no sooner born, but it causeth a rejoycing in the heart of man, like unto that which happened in the house of Abraham at Isaac's nativity. It is a celestial laughter, an extraordinary jubilation, an expansion of all the faculties and functions of the spirit, and will. This little Monarch is no sooner born, but it begins to command, and sits on the heart as in its Throne: All powers do it homage, all passions render it service. All the virtues applaud at its coronation, and confess they hold of it, and are all in it. He who is once well instructed in charity, aboundeth with all riches, and hath the full plenitude of the spirit, (according to the Apostles) and is a Tree grafted with siens of all perfection, and which fail not to bring forth their fruits.

The Empire and eminencies of Divine love.

Instructi in charitate in omnes divitias plenitudinis intellectus. Col. 2. 2. Aitredus num. 13. Bibliorum in speculo charitatis.

Sciences and virtues are that to us, which oars to vessels, what the viaticum to travellers, what light to blear-eyes, what arms to souldiers: but charity alone is the repose of the wearied, the Countrey of Pilgrims, the light of the blind, the Crown of the victorious. Faith and the knowledge of God carry us to our countrey; Hope maintaineth us, the other virtues defend us: but where charity is perfect, as it is in glory; one no longer believes any thing, because he seeth all; one hopes for nought, because he possesseth all.

Excellent conceit of charity.

Temperance combateth against Concupiscence, Prudence against errour, Fortitude against adversity, Justice against inequality: But in perfect charity, there is a perfect chastity, which standeth not in need of the arms of temperance, having no blemish of impurity; A perfect knowledge, which expecteth not any help from ordinary Prudence, since it hath no errours; a perfect Beatitude, which needeth not Fortitude to conquer adversities, since to it nothing is uneasie; a Sovereign peace which imploreth not the aid of Justice against inequalitie, since all therein is equall.

For in a word, what is charity but a temperate love without lust, A prudent love without errour, a strong love without impatience, a just love without inequality? Faith is the first day of our Creation, which driveth away darkness; Hope is the second, which makes a firmament for us, and which divideth waters from waters, things transitory from eternal; Temperance is the third, which arangeth the waters and storms of passions in their proper element, and causeth the land of our heart to appear, which sendeth up vapours to God, that are its sighs.

Prudence is the fourth, which lighteth up in us the sun of understanding, and the lights of knowledge. Fortitude is the fifth, which sustains us in the Ocean of adversities (not suffering us to corrupt as fishes in salt-waters, and as birds) above the Tempest. Justice the sixth, for it gives us to command over our passions, as Adam, who on the same day he was created, obteined it over all living creatures. But charity is the seventh day, The Symbole of Glory, which contracteth all delights in the circle of its Septenary. And how can it but abridge all Theologie, since it abridgeth God himself, and that we have cause to speak to him in such terms, as Saint Zeno did. O love what hast thou done? Thou hast changed God into Man; Thou hast contracted him, drawing him out of the lustre of his Majesty, to make him a pilgrime on earth; Thou hast shut him in the prison of a virginal womb the space of nine moneths: Thou hast annihilated the empire of death, when thou taughtest God to die.

S. Zeno Serm. de fide, spe, & charit. Te Deum in hominem detestatum vocabis, te Deum abbreviatum paulisper à majestate sua commendasse peregrinari fecisse, te virginali concrete novem mensibus religasse, te mortem, Deum mori docendo, evacuasse.

Love

Love thus acknowledged by all the virtues, mounteth as on a chariot of Glory, maketh it self conspicuous with heroick and noble qualities: It is pious, since it employeth all its thoughts on God: It is generous and magnanimous, since it is ever disposed to great designs: It is liberal, as that which spareth nothing: It is strong, not yielding to any of all those obstacles, which present themselves to divert the course of its intentions: It is just, equally distributing rewards to merit: It is temperate, admitting no excesses but of love: It is prudent, having eies alwaies upon its deportments: It is witty, to find out a thousand inventions: It is violent without eagerness, active without precipitation, sage without coldness, good without remisness, and calme without idleness.

Qualities of Divine love, by which we may know whether it enhabit a soul.

But I must tell you, though its perfections be without number, you shall chiefly know it by three qualities, which will make it appear unto you, pliant, obliging, and patient.

Three principal marks of love.

Pliantness

I say pliant; for there is nothing but fires, desires, sweetness, affections, joyes, admirations, extasies, pleasures, transportments for its well-beloved. This is the State which the great Origen figureth unto us of S. Mary Magdalen, when he saith, that by the strength of love she was dead to all the objects of the world. She had her thoughts so employed upon her Jesus, that she was almost insensible; she had eies and saw not, ears and heard not, senses and felt not; she was not where she was; for she was wholly where her Master was, although she knew not where he was. She knew no other art but that of love, she had unlearnt to fear, to hope, to rejoyce, to be sad; all in her turned to love, by reason of him whom she loved above all: The Angels who descended from heaven to comfort her, were to her troublesome, nor could she endure them, she stood upright near the sepulchre, where in the place of death she found her heaven.

Orig. Hom. de Magdal.

Liberality.

Now as in efficacious pliantnesses are flowers of love which never bring forth any fruit; so it takes a second qualitie, which is, to be liberal, and much obliging: For this cause the hands of the bridegroom (according to the Canticles) are all of gold, and round; to shew there is not any thing crooked or rough to stay his gifts: besides, they are all filled with pretious stones, to figure his benefits unto us; Jacinths and Diamonds which he scattereth, and bestoweth as liberally, as the sand of the sea. The Hebrew saith, that the same hands are vessels of gold repleniſhed with the sea, because love is an Ocean of liberalities, which is never exhausted.

Cant. 5. 14. Manus ejus tornatiles, aureæ, plenæ Hyacinthis. (alio versio) Globi aurei pleni mari.

Patience. Pennæ habet, non pondus. Ailredus.

There remains nothing but to be patient, which it doth with so much grace, that one may say, its yoke hath wings, not weight. The heart of it oftimes is invironed with thorns, and it sweareth they are roses. It swims in a sea of worm-wood, and saith it is sweet water: It is covered all over with wounds, and protesteth they are Pearls and Rubies; It is overwhelmed with affairs, and maintains they are recreations; It is surcharged with maladies, and they are sports; with calumnies, and they are blessings; with death, and that is life.

Twelve effects of love.

These three qualities cause twelve very notable effects in love, which are, To love God above all, & in comparison of him, to despise all. To account ones self unhappy, if but a very moment delivered from his sweet Ideas. To do all that may be, and to endure all things impossible to come near him. To embellish and adorn our soul to please him. To be alwaies corporally present with him, as in the Sacrament; or spiritually, as in Prayer. To love all which is for him, and to hate all which is not for him. To desire that he may be declared, confessed, praised, and adored by all the world. To entertain all the most sublime thoughts (that is possible) of his dear person. To pass over with sweetness all the acerbities suffered in his service. To accommodate ones self to all his motions, and to receive both sad and joyful things with his countenance. To languish perpetually with the desires to behold him face to face; and lastly, To serve him without anxietie, or exspectation of reward.

These things being so sublime, we must not presume to arrive thither at the first dash. It is very fit to file, and continually to polish our soul by long services & good actions, to arrive in the end at the happy accomplishment of love. For this cause there are reckoned certain degrees by which the soul is led to the palace of this triumphant Monarch.

Three orders of true lovers of the world.

There is a love, as yet but young, which doth only begin, and hath five degrees, within the compass whereof, it dilates it self to pass to a much greater perfection. It beginneth first by the taste of the word of God, and the sweetness it feels by the reading of good books, which is a sign that a soul already hath an arrow of true love in the heart. This taste maketh a man take good resolutions for the amendment of his manners, and order of his life: this resolution is followed by a happy penance, which bewaileth all the imperfections of the life past with a bitter distaste, and a fit satisfaction. By this way we proceed to the love of a neighbour, and a beginniug is made by a tender compassion of his afflictions, & a rejoycing at his prosperities: Lastly, one addicts himself much to many very laudable good works, and to the holy exercises of mercy. Behold here a most sincere condition, and to be wished in many men of honour, who may therein persist with great constancie.

The second order comprehendeth those which are yet more strong, and it conteineth five other degrees. First, they are very assiduous in prayer, wherein they are much enlightned with the knowledge of verities and celestial maximes. Secondly, they obtein an excellent purity of conscience, which they cleanse and polish by an enquiry into their interiour, holily curious, & perfectly disposed. Thirdly, they feel the exteriour man much weakned by a generous mortification, wherewith concupiscence is quailed. Fourthly, followeth the vigour of the inward man, who finds himself happily enabled to all the functions of the spirit, with a certain facility which becometh as it were natural to him. Fifthly, appeareth a great observance of the law of God, which makes him apprehend the least atomes of sin, through a notable fidelity with which he desires to serve his master. In this rank are many good religious who lead a life most accomplished in devotion, and in the continual mortification of senses.

Lastly, in the third order of perfect lovers, are the great effects of perfect charity, as is, not to have any humane and natural considerations in all ones actions; but to tread under foot all respect of flesh and blood, to defend truth: Not to stick to earth by any roots but to account all things worse then a dunghil, to gain Jesus Christ: to run before the Cross, and to bear the greatest adversities with a generous patience: to love ones enemies: to do good to persecutors; and in conclusion, freely to expose ones life for the salvation of a neighbour. To say truly, they had need to be persons most heroick, to go so far; and there is no doubt, but this is the full accomplishment of love.

Notwithstanding, nine degrees also are added of Nine degrees of Seraphical love for the contemplative.

Seraphick love, which concern Contemplatives; which are, The ſolitude of a heart throughly purified from all the forms of Creatures: Silence in a ſublime tranquillitie of paſſions: Suſpenſion, which is a mean degree between Angel and man: Inſeparabilitie, which adhereth to its welbeloved for an eternitie, not admitting the leaſt diſunion: Inſatiabilitie, which never is ſatiated with love: Indefatigabilitie, which endureth all labours without wearineſs: Languor, which cauſeth the ſoul to diſſolve and melt on the heart of its beloved: Exſtaſie, which cauſeth a deſtitution of the vegetative and ſenſitive ſoul, totally to actuate the Intellectual: Deiformity, which is a degree approaching near to beatifick love. Then is there made in the ſoul a deluge of myſterious & adorable love, which drowneth all humane thoughts, which ſwalloweth all earthly affections, which flieth to the ſuperiour region of man, which hideth all that is eminent in ſciences, tranſcendent in virtue, great in imagination, and which cauſeth the ſpirit to forget it ſelf, and to look on nothing but heaven.

Sect. 12. The Practice of Divine Love.

THE love of God is a ſcience inſpired, not ſtudied, where the infuſion of the holy Ghoſt is more eloquent then all Tongues, and more learned then all Pens. That which come to us by art, oftimes begins very late, and quickly endeth. That which is given us by the favour of heaven, comes very readily, and never is loſt. Thoſe who think to learn the love of God by precepts onely, croak like Ravens, and have nothing ſolid: ſuch as have it by grace are Angels, who are raiſed into the higheſt region, and poize themſelves on their wings. Grave diſcourſes, and good books fail not to contribute much to this purpoſe, as we lately may have tried by the treatiſe which the R. F. Stephen Binet hath publiſhed, fully repleniſhed with the holy ardours of extraordinary devotion, and which ſeem to have been dictated by love it ſelf, and conceived in that fire, which Jeſus came to enkindle on earth, to inflame the whole world.

Τὶ δ' ἔρχομαι φίλα διδοὶ μείζονα κεφαλᾶς, &c. Pindarus.

The means to acquire the love of God.

If then you deſire to profit in this love, let your endeavour be continually to beg it of God with the moſt fervent prayers which the holy Ghoſt ſhall ſuggeſt, to eſteem it above all worldly things, and to apply all your actions to this happy conqueſt.

Be ye very careful to cut off from your heart all impediments which may give it any obſtacle; for if you ſhould imagine to entertain it in a ſoul ſullied with terreſtrial affections; it were to ask a moſt precious Balm, to put it in an unclean veſſel. We have as many Idols in our heart, as paſſions, oppoſite to the law of God.

Aut vitia habemus, aut virtutes habemus Deos. Hieron.

Be not ſatisfied with taking away vices, but ſtifle the remembrance of worldly things, which may in you occaſion any exorbitancy. Withdraw your mind as much as you can from a thouſand imaginations, which fly as aiery ſpirits about your heart when it begins to take wings to its repoſe. Perplex not your ſelf likewiſe, more then is reaſon, with affairs both ſpiritual and temporal, which cauſe a thouſand cares to ariſe, and onely ſerve to quench the vigour of devotion, and to draw out the juice of piety. Fly acerbities of heart, apprehenſions, and ſervitudes, accuſtoming your ſelf to do all with a ſpirit of ſweetneſs, and holy liberty.

The practice of the love of God.

Conſequently make a practice of the love of God, undertaking it with a reſolute purpoſe, a great application of mind, and employing all poſſible induſtries to profit therein, as one would in affecting ſome great bargain, ſome very conſiderable office, or affair, moſt important. For it is a very unworthy thing to behold all deſpicable Trades full of artiſans, who kill themſelves to find out inventions that may ſet forth their profeſſion; and that only the occupation of the love of God, ſhould have workmen ſo lazy and unnatural.

How we may learn to love God above the love of the world.

After all, following the counſel of S. Auguſtine, conſider what the children of darkneſs often do to proſper in worldly loves & amities. They ſtrive to inſinuate themſelves by ſome good office, they conſider on every ſide the perſon of him of whom they would be beloved, they ſtudy his nature, his inclinations, his deſires, his affairs, and they oblige him, ere he is aware, in what he deſireth moſt. Are they entred into his amitie? they perſiſt in the practice of great aſſiduities; they have entertainments and admirable correſpondencies; they delight, they ſerve, they mingle the recreative with the ſerious: They apply all they ſee, all they think upon, all they invent, all they hope, all they poſſeſs, all they ſay, all they write, to the contentment of this creature. They draw tribute out of all for it, and if it be poſſible, will give it its hearts-wiſh in all things: They transform themſelves into its humours and likings: They eſpouſe its loves, enmities, quarrels, and revenges: They publiſh its virtues, with diſcretion conceal its favours: they have tricks to pacifie its anger, to ſtir up its languours, to open its heart, to hold their poſſeſſion, and if it be needful, will paſs through ten purgatories of fire, ice, tears, blood, torrents, ſeas, inflamed ſerpents, gnawing vultures, to arrive at one of its pretenſions. O reproach, that all this is done for a frivolous worldly love, which oftentimes is the Hangman of life, the gulf of Reaſon, the Hell of ſouls; and that there is none but Jeſus, for whom they will not ſo much as ſtirre a finger!

Inhonestos amatores oſtendit, ſi quis amore jamjam lasciviens, veſtit ſe aliter quàm amate placet. Auguſt. ſer. 19. de verbis Apoſt.

Make a reſolution to inſinuate your ſelf into his friendſhip by ſome notable Act, which you know to be acceptable to him, and which he already hath required of you by ſo many inſpirations. Enter into his houſe, and into his boſome: render him aſſiduity in your prayers, your meditations, your communions, and in all your exerciſes of devotion. Learn to ſpeak to him every hour by jaculatory prayers, as one would to ſome friend tenderly loved, and vehemently affected. Referre all creatures to his love, and love nothing but him, but in him, but for him: publiſh his greatneſs every where, make a thouſand inſtruments of his glory: but conceal his favours by a profound humilitie. Behold men your like, as his Images; Engrave all his words, all his actions, all his wounds in the bottome of your heart; make your ſelves like him, as much as you may; bear him on your fleſh, ſuffering for him, not onely with patience, but alacritie, through a deſire of conformity. Behold the principal means by which one may come to the love of God, and to the unitive way.

Obſerve therewithall the three Conditions which S. Bernard preſcribeth, to wit, to love ſweetly, prudently, ſtrongly: ſweetly without violence; prudently without illuſion; ſtrongly without ſeparation.

That we learn to love God himſelf, and by the character of his ſubſtance which is Jeſus.

But, there being nothing which more forcibly moveth the ſoul, then Example; I adviſe you often to preſent unto your ſelf the love of God and Jeſus Chriſt, which ſhould be the ſource of ours; and to make a ſacred poſie to your ſelf of all the lovers who were moſt vehement in Divine Love.

Reflect (O Chriſtian ſoul) upon the chariot of Cherubins in Ezekiel, and thou ſhalt learn what God

In medio animalium splendor ignis, & de igne fulgur egredietur. Ezek. 1.

God would have of thee. I see (saith the Prophet) a clear and bright fire in the midst of these living Creatures, and from this fire I see lightning flashes to issue forth. This is the fire of the love of God, and these lightnings are the eruptions he made, by communicating himself to man. Consider (O soul redeemed with the blood of the son of God) that thou canst not live without love; on what side soever thou turnest, thou necessarily must love; and God foreseeing this necessitie, would that thou lovest like him, that thou take the object of his love for the object of thine own; his manner of loving, for thine; his scope and contentment, for thine. And where thinkest thou hath God the heavenly Father placed his love from all eternitie, but in himself? Because he alone is worthy to be orginally beloved, as the source and fountain-head of all beauties and bounties, which are the two baits of affections, excellively; as he who hath neither end nor beginning; He loves himself by his holy Spirit, which is his own substance, and he loves himself necessarily, because love is his Essence. O soul! if thou couldst a little lift up thine eyes surcharged with so many terrestrial humours, and behold in the bosom of the heavenly Father the eternal Fire-brand which he gives for a rule of thy love; what secrets, and what mysteries of love wouldst thou learn? there mightest thou observe the four conditions which constitute all the excellencie of love, to wit, Puritie, Simplicitie, Fervour and Communication.

First, thou must learn to purifie thy love, this love being most pure and excellent; for it is God himself, produced in the bosom of God, it is the first of Sanctities, holy by origin, by object, by example, and by form; It is the holy Ghost burning in the heart of the eternal Father. S. Thomas teacheth us a verie singular piece of Theologie in the Treatise he wrote of charitie, where he saith, everie thing placed in another is measured and adapted to that which receiveth it, as water, which is round in a round vessel, and square, in a square vessel. For, if the things received be less then that which received it; it by this reception gets a state of excellencie, and a Title of worth above its nature: so (saith he) the visible species are ennobled in our eyes, and the Intelligible, in our understanding. This admitted; I say, that if we only consider the love of God, in that manner as we do in men, as drawn from exteriour objects; yet would it be a matter of a marvellous value to be received into the heart of God, and to be conform to the Divinitie: but when Divinitie telleth us, that this love produced of God, is the substance of God received in God himself, and inseparable from his essence; what greatnes, and, what puritie must we conceive in this love of God? And if he will, that this same love (which is all his) should be not only the object, but the efficient cause of ours, by the infusions he worketh in our hearts; O how much shame ought we to have, so to defile our love with contaminations and impurities of the earth?

S. Thom. opusc. 61. De Dilectione, omne receptum est in recipiente per modum recipientis.

Charitas Dei diffusa est in cordibus nostris per spiritum sanctum. Rom. 5. 5.

Secondly, you must know, this love is most simple, and totally as well in this unitie as in the Essence of God, and although he love creatures, as the tokens and footsteps of this bountie, which are in kinds so manifold, in multitude so innumerable, yet is he not divided, nor severed, because he gathers all those creatures together in his bosom, where their beginning and end is, and therein uniteth them, as rays of his benignitie contracted and drawn together into one Centre in a Burning-glass: Thereupon thou shouldst be sorrie to see thy heart torn, and divided by so many objects which divert thy affections, and hinder thee from simply giving them to God, for whom they are made.

Monas genuit monadem, & in se suum reflexit amorem, ita explicat. S. Thom. 1. part. q. 23.

Thirdly, thou must understand, this love is most ardent; since the bosom of the eternal father, is as a great Fornace which with its flames enkindleth all the chaste loves that burn, whether they be in heaven, in the heart of Angels, or whether on earth, in the souls of the elect. Ah! how much oughtst thou to blush, and to be ashamed, considering, how, in stead of enkindling thy love with the sacred fires of this eternal fornace, thou hast sought to beg a profane fire from the eyes of a wretched woman, which hath burnt thee to the bones, thou hast gone (door after door) to all sorts of creatures, opening thy heart to forraign flames, whereby, thou hast gone about to burn even the sacrifice of the living God? Ah! Thou insensible creature, knowest thou not that Nadab and Abihu, for putting ordinarie fire into their Incensories, when they came to the Altar of the synagogue, were devoured, as unfortunate victims, with the proper coals of their own sacrifices? and dost thou think it will be lawful for thee to approach the Altar of the eternal Testament with this forraign love which thou lodgest in thy heart? Art not thou afraid to hear those thundering words, This Sacrifice shall be a punishment to thee, since thou hast made a sin of thy propitiation?

Fornacem custodiunt in operibus ardoris. Eccl. 43. 3.

Chrysol. serm. 26. Sumes de sacrificio panam, quia fecisti de propitiatione peccatum.

Lastly, (faithful soul) thou shouldst know the love of God is most communicative; for it is streamed forth in his eternal productions by two emanations, of understanding and will, as by two Conduit-pipes of Glories & beauties. And not content with this, this eternal communication being involved in a profound obscuritie unknown to all creatures; he hath cleft the cloud in five places, and is come to communicate himself to the world by five admirable ways of his magnificence, which are Creation, Conservation, the Incarnation of the word, Justification and exaltation of the soul to Beatitude. O! how thou shouldest be confounded hereupon to see thy heart so narrow, and streightned in the exercise of good works?

Look back again upon thy second model, and attentively consider, how Jesus the pattern of all chaste amities loved his eternal Father; and on earth rendered him that honourable tribute of love, which could not well have been payed to a God so justly loved, but by a loving God, and who did with so much perfection, love. Jesus alone passed with an incomparable eminencie those nine degrees, whereof we spake before, which are as nine spheres of love. This most blessed soul, which had an exact knowledge of all the excellencies of increated beautie, loved him according to its science, equalling his fervours to its lights. It first of all entred into the solitude of love, which made a little fortunate Iland of the heart, wherein there was nothing but God and It: God, who was in it with eternal contentments: It, which was in God, with reciprocal and wholly ineffable affections. This heart of Jesus resembled the Halcyons nest, which cannot hold one silly Fly more then the Bird it self: So he knew not how to lodge one creature in himself to the prejudice of the Creator, but could tell how to lodge them altogether, to unite them to their Head. O it was properly his business to give us this lesson, which he afterward dictated by one of his Oracles. He loveth thee not enough, whosoever loveth any thing with thee, which he loveth not for thee. From solitude he entered tred into the silence, which Synesius calleth the Beatifick Silence, and which S. John placeth in heaven in the peaceful condition of the Blessed. It was properly the calm and repose, which the holy soul of Jesus took with his heavenly Father in his divine Orisons, which he many times continued the space of whole nights, watching and weeping for us, and dwelling as it were in the fire of love. It is that silence which the Canticle calleth the Bed of Solomon, encompassed with threescore valiant ones, but of that great Host of Angels. From silence he passed to the suspension whereof Job speaketh, where his soul felt it self totally pulled up by the root from earth, but not (as yet) placed in Heaven, because he was corporally in this transitorie life. We (verily) find three admirable suspensions in Nature, That, of water in the clouds; of Heaven, above the clouds; and of earth, under the clouds: and two ineffable suspensions in the Humanitie of Jesus: The first is that of his blessed soul, which was alwayes hanging at the heart of God, and the second of his bodie on the Cross, to purifie by his death all the regions of the world, both above, and beneath: above, by the exhalation of his spirit; beneath, by the effusion of his blood. After suspension, he mounted to insatiabilitie, which caused him, that, drinking those eternal sources by long draughts in the delights of Contemplation which streams upon him from heaven, he slaked his thirst in his own bosom, not quite quenching it, therein retaining the condition of those who see God: of whom it is said, That they are still replenished, yet still greedie, incessantly desiring what they possess.

The love of Jesus towards his heavenly Father.

Apoc. 8.

Cantic. 3.

Job. 7. 15. Elegit suffocationem anima mea.

Damian. Cardin. in Hymno de Paradiso. Avidi, & semper pleni, quod habent desiderant.

From Insatiabilitie he came to the degree of Indefatigabilitie, which caused him perpetually to spend himself in most glorious labours for the redemption of the world, measuring and running over the earth, as the sun doth Heaven, and sowing virtues and benefits every where, to reap nought but Ingratitude. From thence he proceeded to that Inseparabilitie which tied him for the love of his heavenly Father, not only to the punishment of the Cross, but to so many scorns and miseries as he embraced for us: and he made so much account of this mortal flesh which he took of us, that he associated it unto himself with an eternal band, and hath transmitted it into the bosom of Immortalitie, placing his wounds (which were the characters of his love, and of our inhumanitie) even in the sanctuarie of the most blessed Trinitie. From this Inseparabilitie, he suffered himself to slide into languours, extasies, and transanimations, which make up a Deified love, such as was that of Jesus. Languour dried him up with the zeal he had for our salvation, exhausting all the strength of his bodie, and (to speak with Philo) he seemed as if he would have transformed his flesh into the nature of his spirit, causing it to melt and dissolve under the ardours of ineffable affection, as we see a Myrrh-Tree which distilleth the first fruits of its liquour under the lustre of the sun-beams. Extasie, which bare this great soul with a vigorous violence to the heart of God, made a Truce in all the actions of sensitive nature: and as it happeneth that the Ocean extraordinarily swelling up upon one shore, forsaketh the other; So the spirit of our Saviour already divinized, amassing together the whole multitude of his force, to serve his love and satisfie the passion he had towards his celestial Father, overflowed in the heart of the Divinitie, with so immeasurable a profusion, that all his inferiour Nature seemed to be forsaken, and despoiled of the presence and government of his soul.

Mar. 3. 21.

In the end he entred into that transanimation which so powerfully united him to God, that only retaining the propertie of two natures, Divine and humane; he made an incomparable commixtion of heart, of love, of affections and conformities; which made Origen say, This soul, like unto Iron which is on burning Coals, was always in the word, always in wisdom, ever in God, and took an immutable constancy from the ardour wherewith it is enkindled in the union of God.

Orig. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν. Anima illa quasi ferrum in igne, semper in sapientia, semper in Deo, in convertibilitatem ex verbi Dei unitate indesinenter ignita posidebat.

If you find this love too sublime for you; behold it, as it were tempered and reflected in so many saints, as were S. Paul, S. Augustine, S. Bernard, and so many other.

Sect. 13. A notable Example of wordly Love changed into divine Charitie.

I Will give you a verie familiar one, in a man of the world, a man of the Court, and one who is at this present a treasure hidden from many, who was hated by the envious, persecuted by the proud, condemned by the Ignorant; and yet a great servant of God. It is the learned and pious Raymundus Lullus, as it appeareth by his life faithfully written in the Tome of the lives of the Western Fathers. This man flourished above three hundred years ago, and was born in the Island of Majorica of a noble extraction, which gave him passage into worldly honours, and caused him to be bred in the Court of his King, by whom he afterward was made one of his prime Officers. Never was there a man more inclining to love; for he loved transportedly, and spent all his youth in this vanity, having no employment more acceptable then to write amorous verses, to expres his passion. In the end he fell into the snare of a violent affection that long turmoiled him, which was the love of an honourable Lady, endowed with an invincible chastitie. Here ordinarily, love which delights to pursue what it cannot arrive unto, finds most admiration for the eyes, and food for its flame.

Vitz Patrum Occid. l. 6. Ex Carolo Bovillo.

He was so on fire in this quest, that he thought he should lose his wits, suffering himself to fall into unbeseeming and extraordinarie actions, so far as being one day on horse-back, and seeing this his well-beloved to go into a Church to do her devotions, he spurred hard, and in such manner entred into the holy place, not minding Church, Priest, Altars, or Sacraments; He had no eyes but for this creature, before whom he delighted to mannage his horse with his usual grace: But instantly a loud clamour was raised by the people, who thrust him out of the Church, & handled him like a mad-man.

The Ladie was so much displeased and ashamed at his exorbitant importunities, that she resolved to cure his love by a stratagem, which she could not vanquish by flight. She called this passionate amorist to her (by her husbands permission) and having shewed him the wrong he did to her reputation, so to resign himself over to such a gross indiscretion, as also the disasters he might draw on his own person; she bared her neck, and discovered her bosom all eaten by a malign Cancer, which at first caused some aversion in him: but, the more to fortifie the act, the Lady thereunto added prevalent words, reproaching him with simplicitie to employ so many hours to seek after an unhappy lothsomnes, and take away his love from God, to confer it on a Creature, who so little deserved it.

Poor Raymond was astonished at this speech, dividing his soul between the horrour of this ulcer, and the admiration of the wisdom of the virtuous woman, woman, when instantly this cancer of the bodie cured that of the mind. He in a moment found himself to be changed, as if all his passion had expected this period of sin, and as if on a sudden his soul had been freed from a charm: He could not wonder enough at his frenzie passed. He deplored the loss of so much time, he put forward for the future, to consecrate the remainder of his dayes to penance. It seemed to him he perpetually heard the voice of the Crucifix, which said unto him, Raymond follow me: and his heart burnt with a generous flame to augment the number of so many good servants of so worthy a Master. He would not by halves perform so important a business: he disposed of his whole estate for the benefit of the poor, and threw himself all naked between the arms of the Cross. Behold how it importeth to begin the great work of the love of God by some remarkable Act, and to give ones self freely to him, who hath not for us spared his own son! Thence he retired into a little Hermitage, where attending to prayer, fasts, and Contemplations, he was so illuminated, that being before unlearned in any science, but in that of worldly love, he became as knowing as the greatest Doctours; yet still austere as the most rigorous Hermits.

All this is observed in Blaquerna's book.

His love towards God began, first by great tenderness and continual familiaritie adoring this most pure spirit throughout the great Theatre of nature. If he looked on the rising Sun; he out of Extasie sung and said, From the chaste bosom of the morning went forth the desire of eternal mountains, wherein there are no more blemishes then there is darkness in the Sun. If he considered the sea, he took occasion to enter into the secret abysses of the judgments of God, wherein he remained wholly absorpt. If he cast his eye on the fields; so many flowers as he there observed, were as many little eyes of his well-beloved. If he heard a bird sing; in his conceit it spake to him of the love of his incomparable lover, and he used to say, there was a certain language of love which he understood in all creatures. If he saw a butterfly flying, and a little child running after it; he thereon frames sublime meditations of the Philosophy of love. His solitude seemed to him all environed with Intelligencies, and when any one came to interrupt him and blamed him for being alone; Nothing less (answered he;) I was in good company, but found my self alone after your coming.

He was so transported, that he walked throughout the streets chanting the praises of his Jesus, and when some who knew him while he was in high place, demanded of him, whether he had lost his wits? verily you are in the right (replied he) my well-beloved hath taken away my will, and I have given him my understanding; there is nothing left me but memorie to remember him. He many times caused his eyes and memorie to dispute touching the possession of his Divine love, to see who might vaunt the most right; His eyes said, sight surpassed all: but memorie answered, remembrance was much stronger, because it made water mount into the eyes, and fire into the heart. One while he caused his understanding and will to run after this his dear spouse, and he found the understanding was the more able, but the will better held what it embraced. He was many times seen to be in such a manner, that being readie to sleep, he bitterly with scalding tears wailed that he in sleep had forgotten his Creatour, having then no power over his dreams, nor thoughts. His passion became so violent, when he to himself presented the state of this world, wherein we are separated from the sight of God, that he thereby fell into fainting fits, and was sick of it almost to the death. A Phyician, on a time visiting him in these fits, and throughly understanding his grief, held much troublesom and tedious discourse with him, after which he said, this man had cured him, for that he had made him suffer throughly; and that taking this punishment patiently for Gods sake, he thereby was infinitely comforted. He commonly said, love was a Tree, the fruit whereof was To love, and that tribulations and languours were the flowers and leaves of it: the proof whereof daily appeared in the motions of his soul, wherein he felt most sensible afflictions, when he within himself reflected on the contempt was done to his crucified love.

One day he had a revelation, that of a thousand there were not an hundred who had any fear, or but an indifferent affection for their Saviour; and that of those hundred, ninetie feared him out of their apprehension of the torments of Hell; and that of those ninety, there were not two who loved him for the hope of heaven; and that of a thousand, scarcely could one be found who loved him for his goodness, his nobleness, and his worth: whereat he poured forth so many tears, that he was not to be comforted. He was often heard to groan, and sigh in the open fields, as if he had lien in an irksom prison, and had sought to break his fetters. When, being in these agitations, he came to a fountain side, where lay an Hermit asleep, whom he awakened and asked if he could tell how one might get out of prison? The other, who was a man of God, understood him, and replied, he was in the same prison that he was, as well sleeping, as waking; but it was a prison of love, where his desires, his thoughts, his hopes, his joyes were chains: upon which he fell into an extasie of holy comfort, to have found a man so conform to this humour; and both of them wept so much out of love, over this fountain, that they seemed to go about to raise those streams by their tears. If he wrote a letter, he imagined love gave him the pen, and that he dipped it in his tears, and that the paper was all over filled with instruments of the pasion, and that he sent his thoughts and sighs, as Courtiers, to seek out the well-beloved of his heart. When he saw an Epistle, or a letter wherein the name of Jesus was not premised; it sensibly tormented him, saying, Saracens had more devotion for Mahomet a man of sin, setling his name in the front of all their letters, then Christians had for their Redeemer.

A holy occasion one day drew him to a Church to hear excellent musick: but he perceiving the words were of God, and the tune according to the world; he could not forbear to cry out aloud, Cease, profane men. Cease to cast pearls into mire. Impure airs are not fit for the King of virgins. Some took delight to ask him many questions, and he answered them nothing, but the word, love; which he had perpetually in his mouth. To whom belongest thou? To love: whence comest thou? from love: whither goest thou? To love: who begat thee? Love: Of what dost thou live? upon love: where dwellest thou? In love. He accounted them unworthy to live, who died of any other death, then of love: and beholding a sick-man in an agony, who shewed no feeling of joy to go unto God, but only complained of his pain; he lamented him as a man most miserable. At his entrance into a great Citie, he asked who were the friends of God, and a poor man being ſhewed him, who continually wept for the love of heaven and heavenly things; he inſtantly ran to him, and embracing him, they mingled their tears together with unſpeakable joy.

God often viſited him by many lights, and moſt ſweet conſolations, as it happened at that time when he thought he ſaw a huge cloud between his Beloved and him, which hindered and much troubled him; but preſently it ſeemed to him, that love put it ſelf between them both, and gilded the cloud with great and admirable ſplendours, in ſuch ſort that through this radiant beautie he ſaw a ray of the face of his well-Beloved, and for a long ſpace ſpake to him with profuſions of heart, and admirations not to be expreſſed.

From this obſequious love, he paſſed to obliging love, and made a ſtrong reſolution to become profitable to all the world.

For which purpoſe, feeling everie moment to be repleniſhed with ſublime and divine thoughts which God had communicated to him, and that he had no inſight in Grammar, nor other ſlight ſchool-notions; he reſolved to learn the Latine tongue, being now full fourtie years old. He hit upon a teacher one Maſter Thomas who taught him words, conjugations, and concords; but he rendred him back again elate conceptions, unheard of diſcourſes and harmonies wholly celeſtial; ſo much honouring his Maſter, that he dedicated the moſt part of his books to him, wherein for the dead letter, he offered unto him the ſpirit of life. Not ſatisfied with this, he added the Arabick tongue, of purpoſe to convert the Mahumetans: and for this end he bought a ſlave, for whom having no other employment, but to teach him it, and he having therein alreadie well profited, and endeavouring to convert this wretched ſervant, who had been his Teacher; the other found him ſo knowing and eloquent, that he had an apprehenſion that through this induſtrie he was able to confound the Mahumetan-law, which was the cauſe that the Traitour, eſpying his opportunitie, took a knife, and ſought to kill his Maſter; but he ſtopt the blow, and only received a wound which proved not mortal. All the houſe ran at the noiſe, and there was not any one, who would not have knocked down down the ungrateful creature: but he hindered it with all his might, and heartily pardoned him in the greateſt ſharpneſs of his dolours. Inſtantly the Officers ſeized on this companion, and put him into priſon, where he was ſtrangled, repenting himſelf of nothing but that he had not finiſhed his miſchief; which cauſed extreme ſorrow in Raymond, who bewailed him with many tender tears of compaſſion.

After this, he undertook divers journies into France, Spain, Italy, Greece, and Africk, wandring continually over the world, and not ceaſing to preach, write, and teach, to advance the ſalvation of his neighbours. Paris many times received him with all courteſie in ſuch ſort, that the Chancellour Bertand, who was infinitely affected to knowledges, permitted him to read publickly in his hall.

The reverend Charter-houſe Monks, whoſe houſes have ſo often been ſanctuaries for Learning and Devotion, were his hoaſts, and ſo much he confided in their integritie and ſinceritie, that he with them depoſed all which he had moſt precious. The love of God, which is as lightning in a cloud ſtill ſtriving to break forth, ſuffered him not to reſt, but diſpoſed him to undertake ſomewhat for the glorie of God.

It is true, he had firſt of all that purpoſe which afterwards our father S. Ignatius ſo gloriouſly accompliſhed: for he was deſirous to make Seminaries of learned and courageous ſpirits who ſhould ſpread themſelves throughout the world to preach the Goſpel, and to ſacrifice themſelves for the propagation of Faith.

For this cauſe, he multiplied his voyages to Rome, to Lions, to Paris, to Avignon, inceſſantly ſolliciting Popes and Kings to ſo excellent a work, without ſucceſs. He uſed fervour and zeal therein, but our father thereunto contributed more order and prudence: The one undertook it in a croſs time, during the paſſage of the holy See from Rome to Avignon, where the Popes more thought upon their own preſervation then the conqueſts of Chriſtianitie: The other knew how to take occaſion by the fore-lock, and he intereſſed Rome, and the Popes thereof, in his deſign. The one made his firſt trial under Pope Boniface the Eighth, who having diſpoſſeſſed a Hermit of S. Peters Chair, held thoſe for ſuſpected who were of the ſame profeſſion, fearing they a ſecond time might make a head of the Church. The other happened upon Paul the Third, who was a benign Pope, and he gained his good opinion by his readie ſervices and ſubmiſſions, which tended to nothing but the humilitie of Jeſus Chriſt. The one embroiled himſelf too much in ſciences, even unto curioſitie, and made them walk like Ladies and Miſtriſſes; the other held them as faithful ſervants of the Croſs, ſubjected to holy Humilitie.

The one ſtood too much upon his own wit, and needs would beat out wayes not hitherto printed with any foot-ſteps, nor conferred enough with the Doctours of his times in matters of Opinion and Concord: the other paſſed through the ſurges of Univerſities, and followed an ordinarie track in the progreſſion of his ſtudies. The one was of a humour verie haughtie, the other of a ſpirit facil. The one took the golden branch with violence, the other gathered it gently, as if the providence of God had put it into his hands. Now Raymond, not ſatisfied with ſeminaries of ſtudents, embraced the conqueſt of the Holy Land, and ſtirred up many cities of Italy in this matter, exhorting them to make contributions, wherein he was ſo perſwaſive, that the City of Piſa alone, which is none of the greateſt, furniſhed him with Devotiſts who made of one ſole free gift twentie five thouſand crowns, which he would by no means handle, leaving it to the diſpoſe of the Pope, who would not give ear to the erection of new Colledges; ſo much were the affairs of the Papacy embroiled. He more eaſily obtained one thing, which was one of his three wiſhes, to wit, the ſuppreſſion of the books of Averroe's (an enemie to Chriſtianitie) which many with too much curioſitie read in the Schools of Philoſophie. God many times grants good diſpoſitions to his ſervants, whereof he will not they have the accompliſhment, making them appear more eminent in ſufferings then actions. This great man was of the number of thoſe, for he made himſelf moſt remarkable in the love of ſuffering, wandring over the world in extreme povertie, great incommodities of heat, cold, nakedneſs, hunger, ſcorns, contempts, dolours, baniſhments, dangers, both by ſea and land, ſhipwracks, treaſons, chains, priſons, and a thouſand images of death.

One day, travelling alone through a huge forreſt, he met two lions, which cauſed ſome little fear of death in him, as he witneſſeth in his writings, deſirous to live, that he might yet on earth ſerve his well-beloved: but in this great ſurpriſal he had had a thought, that love would put it self into the midst of this passage, and make him endure death with the more contentment: herewith he comforted himself, and the lions drew near and licked his face bathed in tears of devotion, and kissed his feet and hands, doing him no harm. Men were more sharp and discourteous to him, who ceased not to drag him before tribunals, to charge him with calumnies for his extraordinarie wayes, to give sentence against him; but in all he appealed to his wel-beloved, who never forsook him.

Seeing himself destitute of all succour for the conversion of Saracens, he passed alone into the kingdom of Thunes, where he freely disputed with the chief of the Mahometans, concerning the greatness and excellency of our Faith, against the impostures of Mahomet; which was the cause that he was immediately cast into prison, and condemned by the King himself to have his head cut off: to which he disposed himself with an incomparable fervour of love. At which time, one of the prime men of state in the countrey, who had conceived well of him, out of the admiration of his wit, perswaded the King to be satisfied with banishing him out of his kingdom, & that by this way, he should do all he was obliged unto for the preservation of his own law, and should get the reputation of a mild Prince among Christians, abstaining from the blood of such a man; which he did: but he was thrust out of Thunes with so many blows and ignominies, that he therein gained a noble participation in the Cross of Jesus Christ. The fervour which incessantly boiled in his veins suffered him not to be long at rest. He went into the kingdom of Bugia, as Jonas into Ninivee, crying out aloud through the streets, that there was in the world but one Religion, and that was ours; and that the law of Mahomet was a meer imposture and a fantasie. He was instantly laid hands on, as a mad-man, and led to the high Priest, named Alguassin, who asked him, whether he knew not the laws of the countrey, which forbad him upon pain of death to speak against Mahometism. To which he answered, he could not be ignorant of it; but that a man who knew the truth of Christian Religion, as he did, could do no other but seal it with his blood. This Alguassin proud of science, perceiving him to be a man of a good wit, entred farther into discourse with him, where he found himself shamefully gravelled; which made him forsake the Syllogisms of the School, to have recourse to the arguments of tyrants, which are arms and violence: for he caused him to be presently taken as an Emissary Goat, there being not any Mahometan hand so little which delighted not to hale and lead him with blows, until they brought him into the most hideous prison, which which was rather a retreat then a gaol, where he endured a thousand miseries with an unshaken constancie. The Genowayes, his good friends, who traffick in these parts, moved with his affection, got with good round sums of money, a more reasonable prison for him, where he began again to dispute with the most learned of the sect, and made himself to be so much admired by those his adversaries, that they endeavoured to gain him to their Religion, promising him wife, family, honours, and riches, as much as he could wish: but he mocked at all their machinations, and seeing them fervent to dispute, he persisted therein with great strength of reason and courage. They said, words were lost in the air, but they must take the pen in hand and write on both sides; with which he was infinitely pleased, and spent nights and dayes in prison to compose a great volume for the defence of our Religion. But the King of Bugia coming into his capital city, dissipated all these counsels, much fearing the touch of his law, which was gold of a base allay, and caused him the second time to come out of prison. From thence he sought to get something in Greece, passing over into Cyprus; where he disputed against the Nestorians and Jacobites; who rendred him poison for the honey of his discourses, whereof he was like to die, had he not been preserved by divine providence, and the assistance of a good Angel. The blessed man had alreadie passed forty years in a thousand toils and crosses, and spared not to suffer, by reason of the flames of love which burnt his heart; but he knew not whether he suffered or no, so much he took to heart the cup which God had mingled for him. Verily, our Lord appearing one day unto him, and asking him if he well knew what love was, of which he so many years had made profession? he verie excellently answered, If I do not well know what Love is, I at least well understand what Patience is: meaning, that it was to suffer; since nothing thing troubled him for the satisfaction he had in Gods causes. And another time being asked whether he had patience? he said, All pleased him, and that he had no cause of impatience, which only belongs to them who keep the possession of their own will. Lastly, being about fourscore years of age, he considered within himself what he said afterwards, that love was a sea full of tempests and storms, where a port was not to be hoped for, but with the loss of himself, and that its depth was his exaltation. He went back again into the kingdom of Saracens in Africk, where being known, he was suddenly stoned to death in a popular commotion, and buried under a great heap of stones, in which place his bodie long remained unknown to all the world: but it pleased God, that certain merchants, his countrey-men, sailing into that countrey, saw in the night a Pyramis of fire to rise up over his tomb, which caused a curiositie in them to see what it was; and coming to dig into it, they found this venerable old man who was so gloriously buried in his own triumph; they brought him back into his own countrey, where he is all this time reverenced out of an antient Devotion of the people, which the holy See permitteth rather by way of toleration, then expres canonization.

The second Treatise, Of HATRED.

Sect. 1. Its Essence, Degrees and Differences.

Hatred a hideous Comet.

WHat a Comet is among stars, Hatred is among virtues. It is a passion malign, cold, pernicious, deadly, which ever broodeth some egg of the serpent, out of which it produceth infinite disasters. It is not content to vent its poison in certain places and times, but it hateth to the worlds end, yea, as far as eternitie. To set before your eyes the havock it maketh in a soul; it is necessarie to understand it in all the degrees and dimensions thereof. For which purpose you shall observe, that Hatred being properly an hostility of the appetite against those things Its nature which it apprehendeth to be contrarie to its contentment; It hath some similitude with Choler, but there is much difference, as between pieces engraven, and painted, which may easily be defaced. Choler is more sudden, more particular, more ardent, and more easie to be cured: Hatred, more radical, more general, more extended, more sad, and more remedilesse: It hath two notable properties, whereof, the one consisteth in aversion and flight, the other in persecution and dammage. There is a Hatred of aversion, which is satisfied to fly from all that is contrarie to it. There is another of Enmity, which pursueth and avengeth, and tends to the destruction of all whatsoever. The first propertie hateth the evil; the second, wisheth it to the author of the evil, and when it hath once possessed a black soul, it maketh terrible progressions, and is especially augmented by four very considerable degrees.

Its properties.

Its degrees.

First, it beginneth in certain subjects by a simple aversion, and a hatred of humour, which is the cause we have an horrour at all those things that oppose natural harmonie, which appears as well in the good constitution of bodie, as in the correspondencies of senses, and the faculties of the soul with their objects. And although this contrarietie be not alwayes evident enough to us; yet there is some feeling which in the beginning maketh us many times to have an aversion from some person whom we never saw, and from whom we have never received the least suspition of affront or dammage: Be it out of some disproportion of body, of speech, of behaviour, or whether it be there is some secret discord; we often hate, not well knowing the cause thereof, which verie easily happeneth to the semal sex. For, women being full of imaginations; the vivacitie of fancy furnisheth them with infinite many species of conveniences and inconveniences that cause a diversitie of humours which very seldom make a good harmony; but if they do, it is ever easie enough to be disturbed.

There are loves and hatreds which cannot be put on and put off, as easily as a man would do a shirt; which teacheth us it is very hard to make one to love by command, as if we went about to introduce love by cannon-shots. The first degree of Hatred is properly called Antipathy, and is so general in nature that it passeth into things inanimate, and into brute beasts, which are no sooner born, but they exercise their enmities and war in the world. A little chicken, which yet drags her shell after her, hath no horrour at a hose, not at an elephant, which would seem so terrible creatures to those that know not their qualities; but it already feareth the kite, and doth no sooner espy him, but it hasteneth to be hidden under the wings of the hen. Drums made of sheep-skins crack (as it is said) if another be strucken near them, made of a woolf's hide; and such as are made of the skin of a camel scare horses. The lion is troubled at the crowing of a cock; Cabbages and herb-grace cannot endure each others neighbour-hood, such enmitie they have; and a thousand other such like things are observed in nature, wherein there are such express and irreconcileable hatreds.

The natural antipathies.

Jo.B. Porta in Chao.

If man, who should moderate his passions by reason, suffers himself to run into Antipathies and natural aversions, and doth not repress them by virtue; it falleth out; they increase, and are inflamed out of interest, contempt, slander, ill manners, outrages, offences, or out of simple imaginations of offence, which then causeth a second degree of hatred, which is a humane hatred, consented to with deliberation; which putteth it self into the field to exercise its hostilities: here, by injuries; there, by wrangling; here, by forgerie; there by violence, and by all the wayes which passion inventeth to do hurt by. Abject courages hate with a cold and cloudie hatred which they long hatch in their hearts through impotencie of vindicative strength. The haughtie and proud do it with noise, accompanied with disdains, affronts, and insolencie. All they who love themselves tenderly, perpetually swarm in hatreds and aversions, seeing themselves countre-bussed and crossed in a thousand objects which they passionately affect. All the most violent hatreds come out of love; and namely, when lovers, the most passionate, see themselves to be despised; despair of amitie, transports them to an outrageous hatred, finding they have afforded love the most precious thing that is in our dispose, to receive scorn.

Humane hatred.

Its differences.

Hatred of love.

There are likewise who, without receiving any injurie, begin to hate out of wearisomness in love, and coming to know the defects of such as they had the most ardently loved; they take revenge upon the abuse of their own judgement, by the evil disposition of their own will, and do as those people who burnt the Gods they had adored. Whether hatred arises out of a wearie love, or whether it proceeds from an irritated love; it is ever to be feared: and there are not any worse aversions in the world, then those which come from the sources of amitie. Quintilian hath also observed, That the Hatreds of neighbours are enmities irrecoverable, and wounds which never are cured, because hands woven by flesh, blood, and bowels, cannot be untied, but by making a rupture remedilesse.

Quintil. decl. 17. Non habent proximorum odia regressum: quæ cunque nexus accepere naturæ, & quæ sanguine viscera visceribusque construxit, non laxantur dilecta, sed perrumpunt.

Melancholy hatred. Man-hatred.

Out of this second degree oft-times a melancholick Hatred sprouteth, which the Grecians call man-hating, which is an Hatred bred in feeble, black, ugly, and ulcered souls in the world, who, to be revenged of their mishaps, extend (as it were) their aversions over total Nature. You see men pale, meagre, hideous, who being unable to endure a reasonable yoke which God hath put about their necks, or finding themselves to be disfavoured in their ambitions, endeavours, and pretensions; steal out of all amities, out of all companies, hiding themselves, not in those glorious Hermitages of Religion, where heavenly souls are; but in shameful solitudes, where they busie themselves to feed on gall, and gnaw some heart, in imagination, since they have not been able to transfix it with iron. Others grow up like poisons with the tongue of a serpent, which is ever in action; They have a Phisick of spirit that gnaws, burns, and consumeth them: so that they have no other profession in their life, but to blame all which is done, becoming like unto those ill presaging night-birds which casting forth boading shrietches in the dead time of night, as if they envied us darknes and the sweetnes of repose. Such was the disease of Diocletian and Tiberius, when they retired from the Court to hide themselves in solitarie places, as serpents among thorns. Lastly, this Hatred ever fomented, if it fall upon men powerful and factious; it maketh tyrants of them who pass to the degree of brutishness and execrable Barbarism, which causeth some to eat hearts stark raw; others to disentomb the dead, and to exercise crueltie on those who have nothing common with the living: others, to invent torments never seen, heard, nor imagined; others, to make themselves goblets of the heads of their enemies, therein still to drink revenge, venge, as often as they do wine, as did Alboinus a monster worthy of the horrour and execration of all men. See here somewhat near, the essence, qualities, division, causes, and effects of hatred.

Plin. l. 28. cap. 1. Homines quidem ut venena nascuntur: atra cum serpentium, tum linguæ vibrij; tabescunt animi curarum, adurit, cruciatus omnis, ac diversum alienum malo, ex malo tenebris quoque suis & ipsarum mollium quieti invidentes.

Sect. 2. That the consideration of the goodness of the heart of God should dry up the root of the Hatred of a neighbour.

LEt us now dazle the eyes of this furie by the contemplation of the goodness of our celestial Father, who is the prime model whereon we ought to reform the exorbitancie of our passions.

Diligis enim omnia quæ sunt, & nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti, nec enim odiens aliquid quod constituisti aut fecisti. Sap. 11. 25.

Let us learn from him to hate nothing, or, if we must hate at all; let us enter into the participation of a hatred fit to rest in the heart of God. The sovereign Creator hates not any thing in the world; for, he made all in the world, and as his wisdom is free from errour, so his works are void of repentance. Whence is it (think you) that Antipathies are to be found in Creatures? But that, their essence being limited to certain conditions and particular qualities, they commonly meet with other objects of natures quite contrarie to that wherewith themselves are endowed; which causeth counter-buffs and resistance in encounters. But if a creature might be found which eminently had all the qualities & perfections that are observed throughout the whole latitude of essences, and which had thereof made a good temperature within it self; it would not hate any bodie, but rather within it self accord all contrarieties.

a Simplicity of Divine Essence exempt from Antipathy.

Now that which we cannot give to creatures piece-meal, no not in our a imagination, God possesseth in gross from all eternitie. For within a most simple essence, and one sole form of Divinitie, he involveth all essences, all forms and perfections of creatures, which in him are exalted and deified: which is the cause he hated nothing that he made, he despiseth nothing, he accounts nothing unworthy the care of his Providence, even to the least worm of the earth. He is not like those nice and curious men who are distasted with all that is not for them. As he is all, he loveth all, and communicateth himself to all creatures according to their disposition.

b Omnia unum sunt in Deo, & cum Deo, nec enim aliunde justus aut sapiens quam unde magnus & bonus; nec aliunde denique simul hæc omnia est, quam unde Deus. Bern. ser. 3. in Cant.

O God! what say we, when we speak of the b Essence of God? All things are in God, the same form of the Divinity which makes him great, maketh him by the same means, good, wise, just, and all he is by his proper Essence. The great Divine S. Gregory, surnamed the Divine, saith, It is only in him to comprehend in his bosom all the Essences whereof he is the source of Origin. And S. Zeno addeth, That he alone is before all things, because all things are contained in his hands; he of himself is what he is, and there is none but he who knoweth himself in all the dimensions of the perfection which science may have. All the Attributes of God make in him but one perfection; all creatures which are in the heavens, the air, on the earth, and in the sea, are but one Essence. He united all in himself, and for this he loveth all, and regardeth all things created, as raies of his light, and tokens of his bountie. Hemlock, aconite, and aspicks, and so many other mischiefs in nature, are evils but in appearance, and benefits in substance, as S. Augustine verie pertinently discourseth. There is not so much as poison in the scorpion which is not good; although it be not good for us, it is so much good for the scorpion, that take away his poison, you take away his life. It is the disproportion of our nature, it is sin, which hath in us changed so many excellent blessings into great mischiefs, and which daily maketh us to hate, and curse them: but God hateth nothing, nor curseth any thing, but what he is not, and he is all, except sin: It is that alone which he esteemeth worthy of the hatred of his heart, which he chastiseth, and which he with an armed hand pursueth to the gates of hell, and beyond the gates of hell. He presseth continually upon sin, he convinceth, he fights against it, with no other arms then his justice and sanctitie, which is an eternal rule, that looketh round about on everie side, condemneth and censureth the works of darkness. For as in things artificial, all the perfection of works consist in the conformitie they have with the rule of the art which made them, and all their imperfection proceedeth from their recess from the same rule, which without speech or motion declareth the defects of manufactures that depart from its direction: so all the good, and all the beautie of moral actions, is, in the correspondence they hold with reason, and the eternal law: As all their deformitie and mishap, comes from their departure from this same law, which is the Justice, the Holiness, and Essence of God himself, who perpetually stands in opposition against iniquitie. It is it, which he drenched in the water of the deluge, which he burnt in the ashes of Sodom, which he swallowed in the gulf of Core, Dathan, and Abiram, which he tormented by the plagues of Pharaoh, which he gnawed by worms in the person of Herod, which he consumed by ordure and stenches in Antiochus, which he punished with gibbets and tormenting wheels in so many offenders, which he still tortureth to all eternitie, sunk down into the abyss of the damned; and it is it, out which he produceth his glorie, whence he raiseth his trophies, and makes his triumphs to be by essence and nature, a perpetual enemy and a destroyer of sin. O magnificent hatred! O glorious enemy! O triumphant persecution!

Only sin hated by God.

Let us enter with God into this communitie of glorie, let us hate sin (as he doth) by him, and for him; let us destroy it in our selves by penance; let us destroy it out of our selves by our good examples, let us destroy it by a good resolution, since Jesus hath destroyed it with so much pain & blood. How can we love such a monster, but by hating God? And how can we hate God, but by making our selves worse then devils? For if they hate him, they hate an avenging God, a punishing God. And we will hate a God that seeks us, a loving God, and hate him after so many execrable punishments of sin which we have before our eyes; and hate him after he hath offered himself up for us in the great sacrifice of love and patience. Is not this intollerable? We will employ some part of our life to revenge an injurie, and to hate a man, as if we had too much of it to hate sin: we make a shew to honour the Master, and we kill his servants; we make profession to adore the Creatour, and we tear his images asunder. Where are we, and what do we, when we make a divorce between our likes to disunite our selves from the first Unitie, which draweth all to it self by union?

Sect. 3. That Jesus grounded all the greatest Mysteries of our Religion upon Union, to cure Hatred.

LEt us contemplate our second model, let us behold our Jesus, and we shall learn, that all the greatest mysteries of his life and death, are mysteries of Union, to unite us to him, to unite us to his Father, to unite us to our selves with sacred and indissoluble bands.

Heb. 1. 2. Locutus est nobis in Filio, quem constituit hæredem universi, per quem fecit & sæcula.

First, all creatures of this great Universe were made by the Word, in the Unitie of Beginning. He spake to us by his Son, whom he hath established the heir of the whole universe, by whom likewise he created the worlds. Secondly, all the parts of this great All, were so streightly tyed one to the other, that they never have suffered the least disunion, and although many seem to have antipathy, and reciprocally to pursue each other; yet they will not be be separated, but joyn together in a manner so adherent, that he who should go about to disunite one Element from another, all these great pieces of the world would infinitely strive beyond their qualitie to repleniſh its place worthily, and to leave nothing void.

Æterno completitur omnia nexu. Tot rerum mistique fœdus concordia mundi. Lucan. l. 4. Plin. l. 36. cap. 17.

And it is a wonder, that from the beginning of the world, all things are held together by this Divine Tie, Concord, which in its union causeth the happiness of the world, and those sacred influences of love, have woven eternal chains to tie indissolubly all the parts of the universe. All this great bodie resembleth the stone Scyrus which floateth on the water while it is whole, and sinks into the bottom, so soon as it is broken. This is the cause why all creatures have from all times conspired, and do still daily conspire with inviolable inclinations in the maintenance of this concord, that the celestial and elementarie world may subsist in a state unchangeable. There is none but Angel and Man in the intellectual world, who have made false accords, and have begun to sow division, the one in Heaven, the other in terrestrial Paradise. He who placed it in heaven, is banished into the abyss, without recoverie; the other is succoured by a Redeemer, who came to restore the lost world, and he in Saint John professeth, he aimed at nothing but Unitie to make this reparation.

Joh. 17. 21. Ut omnes unum sint, sicut tu Pater in me, & ego in te.

S. Max. secunda cent. 146, 147.

For this cause (saith S. Maximus) he united himself to humane Nature, not by a simple union of will, of love, and of correspondence: but by the ineffable knot of Hypostatical union, conjoyning two Natures in one sole Person, and by making a communication of all he is, to his humane Nature, transplanted into the Divine. For this, he likewise doth daily unite himself to us in the Sacrament of the Altar, a true Sacrament of Love; where, if we will speak with S. Cyril, we say, that God is dissolved into us, as one piece of wax melted and poured together with another; and if we will reason with S. John Chrysostom, we say, He giveth us his virginal flesh, as a most sacred Leaven to season the whole mass of humane Nature: It is that, which in us should work that virtue, which the great Areopagite calleth a Conformitie of affections and manners, drawing near to Divinitie: It is that which giveth the name of peace to the holy Eucharist, with S. Cyprian, and that which so united the Christians in the Primitive Church, that they went from this mysterious Table, as from a banquet of Love, after which they breathed nothing but most pure flames of perfect amitie; whereat the Pagans who saw them, cried out, See how they love another! Behold how ready are they to die one for another! as we have said.

Κηρὸν πλέξας τῷ Κηρῷ. Cyr. in Joan. Chrys. hom. 46. in Joan. Ἀνάπτει τὸ σῶμα ἄνωθεν εἰς ἡμᾶς, ἡμῶν ἐγκιρνᾶται τὸ σῶμα. Cypr. ep. 10. 29. 30. Dare pacem lapsis. Videt in invicem si diligant, videt ut pro alterutro mori sint parati. Tertul. in Apol.

And yet thou (O man) wilt play the hobgobling, hate a man, and hate him in cold blood, yea, hate him determinately, and hate him irreconcileably. Seest thou not, that remaining in this disposition of a devil, thou dost thrust as much as thou canst the knife of division into the bosom of God bandying against unitie in contempt of the first of unities? Seest thou not, thou sinnest against the Incarnation of the word, the chief Sacrament of union which thou profanest; Against the sacrament of the Eucharist dreadful to Angels, which our Saviour instituted to unite us as grains of Corn are united in the Hoast which serveth as a basis to this Mysterie, and thou wilt frustrate the counsels of Jesus, despise the blood wherewith thou wert regenerated, separate thy self from the bodie, from whence thou canst not be divided, but by making thy self a companion for devils? Senseless man! by what God, by what Sacrament wilt thou swear, after thou hast profaned (not out of sudden choler, but by premeditated hatred) the God of peace, and the Father of unions? What a life of an Owl is it to resolve to live perpetually without seeing such a person, and to be reconciled unto him; and to be satisfied with only saying, he wished him no ill, because he will not tear his heart out of his belly? Noble and illustrious souls who bear the character of the living God; will you not rise up against this life of a Tyger and a Leopard, to enter into the sweetnesses and communications of Jesus, who shut up his transitorie life, by sealing with his blood the pardon he gave to his enemies?

Sect. 4. Of three notable sources of hatred, and of politick remedies proper for its cure.

WE peradventure take too high a flight in Theological proofs; I will descend lower, and touch remedies more secular for such as are in the practice of humane life. You shall observe, that it is most expedient to know the sources of Hatred, to apply fit remedies; and since those most ordinarily bear sway, proceed from Humour, Reason, and Interest, it is good to adapt to everie passion, that, which is most proper to the cure thereof.

Hatreds of humour, and how they are to be handled.

Hatreds of Humour and natural Antipathy, are verie hard to be cured in those who guide themselves by the senses; the best remedie is to advise them to separation who hate in this manner, so much as affairs, occasions, and civil reasons may permit: For, as there be certain natures which cannot endure the presence of some creatures, but that they feel some notable alteration (witness those who are affrighted, being shut up in a chamber, with a Cat, which they are sensible of before they see her, by instantly changing hue and countenance; and others who are terrified at a spider, or some other venomous creature:) so, there are spirits so contrarie, that mutual presence causeth disturbances in them, which are not absolutely in their power to repress.

Suidas. Attila fears Zercon.

Attila, the scourge of the world, who made the whole earth to tremble under the lightning of his arms, feared not any thing in all nature, but the sole countenance of Zercon; wherewith he was so moved, that he thereby became ungrateful. We must sometimes in these matters give way to natural inclinations, when they rise to so great a violence. And I cannot approve of those; who for worldly wealths sake, marry such together as have as much correspondence as the ape & the tortoise, who naturally hate another. And although they perswade themselves that these aversions of humour will waste with time; yet this happeneth but to those who are infinitely virtuous. But, if vice and profit become parties in the business; then do we see hatreds irreconcileably arise between man and wife. S. Bernardin, in his fourth Tome, fix and thirtieth Sermon, speaketh of a marriage made by surprisal, for the accomodation of a family, without any disposition of the parties; which was the cause, that a verie handsom young man was made to marry.

Pars. 1. magnetur. S. Bernard. tom. 4. ser. 6. An observation of S. Bernardin concerning bad marriage.

marry a maid with many deformities of body, palliated with many impoſtures; ſo that ſhe appeared as thoſe birds who having no body, make themſelves a pompous dreſs of their plumage. But above all, they had given her chopins, which might of a dwarf have made a Coloſſus. But at night ſhe laying off all thoſe her trims, and artificial leaves, the husband took ſuch an averſion, that he flew out of the nuptial bed, and could never endure her; becauſe he was a young-man, and did not reſolve to love ſo much out of charity, but that he would call his eyes to counſel. Here divorce began as ſoon as marriage; wherein it was more happy, then in thoſe, who after many years of miſeries, madneſs, tragedies and ſins, come in the end to ſeparation. That which is obſerved in ill-ordered marriages, is likewiſe ſeen among many brothers and ſiſters, who are full of contrarieties, which begin almoſt with their birth; and when theſe cannot eaſily be overcome, parents do not amiſs to ſeparate them, and breed them in ſundry houſes, that continual preſence may not encreaſe enmitie.

Do we not ſee it is an induſtrie in nature to interpoſe great rivers, ſeas, and mountains, almoſt inacceſſible, between people, who are of humour, manners, and cuſtoms extremely different? Following which principle, I do not think we ſhould continually urge with eagerneſs a ſick man to ſee thoſe againſt whom he hath (as it were) an invincible antipathy; but rather to be contented with other teſtimonies, by which he declares, he entertaineth no deliberate hatred. I ſay this with regard to neceſſity, and humane infirmities. For it is moſt certain, that a ſoul truly Chriſtian ſhould advance its actions to the higheſt top of Generoſity.

Et habitabit lupus cum agno, & delitabitur infans ad ubere ſuper foramine aſpidis.

And although (to ſpeak humanely) we ſeldome find Orpheus's, who with their Harp do accord creatures very different; yet is the grace of the Goſpel able to make wolves to cohabit with lambs, and children to ſport in the cavern of an Aſpick.

Reaſonable Hatred and its illuſion.

As for Hatred, upon reaſon, which cauſeth one to hate evil and the wicked, out of zeal or indignation; It is much more nice; and ſometimes there are ſpiritual perſons who infinitely flatter themſelves therein, thinking they have reaſon to hate, although they have no other ground but a falſe report, and a lie, whereof they will not be cured; thinking to do that through zeal, which they act out of mere revenge. There is no doubt but one may, and ought to hate vice and the vitious; yet muſt he ever in them love the image of God, and the reſemblance of humane nature, which is that perfect Hatred whereof the Kingly Prophet ſpake, according to S. Auguſtine. But we meeting not with vices, which, like Plato's Idea's, are not tied to perſons; it is dangerous, leſt ſeeking to pull them away, we be more paſſionate againſt the party who hath them, then againſt all the moſt abominable iniquities. We muſt not believe our ſelves, when there is queſtion of ſome important puniſhment, nor ſuch as are born to flatter our likings with too much ſervitude; but thoſe Angels for our counſellours, if it be poſſible, who are diſintangled from the matter of Intereſts. There are ſome who uſe to fortifie themſelves in their reſolutions by the deportments of thoſe who are held for Saints in the Church, and do readily alledge the examples of David, who, being upon his death-bed, recommended to his ſon Solomon the puniſhment of Joab and Shimei. But we muſt here conſider that David is not a man impeccable to ſerve as a pattern for all our actions; and that it is ever better to conſecrate our dying lips with the words our Saviour ſpake a thouſand years after, on the croſs; then with thoſe he left in this inſtant, as a Teſtament to his ſon. The Jews had naturally great inclinations to revenge, and many ſought to perſwade themſelves, it was by their laws permitted: which is the cauſe this great King was not ſo perfectly free from all the ſeeds of Hatred in the whole courſe of his life. But, foraſmuch as concerneth this laſt will of his, one may excuſe him for divers reaſons, nor can it be denied an act of juſtice to put Joab to death, who had defiled his hands with the blood of two innocent Princes; but it is ſtrange, that David reſerved this ſo rough a puniſhment for him, after fourtie years of great and ſingular ſervices, when he was about threeſcore and ten years old. Yet Theodoret brings a reaſon of ſtate for it; wherein he ſheweth, that Joab being in himſelf a great Captain, was withall daring in his manners, and tyrannical in his undertakings; and had already made it but too much appear, that he meant to embroil the ſtate after the death of his Maſter, and to ſet Adonija upon the throne, to the prejudice of Solomon: which was the cauſe that David, who ſought fixedly to eſtabliſh the Kingdom upon his lawful ſucceſſour, counſelled him to take him away by a juſt puniſhment of other crimes which he had committed. And as for Shimei, who had ſurcharged him with injuries and curſes, when, afterward he returned victorious into Jeruſalem, he came before him, craving pardon of his fault with lowly ſubmiſſion, which ſtayed David, and made him ſwear he ſhould not die for it; which ſeemeth to convince him of perjurie, when he commanded his ſon Solomon to kill him. I cannot approve Toſtatus his diſtinction, who ſaith, When perſons, very different in the qualities of their rights treat together, that he who hath juſtice on his ſide, may promiſe things with an intention not to perform them, as the other meaneth them. For verily the permiſſion of this manner of captious proceedings would throw a diſtruſt upon all treaties. But it is eaſie to ſee that David in this occaſion, beholding himſelf to be accompliſhed with joy and glory, when Shimei came to caſt himſelf at his feet, and that Abiſhai counſelled him inſtantly to put him to death, he ſwore he ſhould not die, and that the alacritie of a day ſo pleaſing ſhould not be purpled with humane blood; ſo that he had no further purpoſe, but to aſſure Shimei for the time preſent, and to promiſe him impunitie in this conjunction of Kingdom and affairs. But when he ſaw this ſpirit was inſolent, and like alſo to occaſion trouble in the young King, he did not abſolutely command (as Cajetan obſerveth) to put him to death for what was paſt, which had been pardoned; but not to ſpare him in new occaſions of commotion: as actually Solomon (following the intentions of the King his father) troubled him not upon his ſlanders; but upon another occurrent. Now although one may alwaies give colour to the Hatred, which is undertaken upon conſideration, and that it be ſometimes neceſſary for the extirpation of the wicked; yet muſt we more incline to clemencie then juſtice, in all which concerneth our ſelves.

Perfectio odii oderam illos. Pſal. 138.

Queſtion upon the act of David.

Theodoret in c. 2. l. 3. Regum, citatus in Gloſſa.

For Hatreds of Intereſt, which concern eſtates and honour, they many times in theſe daies are incurable, if they be not accompanied with ſome reaſonable ſatisfaction. It is a thing very remarkable, that our Saviour, who accordeth elements, and pacifieth total Nature, would not undertake the agreement of two brothers upon the partition of their their patrimony. Nay, there are some now-a-daies so greedie and fleshed in prey, that for a fingers breadth of land they would oppose Jesus Christ, if he should visibly come to mediate their reconciliation: After a thousand reasons which may be alledged for peace and good correspondence, they derive but one conclusion out of it, which is, to have their will. For which cause, God chastiseth them, and very often permitteth dissipation of goods, ruine of families, and many other accidents which stain their consciences, and tarnish their reputation. As on the contrary, he blesseth the children of peace, who forgo somewhat of their interest to acquire this inestimable treasure. It is almost as hard to preserve charity in a great suit, as to maintain fire in the water, or under earth to keep inextinguible lamps. He who will persist with a conscience indifferently Christian, must never descend into suits but with a leaden pace, and come out of them with the wings of an Eagle. Suits are as the sons of Chaos and night, there is nothing in them but confusion and darkness. It is a mixture of all evils, which hath the heat of fire, the threats, the roaring thunders and tempests of the air, the rocks of the sea, the talons of birds of rapine, and ravenous throat of fishes, the gall of serpents, the fury of salvage beasts, and the malignitie of poisons. Before it, ever walketh the desire of anothers goods; by its side, deceit, revenge, injustice, falshood, and treachery; after it, repentance, povertie, shame and infamy. As war is made for peace, so we sometimes undertake suits for justice; and those are honest men, who desire it: but they who at this present do it with all sincerity, are the greatest Saints of this age, who seem to be given by God to mortifie civil hatreds, and to establish minds in concord.

Suits, their nature and description.

Duel. After suits, Hatred brings forth another mischief, which is, Duel, a true Sacrifice of Moloch, which hath cost France so much blood, mothers and wives so many tears, which filleth families with sorrow, friends with grief, ages with horrour, and hearts the most reasonable, with the detestation of such a Crime.

Means to use an efficacious remedy in Duel. The edicts of our most Christian King (which have had more force then all other) have served in stead of a Jasper-stone to stanch blood: But never would a remedy absolutely efficacious be had therein, were it not that the King (who is the true Arbiter of honour, and distributer of glories) did not pour a strong influence of his spirit upon the Marshals of France, those great Captains; and all the brave men who wield a sword: by which he lively and powerfully perswadeth the whole Nobility, that this opinion conceived of the valour of those who fight Duels, is a meer illusion; since it may be common to lackies, and to the most abject conditions. Besides, there is need of a strong and speedy military justice to accord differences of men of war, and to chastise so many petty insolencies which seem to arise from nought, but to put affronts on men of honour: Otherwise it is hard to perswade a sword-man to forbear revenge, seeing himself provoked by outrages, which would make him to live dishonoured (according to the world) in his profession. And as for these slight souldiers of Cadmus, whose fingers itch, and who ground Duels upon the wind of a word, to let the world know they are tied to a sword; It were very good to send them into armies, and to recommend them to some prudent Captain, who may put them into some good occasion to make trial of their courage, and to give information of them, that either their cowardise may be punished, or their valour approved. It seems to me that these proceedings being well observed, might be of power to stifle this fatal plague, which hath caused so many mischiefs. For we must not wholly take away point of honour from the Nobility, no more then from women. Now as virtuous women account it not a point of honour to be faithful to an Amorist, but to a husband: so it is not fit that real gentlemen should think themselves valiant by the practice of a crime, but by the exercise of a virtue. As the first invention of Duels grew out of an opinion of point of honour; so must it die by a true judgement of honour, which proceedeth not so much from Doctours, as Captains. When the Gladiatours were in vogue, and that it was accounted a glorious thing to descend into the Amphitheatre to fight against men and beasts; all the world was inflamed therewith as with fury, and not so much as women but would be partakers.

This manner of massacres also bare sway sometimes in the times of Christianity, until the Emperour Honorius, who buried them, after so many eloquent tongues had, to Princes and Magistrates, represented the horrour of those so barbarous actions: so we ought to hope, that the King, to whom God hath given the plenitude of so many and so admirable blessings, will cultivate the Palm which he already hath planted by his victory over Duels, and will cover under earth and forgetfulness this infamy of mankind. I satisfie my self with giving this advice; having treated on this subject in the second Tome of the Holy Court.

Sect. 5. Natural, and Moral Remedies against this Passion.

IF you require Remedies and instructions both Natural and Moral against Hatred; Know that the Philosophers, who consider all according to the course of Nature, teach us that some have rebated and blunted the points of this cold and maligne Passion, one while by living with hot and moist viands, another while, by consideration of the joyes and prosperities which God hath given them in divers negotiations and accidents of affairs; thinking it not reasonable to employ the time in hatred, which was too short to enjoy the benignities of heaven. Others have cured themselves by conversation with good company, which is one of the sweetest charms of life: Others, by hope, and the desire they had to derive favour from the self-same party who had offended them; another while also, by a courteous interpretation of words and actions which had raised the same hatred: Lastly, by the change of those whom they hated before, seeing them rather to be raised in great innocency, or fallen into deep miseries, which made them derive from mercy that satisfaction they could not expect from revenge: But if they from nature have begged some comfort for their passion, and have not been frustrated of their attempt in the practice of the means; How much better helps have we, then they ever had; since that besides those natural remedies, which are not alwaies certain, we have the grace, and example of Jesus Christ.

Will you efficaciously remedy Hatred? Learn not to love your self so passionately as you do: For that is the cause that you make of your self a little Idol; and that the least word which seems to be let slip against you, many times, not of purpose, nor with intention, grieveth you, as if by displeasing sing your Chymera's, a Divinitie were offended: That is the cause that you have burning and enraged desires towards money, and the frivolous honour of the world, so that one cannot touch you on this side, but he strikes the apple of your eye.

Learn, as a wholesom instruction, those words of the Prophet Aggeus. You have hastned to go into your own house with contempt of mine, for which cause I have stayed the clouds in the heavens from distilling down their dew upon the earth. So long as you love your self so much, you shall never have love nor friends. So long as you think upon nothing but to raise your house and fortune on the ruines of the houses and fortunes of others, you shall be deprived of the dew of heaven, which is that Consolation of the just, which they find in charitie.

Agg. 1. Festinatis unusquisque in domum suam, propterea prohibiti sunt cæli, ne darent rorem.

Secondly make account to compose your self to a noble exercise of patience, which is to tolerate the defects and imperfections of your like; beholding them, not on the side where they do you wrong, but on that where they have connexion with God: and upon every offence you receive, say, This man is troublesom, but he is the image of God; He is violent, but it is he must crown my patience; He is vicious, but he is my flesh and blood: Let us hate his vice, but love the man, although he deserve it not: Let us love him in the heart of God, since we cannot love him out of his own merit. S. John kissed the hand of an Apostate, and a Thief, covered all over with blood, to oblige him, by whom he was traiterously disobliged; and I cannot shew the least token of amitie, towards one, who hath spoken one cold word to me. S. Katharine suck'd away the matter and filth of the ulcer of an infamous slanderer, who had detracted her with all manner of virulence, after infinite many benefits; and I cannot endure so much as to see one who hath displeased me, as if I were created to live free from all worldly contrarieties. I, who commit so many sins, on the other part, will to day do an act of virtue in honour of my Master, and in despite of passion. Let us go to heaven by love, since we cannot go thither by sufferings. This is the true gate by which we enter into the sanctuary, eternally to enjoy the sight of the inaccessible beauties of the holy and regal Trinity.

Exercise of patience.

Hæc est porta per quam qui ingreditur in Sancta sanctorum, & inaccessa pulchritudinis spectator dignus constituitur. S. Max. de concent. l. 381.

Hear you not the God of peace who saith to us, If thou (O unhappy soul) wilt still persist in Hatred; I pronounce unto thee the six punishments of Cain, Banishment from the sight of God, fear, stupiditie of mind, the life of a beast, the malediction of the earth, and (as Procopius addeth) persecuting Angels armed with swords of fire, who shall pursue thee like spectres and spirits in all places, and shall make themselves visible, and dreadful to thee at the last day of thy life? Behold here deservedly thy inheritance, since being mortal, thou makest thy enemies immortal, and dost still persecute the afflicted widow and her children, who are become orphans after the death of a husband, and a father, whom thou hatest. The strongest enmities oft-times are appeased at the sight of a dead bodie and a tomb, which we find exemplified in Josephus: For, Alexander was extremely hated by the Jews, as having reigned over them with a rod of Iron: But when death had closed up his eyes, and that the Queen his wife most sorrowfully presented her self, accompanied by two young children, & exposed the bodie of her husband, saying aloud (Sirs) I am not ignorant that my husband hath most unworthily used you, but see to what death hath brought him: if you be not satisfied, tear his bodie in pieces, and satisfie your own revenge: but, pardon a deplorable widow and her little innocent orphans who implore your mercy. The most salvage spirits were so softned by this act, that all their hatred turned into pitie; yet you (Barbarian) still persist to hate a man after his death, to persecute him in a part of himself, to tear him in pieces in his living members. O good God if you renounce not this revenge, you will be used like Cain, as an enemy of mankind, and a hang-man of Nature! O flame! O love! O God! As thou art dispersed throughout us by love, so banish all these cursed Hatreds of hell, and make us love all in thy goodness, to possess all in thy fruition.

Joseph. l. 3. c. 23. A notable example to appease hatred.

Sect. 6. Of the profit may be drawn from Hatred, and the course we must hold to be freed from the Danger of being Hated.

Utility of Hatred.

THere now remains to consider here, what profit may be derived from hatred, and with what Oeconomie it may be husbanded, to render it in some sort profitable: and in case it be hurtful; to prevent its assaults, and sweeten its acerbities. If the industrie of men found out the way to make preservatives out of the most dangerous poysons; why should it be impossible for us to make some notable utilities to arise out of a passion, which seems not to be created, but for the dammage and ruine of all things? yet it is certain, that Nature (which never is idle in its productions) hath given it us for a great good. For it may serve love well rectified in its pretentions, it furnisheth it with sentinels, and light-horse, to hinder that which opposeth its inclination, and to ruine all contrarieties bandied against its contentments. How often would Nature throw it self out of stupidity into uncertain dangers and most certain mischiefs, were it not that natural aversion did awaken it, did avert it from its miserie, and insensibly shew it the place of repose? Is it not a wholesom Hatred to hate Pride, Ryot, Ambition, and all ill Habits? Is it not a reasonable Hatred discreetly to fly from maladies, crosses, incommodities which hurt the bodie and nothing advantage the mind? This passion which in the beginning seemed so hideous teacheth us all this; When it is well managed it conspireth against others by an according Discord, to the lovely Harmonie of total Nature.

One may say, there is happines, and advantage to hate many things; but what profit can one find in passive Hatred, which makes a man many times to be hated, and ill wished without cause or any demerit?

That it is good to be honestly loved.

To that I answer with Saint Ambrose, that it is good to avoid such a kind of Hatred, that it is fit to makes ones self to be beloved with all honour by good men, and to gain (as much as possible) the good opinion of all the world, thereby to render glorie to God, as Rivers carry their tribute to the Ocean. A publick person who is in the employments and commerce of the great world, may have all the treasures of the Indies, and all the dignities of old Rome, but if he have not the love and good-will of men, I account him most indigent and poor: Thence it is that confidence taketh beginning, without which there is no fortune maketh any notable progression, nor affair which can have such succes as might be expected.

Bonum est testimonium habere de multorum dilectione, hinc nascitur fides, ad committere se tuo affectui non veretur alienus, quem charum advertit in pluribus. Ambr. l. 2. offic. c. 7. Means to gain the good will of the publick.

It is infinitely profitable for great men, that they may divert the Hatred of the people, to have innocencie of life, greatnes without contempt of inferiours, revenues without injustice, riches without out avarice, pleasures without ryot, liberty without tyranny, and splendour without rapine. All the rich who live in the society of men, as Pikes, (called the tyrants of rivers) in the company of other fishes, to ruine, devour, and fatten themselves with the bloud of the Commons, are ordinarily most odious: but as there is a certain fish, which Elianus History calleth the Adonis of the Sea, because it liveth so innocently that it toucheth no living thing, strictly preserving peace with all the offspring of the sea, which is the cause it is beloved, & courted as the true darling of waters: so we find in the world, men of honour and estate, who came to eminent fortunes by pure and innocent wayes, wherein they demeaned themselves with much maturity, sweetness, and affability, which put them into the possession of the good opinion of all the world. But those who are hated, ought diligently and carefully to consider from whence this hatred proceedeth, and by what wayes it is fomented; that fit remedies may thereunto be applyed.

Adonis, an admirable fish. Elian. l. 9. c. 16. de animal.

How hatred is to diverted.

There is a hatred which cometh from equals, another from inferiours, a third from great ones, and sometimes from powerful and subtle women, which is little to be feared. That which proceedeth from equals, lasteth long, by the counterpoise of power evenly balanced, and wasteth wretched hearts in the search after a cursed revenge, which drowneth pleasure in great acerbities, and many times, life in bloud. We must instantly labour for reconciliation, by a just satisfaction of the offended party, or stand upon our guard, that the enemy may not prevail. The hatred of inferiours towards great ones, whilst it is spread amongst the confusions of the multitude, oft-times long remaineth under silence shut up, as the impetuous current of a River kept in by a trench; but so soon as it hath liberty, it with so much fury overfloweth, that it turneth men into Tygers and Leopards. So we see in Histories, many miserable Princes overwhelmed with the hatred of the people, with a thousand inventions of cruelties, which force compassion from the most obdurate.

All books are filled with these disastrous events: but I do not think, we can behold a more tragical spectacle of popular hatred, then that which is represented by Nicetas in the person of Andronicus, Emperour of Constantinople. He entred into the Empire like a Fox, by tyrannical usurpation, and covered his crimes with a dumb shew of a sophisticate devotion, at which time (God the avenger of iniquities) was pleased to chastise him with an iron rod, and to make him as an example of his justice to all posterity. He fell (alive) into the hands of his enemy, who having loaden him with injuries and contumelies, abandoned him to the people for the punishment of his perfidiousness. From that time he was entertained with all the despites, which hatred and the liberty of doing all, permitted his enemies: For he had buffets redoubled one upon another given with implacable violence, his hair was torn off, his beard was pulled away, his teeth were knocked out, and not so much as women but ran upon his wretched body to torture and torment it, whilest he replyed not a word. Some days after, his eyes being digged out, and his face disfigured with blows, they set him on an old botchy Cammel, without ought else to cover him then an old shirt, to lead him through publick places in the manner of a triumph. This spectacle so full of horrour, nothing at all mollified the peoples hearts, but desperate men were to be seen to rush upon him on every side, as thick, as in Autumn swarms of flies fleshed with some carrion; some covered him all over with dirt and filth, others squeezed spunges filled with ordure on his face, others gave him blows with clubs upon the head, others pricked him with Auls and Bodkins, and divers threw stones at him, calling him at every stroke Mad-dog. And there was a wicked woman of the dregs of the vulgar, who threw a pail of scalding hot water upon his head, that his skin pill'd off. Lastly, they hasted to hang him on a gibbet by the feet, exposing him to a shameful nakedness in sight of all the world, and they tormented him to the last instant of death, at which time he received the favourable blow, from a hand which thrust a sword through his mouth into his bowels, without other complaint then to beseech God to have mercy on him. Behold the most bloudy effects of this cruel passion. But we may say, if this of the people resemble torrents, that of great and powerful ones is not unlike thunders and lightnings.

Horrible example of the hatred of the multitude.

Many Monarchs may be compared to the mountain Vesuvius near Naples, which (as it is written) is so fertil, that it yieldeth unto those who manure it, a million of gold in revenue; but when it comes to cast forth its all-inflamed entrals, it oft-times makes as much a havock in one day alone, as it brings profit in a whole Age. How many persons meet we in ancient and modern History, raised to flourishing estate, and enriched with the spoils of the Universe, who in a moment of misfortune have lost the honours and wealth, which in so many years of favours, they had with full hand amassed together in their houses?

Mountain of Vesuvius, Julius Recipinus.

But most especially, imperious women are ardent and exorbitant in their revenges, when a great power combineth with Passion to replenish all with disasters. Hatred shewed it self fierce and insolent in Eudoxia against S. John Chrysostom, furious in Justina against S. Ambrose, bitter in Theodora against Narses, bloudy in Fredegonda against Pretextatus Arch-bishop of Roan, whom she caused to be murthered at the Altar. And when this hatred is enkindled with the flame of love it self, and that they in their dispose have the Arms of their Amorists and servants, for execution of their purposes, they cause cruelties, which would make the History of Man-haters, and Lestrygons to blush.

Hatred of women

Means to eschue, and prevent the hatred of powerfull men.

It is good, for prevention of this kind of hatred, to have little occasion to entermeddle with such kind of people, nor too eagerly to pursue the favour of great ones, nor the pompous glories of worldly fortunes, since its felicities (like as if they were crimes) never scape scot-free. You must not enter too far into the intrication of affairs and persons; keep your self from slanders, and mischievous strokes of the Tongue, ill offices and treasons of such as have no soul; to make your self recommendable by Piety, Justice, Liberality, Moderation, Sweetness, and so many other virtues; which having adorned you in prosperity, raise a lustre and consolation in the bottom of adversity. To this also you must add powerful friends, who enlighten with the ray of truth, that darkness, which envy ceaseth not to spread over lives the most innocent, and which permit not virtue to be ever oppressed by Iniquity.

As for such as are in charges, offices, dignities, and commands, wherein in reason alteration may be expected, if they see themselves to be persecuted by publick hatred, it is best for them to change their condition to find repose: and especially, when there are powers which will hate out of humour, or levity; and who shutting up all passages to reason, do onely open an ear to slander. I ask, whether in such a case, God hath not consecrated a sanctuary for evil fortune in the pitty of a neighbour? The Divine Providence never permitted, that one sole man should be King of the whole world. He who is persecuted in one Province, passeth to another, and often finds friends who wipe away his tears, and gild his fetters: Whilest hatred swayeth in the Consistory of Cruelty, to draw down lightnings, and dart thunders on his head. Joseph sold by his brethren, found innumerable favours in Egypt. David, pursued on all sides by the envy of Saul, like a wild beast, met with refuge and employment under Abimelech. S. Athanasius sanctified the places of his banishment by the sanctity of his virtues. S. Hilary pulled out of his Bishoprick, lighted in Phrygia upon a silent repose, which gave him leave to write his learned books of the Trinity. S. Thomas of Canterbury rested between the arms of France, whilest Henry of England thundred sentences, and proscriptions of death against him. If one countrey become a step-mother, another proves a Mother; and the Divine Providence (the world's great Harbinger) ever findeth some petty work to entertain its elected.

But if there be no means to escape; and that servitudes must be undergon, prisons, and chains, & that scaffolds must be bloudied to satisfie the revenge of an enemy: Then is the time, when a spirit well habituated in the continual exercises of virtue entrethinto the centre of the soul, & beholdeth as from a high fortress, the vicissitude of human things, which here below have in them nothing immovable, but their proper unstedfastness. Then it is, when despising these veils of body composed of our inferiour elements, it now entreth in thought into the region of Intelligencies. Then it is, when it accosteth the legions of so many Martyrs, who on their bodies have received as many wounds as they had members, and have moistned the sacred palms of their victories in the effusion of their blood. All which is humane, yieldeth to the Tyranny of persecutors: but the immortal spirit makes it self a large way all bordred with lawrels in the Temple of glory and reputation; and like to the dove of the Prophet (whose wings were of silver) taketh a high and exalted flight to declare to all ages the innocency of a great courage, and to make its relicks survive in Cabinets, and in the memory of all good men.

How many have we seen die on Scaffolds, who with the sweetness of their countenances, terrified the most terrible aspects of executioners? They spake, they did, they suffered, they ordered their deaths as matter of Triumph, they comforted others in their suffering, at a time when they had much to do not to complain themselves. They acted together all the parts of wisdom, and came off so well in every one, as if they onely had undertaken this one. It was a great thing for them to do; but to do it so exactly, is that which for ever makes them the more admirable; and it was a matter incredible, that speaking so well, they yet suffered better in an occasion, where words have no credit, works no time, violence no relaxation, nor enmity compassion.

The third Treatise, Of DESIRE.

Sect. 1. Whether we should desire any thing in the world? The Nature, the Diversity, and description of Desire.

Whether it be good to have no desire.

THe Sages make a question, whether it be a thing to be wished, to have no Desire? And there are of them who think, that to live happy and contented, we must banish all desires. For they are amusements which perpetually entertain us with the time to come, which put us on the Rack, and burn us by our proper thoughts. Desires are the ecchoes of our loves, which mock us, & counterfeit certain voices, essences, & personages, which ordinarily are made of nought else but wind.

But now (say others) to have no desires, is to have no soul, no sense, no reason: it is to be a fly, not a man. The Seraphins in Isaiah stand by God's side, yet cease not to clap their wings: to signifie unto us, there is no soul so perfect and contented, which hath not the heart still excited with some generous desire. Trees are purified by the winds agitation, rivers are cleansed, and purged in their perpetual currents, and the heart by desires. If we would have no desires, we must not talk any more of eating and drinking; we must no longer have this young lover sigh after his beloved; we must not then admit learned men to make love to wisdom. That wrastlers burn with affection of prizes due to their valour; and that the souldier covers himself with his wounds to embellish his garlands, all ought to be indifferent to us; and that is the way quickly to run into the nature of rocks and stones.

We must here make a notable distinction of desires, insomuch, some are natural, given by God to man for the preservation of himself: Others are artificial, which arising out of an exorbitant will, are nothing but flood and ebb, but agitations and tempests. Desires are like number, one cannot name any so great, but that it is capable of addition.

The world replenished with desiring souls. Psal. 50. v. 12. Tabescere fecisti animam meam (alia versio) liquescere fecisti, ut tuam desiderium ejus. Est felicitas ingrata subtrahi ut semper pleni spei, vacui commoderum. Præsentibus carere dum futura prospectant. In Psal. 92. Richardus de S. Victore in Psal. 8.

Hence it proceedeth, that the world is replenished with desiring, and suffering souls: and that there is not almost any one who is not in expectation, and breathes not the air of the Region of desires. The most part of men resemble the moth which gnaws a garment, and in gnawing, eateth its own house: For by the eagerness of desiring the future, they lose all the pleasure of the present, and demolish their fortune by their greediness to raise it. That is it which the Panegyrick wittily expressed, pronounced before Constantine the son. Felicity glideth by us, as the water which streameth along under bridges, when still, full of hope, we rest unfurnished of contentments.

Desiring hearts (saith S. Augustine) are as those great-bellied women to whom the eternall word hath denounced a curse in the gospel. All the world would be but a morsel in the mouth of man's heart (saith Richardus de sancto Victore) since its wishes are infinite; and that it is evident that in Infinity what part soever you assign, you are stil at the beginning.

An excellent picture of desire.

If you desire that I make you a picture of the nature and perquisites of Desire, I will tell you it is a strange country, whereunto the prodigal Child sailed, when he forsook his fathers house to undertake a banishment: a Country where corn is stil in grass, vines in the bud, trees perpetually in blossom, and birds always in the shel. You neither see corn, fruit, nor any thing fully shaped; all is there onely in expectation. It is a Country full of figures, phantasms, illusions, and hopes, which are dreams without sleep: a Country where the inhabitants are never without feavers, one is no sooner gone, but another cometh into its place. There dwelleth covetousnes, a great woman, meagre, lean, starven, having round about her a huge swarm of winged boyes, of which some are altogether languishing, others cast her a thousand smiles as she passeth along; upon her self she hath an infinite number of horseleeches, which suck upon her to the marrow. Time looketh upon her a far off, and never cometh near her, shewing her an inchanted looking-glass, wherein she seeth a thousand, and a thousand false colours, which amuse her; and when she hath sported enough, she hath nothing to dinner, but smoke.

Behold the table of Covetousnes grounded upon Theology, and the Philosophy of S. Thomas. I say, to explicate my self, that the countrey thereof is the country of the prodigal child; and that famine is perpetually there, Desire being nothing else but a hunger of the good it wisheth: or indeed, a motion of the appetite towards the thing it loveth, and the first degree of love. All is in blossom in this Countrey, and never in fruit; insomuch, as he who desireth, possesseth nothing, as yet, but in imagination: and such is the nature of Desire, that coming to the end of its career, it sinks: since where the good is preseot that is affected, there is no further desire. The inhabitants there, are continually in feavers; since wishes are but feaverish servours. All there is full of phantasmes; because all those blessings are meerly imaginary. Covetousnes is necessarily hungry, being perpetually in pursuit, never overtaking nor eating: but if it do overtake and eat and gluts its heart, it ceaseth to be covetousnes. Verily it hath round about it little laughing boies; those are gandy, and sparkling desires: some sad, they are frustrated desires: Many bloud-suckers, which suck it, they are troublesom, and turbulent desires. I add, that time (ever distant from it) entertaineth it with an inchanted mirrour: For it seeth nothing but in the future, and sees many Chymera's and illusions, after which it is tormented, As Tygers, who beholding the looking-glass which hunters have set in Forrests, imagine it to be a creature of their own kind shut up in a prison of glass; and so long they scratch it, till they break it, and deface their desire. Lastly, I conclude, that they are served at dinner with smoke, all worldly desires being nought else but wind, and smoke.

Desiderium est motus appetitus in amabili, & inchoatio amoris. S. Thom. 2 sent. dist. 26. q. 1. art. 3.

Sect. 2. The disorders which spring from inordinate Desires, and namely, from curiosity & Inconstancy.

Ose. 13. 3. Erunt quasi nubes matutina, & sicut ros matutinus præteriens, sicut pulvis turbine raptus ab area, & sicut fumus de fumario.

O God! should one imagine the misery of those who dwell in this Countrey of Covetousnes, and who live in worldly desires, and perpetual disturbances, he could not have any thing more efficacious to give him a distaste of it.

Three disorders of desire.

I observe, ill-rectified desire causeth three disorders in the soul, which are, sterility, ardour, and unquietnes: Sterility; for, perswade your-self, all the inhabitants of this countrey, which are now adays many, are empty hollow souls, void of the solid and eternal good for which they were created, and are filled with imaginary windings, and labyrinths: Ardour; since they are hearts inflamed like fornaces, which dart forth desires, as Coles do sparks; hearts, which as the Eagle-stone, are still big, but produce nothing: Unquietnes; for that they live like Hedg-hogs all environed with sharp quils. There is onely this difference, that sharp quils serve the Hedg-hog for a defence and sharp-pointed desires kill, and consume those who have them.

You see men who all their life-time lie at anchor, and expect a wind, never saying; men, who are continually in fetters like prisoners; Men, perpetually like to languishing Amorists, or to truantly scholers who vehemently desire play-days; some, the most spiritual, thirst after books, and libraries; others please themselves with Idea's of dogs, of birds, of apes, and of horses: Others, in imagination, handle pieces of chrystal, pictures, diamonds, and pistols: Others cut out garments at their pleasure, of the richest stuffs which fancy can furnish them with; some are eager after hunting, and traffick; others, after courtship, and game: Some, go to the Temple of Honour; others mind nothing but money. It were a very hard thing to reckon up all the feavers, purgatories, and pains of those passionate souls; For indeed, natural desires are not limited by nature which made them; but those which consist in opinion have no limits, as Imagination which produceth them, hath no measure. But although men be very different in desires, they agree all in one point, which is, never to be contented, alwayes to desire some change, and novelty; and so ardently to desire it, that there are those to be found, who for a ruff-band, or a shoe, would gladly hasten the course of the sun, as they set forward the hand of the diall.

The passion of Curiosity, a kind of Desire.

But among these symptoms, which are frequent with persons infected with such like diseases, I discover two other passions of curiosity, and inconstancy, the companions of desire. Note, that Truth sitteth in a Throne all repleniished with lights, and is of very difficult access, if one have not wisdom for direction. For ordinarily curiosity way-layeth such as go about to approach to it, and involveth them in vast labyrinths of errours. This curiosity (if you desire to know the nature of it) is nought else but irregular appetite to know things either vain, unprofitable, or evil. It dwelleth in a Countrey fertile in apparance, but very barren in effect. It hath in its dominion many spirits (to speak truly) neither dull nor stupid; for they all have smartnes and vivacity: but the most part have a great want of judgment and discretion, to serve as a counterpoise to their levity. They will know all, and in an instant ask more questions then the seven Sages of Greece could resolve in ten years; so likewise they are of the nature of those Stars which raise tempests and cannot calm them, since they frame a thousand casualties, a thousand difficulties in affairs, and never derive a good conclusion. You may say, if you well weigh them, that they have a worm in their wits which gnaws them; that they are men sick in health, and living dead-men, who neither know what they would, what they do, nor what they are. Curiosity, seeing they have so much disposition to receive its impressions, entertaineth them in the winding ways of truth, like a Mountebanck, who put a multitude upon a gaze, by letting them see infinite many dainty colours in a Triangular glass: and in the conclusion sends them away dinnerless, with hunger in their teeth, and illusion in their eyes.

Curiositas motus animæ mortua. S. August. Confes. l. 13.

After these slight amuzements, this evil Mistris turns them over to anxiety, anxiety delivers them to new desires, and new desires to servitude, servitude to ignorance, ignorance to presumption, and presumption to unquietnes of mind. From thence they who are deeper plunged into this poison of false wisdom, take the way of impiety, others of misery & poverty, some of choler, of envy, of slander, and despair; the best provided are like the Danaïds, who do nought but fill and empty their tub, but to Omnis anima curiosa, indocta est. Augustde agone Christiano. c. 14.

Nulla curiositate videant quæ sunt in sanctuario. Num. 4.

no purpose. All are not sick of one same disease; for some have a curiosity, black & faulty, as those who seek for a Master in matter of Religion, and would gladly talk with a devil to learn news from Paradise: or such as those who strain curious Sciences so hard, that they squeeze black and maligne vices out of them, as Magick, or the trick of coyning false money: or as those who are mad to hear, to see, to know the vices, or mischiefs of others. Others have a more innocent curiosity, one of medals, another of Tulipa's, some of voyages, others of companies; and indeed, of all things which may serve for incentives to Concupiscence.

There are of them who are much disquie ted with matters which little concern them, they are curious to know all that passeth in the world in the Indies, in Japonia: how many elephants the great Mogull keeps; who is to succeed the King of China in his Empire; whether the great Turk armeth; whether the Persian stirreth; and what forces Prester John hath for the preservation of his State. they think within themselves, what a face they would set upon it, if they were Kings or Popes: They in their heads dispose of Kingdoms: They raise Republicks; they rig forth ships; they pitch battels; and after they have doated, they find nought but nothing in their hands. Others advance not their aims so high, but rest satisfied with inferiour thoughts, and petty cares; as how to trot up and down the streets to visit houses, and to ask of all they meet, what news do you hear? As also to observe post-dayes, and to visit their friends round, by a list-roll indifferently, to heap together the bruits of the City, to vent them again without any consideration. There are some who make vows of pilgrimages, not out of devotion towards Saints; but from a purpose to content their Curiosity. They know all the Indulgencies wch are throughout all the Churches of the Province, and beyond: all the houses that are built, all the christnings every day, all the weddings celebrated, all the childbirths of male or female, all the merchandizes newly brought in, all the strangers who arrive, all the suits determinated, all the charges given, all the offices sold, all the pamphlets cryed up and down the streets: Their heads are wonderful Fairs, whither merchants come from all sides; there is not a moment of repose: and solitude with such is accounted a petty hell.

Inconstancy followeth the multitude of desires. The kingdom of inconstancy.

This multiplicity of desires is waited on by another Malady of Inconstancy, which is properly a levity, & an irresolution of mind wch sheweth it self in his manners, actions, & words, who is touched with it. To say truth, this passion is a devil, who inhabiteth in a land of quicksilver, where Earthquakes are almost perpetual, winds blow on each side, and blowing, make many weather-cocks to turn to & fro, & every moment change posture; In this place, an admirable creature is to be seen, who is not what she is, & is that she is not; so many faces & figures she hath: She likewise is still upon transformations, & seems to do nothing at all, but to make, & unmake her self. One while she is great, another while little, one while gross, another while slender, one while affable, another while harsh, one while serious, another while gamesome, but ever slippery; and if you lay hold of her, you catch nothing. She goes forth of her lodging to appear in publick, as if she came into a Theatre, clothed, one while in changeable Taffaty, another while with different pieces set together out of a singular fantastick addleness of wit. She alone representeth all personages, talks with all kind of voyces, and in all manner of languages. After her we behold a million of petty phantasmes, imperfect in shape, and which seem to be but pieces roughly begun, which we may say, are her works.

If you a little observe the men which inhabit this kingdom of inconstancy, you shall find, they are people whose humours consist much of air and water; for they are always supple and pliant to all manner of objects, they have a spirit which brooketh not busines with a strong and solid penetration, to see the bottom of it; but onely scratch them with a little bodkin which is blunted, & broken presently. If you could see their heart and brain, you should behold in the one, huge squadrons of thoughts wch scuffle together like Cadmus his souldiers: in the other, a mighty mass of desires and indigested purposes, which renders them very unable to receive the impressions of the Divinity, as S. Basil hath observed upon that Prophet Isaiah. It seemeth all this kind of people have a wil of wax, & that any man may work it which way he list. Their passions are sharp, and ardent in the beginning: so that they transport judgment, which is either notably weak, or much benummed; but they last not: for they instantly are troubled at things present, and ever turn their face away from the future, never (as it were) being where they are, and stil being where they neither are nor can be. You shal see they every day begin to live, yea, when they should make an end; and if they do any good, they do it but by halves, never allowing themselves leisure to lick their Beat (as they say) nor to finish their work; so precipitate they are by contrariety of different desires, which draw them this way and that way, and destroy all the abilities of their wits. You shall note in them a great greedines after novelties, & continual changes of manners, study, apparel, of wearing their hair, of their manner of living, gate, of voice, of conversation, of sports, exercises, counsels, loves, of amities, words, & of mouths wch at once breathe forth hot & cold. To conclude, their life is nought else but the flood and ebb of a continual Euripus, it is repleni shed with shadows, giddines, and illusions, which in effect make it miserable; For commonly it is waited on by disesteem, grief, shame, anxiety, and great shipwracks of wit and renown.

Τὸ ἀνθρωπάριον μᾶλλον τῷ βίῳ εἰς ὑποδοχὴν δέχεται πάθη ἐπιτηδειότερα, ἢ ἀρετήν. S. Basil. Hom. 1. in Isaiam.

Sect. 3. The four sources out of which ill-rectified desires proceed.

Four sources of desires which toil us.

YOu must know, that those restless desires which toil us, proceed from four sources: the first and principal whereof is, a heart void of things divine; there being not (saith S. Augustine) a more manifest sign, that a soul is not well with God, then, when it entertaineth a multiplicity of desires. Moses pulled off his shoes before the burning bush, where he saw his eyes cleared by the rayes of the Divine Majesty; (in my opinion) to teach us, that his heart was at an end of its journey, since he had found the Centre of eternal rest. Whilst the soul of man is out of the limits which God assigned it, wel it may find Ins to lodge in, but it never finds a home: But he who knows the way how to accommodate himself, in all things, to the wil of God, hath found the industry of an infinit good, in the accomplishment of his desires.

It is to live like Cain in the region of instability, & to walk upon a quagmir, daily to entertain so many fresh appetites. Their multiplication witnesseth enough the barrenes of their purchase, but when one wel tasteth God, & finds him to comprehend all relishes, he forsaketh all to follow him, and the heart hath no more to do, but to please him who is the source of its contentment.

The second cause of desires is a promptitude, and a vivacity of the Minde, which bends much to levity, and is not at all balasted by solidity of judgment, whereby the soul is set at liberty to flie after all manner of objects, as bees do after flowers. I wil deliver unto you an excellent doctrine, which will teach us, that between a ship and the heart of a man (if we consider them well) there is much resemblance. The ship is a house of the sea, and the heart is the habitation of the soul, whilest it is in the ocean of this mortal life. The ship goes on the waters, and the heart upon abysses: The ship hath its sails, and the heart its aims: The ship is guided by the rudder, and the heart by prudence: The ship expecteth winds, and the heart the divers motions of its thoughts: The ship feeleth tempests, and the heart passions: the ship feareth rocks, and the heart obstacles: The ship suffers shipwrack under water, and the heart under the gulf of iniquity. The ship in the haven, and the heart in tranquillity.

A comparison of a ship, and the heart of a man.

Now as in the Scripture there are three sorts of ships specified; so there likewise are three manner of hearts. Some compared to ships which carry fruit, are such as are replenished with affections and desires; with pleasures and contentments of the world; which are enemies of the present, and perpetually sigh after the future. Others, are ships of traffick, which are continually full of affairs, disturbances, great and little cares, that steal the repose of life from them. The rest are the ships of Tharsis in the Mediterranean sea, which carry great designs, great earthly ambitions, and are very often tossed by most impetuous winds.

Naves pomo pariatis. Job. 9.

Naves institoris. Prov. 31.

Naves Tharsis. Psal. 47.

The third source of our Appetites is a hot and sanguine Complexion, which in our heart enkindleth many desires like unto a fire made with straw, violent enough in the beginning, but of no lasting: as on the contrary, cold people have fewer desires, but are more pertinacious in the pursuit of them.

It is said we must beware of a man, who hath but one thing to do, because his thoughts being perpetually bent upon one and the same object, he becomes extremely troublesome to those from whom he desireth the accomplishment of his designe: so must we defend our selves from a man who hath but one desire, especially when it is inordinate; For we may easily escape from such as have many cares. Time wasteth them as fast as he produceth them; it is needless to oppose, or much to contradict them: let their minds rest, and you shall find the purpose they had in the morning, to be quite gone by the evening, like the Ephemery, which lives but one day. Now as for those, who have amassed together all the strength of their soul upon one desire, they are immeasurably urgent, and cease not to persecute you untill they have put their wish in execution.

The fourth is a certain crooked winding of a heart, which is (as it were spungy and insatiable) joyned to a debility of spirit which apprehendeth want and necessity, and this makes it to fasten upon any thing to help it self.

Interpellat ad desiderandum finis ipse desiderandi. Tertul. lib. de panitent.

Tertullian saith, that all these wandring souls have no other profession in this life, but to be in wish, where they cannot be personally in presence. The end of one desire provoketh them to begin another. Their desires resemble fruits that pass away, which in their latter season retain some beauty of their first vigour. There are many who esteem it a bitter business to expect, and who had rather see their hopes cut off, then to find out the way how to prolong them; but such are born to desire, they are not pleased with a victory already gotten; you do greatly wrong them, instantly to give what they ask, they love even things unlawful, because they are such, and so soon as they are permitted them, they lose that place which they had before in their heart.

Sect. 4. That the tranquillity of Divine Essence, for which we are created, ought to rule the unquietness of our desires.

AGainst this passion, I have two remedies to propose in two Reasons; the first whereof is drawn from the first model, which is the heavenly Father; and the second from the second, which is the Incarnate Word; since in them are the most efficacious ways for reformation of the table of the soul. As for the first, I say, that our soul being made to the Image of God, and for the possession and fruition of God, it will never rest but in the conformity of its understanding and will, with the understanding and will of its Creatour. Now, what think you would God desire, if he were capable of desire; what would he wish to see, to know, and to have? nothing but himself: and insomuch as he is eternally and inseparably with himself, he is not capable of any impression of desires whatsoever. We cannot be like unto God without desires, whilst we are in the world; but we may, and ought to have but one main desire, which is God himself.

Reason against vain desires drawn from the Divine tranquillity.

Imagine your heavenly Father to be a great sea of Essences, of perfections, & of contentments, a sea which hath neither bottom nor shore; a sea wherein all the vessels of curious souls suffer shipwrack. Imagine with your self an Exemplary world, a vast world of wisdom, of sanctity, of intelligencies, of lives, of reasons, and of forms. There God inhabiteth within himself, being to himself, (as saith Tertullian) place, palace, world; there he is absorpt, as in a huge abyss of delights, not to be imagined. He from all eternity hath his felicity purely perfect, and concentred in his own bosom; seeing he from all eternity hath his Son, his great and onely Conception, which emptieth him without his emptiness, which issueth from him without issuing forth, which abideth in him without distinction of Essence, or confusion of Persons.

Nazian. in Natalitia. Πέλαγος ἀϊδὲς οὐσίας ἀγαθοῦ καὶ ἀπεράντου.

Tertul. in Praxeam, cap. 5.

He hath all his loves within himself, since he hath his holy Spirit, a substantial flame of love, enkindled in his heart by his proper will, which is the eternal and unquenchable fornace of all chaste affections. He hath all his desires limited and replenished, since, as he sees nothing out of himself; so he cannot desire any thing out of himself. If you imagine the sea (saith S. Augustine) it is not God: If you imagine the earth with so many rivers which moisten it, so many herbs and flowers which enamel it, so many trees which cover it, so many living creatures which furnish it, so many men which inhabit and cultivate it, it is not God. If you in your thoughts figure the air, with all its birds so different in shape, so various in plumage, so diversified in their notes, it is not God. If you go up to those Chrystaline and Azure vaults, where the Sun and Moon, and so many Stars perform their career with such measure, it is not God. If you behold in heaven innumerable Legions of Angels, Spirits of fire and light, resplendent before the face of God, as lamps of balsamum lighted before the propitiatory, it is not God: but God is he who comprehendeth all that, who bounds it, and incomparably surpasseth it.

Nec intelligentiam admittit solitudinis, nec diversitatem divinitatis. Magist. Sent. lib. 1. d. 2.

Mare vastum, non est hoc Deus; omnia quæ sunt in terra homines & animalia, non est hoc Deus. Aug. in Psal. 85.

All things (say Divines) are in God by way of eminency, eminency, as in the Exemplar Cause which moulds eth them, as in the Efficient Cause which produceth them, as in the Final Cause which determines them: but they are in a manner so elate and exalted, that those same which in themselves are inanimate, in God are spirit and life.

Quid factum est, in ipso vita erat. Joh. 1.

All the Creatures we have seen produced in the revolution of so many ages, are as Actours, which, God (who is the great Master of the Comedie which is acted in this world) kept hidden behind the hangings in his Idea's, more lively & more lustrous then they be on the stage. The world strikes the hour of their Entrances, and Exits of their life and death: but the great clock of God in his Eternitie, hath at one instant strucken all their hours. Nothing to him is unexpected, nothing unknown, nothing new: All that which tieth the desires of the most curious; all that which suspendeth the admiration of the sagest; all, which inflameth the hearts of the most passionate, Lands and Seas, Magazines of Nature, Thrones, Theatres, Arms, and Empires; all are but a silly drop of dew before the face of God.

Ecce gentes quasi stilla situlæ & quasi momentum statera reputatæ sunt; ecce insulæ quasi pulvis exiguus, & Libanus non sufficeret ad succidendum. Isa. 4. 16.

Then how can God but live contented within himself, since the smallest streams of the fountain which springs from his bosom, may suffice a million of worlds? O ungrateful and faithless soul! the same Paradise which God hath for himself, he hath prepared for thee; he will, thou beholdest thy self, that thou contemplatest thy self, that thou reposest thy self in his heart; yet thou fluttrest up and down like a silly butterfly among so many creatures, so many objects, so many desires; perpetually hungry, ever distant from thy good, ever a traitour to thy repose and glorie. Beggarly soul, which beggest every where: Miserable soul which in everie place findest want in abundance: Ignominious soul, upon whose front all loves have stamped dishonour; when wilt thou rally together all thy desires into one period? When wilt thou begin to live the life of God, to be satisfied with Gods contentment, and to be happy with Gods felicity?

Sect. 5. That we should desire by the imitation of Jesus Christ.

2. Reason of the only desire which Jesus had in seeking the glory of his heavenly Father.

THe second Reason that I draw from the second Model, which is, the Word Incarnate, the Rule and Example of all our actions, is, that Jesus Christ hath no other desire on earth, but to suffer, to be dissolved, and to annihilate himself for the glorie of his heavenly Father, by subjecting rebellious powers to his Scepter, and by gaining souls, of which he infinitely was desirous, even to the last moment of his life. The Philosopher Plato in the Book of the order of the Universe, writeth, that all the Elements naturally desired to evaporate themselves in the Celestial Region, as it were therein to obtain a more noble, and more eminent stare of consistence. Now the deaf and dumb desire, which things inanimate have, to be transformed into a nature most delicate, is most apparent in the sacred Humanity of the Son of God, which, although it always remained within the limits of its Essence; it notwithstanding had an ineffable sympathy with the Divinity, being totally plunged therein, as iron in burning coals. It in all, and through all, followed its motions, will and ordinances, as true dials wait on the Sun; nor had it any desire more ordinary, then to make a profusion of it self, in all it had created.

Plato lib. de ordine universi apud Viennam.

Theology teacheth us, that albeit, the will of God were necessitated in certain actions, as in the production of the love which sprang from the sight of God; notwithstanding in others, it was altogether free, able to do, and not to do such, or such a thing according to his good pleasure; as at such or such a time to go, or not to go into Jury. Able, of two good things which were presented, to chuse the one or leave the other; as, to do miracles, rather in Jury then in Sidon. Able, also to do the things ordained him by his heavenly Father out of motives and reasons such as his wisdom thought best to chuse: In all those liberties, never pretended he ought but the glorie and service of his Father. Good God, what sublimate is made in the limbeck of Love, what evaporations, and what separations of things even indivisible, are made in the five great annihilations which Theologie contemplateth in the person of Jesus Christ!

Non volebat in Judæam ambulare. Joh. 7. 1.

First, the inseparable Word of God seemeth to make a divorce, but a divorce of obedience; and to separate it self, but with a separation always adherent by the condition of a forreign nature transplanted into the Divinitie. Secondly, he, by a new miracle permitteth, that this humane nature tied to the Divine nature, be separated from its subsistence, its last determination and substantial accomplishments. Thirdly, that Glorie be separated from the estate and condition of Glorie, yielding his glorious soul up as a prey to sadness. Fourthly, he separateth himself not only from the signs and conditions of a Messias, but almost from the resemblance of a man, being become as a worm.

Radius ex sole, portio de summo, de Spiritu spiritus, & de Deo Deus. Tertul. Apol. 2.

Lastly, he draws himself into the interiour of his soul of his own accord, and wholly melts himself as Incense in the fire: in such sort, that S. Gregory very well saith, That he is the Amber of the Prophet Ezekiel enrobed with the heat of flames. But better saith Origen, who calleth him the Perfume which is annihilated for us; comparing the will of the Son of God to a viol filled with an aromatick liquor, which one hath turned up side down to empty it to the last drop; so the desires and affections of Jesus are poured forth in the bosom of his heavenly Father. But most especially on the day of his Passion, for then was the time when the Prophecie of Habakkuk was accomplished: Is it thou who mountest upon the light-horses, and who beareft salvation in thy mysterious chariot.

Greg. l. 28. mor. cap. 2. Quasi ignis effulgens, & thus ardens in igne. Origen in Cant. unguentum exinanitum.

Hab. 3. Qui ascendis super equos tuos & quadrigæ tuæ salvatio.

I now leave those who interpret this passage of the chariot of God triumphing in those ugly darknesses of Egypt. I leave those who refer it to the second coming. I follow the Interpretation which S. Ambrose presenteth unto me, who calleth the Cross a Gibbet of Triumph, and others who term it the true chariot of the glorie of the God of hosts. I consequently say, that the light-horses of our Saviour are his winged and flaming desires, which bare him more gloriously then Elias unto the throne of Honour, where he hath made a full consummation of himself, by the separation of his bloud and soul in that great Sacrifice, which put Heaven to mourning, the Sun into eclipse, the Earth into quakings, and Men the most stupid into affrightment. O, with what obedience, with what resignation did that dying Swan then appear, when all the stars (as Dydimus relateth) about three of the clock afternoon were seen in the heavens to enlighten his death! O, with what union of his will to Gods will, he spake these words, O my God, O my Father, behold me on the Pile to be sacrificed to thy Divine Majesty; My God, I have desired it from the first moment of my conception, I have had the law of obedience engraven in my heart with a chizzel of fire and an eternal character, and at this time (O my celestial Father) I wish it, I would it, and will protest it whilst my soul shall be on my lip, to have but one only desire in the world, which is to annihilate my self in accomplishing thy will!

Sect. 6. The condemnation of the evil Desires of the world, and the means how to divert them.

Against evil desires.

AND yet thou (O disloyal soul) wilt in thy heart entertain a mass of Desires, thou wilt rather live among feavers and burning coals, then tie thy self to the will of God! Rebel, thou hast prostituted thy self on high and below, upon the mountains and under trees, under cedars, and on the hyssop; so many great and little Desires have possessed thy heart. Thou miserable man, to have affection in store for a deceiving creature, who hath put the sword of division into thy marriage, to cut asunder a knot tied before the face of Angels and men! Thou unfortunate maid, unlucky victim, to fill all the sails of thy Desires for a man more light then the wind, and more faithless then ice; whose words are but promises, promises but perjuries, perjuries but forsakings, and forsakings but disasters; and to have neither heart nor thought for God, a Father so benign, a Saviour so affectionate, a Lover so loyal! Thou, to burn alive with black and shameful flames of ravenous avarice; & to have no feeling for him, who hath the beautie of fields, the enamel of meadows, the extent of seas, the riches of metals, and all the magazins of the Universe in his bosom! Thou, to run at random after transitorie honour, which glisters like a worm in a piece of rotten wood, and which pricketh like a thorn; and not to hold sympathy with him who crowneth the heads of his Elect with eternal garlands! Thou, to live daily in fits of fire and ice for a slight toy, for a gorget, for a chopino, for a little dog, a parachito, for all that which I neither can nor dare to express! O what a shame is it, that all creatures serve for snares and prisons to hearts moistned with the blood of Jesus; and they not to be softned by this venerable shower, able to break rocks asunder, and dissolve anvils!

In omni colle sublimi, & in omni ligno frondoso tu prostituta haris, meretrix. Jer. 2. 21.

You will ask me what you should do to be delivered from this tyrannie? First, accustom your self to cut away all superfluities, whether of apparel, diet, vain company, or other delights which fight against the law of God. Reduce your appetites to a small cost, and take more care how to end them, then to cherish them. Resolve with your self to lop off all your superfluities, and to be contented with little, holding it for a thing most assured, that by how much the less you shall depend on your greedie desires (which are most forward mistrisses, to whom you have prostituted your Christian libertie) so much shall you be the more near to God.

Desideria tua parvo redime, hoc enim tantum curare debet ut desinant. Senec.

Secondly, if you feel in your heart some seeds of desires to sprout and disquiet you; seasonably prevent them, one while diverting them by some laudable employment, another while by pulling them up with main strength in their first tenderness, and never to let them to get strength to your prejudice. It is much more easie to defend ones self in the beginning from a passion, then to moderate the violence of the exorbitancy, when it is lodged in your heart.

Non obtinebis ut desinat, si incipere permiseris. Sen. ep. 116

Thirdly, follow Aristotle's counsel, and look on all the objects of pleasure; not such as they are, whe they at first sooth sensuality: but such as they be whe they turn their backs to forsake us. Lastly, exercise your self continually in the desire of joys eternal.

Voluptates abeuntes, sivella fessa & pœnitentia, plenas, quo minus expidit reperiantur.

Behold all those things which environ you, all those honours, those riches, those pomps, as deceitful and momentarie things; Behold them as a flitting companie; Each day undo a knot of your slaverie; Put your self into the libertie of Gods children; Place your self in such a nakedness of spirit that you may say, One, and no more. Blind soul, how canst thou live one sole moment with so many desires, which are as so many daughters to marry? what a care must be had, well to bestow them? what a fear, to bestow them ill? what a grief, that they are ill bestowed? Stupid soul, canst thou rest with so many blood-suckers fastned to the marrow of thy bones, which draw thence all thy vital humour, and make thee have a life which hath nothing less then life in it? Temerarious soul, who hast dared to think, that forsaking thy Creatour, thou elsewhere shouldst find a better match! Go, and see the obstacles which daily meet with those who hunt after honours, favours, and wordly wealth. Go, go, behold, and thou shalt see a thousand fishes swim in a pond after a rotten worm. How many battels must thou wage, how many sweats of death, must thou sweat; how many iron-gates must thou break through, to content one only of thy desires? O how often will the Heavens and the Elements conspire against thy affections, which thou so unworthily, so disastrously hast placed?

O what bloodie sorrows at thy death, when God shall draw aside the curtain of the citie of peace, and shall shew thee an infinite number of souls in the bosom of Beatitude, for having well disposed their Desires; and on the other side, burning coals to expiate affections ill managed!

O what horrour, what terrour, and what despair, if the Angels come and say with a voice of thunder, Foris Canes, and that we must wander up and down in affection with a hunger everlastingly enraged, after a good we so many times have despised! O Jesus, the desire of Eternal mountains, draw to thee all my desires, since thou art the Adamant. Jesus, the love of all faithful souls, take all my affections, since thou art the Center of all hearts. Jesus, the Joy and Crown of all the Elect, stay my floating hopes, since thou art the haven of hearts, stretch out an assisting hand to so many errours, and set me in a place where I may desire nothing: but let it be such a place wherein I may love that which is infinitely amiable.

Apoc. 22. 15.

The fourth Treatise, OF AVERSION.

Sect. 1. The Nature and Qualities thereof.

The essence and nature of Aversion.

AVersion is a passion apprehensive, disdainful of distastes, which is shut up as a snail in its shell, and hath no inclination to any thing in the world. Covetousness presenteth it many objects, to see if it can snare it with a bait; but it doth nothing but fly away, and turn the face to the other side: and albeit it seems not to desire ought of all is offered unto it; it nevertheless coveteth good, but goes towards it by by-paths, and flight from all that which seems opposite to its felicitie.

Well, to understand the nature of this Passion, we

we must know, that as in motions of affections, there is first made in the soul a love wholly simple, which is an inclination and a complacence towards some object; from thence Desire is created, by which we consider the same object, not only as good and convenient, but as a thing absent, and out of us, which we must endeavour to have, and to bring within our power: But if we have the good hap to possess it; from thence joy ariseth, which is a perfect complacence, raised upon the possession of the thing desired. Likewise in passions which resist and oppose our heart; first, a simple hatred is created, which only importeth an Antipathy; and a certain dissenting from the object, which the understanding proposeth to the will, as disagreeable or hurtful: Thence we come to consider this object, either as far distant, and hard to be avoided; and then Fear laies hold of our heart: or we behold it more near at hand, and very easie to be repelled, being wholly unable to make any great or strong impressions upon us, as Fear doth, and then it is properly called Aversion: but if the evil happen to be present, it is a vexation and a trouble; and when it is past, there remains a horrour, which we call Detestation.

The character and true image of a spirit subject to Aversion.

We may say, this passion which is disgusted with all, hath nothing so distasteful as it self. There you behold a soul oppressed, still apprehensive, still retired, and ever harsh; and as nothing pleaseth it, so easily it displeases all the world. If there be cause to name one, he will never call him by his name; but will say, of whom speak you? of that wretch? of that sluggard? of that miser? of that ignorant fellow? Or, if he hath some deformitie of bodie; of that crooked piece? that crump-shoulder? of that unfortunate caitiff, who is much duller then a winter's day, or the snows of Scythia? If a book be to be censured, there is nothing worth ought in it, they are discourses and words ill-placed. If merchandize be to be bought, the shop and store-houses of a merchant shall be turned over and over, and nothing found that gives contentment. If he be in his own house, he makes himself insupportable to his domesticks: this garment is ill made, this chamber is ill furnished, this bed too hard, these dishes unsavourie; the wind at a door, the creaking of a casement, the crying of a child, the barking of a Dog, all is troublesom to him. If a man of this condition be to be married; there is not a maid in the world worthy of him, he must have one framed out of his own rib, as God did for the first Man: or suffer him to raise his love in imitation of Endymion and Caligula, up to the sphear of the Moon. But most especially, women of this humour are extremely troublesom; They have no small business to do, who are to find them out maid-servants and nurses; this is too rustical, she hath nothing amiable in her eye, she speaks too big, her body is not slender enough; the other is a piece of flesh not worth ought: needs must she be perpetually upon change; and out of too much curiositie to meet with a good service, be the worst served of any woman in the world. Behold one distasted with professions, conditions, and offices, all displeaseth him; Shall he become a Church-man? that seems a slaverie to him: Shall he betake him to a sword? It is hazardous: To an Office? It costs too much: To traffick? Little is to be gotten: To a Trade? He cannot find a good one. Lastly, it troubleth him to be a man, and would gladly entertain the invention of Ovid's Metamorphosis, to be transformed into some other kind of creature. There are young wenches, who have much ado with themselves: Shall they marry? There is not any match likes them; this man is unhandsom; that other is but simple; this man too wayward; that, too melancholy; one, too wild; another hath not living enough; nor that other, good alliance; an Angel must be fetched out of heaven to marry them. In the mean time, some amorist learneth to dance his cinque-pace, and to powder and frizzle himself to please this coy piece, whom nothing contenteth but her own distastes. If, on the other side, this creature looks towards Religion; she will multiply her paces and visits, and will run over all the Monasteries, and find none to content her; one is too indulgent, and another too austere; the habit of this pleaseth, but the manner of living is distasteful; the flesh draweth upon one side, and the discipline drives away on the other; and her wavering mind can resolve on nothing, nor irresolve on nothing, but irresolution.

That admitted and established in this manner; I say, there are two sorts of Aversion, the one whereof is tied to things, the other to persons, and both of them are of power much to disturb us, if we seasonably seek not to give remedie thereto in our most tender years before these dispositions wax old in us, and strengthen themselves to our prejudice. Now, I observe we may find very good remedies out of the consideration of the Divine proceedings of God, as I intend to let you see in the sequel of this discourse.

Humour of coy women.

Sect. 2. The sweetnesses and harmonies of the heart of God, shew us the way to cure our Aversions.

The consideration of the love which God bears to his creatures, is a powerful remedy to cure Aversion.

Diligis omnia quæ sunt & nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti. Sap. 11. 25.

Sin corrupteth the goodness of essence in intellectual creatures.

Cypr. de Idol. vanit. Spiritus impuri & sophistæ, & qui post eos quasi terrenis vitiis immersi sunt, & à vigore cœlesti terreno contagio recesserunt, non desinunt perdita perdere.

FIrst, we see that God loves all things except sin, and hates nothing he hath made. Essence, Goodness, and Truth, follow one another by the necessitie of consequence; and God hath put nothing into being, which is not in the state of some Goodness; yea, the devils will burn in hell having something good, having somewhat of God. They have being and substance, understanding, and will; all which, considered within the limits of Nature, cannot but be good. There is nothing but sin which altereth and depraveth it by the ill usage of it. S. Cyprian hath well noted it, when he saith of Devils, That they were "spirits impure and sophisticate, who having lost their sinceritie and heavenly vigour by the contagion of the vices of the earth, and who being once lost, cease not to ruine men. From thence we behold, that as in adulterated merchandize and false money, there is alwayes some good mixed with the bad; so in these unclean spirits, there is an Intellectual nature of it self verie good, which hath been corrupted by sin. God cannot but love in them all that is his, as much as he detesteth all which proceedeth from their rebellion; But if there be any thing lovely in creatures so miserable and forsaken, which is worthy to entertain the heart of God; how can we have an Aversion against so many other things which rest (as yet) in innocencie?

God in his Essence accordeth the diversitie of all Essences.

It is an admirable thing, that the heart of God is as the Father of Harmonies, and doth within it self accord things the most opposite. For we know all the world in this soveraign being, is more beautiful, better coloured and more flourishing then it is in it self; yet there is no contrarietie. Water resisteth not fire; heat, cold; drouth, moisture; because it is a Sanctuarie of Peace, where all diversities conclude in Unitie. Greek Histories make mention of certain Temples, as was that of Adonis, where-wherein lions were tractable; that might come to pass from the Industry of men, and not out of the virtue of the place, as Elian the Historian supposeth: but here we must say, The bosom of God is a true temple of Peace, which makes lions familiar with lambs, and which uniteth all to it self.

Marvellous Temples, where lions were tractable.

Ælian. de animal. l. 12. cap. 25.

The sympathies and antipathies which God hath wisely impressed on Essences, end in union.

But to witness unto us, beside, the intention which God hath to dispose us to sympathy, hence is it, that not satisfied to have united all the parts of the world, as those of an Egg, he giveth even to creatures insensible, certain Bands and dumb Amities, which cause them to seek one after another, and to link themselves together by complacence, as we see to happen in the load-stone and iron, in the amber and the straw, whether it be done by a substantial form which is hidden from us, or whether it be by a transpiration and effluxion of their substances, as the Philosopher Empedocles thought. And which is more, if this sovereign Workman permit Antipathy among creatures, he hath reduced all to the good of communitie, since it serves for the conservation of Species which compose the beautie of his Universe. So the contrarietie between the Lamb and the Wolf is a perfect incitement to the conservation of this creature, necessarie for humane life.

How we ought to govern our Aversions. Nature necessarily brings with it its sympathies and antipathies. Fracast. de sympath. & antipath. l. 1. c. 13.

Some one may here say, that by perswading too much, I perswade nothing: for, if we admit sympathy for all which God had created, we then must love serpents and poisons; we must miserably satisfie our hunger with all impure viands, which cannot be done without destroying the principles of nature which necessarily hath its appetites to good, and its Aversions from many things contrarie unto it. To that, I answer, we cannot wholly live without Sympathy and Antipathy: For we well know that the knowledges of the Senses, of the Imagination, of the Understanding, come to us by the help of Species which represent unto us the quantitie, figure, form, habit, motion, and the rest of things; but above all, the accord, and dissonance from whence commonly arise in our soul two affections, the one of Dilatation, and the other of Restriction. For as the soul dilates and spreadeth it self to things which are delightful to it; So it draws back, and foldeth it self up at the sight of all is unpleasing to it, verie well witnessed even in the members of the bodie; which extend or contract themselves, according as matters are agreeable or disagreeable to the heart. We do not here intend to stifle all the first motions which are not in our power, insomuch as they are invincible and inevitable. It were to no purpose to make long discourses to a man to exhort him, not to have some small quaking in his bodie, when on a sudden, cold water is thrown upon him, or not to wink with his eyes when a glittering sword is presented, as it were to strike him, or not have some dizzines in the head, by beholding a precipice from a place on high: For all that is natural, and may happen to men the most moderate.

The first motions are for the most part inevitable. Senec. l. 2. de Ira c. 2.

We do not likewise say, that we must not fly, not only by the first Motives of Nature, but also out of Election and Reason, all that which is hurtful to the bodie and health. No man (saith the Apostle) hateth his own flesh, but cherisheth and entertaineth it as long as he can, therein imitating the tenderness of affection which Jesus Christ hath for his Church. I add, that it is not also my intention to perswade, that one should not seek in the care of his life, things the most commodious, so much as Justice and Reason wil permit. We must bear with servitude (saith this fore-alledged Oracle) if we be engaged in this condition; but if one can become free, I advise him rather to make choice of liberty. Yet we are not ignorant, but that there are many good men who by the power of virtue afflict their bodies, and prefer contempt above all which the world esteemeth, that they may conform themselves to the sufferings of our Saviour.

One may reasonably fly that which is in any wise hurtful. Nemo enim unquam carnem suam odio habuit, sed nutrit & fovet eam, sicut & Christus Ecclesiam Eph. 5. 25.

But to rest within the limits of civil life, I say, that although we may innocently use the blessings of God, and put nature to its small pittances; yet we must take heed of becoming too suspicious, too nice, and too apprehensive of those things which are not according to our appetites; for otherwise there happen great disturbances, and irksome confusions of mind, which thrust the health of our soul into uncertainty.

To seek by lawful ways ones petty accommodations, is not a thing of it self to be alwayes condemned. Servus vocatus es? non sit tibi cura, sed si potes fieri liber, magis utere. 1 Cor. 7. 21 a One must take heed of being too curious.

First, when a spirit is too much tyed to its skin, and too much bent to flie all the contrarieties of nature; it is very beggarly and suppliant towards its body, which is not done without much care: For life being repleniished with great and little incommodities, from which Kings themselves cannot be wholly exempt: If one apprehend them too much, he must live like a man who would perpetually shut his eyes for fear of flies, and employ (almost) all his time, which is so precious, in the service of the flesh.

It is an hard thing not to feel some incommodities, life being so full of them.

God himself permitteth it also. Timor quem timebam evenit mihi, & quod verebar accidit. Job 3. 25.

Secondly, God for punishment of this niceness, will suffer, that all we most fear shall happen to us: a man many times falleth into mischiefs even by fearing them. Death seems to be onely for cowards; and when one seeks for liberty by unworthy ways, then he is involved in the greatest servitude.

One puts himself upon the hazard to live always in insupportable anxiety. Debitores sumus non carni, ut secundum carnem vivamus. Rom. 8.

Thirdly, one is in danger to fall into much discouragement, and into sad despair, when he sees himself slipped into matters troublesom, and very vexing, since he sought to avoid the lightest. For which cause the Sages counsel us, willingly to accustom our selves a little to evil, and of our own accord to harden our selves, to the end, that when it shall come, necessity may make that more supportable, which we have already assayed by prudence. We owe nothing to flesh, to live according to flesh, saith S. Paul: and S. Jerome in the Epistle he wrote to Aglasius, clearly giveth him to understand, That the Profession of Christianity is not a Profession nice and lazy; a true Christian every day beareth the Cross, and renounceth himself. S. Bernard said as much in one of his Sermons upon the Canticles: Fly (saith he) to your beloved persecutour, that you may find the end of your persecutions in the accomplishment of his wil. It is a determination from heaven, that we should see before our eyes so many great religious men and women, most austere, whom the divine Providence seems to propose unto us, to extend and glorifie the Cross of Jesus Christ; and shew, that all is possible to the love of God.

Hier. in ep. ad Aglas. Non ist delicata in Deum, fecura confessio quotidie credens in Christum, tollit Crucem suam, & negat seipsum. Bern. ser. 85. in Cant. Fuge ad illum qui adversatur, per quem talis fias, cui jam non adversetur.

Sect. 3. The Consideration of the indulgent favours of Jesus Christ towards Humane Nature is a powerful remedy against the Humour of Disdain.

IF we be not yet throughly perswaded by these reasons; the example of our Saviour ought to make us ashamed: For when we more nearly consider his life, we find that he only did not shew an Aversion from things despicable, but chose the most abject, and contrarie to Nature.

The example of our Saviour serves for another strong remedy to sweeten our Aversions.

I ask of you, what attractive was there in humane nature, to draw him from the highest parts of the heavens to its love? What saw he in it but a brutish bodie, a soul in the most inferiour order of Intelligencies, all covered over with Crimes, wholly drenched in remedilesse miseries? and yet laying aside aside those beautiful Angels who did shine as Aromatick lamps in his eternal Temple; he came upon earth to seek for this lost creature, prodigal of his substance, a foe to his honour, injurious to his glorie: and not content to reconcile it to his father, he espoused it, and united it to himself with a band indissoluble, putting it into the possession of all his greatnes, to surcharge himself with its miseries. This is it, which is so notably described by the Prophet Ezekiel, when he sets before our eys a miserable ungracious wretch, cast forth upon the face of the earth, wallowing in ordures, abandoned to all sorts of injuries, and scorns, whom the Prince of glorie looketh on with his eyes of mercie, taketh him, washeth, clotheth, adorneth, and tieth him to himself by the band of marriage.

Erat nuda, & confusione plena; & transivi per te, vidi te, & expandi amictum meum super te, & operui ignominiam tuam. Ezech. 16.

Displicentes amati summe, ut fieres in nobis unde placeremus. Concil. Arausican.

We naturally have so much Aversion from persons misshapen, nastie, and infected, that we cannot look upon them: but if with these defects, we also there find a soul wicked, ungrateful, an enemy to God and men; we then conceive such horrour, that one had need to be more then a man to endure them. Now, we were in this estate, which I speak of; for besides the misfortunes and calamities which encompassed us on all sides, we were enemies to God, by having been too much a friend to our selves; and which is more, we could not have one silly spark of love for him, if it were not inspired into us by himself: mean while he accepteth us, and appropriateth us to himself among all these contrarieties. He out of his goodnes will not lose him, who through his own malice delighteth to lose himself; he then stretcheth forth his hand unto him, when the other turns his back; the one flyeth, and the other pursueth this fugitive with the pace of his charity, even into the shadow of death. He calleth him, he flatters him, he courteth him; and not content to pardon him a crime, he promiseth him a Kingdom. What may one say of so profuse a Bountie!

Nec peremptum perire patitur, nec ab averso avertitur; sed fugientem paterna charitate insequitur, te vocat, blanditur, & reverso non solum crimen ignoscit, sed & regnum promittit. Franco. Abbas l. 5. de gratia.

The humours of the world are quite contrary to the designs of God.

How can we in the world so greedily seek for all the contentments of nature, seeing the God of nature so roughly handled in the world, which he built with his own hands? we cannot abide the stinging of a fly, a noise, a smoke, the sight of a thing which is in any sort displeasing: a world must be made of gold and silk to satisfie our desires. Jesus is the sign of a Contradiction, reverenced in appearance, and effect, used as a thing of nought. O how divinely hath Saint Augustine expressed the humour of a worldly man, an enemy to the life of God, in the book he wrote of the Christian Combat! Jesus was not wise enough, according to the opinion of the world; He hath indifferently taken upon himself all that which his heavenly Father would, not shewing any Aversion from things the most distasteful.

Displicet avaro quòd non corpus aureum habuit; displicet impudicis, quia ex virgine natus est; displicet superbis quòd consumelias sapienter pertulit; displicet delicatis quòd cruciatus est; displicet timidis quòd mortuus est; & ut non vitia sua videantur defendere, unum in hoc dicunt sibi hoc displicere sed in filio Dei. Augustin. de agone Christiano.

This is it which is hard to digest; It displeaseth the covetous, that he coming into the world hath not brought with him a bodie of gold and pearl. It displeaseth the luxurious, that he was born of a Virgin. It displeaseth the proud, that he so patiently suffered injuries: It displeaseth the nice, that he endured so many afflictions and torments: Lastly, It pleaseth not the timorous, that he died. Prophane spirits cease not to say, but how can that be done in the person of God? and instead of correcting their vices (which are verie great) they find cavils at the perfections of Jesus Christ, which are most innocent.

Sect. 4. The Conclusion against Disdain.

It is a shame to have an Aversion against one for some defect of body, or some other deformity of nature, when we are bound to love him.

Will we still out of humour love things pleasing to sensualitie, and have a perpetual distaste against all which may maintain virtue?

A Father and a Mother, to have an aversion against their own children, under colour that they have some defect in nature; and instead of regarding them with an eye full of pity and compassion to comfort their infirmities, wipe away their tears, and provide for the necessities of their life, to leave them at random in the storm: and if out of necessitie we must do them some good, to throw them out bread in an anger as if they had committed a great crime to come into the world, in that rank which the providence of God had prepared for them; what a shame is it to entertain amities and pettie loves only to please flesh and blood; that if the eyes find not contentment, the heart will no longer observe fidelitie!

This creature, which had heretofore been so much beloved, is now forsaken, rejected, and used like an excommunicate, having no other crime but some deformity of body, some infirmity or other accident, nothing at all in its power to remedie.

A husband, traiterous to Altars, and to the Sacrament of marriage, barbarously useth a wife who brought with her the wealth of her parents, and her own heart and bodie, in lawful wedlock: but now this carnal man taken in the snare of his lust by a wretch and a prostitute, rejecteth a lawful wife as if she were a serpent, or the froth of an enraged Sea, elsewhere to satiate his brutishnes, to the prejudice of his reputation, and the death of his soul. Must I here produce the actions of Infidels, to confound ours?

Lucianus in Toxaride.

A generous act of a Pagan, who teacheth us powerfully to command over our Aversions.

One Mnesippus relateth in Lucian, How that he one day, seeing a man, comely, and of an eminent condition passing along in a Coach with a woman extremely unhandsom, he was much amazed, and said, he could not understand why a man of prime qualitie, and so brave a presence should be seen to stir abroad in the company of a monster. Hereupon, one that followed the Coach, overbearing him, said (Sir) you seem to wonder at what you now see; but if I tell you the causes and circumstances thereof, you will much more admire. Know, this Gentleman whom you see in the coach, is called Zenothemis, and born in the City of Marseilles, where he heretofore contracted a firm amitie with a neighbour-citizen of his, named Menecrates, who was at that time one of the chief men of the Citie as well in wealth as dignities: But as all things in the world are exposed to the inconstancie of fortune, it happened that having (as it is thought) given a false sentence, he was degraded of honour, and all his goods were confiscated. Every one avoided him as a Monster, in this change of fortune; but Zenothemis his good friend as if he had loved miseries, not men, more esteemed him in his adversitie, then he had done in prosperitie; and bringing him to his house, shewed him huge treasures, conjured him to share them with him, since such was the laws of amitie: the other weeping for joy to see himself so entertained in such sharp necessities, said, he was not so apprehensive of the want of worldly wealth, as of the burthen he had in a daughter, ripe for marriage, and willing enough, but blemished with many deformities. She was (saith the historie) but half a woman, a bodie misshapen, and limping, an eye bleared, a face disfigured; and besides, she had the falling sickness with horrible convulsions.

Nevertheleſs this noble heart ſaid unto him. Trouble not your ſelf about the marriage of your daughter, for I will be her husband. The other aſtoniſhed at ſuch goodneſs, God forbid (ſaith he) I lay ſuch a burthen upon you. No, no, replyeth the other, ſhe ſhall be mine, and inſtantly he married her, making great feaſts, whilſt the poor Father was rapt out of himſelf with admiration.

Having married this miſerable Creature, he honoured her with much regard, and made it his glory to ſhew her in the beſt company, as a trophey of his friendſhip. In the end ſhe brought him a goodly ſon, who reſtored his grand-father to his eſtate, and was the honour of his family.

O good God! A man of the world, to ſpeak, and do all this for worldly Amitie! to command over himſelf in all the great averſions of nature, to content a friend! to act all theſe admirable prodigies, in ſight of all the world for the ſatisfaction of a moral virtue! And can it become us to play the nicelings, and ſo much to give way to our averſions; to forſake the law of God, Nature, and our own ſalvation! Will we never underſtand the ſaying of Saint Juſtine; That to live according to the propenſions of Nature, is not to live like a Chriſtian?

The fifth Treatiſe, Of DELECTATION.

Sect. 1. That Delectation is the ſcope of all Nature: Its Eſſence, Objects, and Differences.

God hath made all creatures to have Delectation.

GOd ſeemeth to have made all things for Delectation; ſince even Creatures which have no ſoul nor reaſon have a dead Delectation applyed to the place, and end for which they were made. Had fire ſenſe, it would triumph for joy to ſee it ſelf in an eminent place: and a ſtone would receive contentment to be below: the Iron would ſmile to feel it ſelf enchained by the arms of the Adamant; and a ſtraw, to behold it ſelf caught by the Amber.

Now for as much as theſe things are without judgement; all their joy conſiſteth only in the ceſſation of their motion, which is done when they are arrived at their proper elements. Creatures the moſt eminent have a ſenſitive knowledge of things agreeable to them, and do infinitely rejoyce in their poſſeſſion and fruition; But, man, who worketh by more powerful and exalted engins of reaſon, is created to participate in Joy, not by a dead Action, but by an underſtanding, and a reaſonable fruition. And that you may the better conceive, wherein the joy of a real man conſiſteth, you muſt know, it is compoſed of four things; the firſt whereof, is, that, to receive; one muſt have an object pleaſing and delightful, which is as the baſis of rejoycing: and ſecondly, a facultie capable to conceive, and know this object, which in it ſelf naturally diſpoſeth to Delectation; from whence it cometh to paſs, that a Beaſt will hear the braveſt and beſt Luteniſt in France without any pleaſure; becauſe, it hath not ears to judg of it: thence we muſt go to a third degree, which is an affection toward this object; otherwiſe, had it all the perfections in the world, there is no contentment taken therein: from whence it cometh that devils, albeit they have a certain preſence of the ſoveraign of all objects, which is God, and have a certain knowledge of him; they cannot find any repoſe therein, becauſe they love him not. To conclude; the accompliſhment of pleaſure is the preſence, poſſeſſion, and fruition of the good which is known to us, and which we love: for from thence proceedeth a ſweetneſs vital, lively, and delicious which poureth it ſelf forth into the bottom of our ſouls, and diffuſeth it ſelf upon our ſenſes, as a gentle dew falling on plants. See what joy doth, if you have never well tryed it; which is indeed nought elſe but a ſatisfaction of the ſoul in the enjoying what it loves.

Four things compoſe the ſolid delectation of man.

Why devils love not God, whom they know to be ſo amiable.

But now at this preſent, to expreſs all the objects, and particular cauſes thereof, is a diſcourſe which rather extendeth in length, then eſtabliſheth any ſolid veritie; Yet, I think one may undertake to affirm there are three ſorts of joy: ſome are wholly divine and inſpired, as thoſe of holy Confeſſours, Virgins, and Martyrs, who rejoyce in the practice of virtues, in auſterities, and torments; others are indifferent, partly humane, and civil, as are the pleaſures we take in the beautie and diverſitie of natural things, honeſt amities, and ſciences, in honour and eſtimation, in the ſucceſs and proſperitie of affairs, and in the exerciſe of great charges: Others come from the Baſe Court, and from animal nature, as are the pleaſures of eating and drinking, of feaſts, of banquets, of love, of dancing, of ſports, of plays, and of jeſting.

Contentments are rather in the will, then in pleaſing objects.

Every one meaſureth his likings by his own nature and condition; and one may truly ſay, that pleaſure is not properly in things exteriour, but in the interiour of our wils and appetites. See we not, that all colours have no luſtre in the night-time, and that neceſſarily light muſt awaken, and put them in poſſeſſion of being coloured? ſo, all objects in the world are of the ſame nature; they are dumb, dead, and inſenſible, unleſs the ray of our will reflects on them to actuate them, to ſet them a work, and of them to make matter of our delight.

If pleaſure ſprang from the qualitie of creatures, it would be alike in all hearts; and never would any thing, which is pleaſing to one, be irkſom or diſtaſteful to another: but ſith we ſee ſo many diverſities in the contentments of particulars, and that one ſelf-ſame man is ſometimes diſpleaſed with that he hath moſt affected; we may well ſay, there is ſome ſecret in joy which is not derived from any thing elſe, then it ſelf. Chiron could not endure to be a feigned God, becauſe he daily ſaw the ſame things. Polycrates was impatient to have Felicitie fixed upon him, and ſought, of his own accord, to become unfortunate, as one glutted with his own happineſs.

There are a thouſand fantaſtical tricks in a ſpirit over-much contented with worldly bleſſings, needs muſt our appetite in the ſame tone meet with objects, to accompliſh our felicitie: Wherefore it much import to habituate it in delight, which ariſeth from things good, and laudable, to purchaſe its joys at a low rate, to have them continually within ones ſelf, without begging them from elſewhere, which will never happen but by flight from unlawful luſts, and by the application of our minds to things divine. For which purpoſe I will here repreſent unto you the reproach of evil pleaſure, that you may adapt your ſelves to the ſources of the delights of God.

Sect.

Sect. 2. The Baseness and Giddiness of sensual Voluptuousness.

The essence of this Passion.

WIcked pleasure is an inordinate delight in sensual things, proceeding from a soft, nice, and effeminate soul which adhereth to its flesh, and excesively loveth it, and which also oft proceedeth from a spirit become cold in the love of God, and darkned in the knowledge of other blessings of the other life, from bad education, and from many vicious habits contracted in youth: strange is the dominion of flesh, and admirable the sway of pleasures.

Delubrum voluptatis. Isa. 13.21.

Figure unto your self that you in a Table see that Edifice, which the Prophet Esay calleth, The Temple of pleasure. It is a house of delight, where one entreth in by five gates, which are all crowned with roses, and carry the badge of youth, and prosperity. The five gates are the five senses, by which all the passages are made into carnal pleasure; and which according to their nature are perpetually but upon sensual pleasures, and vain delights of the world. When one entreth into this house, he instantly feels the smoke of meats, he heareth a great noise in the kitchin, and mixed with it a consort of dissolute people, who chant, that, which those miserable souls sung in the book of Wisdom. Come, let us enjoy present blessings, and let us not torment our minds with the time to come; let us make much of creatures while they are in our power; let us take prosperitie by the wing whilst youth smileth on us. Let us spare neither rich wines, nor perfumes; the flower of time flyeth away, lay hold of it who can: Let us make coronets of roses before they wither, and let there not be a meadow wherein our sensuality wantonly sporteth not.

Venite, fruamur bonis quæ sunt, & utamur creatura tanquam in juventute celeriter, vino pretioso & unguento nos impleamus: & non prætereat nos flos temporis; coronemus nos rosis, antequam marcescant, nullum pratum sit quod non pertranseat luxuria nostra.

Then we behold a great number of those drunkards, of whom the Prophet Esay speaketh, who are upon the side of a river, called the Forgetfulness of God: some of them are frizzled, powdred, musquified; others smoke-dried, high-coloured, and Fiery-faced; others pale, meager, and out of countenance: some drink, eat, and make good chear so prodigiously, that Nature doth even burst for anger: some toy, sport, and trifle among women of their own humor: others fumble upon a Lute, sing airs, and prattle to please themselves: others shuffle Cards, shake dice, and pitch battels at the sound of money: others design strange new dances in their fantasies: and to conclude; all of them have no other aim, but the satisfaction of sense, and the slaverie of the flesh.

The image of nice ones.

You see likewise among these heaps very many of suspicious nicelings, who have as great a care of their health, as if the Species of men were to fail in themselves. There are many people, who never by experience knew of what colour the Crisping of day was; and who as well also may vaunt, as the Sybarite, that they never saw the sun either rising or setting. Alchymists labour to turn copper into gold; but these men commonly turn day into night, and seek for elements apart to distinguish themselves from other men, as being not made of the same matter with the rest. They perpetually pick quarrels at the air, the winds, the seasons; and there is scarcely a day clear enough for them: they must keep their chambers, learn the trick of dining in their beds, to beware of Planets and Moons (as great enemies) and to fear the Serene as if it were some flying serpent, which came to rob them of their life: heat, cold, moisture, drouth, travel, the way, are hostilities with them, against which they proclaim an everlasting war. All these kinds of people would willingly make Epicurus his vow, which is never to have any trouble, nor ever would they be dispensed with in it. If there be the least shadow of some sickness; Physicians upon Physicians must be consulted with, all the world must be entertained with an imaginary evil, remedies must be sought for, on all sides; Drugs every hour, of all kinds sent for, so long, until they have made an Apothecaries shop of their bodies. But if really they be sick; Hippocrates and Galen must be raised again, to feel their pulse, so few Physicians they find to their liking; and then battels must be waged, to take a medicine, or to receive a prick of the lancet, if peradventure the apprehension of it be lodged in the giddiness of their brains. When Death comes to look on them, he must have a gilded Mask on, and be cloathed with a garment of white sattin, embroidered with pearls, and a little sythe of Christal put into his hands, or a silver dart; for they extremely fear the stroke.

Lastly, to be short, you in this lodging observe infinite many who never make use of their feet, and as little of their head, but to trouble all the world: such as cannot eat one morsel but with silver forks, nor cannot spit but upon the same metal; such whose viands must be more choice then were used in those antient feasts of false gods: There is not a Cook, a Groom, nor a Maid-servant can content them; so many fashions, singularities, and services there are about them: you would say their life is a continual sacrifice repleniished with ceremonies; everie day they must be upon change of officers, and he who accomodateth not himself to their humour, is their open enemy. Were it not better for one to die a thousand times, or to live all the dayes of his life attending the most skittish Mule that is, then do such service to his bodie?

Sect. 3 The Sublimity, Beauty, and Sweetness of Heavenly delights.

Remedies; True contentment is in God.

WRetched Soul! if thou yet art not grieved to lead a life, an enemie to the Cross, odious to Reason, unsupportable to men: and if thou seekest joy and contentment, for which, it seems to thee, we are born; lift up thine eye, and behold delight in its source, which thou wilt never find but in the house of God. The wine of Palms makes all other wine unsavourie, and men to be temperate; So the contentment which cometh from things divine, blotteth out the memory of all sensual delectations.

Melior est racemus Ephraim vindemia Abiezer. Judic. 8. 2.

One grape alone of Ephraim is better worth then all the vineyards of Abiezer. One sole pleasure taken in heavenly objects, is a thousand times more to be esteemed then all the contentments in the world, whose delire is nothing but fire; fruition, but disturbance; and loss, but repentance. All the pleasure of God is in God himself: he hath his Halls, his orchard, delights, his Cabbinet, and his Paradise in his own bosom: he alone is an infinite good to himself, and sustinent in all the latitudes of its beatitude: he enjoyeth it from all eternitie, having no need of any creature, to augment the pleasure of it, and to accomplish the glorie of it: and, if of necessitie he must have company, and amitie to make up an accomplished good; he never needed more then the most sweet and lovely societie which he found before all Ages in the Trinitie of persons, amongst whom there is a sovereign Communication of blessings, joy, counsels, and nature. Now, it is an admirable thing that the same good which God out of necessitie hath for himself, he hath prepared for us through Charity; and will we have any other Paradise, then himself! Masters will not have any thing common with their servants, and if they could, they would not breath the air which ordinary people daily draw in without any difference; but would create another more pure and delicate, for their own use. God, all good, and all bounteous, doth quite contrarie: For, all that, which is greatest, most rare, and most to be wished, is beatitude which boundeth the desires of all the world; and he hath shared it with us, not dividing it, sith he will, that every one of us possess it without division, as he enjoyeth himself without distinction of felicitie between persons. O what a shame is it, that a soul created for the delight of God, beggeth its contentment from an ape, from a parrot, from some sauce, from a dance, or other thing more contemptible!

God possessing himself, enjoyeth his contentment.

Three considerable qualities in the blessings of God.

The blessing of God hath three things, observed by S. Thomas, which marvellously recommend it, to wit, that it is most general, most intimate, and most durable. If we found the like qualities in the pleasures of the flesh; I should think they were wise, who provided themselves of them: but if there be nothing less in them, then all that which a well-rectified soul may desire; why pursue we them, to inflame our thirst and provoke our appetites? As for what concerneth Generalitie; the benefits of sense have this want; they never generally delight, sith the train of the Peacock, which pleaseth the eye with its diversified paintings, contents not the taste at all; and that which pleaseth the taste, doth not necessarily please either the touching or smelling. Otherwise doth Gold recreate, and otherwise delight; everie creature hath its propertie and nature, which limiteth the virtue thereof with a certain circumference: God is the the object which gathereth together all delights, as he uniteth all blessings. O man, thou callest here under the little of Contentment, all that pleaseth thee: Thy gold is thy contentment, and thy Farm thy contentment, and thy life thy contentment; but God is a contentment which includeth all other pleasures: among these objects which charm thy senses, that which is silver cannot be gold, and that which is wine cannot become bread, and that which is light cannot serve thee for drink: but thy God is that alone which containeth the models of all pleasures to be imagined.

Agrum tuum pax est, prædia tua pax, Deus tuus pax; quicquid hic desideres, paxtibi erit; quia hoc, aurum quod tibi est, non potest esse argentum: quod vinum est, non potest esse panis: quod tibi lux est, non potest esse potus; Deus tuus totum erit tibi. Aug. in Psal. 36. serm. 1.

Secondly, if we regard the manner of delighting; all pleasures of sense pass but to the outward skin: and if they come to penetrate farther; they beat down our senses which are not long able to bear an object so violent, although it be gustful and pleasing. Our soul alone, as it is in its nature, is not mingled with that matter which tieth things corporal: It hath a capacitie almost infinite of not being wearie of its object; and God who is a spirit-Creator pierceth in into the bottom, and overfloweth it with eternal felicities. For, as for the third consideration, we see all sensual delectations pass along like a torrent which runs through a valley: but the blessings of God ever flow with an affluence which never dryeth; and therefore Hugh of S. Victor verie well compared the favours of heaven to a miraculous oil, which the Prophet Elizeus obtained by his prayer for the good widow: for as ordinarily oil daily decreased in the vessels wherein it was put; this, quite contrarie, so multiplyed through the blessing of the Saint, that the woman was enforced to say, she had no more vessels to put it in. And how many see wee in the world, who keep a wicked slight pleasure as a drop drop of corrupt oil which comes to nothing, and fadeth away as if it be not spent; whereas the consolations of heaven do sometimes so fruitfully overflow upon faithful souls, that they confess they have not a heart large enough to contain them! O soul really penurious, worthy of all the poverties on earth; whom the riches of heaven cannot suffice! what hast thou to do with those standing puddles of Egypt which do only inflame thirst in thy veins? wilt thou never seek for thy refreshment in the Cisterns of Bethlehem!

Hugo l. 1. Miscellaneorum. tit. 3. Ad oleum mundi vasa deficiunt, oleum mundi in vasis deficit.

Sect. 4. The Paradise, and joyes of our Lord, when he was on earth.

Our Lord passed all his life in contentments which were necessarily due to him, to give us an example to wean ourselves from them. Hic est filius meus dilectus in quo mihi bene complacui. Mat. 17. 5. Totius potestatis summa, thesaurus virtutum, flos delitiarum, amnium deliciarum, convivium Angelorum. Aug. hom. in exurgens Maria.

LEt us, in the second instance, behold what joys and what pleasures the incarnate word made choice of in this life; since it must serve us for a model. Verily, were there a man in the world worthy to live in perpetual delight; it was he, in whom the heavenly Father had chosen to place his heart, his joys, and contentments: It is he, who is called by Saint Augustine, the summary of all power, the Treasury of virtues, the flower and quintessence of contentments, the sweetness of delights, and the perpetual banquet of Angels. As supremely potent; he might afford himself all the pleasures of Monarchs: as correspondently virtuous; he might sanctifie them in his own person: As being in possession of the most pure delight (in such sort that the only aspect of his face served for a delicious feast to all the blessed souls;) he seemed to be inseparable from joy; He notwithstanding would take so poor a part in the comforts of the world, that he, who would consider and behold the whole Table of his life from the time of his birth to his death, shall find he chose the life of a Halcyon who liveth among thorns, whereof her nest is made, and on the trembling agitation of waters, which serve it for a moving chariot. The life of Jesus Christ was a thorny life among a thousand difficulties which environed it on all sides, a life tossed with a thousand afflictions which afforded him no rest, a life like unto a piece of Tapistry wrought with threds of gold, wherein there was nothing but thickets of briars and brambles. Good God! if we be threatned by some evil; we try all manner of helps, we offer vows to all the saints, and make heaven and earth to conspire (if we can) to free us from it: we beseech God to do miracles in our behalf, that we may suffer nothing; and he doth a perpetual one in himself, to endure all which a supreme crueltie could invent, & an equal patience suffer. He permitted sadness to seize on him; even in the bosom of Beatitude, as if a King should give a sergeant leave to bring him a summons in the midst of the pleasures of his Table. The two most triumphant days of his mortal life seem to be, that of his Transfiguration, and that whereon he made his magnificent entrance into Jerusalem; And yet on this he wept, as moistning his triumph with tears from his eyes: and on the other, Moses and Elias, who appeared by his sides, to serve as Oratours in his praises, spake of that he was to fulfil in Jerusalem (to wit) of his excessive sufferings, as if one had proclaimed to Cæsar the sentence of his death, at the instant when he entred into his Ivorie chariot to be drawn by four white horses. Jesus Christ was at that time in a body all resplendent with lights, which was as a chariot to his soul; and he would, to be entertained with his passion, mingle the Cypress with the Lawrel. I do not wonder the Fathers have applyed to him the passage of Genesis; I will put my Bow in the clouds.

This,

Arcum meum ponam in nubibus. Gen. 9.

This, verily, was the Raiobow of the Celestial Father, which shone, & showred both at one time: for, we see, this goodly meteor, all composed of clouds of glory which serve as a Mirrour for the sun, ceaseth not to pour down it self in rain upon our heads; so, the Saviour of the world in the pavillion of the Beatitude of his soul all covered over with fires and lights, had eyes weeping over the sins and miseries of men. Where think you were his joyes? S. Augustine will tell you. The soul of Jesus Christ was perpetually content, because it was drenched in God his father, as a drop of dew in the Ocean: It was ever in the place of pleasures which were born with it. All it thought, all it did, all it aimed at, was nothing but God: and from this so perfect union, waited on by immortal ardours of his love, it derived its Immutability.

Aug. l. de Incarnatione Verbi.

The soul (besides these delicious Torrents of beatifick vision which overflowed it) drew its consolations from the very sufferings it endured for the glory of the Divine Majesty. It drew them from the destruction of Idols, and from the confusion of devils which yelled, being now despoiled under its feet, from the exaltation of the Church, in sufferings and persecutions; from the glory of so many souls who sailed from the red sea of their bloud to eternal rewards; from so many holy Virgins who were to follow the standard of the purity which his Mother did first of all place on his Altars; from so many Doctours who should be born to beat down heresie in so many battels, which were to be waged throughout the revolution of Ages; from so many Confessours who should bedew themselves with tears of pennance, and burn themselves in a Holocaust of sweetness. All was presented unto it, as in a burning glass; the rayes whereof reflected in diametre upon its heart to set it all on fire, in such sort, that it was then like to the great Angel of whom the Prophet Zachary speaketh, who sat upon a red horse among gardens of Myrrhe, which are the Hieroglyphes of love; his red horse was the ardour of his celestial affection, and the branches of Myrrhe so many elect souls, which were even then in the Book of Prescience, wherein he took unspeakable delight.

Sect. 5. Against the Stupidity and Cruelty of worldly pleasures.

AND now, (O disloyal soul) to be called to the society of the joyes of the celestiall Father, and of the Son of God; and to despise them for a miserable fansie of pleasure! Ah, illusion! Ah witchcraft! What sense is there to feast perpetually, and to live in the profuse excess of Taste and gourmandize, which you shall one day have more cause to curse, then cherish; whilst so many poor Widows, so many little Orphans, and people heretofore fortunate, now necessitous, even to the extremity of penury, have not dry bread to moisten it with their tears, before they eat it? When have you inquired after their Calamities? When have you opened an eye to behold them? When have you so much as made a ray of mercy to reflect on so pressing and deplorable miseries? Go (O thou ungrateful to God) traitour to thy own salvation, enemy of the poore, scorn of the rich, and prison of humane Nature, who keepest it shut up in thy bowels of brass, not suffering it so much as to behold its like. What wilt thou answer to the voice of the bloud of so many poor, who will plead against thee at the day of judgment, if thou from this time resolvest not to cut off thy superfluities, to comfort their afflictions? Where wilt thou find any to receive thee into those celestial mansions, if thou dost not visit the poor in their Hospitals, and Cabbins, abandoned by all the world? Where wilt thou find rewards from heaven, if thou sowest not liberalities on earth? O thou nice wanton who wiltst perpetually be observed according to the giddy fancies of the exorbitant spirit; and the many sufferings which have covered, and swallowed up the third part of man-kind, never to enter into thy thoughts! Of what flesh, of what bloud, of what bones dost thou think thou art made; to desire here to be served like a demy-God, and to walk on the heads of men? Ignorant of thy self, nay Hang-man of thy self, who canst not live without so much prodigality, superfluities, and services; not knowing that the first imitation of God, is, to depend little in the world on ought which concerneth the service of the body. O thou old raven of the Deluge, who still art tied with a long chain of servitude, to a wretched piece of carrion, which hath exhausted the wealth of thy purse, and brain! Is it then infamous pleasure for which thou hast renounced the delights of heaven, for which thou hast betrayed thy salvation, and trampled under foot the bloud of the Testament; and thou not yet so vouchsafe to open thy eyes, to see the headlong ruine which threatneth thee? Unhappy Bacchanalians, who make Temples to be consecrated among Christians to Idolatrize you; where will you find any place to lodge you in, unless you mean to leap, and skip upon the blood of the lamb? Hence with riot, curiosity, sports, feasts, and dissolute delights; I pronounce it, I publish it aloud, They are the Apostacies of Christianity, if you dayly go about to countenance these libertinismes.

Traiterous pleasures, pleasures enemies of the Cross; see, see at the door of the house of these Syrens the sepulchres of Concupiscence which stink, and smoke still with the disastrous carrions of those unsatiable bellies which made war against heaven, to have dainties, which they no sooner received into their throats, but the anger of God fell on their criminal heads: and do you think, that following their steps, you shal have better success? See, see Lot's wife turned into a statue of salt, who still cryeth out, with an eternal voice, over the burning ruins of Sodom, and saith, For having looked back on a voluptuous City, yea, on the flames of my punishment, behold me changed into a pillar of salt, that all posterity may know, that bodily lusts are like unto salt water, which well may irritate thirst, but never can quench it. See, see likewise those Princes glutted with delights, crucified right against the sun, which at their death reproacheth them with their crimes. O voluptuous! O carnall creature! the time will come, when those members which thou wouldest not crucifie by a holy mortification on the Cross of Jesus Christ, shall be crucified on the Cross of the bad thief, by the pains and torments which the Justice of God shall send thee, and it shall be said, Crucifie, Crucifie him against the sun, that he dying, may see him whom he hath despised; that he may see the sun of Justice, against which he hath spit; that he in Idea may see the splendour of eternal delights, which he hath left, to tie himself to a dunghill; that dying, Jesus may reproach him with his sensualities, his dissolutions, and ingratitudes. O God! rather hair-shirts, sackcloth, ashes, sacks, thorns, fasts, austerities, and sharp rasours, then to fall into such ignominy.

Sect. 6. The Art of Joy, and the means how to live contented in the world.

The art of Joy.

ONe of the best arts in the world is, how well to rejoyce, and the man who finds out the mistery of it, doth more, then if he had discovered the fountain-head of Nilus, or the Countreys which produce gold and diamonds. I will give you a brief method of it, to conclude, the Treatise of Delight; and place your soul (if you wil take so much pains as to obey reason) in the state of a most sincere tranquillity.

You must first of all imagine with your self, that the earth whereon we live is not the region of joyes; and what industry soever we may use, we shall not any long time of our life be impenetrable to cares, and Sadness, which commonly grow from our condition.

Damascen.

It was a fansie in King Abenner to be desirous to breed up his son in continual pleasure, never suffering him to be touched with the least impression of so many discontents, which occurre in the course of mans life. For which purpose he caused him to be educated in a pallace, which seemed to be consecrated to merriments, and delights: All, which art and nature could do to make a man contented, was shut within this circuit, and the Father permitted not any thing to be presented before his sons eyes, which might have the power any way to displease him. In the end, this happy creature was troubled at his golden Cage, and delicious prison. He had a desire to behold the world: and having before never seen about him but flourishing troups of youth, endowed with strength, garb, and health, enjoying full prosperity; he, at his going out of the palace, met first a begger, then a leper; lastly, a man all worn with age; which sight instantly moved his heart, touched with much compassion of the miseries of mans life.

Cares enter into us by the gates of the senses, let them be never so well guarded: and if we have not wherewithall to be contristated; our own felicities displease us. Upon which Symmachus hath very well observed. That, We are born in the world much rather for sorrows then joyes; pleasures which accost us; stay not long with us, they have wings to forsake us, but to say truely, sweetest things in the world are given us for an use as short, as the sense thereof is feeble. And that which the more is to be lamented, is, that wits the most subtle are ordinarily the least satisfied; they are more greedy of the time to come, more distasted with the present, less forgetfull of evil past: They burn themselves with their proper light; and many times, to avoid an honest captivity, they frame themselves a thousand fetters. It is no disgrace; but, the desire of many, to be a beast a little, to live the more in repose; and to leave the tree of Knowledge, to gather the fruit of life. Now, albeit we cannot arrive in the state of this present world to a fulness of felicity; yet there are means somewhat to manage our life, and to lead it in innocent contentments. To reach this happiness, it is necessary first of all to have a conscience very clean, and free from remorses, from crimes, and from sins, never well expiated; for that is it which lighteth up torches, and which causeth furies, and tormentors in the midst of a heart troubled with spectres of its own wickedness. What joy hath a man who hath God his enemy; and who feels the Divine Justice to shoot lightnings, and shake thunder over his criminal head? nay, may we not say, there is not a moment of his life which is not steeped in the bitterness of his thoughts? There is not a Thunder-clap which seemeth not to roar for him: There is neither an anger in the heavens, nor a menace on the Earth, which seems not to conspire to his ruine. If you have passed your life very innocently; give thanks to God who is the Father of innocency, and the source of Sanctity.

Symmach. ep. l. 1. Sic nati sumus ut sapius adversa fungamur, & bona nostra quæque tei nam brevis usus, quam levis sensus est.

But if by mishap you are fallen into some very grievous sin; (following the Counsel of Cardinal Petrus Damianus) Mount up to the Tribunal of your understanding, lead your soul to judgment, let your thoughts accuse you, let your reason judge you, let your conscience lift up the sword, let it strike home, let the blood of tears be seen to stream from the wound, and be you a Martyr of penance, to become a witness of the mercies of God.

Damian. serm. 30. Ascende tribunal mentis, & temetipsum pertrahe ad judicium quæstionis, cogitatio accuset, animus judicet, pœnitens conscientia vulnet. Carnifex feriat, lachrimarum rivus vultum tergat: Sic per Martyrii similitudinem ad veram pervenies Martyrii dignitatem.

It is to mount very high, to come to this first degree; but we must yet pass to the second, which is mortification of passions, because a soul perpetually mastered by its appetites, cannot freely breathe the air of the children of God. It was in the confusion of stirs, that the Prophet Nahum accomplished his Prophecy. The voice of the whip, the voice of the impetuosity of wheels, of the neighing horse, and the flaming chariot, of the corvetting horseman, of the glittering sword, and of the lightning lance, where we see nothing but death and ruine. There is nothing but wars in a passionate spirit, the whip of Gods Justice scourgeth, the wheel of inconstancy there circumvolveth continually, there concupiscence neigheth. Pride walks in Triumph, anger shooteth its envenomed shafts, there virtues are ruined, and vices walk in pomp. And what pleasure can you have in these tumults, and in these nights, drawing so near to Hell!

Salmeron in Parab. Evang.

It is held, that pearls have a thick film which darkneth all their lustre: but when they have passed through the entrails of a pigeon which concocteth them by its heat, this skin falleth off, and they get a radiance infinitly beautious. The like hapneth in the matter of a soul troubled with some evil passion; it loseth the lustre wch is imprinted thereon by the finger of God, & fadeth in the obscurity of its concupiscence; but if it throw it self into the heart of God, wch is the holy Ghost it self, it tempreth the unrulinesse of passions by his divine ardours, & is clothed with the most pleasing lights of the Empyreal heaven, wch are the sources of the most innocent delights. What a spectacle is it to see a man master over himself, who walketh according to the levels of God, as the hours by the degrees of the sun, who prefers conscience before riches, virtue above honour, who wil not be knowing, but to understand his own ignorance, who desireth not to be potent, but to do good, who of his words maketh decres of wisdom, & of his life a continual harmony! Must we not confess that he entreth into a fortress, where envy no longer hath a tooth to hurt, calumny no serpentine tongue tosting him, nor fortune darts to strike him? It is not a simple word, but an Oracle of the 70 Interpreters, when they said, that a man who hath wel mastred his passions, is the Physician of his own heart.

Add to this victory over pasions, a good choice of professions and vocations, which are to be exercised in humane life, wherein we necessarily must play some part, and have some reasonable employment to entertain our selves, otherwise Idleness oftentimes becoms the seminary of unquietness. There are men, who be in the world, as dislocated bones in the body, They have hit ill by the mishap of their choice, they are not in the place, where the divine Providence would have them. A storm of pasion hath peradventure thrust one into a Cloisterian infirmity of flesh hath bound another too basely to some poor wedlock: those are bands which wisdom cannot break, although Imprudence hath many times tied them with its hands, we must sweeten them by reason, since they vex us by their necessity. A heart galled by some ill chance, which it knoweth to be incorrigible, hath much ado to find any joy; it must be created by art, seeing we cannot attain it by good luck: It will not be so genuine, but perhaps generous enough. It is a great mystery in matter of contentment, prudently to order the course of ones life, and not to put ones self upon bad businesses; to be guided rather by counsel, then by passion, to dispose his persons, and family within limits, civilly well rectified, neither to make matter for a Comedy of his name, nor for a Tragedy of his manners: to settle his little fortune in a pure tranquility; not to be offensive, nor to have any enemies but such as have proclaimed enmity against reason. Great estates are much more uncapable of contentment then mean; they have too great a Train, and in the great extent of their appurtenances, they fall the more often upon all kind of hazards; their felicity is a body composed of a million of members, multitude burdeneth them, and the want but of one afflicteth them. We have seen Kings and Princes, who could not be merry, but by stealing themselves from themselves, and by forsaking the ensignes of their dignity, to descend to the conversation of more inferiour conditions.

There are many in the world, who are incited by great worldly ambitions, but who having met the golden mean, habituate themselves in their condition, and there to adapt them, as Halcyons to their nest: They have the dew of Heaven, and the fat of the Earth, wealth, children, inheritances, houses, money, health, and friends; they manure the gifts of God, in an assured repose; it seemeth contentments are onely made for such men. Such is the felicity described by the Poet Martial. Wealth which comes by Succession, not by pains-taking; land which affords a good revenew; a perpetual fire, no suit, no servitude, a mind contented, a body sound, and conveniently strong; a prudent simplicity: friends suitable, domesticks obsequious, a Table without art, night free from cares, and not burthened with wine; A bed not sad, but chaste; sleep which makes the night seem short; to desire to be what one is, and to reach at no more; neither to fear the last day of our life, nor to wish it. Behold the bounds of humane happiness, which are well enough expressed, according to the opinion of the world; and such as walk these wayes, readily sequester themselves from all the disturbances of care, and would not in any sort approve the ceremonious customes of the Jews, who commonly carried panniers and Hay along with them in a journey, to put them in mind that their Ancestours had carried earth and mortar in Egypt. But yet we must tell you, it were to make life too beggerly, and too much depending on fortune; to think felicity is included within so narrow bounds. There needeth but a moment to pull down a nest, which a bird hath built with time and pains: nor needeth there also but one misfortune to dissipate all the little Oeconomy of humane prudence.

Martial. Epig. l. 10.

Cumen. l. 1. de Rep. Hebr.

Learn a good lesson of contentment, which shall be, not to rejoyce much at vain and mutable things; to unloose your self, what you may, from sense, and to fly into the region of Angels, therein to find your contentment. There is ordinarily much satisfaction in the commerce one hath with God, in great and worthy actions, in good conversations and pure amities, in the estimation which proceedeth from virtue, in the contemplation of total Nature, therein to find the God of Nature, in the last of the Maxims and verities of our Religion, and (if you be of capacity) in Eloquence, Poetry, Painting, Musick, the Mathematicks, in Games which are most spiritual, Histories, Books, meetings of good wits, woods and solitudes. Discharge your delights (as much as you can) from matter, to approach unto those of Paradise. Fix them not on things which are hard to atchieve, and easie to be lost; practise your spirit, to find them in your heart, as a good father of a family, who ever hath wherewith to live, and to feast his guests in his own house. Forget not in the time of fair weather to prevent the storm of humane accidents, and daily think how you may put your self under covert within your self; but, which is more, into the bosome of God. When Gyges his ring was turned towards the world, it made him visible to all there present, but when he drew it back towards himself, he became invisible, and impregnable against such as wished him ill. If your quality cause you to look towards the world, and pompously to propose you to the eyes of beholders; remember you must have a Retreat, and innocent invisibilities to vindicate your self from the throng of importunacies.

When you shall have well-grounded the matter of your contentments, then neglect not the form and fashion of them. Imitate not those, who on a sudden drench and drown themselves in pleasure, with a voluntary drunkenness, which presently deprives them of all pleasure; Distill your joyes, like unto a heavenly dew; moisten your heart, but overflow it not; otherwise it is to be feared in such as are of a very soft temper, lest the approach of excessive joy, may cause a great evaporation of spirit, and leave the heart destitute of heat and vigour: which caused Zeuxes the Painter to die laughing, as he beheld the rough draught of an old woman, which he was a finishing; and the Poet Philemon, by seeing an Ass that came to eat figs on his Table.

Howsoever it be, distaste sticks to the extremes of the greatest pleasures, as Cantharides on the fairest Roses. Resemble not those who overflow in their favours, who publish their own prosperities, and tell them to all the world: which raiseth them many envious and maligne spirits, who stir up tempests in their imaginary tranquillity. Rejoyce (said an Ancient) in your bosome; do all the good you practise from morning till night, with pleasure; and when any misadventure befalleth you, ever think, it is a great favour from God it went no further, and that the Divine Providence is satisfied with a little hurt. Call sometimes to your memory the ill days and dangers you have escaped by the goodness of God, that you with the more gust may taste your repose. If you be fortunate, hold you there, and be not like the dog in the Fable, who let go his piece of flesh to catch a shadow. The foolish Idolaters of Egypt, after they had Courted their god Apis in so many studied fashions, after they had found him with so much satisfaction, after they had received him with so much applause, killed him, to put another in his place. That is it which all senseless worldly spirits do; they disturb their own pleasures, and themselves, to live to become the conquest of a Chymera of honour, or of some pleasing thing, which keeps them in a perpetual perpetual famine. You are permitted to love the gifts of God, to derive a little tribute of contentment out of all creatures, to restore it to the Authour, to avoid discontented humour, spirits troublesome and complaining, to please your self with good company: But if you desire to know the mystery of mysteries in pleasure; understand, you shall never find it but when you shall learn to rejoyce in tribulations, out of a desire you have to conform your self to Jesus Christ. That is the joy which all the Saints have studied with pain, have found with delight, and have tasted with glory. That is it which S. Peter calleth, The ineffable, and the glorified; That which S. James said contained the consummation of all comforts: That which S. Paul found in Caverns, S. Laurence on the Grediron, S. Katharine on the wheel, S. Apollonia in flames; Lastly, That which cometh from the throne of the Lamb, and which with its eternal streams watereth all the plants of Paradise.

The sixth Treatise, of SADNESS.

Sect. 1. Its Description, Qualities, and the Diversity of those who are turmoiled with this Passion.

The Essence and Image of Sadness. Cujus initium cuncta obtinet, progressum labor, dolor exitum, error omnia. Petrarch. de remedii.

A Wise man said that man entreth into life as into a career, where, in the beginning, blindness putteth a scarf over his eyes, then delivers him over to labour, which giveth him a heavy stone to roll all the length of the life, labour placeth him in the hands of sorrow and sadness; sorrow (which properly is a dislike had against objects contrary to its inclination) exerciseth him principally in the body: Sadness, which is a passion of the reasonable Appetite, that filleth the heart with acerbity by the privation of amiable objects, and by the representation of things grievous and opposite to nature, works upon the soul, which it incessantly afflicteth. Some are slowly wasted by perpetual languours, others are many times seized on with so much violence, that they suddenly die of it, as it happened to a son of Gilbert, Duke of Montpensier, who yielded up the ghost on the tomb of his father.

This passion hath for nurse, softness of spirit, seeing a soft soul is ordinarily eaten by anxiety, and gnawn by perplexity, as iron is consumed by Rust: It is seated in melancholy; for the melancholick are they who most feel the burdens of life, the spirit being deprived of alacrity, which useth to season things the most bitter. Faintness and discouragement are ever by its sides to torment it: because they are the two passions which dry up the Humidum radicale, quench the heat, drain the source of spirits, and constitute the whole state of its mischief. Round about it fly cares, discontentments, and annoyes; since these are its companions, and most ordinary entertainments. The heart of it is filled with an infinite number of desires, being our discontentments do multiply according to the measure of our desires; and that he who desireth nothing, quarrels at no body, nor is impatient at the burdens which the providence of God layeth on his shoulders. It liveth on gall, as being nourished by continual acerbities: It looketh back far off after contentment, which flieth from it; insomuch as its onely torments consisteth in desiring, and not enjoying: It beholdeth it self in a pond of standing water; because such are the objects of sadness, which the impatient set before their eyes, to stir up in them many troubled and uncollected fantasies. Lastly, it is one while little, crouching, and loutish, with a countenance of lead, and weeping eyes; another while also it is furious, inflamed, and fretfull; to signifie unto us two sorts of impatient men, whereof the one silently bites the bridle, having no means to come to the end of their pretensions: and the other breaks out into extraordinary fury, with intention to tear asunder the obstacles which oppose their designs. Behold the picture of sadness drawn out of Philosophy and reason. Now, I may well add, following the conceits of the wise, that I see infinite many in this picture who have not all the same liveries; For the kingdom of this Passion, is an admirable Purgatory, where punishments are divers, and every one participates of them according to the quality of his apprehension, and the diversity of objects. Such (saith S. Ambrose) is the condition of our life; Roses, which before sin grew without thorns, are afterward on all sides armed with sharp-pointed prickles, to teach us that the most smiling fortunes take part in the cares, and miseries of the condition of mortals.

Spina sensit gratiam floris, tanquam humanæ speculum præferens vitæ, quæ suavitatem perfunctionis suæ finitimis curarum stimulis sæpe compungit. S. Ambr. l. 3. Hexameron.

Impatient of divers qualities.

I observe nice impatient ones, who have been bred, as it were, between silk and cotton, and who never beheld the miseries of the world, but through shadows and clouds, and therefore the use they have taken to be served from their childhood according to their humour, causeth patience to be a matter very extraordinary with them. So you see that upon the least occasion presented of suffering, their weak spirit shrinks within it self, and their tender flesh makes resistance. These are they of whom the Prophet Baruch spake, My nice ones have walked through hard and rough ways. And of whom Seneca hath aptly said; They are ulcers which are irritated when they are lightly touched, or that you make but a shew to do it. I on the other side observe suspicious impatient ones, who skirmish with flies, and are tormented upon shadows of affronts which never were, continually ruminating on some slight cold countenance not purposely shewed them; or some word spoken, meerly out of freedom of speech: on the other side, I see of them that are prompt, and sharp, whose bloud quickly comes into their faces, whose eyes sparkle, voice is shrill, fashion turbulent, and veins wholly bent upon revenge; so that they do not long dispute with a yoke: but break it, and run at random, where they oftentimes commit as many errours as they go steps. I observe others, who are more bitter then sharp in their impatience; and in this number I behold many wayward, and prying old men, who still have some accusations to make against the actions of youth. I see many Courtiers discountenanced, many intranced lovers, many officers, servants male and female dismissed, many suitours rejected in their pursuits, many envious, who repine at the prosperity of their Neighbour: on the other part I behold many persons afflicted in the world, one with sickness, another for the death of a friend, one with contempt, another with slander, one with poverty, another with deformity of body; some with indispositions of mind, and other temporal mishaps. It is of this sadness whereof the Wise-man speaketh, when he saith, Delicati mi ambulaverunt viam difficilem. Baruch. 1. 26.

Proverb. 25. Sicut tinea vestimento, & vermis ligno, ita tristitia viri nocet cordi.

saith, that Even as the moth marreth a garment, and a little worm gnaweth wood, so sadness insensibly eateth the heart of man.

Lastly, I see many miserable creatures, who cease not to find fault with their vocation, and to complain of those who govern them, to accuse the Age, and seasons; and oft-times to call God in question. Some tell their evil to all the world, like unto those sick persons who sought for remedies from all who passed by the gates of their Temples: others hatch their discontent in the bottom of their heart, and have much to do, that it be not seen in their faces; others publickly drag their Cross through currents of water, with murmurs and imprecations, of which the Scripture saith: That the clamour and noise of their exclamations openly break forth. Others cannot rest in any place, being weary of all manner of sports, recreation and company: others are vexed at themselves, are doutish, melancholick, frightful, as if they had some evil spirit in their heart, so much oppression of mind they feel: they neglect all the offices of civil life: yea, and the functions of natural life, loth any longer to eat or drink, as if they already were in their graves: From thence proceed black fancies, illusions, despair, and a thousand agitations of mind, which cannot be sufficiently expressed. It is sadness which in Scripture is called a general plague. Verily it is a lamentable thing to see, how we are here handled by the unhappiness of our passions. I am not ignorant, there are dolours so great, and sadnesses so deep, that an extraordinary grace of God is necessary to free a soul from it which is touched with it, and to set it at liberty; but we must likewise say, that we often betray our Repose and Conscience, by suffering so many bad seeds to grow up in our hearts, which we might kill with some resistance of virtue, and some ordinary help of the grace of God.

Tumultus murmurationum non absconditur. Sap. 1.

Omnis plaga. Eccl. 25. 17.

Sect. 2. Humane Remedies of Sadness, and how that is to be cured which proceedeth from melancholy and pusillanimity.

WHilst the great Genius of Physick, Hippocrates, drave away maladies by his precipes, and almost snatched bodies out of the hands of death, one Antiphon arose in Greece, who envious of his glory, promised to do upon souls what the other did on mortal members, and proposed this sublime invention, which Plutarch calleth the art of curing of all Sadnesses: where we may truly say, he used more vanity, promises, and ostent of words, then he wrote good effects. Certainly it were to be wished, that our age (which is so abundant in miseries) should likewise raise great comforters to sweeten the acerbities of the times, to pour oil on the peoples yoke (as the Scripture speaketh) to enter into the interiour of so many poor souls, beaten down with sadness, and wasted with cares, to draw them out of the shadow of death with the first raies of some felicity. Another Helena were needful to mingle the divine Drug of Nepenthe in the meats of so many afflicted persons, who moisten their bread with their tears before they eat it.

Isa. 10. 27.

For my part, I think, that to apply a remedy to sadness, there must a diligent consideration be had of its nature, kind, and quality, for fear that going about to give it comfort, the evil be not exasperated, or that a medicine be unprofitably applied.

Four kind of Sadnesses.

There are sadnesses which come from humour, there are which proceed from pusillanimity, others are caused by scruples, others by an infinite many of those some objects which happen in the chances of humane life.

As for those which grow from Melancholick humours, they are deep rooted as being the inheritances of Nature, and the effects of Temperature. They may notwithstanding be greatly moderated by prudence, discretion, and study, which one may use in overcoming them. It were not to be desired to cut off all manner of melancholy at once, when it is born with us, and proportioned to the functions of our mind, and motions of our body. It is a land which seemeth somewhat dry, but it hideth great treasures. What would become of subtlety of wit, weight of judgment in conceits, invention in sciences, indefatigable labour in affairs, constancy in resolutions, a corrective for light humours, beseemliness in modesty, perseverance in devotion, strength in meditation, constancy in serious life, patience in contempt, exercise of humility; if the melancholick temperature, and Saturnian influence did not thereto contribute solidity? Is that which maketh great Captains, sage Counsellours of State, divine Philosophers, and the most famous Religious: From whence it cometh, that the Antients called it the passion of demy-gods. Onely heed must be taken it run not into some excess, and render not nature sharp, critical, presumptuous, inflexible, and odious; For by that means, certain spirits too much do soothe their own humour, using therein not any correction, make themselves among company, that, which Aconite is among plants. They are insupportable in conversation, and oft times mingling vanity with sharpness, there is not any thing wherein they will not find somewhat to reprehend in words, in sciences, in affairs, in sport, in recreation, in voice, in garb, in habits: and because nothing pleaseth them, they many times displease all the world. It is a great prudence in such as feel themselves naturally disposed to melancholy, to cultivate their mind, and to take from it all which may make it harsh by a perpetual counterpoise of sweetness and mildness. The wicked Rutilius thought all the Anchorets and Religious men were sick of Bellerophon's disease, which is a furious sadness; but he is grosly deceived. For it is undoubted, there are great Religious persons, who drawing nought out of melancholy, but solidity and constancy, do associate unto it, out of virtue, a singular serenity of life, so that it is a hard matter to find any of a humour more pliant and pleasing. Palladius in his Lausiac History, maketh mention of a famous Abbot named Apolon, who was the father & master of about 500. Monks, whom he maintained in so perfect alacrity, that their countenances seemed to bear the characters of Celestial tranquillity. There were none sad, and if any one seemed to be touched with heaviness, the good Abbot drove it away by his discourse, as swiftly as the Northern wind dispelleth the clouds, saying unto them, It was for Jews, for Gentiles, and for sinners to be contristated; but good religious men ought to entertain an eternal commerce with Joy.

S. Athanasius saith of Saint Anthony, that his face was a looking-glass, wherein God caused the sanctity of his mind to be resplendent, and that he always seemed cheerfull, as if the bloomings of his heart had put his venerable face all into blossome. So much saith Denis (sirnamed the little.) Saint Pachomius (a man very eminent, who, in body altogether dissolved with austerities and maladies) did in conversation retain the vigour of holy alacrity. It is an imitation of the Saviour of the world, who, according to the Prophet Esay, was to be neither sad nor tempestuous.

Non erit tristis neq; turbulentus Isa. 42. 4.

And as pious Anna, of whom is spoken in the first book of Kings, forsook all the countenances and crabbed looks which sadness caused in her, so soon as she had conceived the little Samuel: so we must infer, that a soul which is honoured with the spiritual conception of Jesus formed in his heart, is able to drive away all the disturbances of dolour. Otherwise, if this evil humour of sadness be cherished, without breaking it upon all occasions by convenient diversions, and the direction of reason, it encreaseth with age, and being aided by evil dispositions of body, it often degenerateth into shamefull follies and hideous frenzies. From thence are come those Melancholicks of whom Galen speaketh, whereof one thought himself to be an earthen pot, the other imagined he was a cock, and ceased not to crow and clap his wings; the other feared that Atlas would let the heavens fall. And Trallianus assureth, there was a woman who continually kept her hand very closely shut, fearing lest the world, which in her opinion was held between her fingers, might escape her. Such Melancholies (saith S. Jerome) stand more in need of Hippocrates his remedies, then the discourses of Philosophers.

But laying aside these Sadnesses of natural Melancholy, it is fit to know, that which proceedeth from a tedious anxiety of heart, is very hurtfull to the practice of virtue, and may be cured by the resolution and courage of a well-disposed will. It is the malady which the Grecian calls Acedia, against which Cassian wrote a whole book, shewing, it fasteneth very easily upon persons who make profession of Devotion, if they use not labour and study to divert it.

And verily, there are people in no sort fit for Religion, nor the exercises of Meditation, who, nevertheless are therein embarked through levity or ignorance, never having well weighed the greatness of that vocation. But if they meet some spiritual Directours, either indiscreetly zealous, or little experienced, they wil raise them from earth, & instantly apply them to the highest contemplations, drawing them from handy-labours and employments of civil life. I would willingly ask what can they else do but fall into the passion of slothfulness, into anxieties & languours, w^ch^ make life unprofitable to them? In the mean time they who have undertaken the charge to guide them in their Labyrinth, make them many times believe these dryenesses and distelishes are the visitations of God, who will try them; and that they must go on and not faint, nor suffer the honour of their crown to wither. And there are, who living as beasts in a meer lazyness of spirit, imagine it is an Inaction, which causeth a cessation from all the functions of their soul, to let the Spirit of God to work in them. Hereupon, we see some Devoters so well practised in this mystery, that they abandon all correspondencies due to a husband, all the care of their children, all the providence they ought to have for their family and houshold affairs, to satisfie the fancies of their mind. It is not Devotion which teacheth them this, nor is it fit that Libertines hereby take occasion to condemn the exercise of piety. It is an errour must be corrected, and speedily, such spirits must be reduced to labour and care for affairs, to cure their sadness. It is the counsel which the Apostle gave to 1 Thes. 4. the Thessalonians: We entreat you (my brethren) to profit more and more, and to endeavour to be peaceful, and that attending your affairs, you take paine with your hands, as we have appointed you, that you by your conversation may edifie those who are none of ours, and that you may need nothing. The fore-alledged Authour notably deduceth this Text of S. Paul, with many other which he citeth, shewing, that a singular remedy for sadness, caused by Idleness, is, the occupation of the mind and body.

The scrupulous.

For my part, I am perswaded, that by this means many scruples might be cured, wherewith divers minds are now-adayes miserably turmoiled. For they no sooner enter into the great representations of Gods judgment, of sins, and of the torments of the damned, but they presently bear all Hell on their shoulders. The thunders of the divine Justice roars not, but for them, and for them the lightning-flash; they build scaffolds in their heart, whereon their imaginations walk; they nail themselves on voluntary Crosses, and bind themselves on Racks, making an executioner of their mind, and a continual punishment of their life. All they think (in their opinion) is sin; all they do, nought but disorder; and all they expect, meer malediction. They never have made a good Confession, they have ever forgotten some circumstance, they have not well summed up the number of their sins, the Confessour hath not well comprised what they would say: they must eternally begin again, and for trifles of no value: they must run and weary all the tribunals of Confession, and employ more time then would be needful for a man who should manage all the great affairs of France. It is a pitiful thing, and verily tyrants never invented so rigorous torments, which superstition (witty in the fruitfulness of its own tortures) surpasseth not. It so toileth the mind, that the body is extremely weakned, which is seen in a face discoloured and wan, a brow heavy, an eye troubled, a heart sobbing, a countenance ghastly, a loss of sleep and appetite, a forbearance of all recreations and pleasures of life.

Remedies for scrupulous minds.

To speak truly, these poor souls are worthy of compassion: for they are perpetually in most painful Purgatories. Efficaciously to comfort them, they must be put into the hands of some prudent, charitable, and resolute man, who may enter into their heart, and may be (as it were) the soul of their soul. They must be drawn from this indigested and too frequent devotion, from all those general confessions so often reiterated; they must not be permitted to accuse themselves of all the vain imaginations of their interiour, but of the transgressions which pass to the exteriour. They must be made to account their doubtful sins for not sins, since ordinarily the scrupulous have a mind wakeful & adverse enough to themselves, not to doubt of any grievous sin; great conceits must be put into them of the goodness & mercy of God: their courage must be raised: and they, in stead of sins, caused to set down in writing, or otherwise, their good works, & the favours they have received from God. It is sometimes fit to change meditations into good broths; to excite them with some generous thought; to stir them up some difference or suit, if it be needful: to hold them in business interlaced with honest repose, & convenient recreation; to handle them sometimes a little severely; to teach them to believe, & to suffer themselves to be directed, and to accustom them to brave this scrupulous conscience, & to vaunt to have despised whatsoever it dictateth. Lastly, to perswade them there is one who hath answered for their soul before God, & that if there be any ill in his direction, he shal be damned for them, and no hurt come to them thereby. To commend them for their docibleneſs when they obey, to let them ſee the fruit of their obedience in the conſolation of their ſoul, to exhilerate them, to heighten them, to take them from themſelves, and to turn them into other perſonages. Many have been abſolutely cured by theſe kindes of proceedings, many much ſweetned. For there are of them who ſuffer all their life time, their thoughts being as devils ſettled in ſome poſſeſſion which never fully forſake them; but they muſt be let to underſtand, the croſſes ordained them in this life; and that undertaking a good reſolution for patience, they ſhall multiply their merits.

Sect. 3. The remedy of Sadneſſes, which proceed from divers accidents of humane life.

HEnce I diſcover very long dilation of pleaſures daily framed in ſo many divers occaſions, which makes it ſufficiently appear unto us, that as of all living creatures, there is not any more delicate, more ſenſible, & which is waited on with ſuch a train, as man; ſo there is none more expoſed as a Butt for all accidents, which are of power to occaſion trouble, then he. Alaſs! what is man, who maketh a crime of his birth, a ſlavery of his life, and an horrour of his death? To ſalute day-light with his tears, to come into the world to be inſtantly crucified, his mouth open to cryes and hunger, to bring a barren mind, a frail body, enraged concupiſcences, to be a beaſt ſo many years, then an infant, to feel his miſery; to ſee his poor liberty fettered, to live under the fear of rods in a perpetual reſtraint of will; then to enter into Adoleſcency, followed by youth, which cauſeth loud ſtorms of paſſions to bear along with them the ſeeds of all his miſeries. After that, a ſervitude of marriage, an evil encounter of wives and husbands, of affairs, of cares, of poverty, of children, of ſlanders, of quarrels, affronts, of contumelies, of bodily pains, of faintneſs of ſpirit, of ruines of families, of poiſon, of puniſhments, of privation of all one loveth, of vexations by all one hateth, an old age contemptible, ſick, and languiſhing. Death a hundred times invoked, to fly from the miſerable, and to lay hold of the fortunate. With all this, to ſee abyſſes of fire, and torments prepared for ſins, ordinary in worldly life. Who is it that trembleth not, thinking upon all theſe objects? and who ſaith not, that one muſt be either well fortified with prudence to divert his evils, or have patience to bear them?

Miſeries of humane condition.

Note, that all which may afflict us, is reduced to the loſs of goods, of credit, of friends, of incommodities of body or mind: and that our miſeries, which we think to be infinite, are confined within three ſmal limits. For all the ſadneſſes which may ariſe from theſe five ſources, God hath given us five remedies: Senſe, Reaſon, Time, Neceſſity, and Grace. There are many dolours which grow from the ſenſes, and are likewiſe cured by the ſenſes. We muſt not think all ſadneſſes have ears patiently to hear the diſcourſes of Philoſophers. There is queſtion how to help the ſoul by the body, an 100. ſhillings are of more worth then a hundred reaſons to a poor wretch who hath need of ſuſtenance and refreſhment to ſolace his pains; a little good uſage, meat, apparel, a Croſs upon gold or ſilver, remedieth many Croſſes of needy people. If they to whom God hath given worldly wealth, took the pain to imitate ſo many honourable perſonages, and to accuſtom themſelves to viſit the ſhamefaced poor, they would daily do miracles, they would drive away the devils of melancholy, bad humours, ſpectres, deſpairs, and maladies, they would pull millions of ſouls out of the hands of their evil fortunes, and would be more to men then were the demy-Gods of Antiquity.

The ſubjects of our afflictions.

Five remedies for all ſadneſſes.

How many herbs, ſimples, compoſitions of phyſick, how many lenitives; what powerful effects of Chyrurgery, being well ordered, do cure ſtrange infirmities, and do pluck one from out of the gates of death? But as the cure and eaſing of the ſenſes is neither preſent nor efficacious with all the world; what ſhould a man do who hath never ſo little heart, but try to cure himſelf by reaſon? It is it which God hath given unto man in ſtead of ſo many offenſive and defenſive arms, born with other creatures; why ſhould we not uſe its help? It is it which teacheth us, that grief is nothing elſe but an apprehenſion of diviſion; and that as we are out of exceſs tyed to all pleaſing things in the world: ſo the want of them becomes very ſenſible, in ſuch ſort, that our ſadneſſes ordinarily proceed from our love; Experience ſufficiently ſhewing, that all ſuch ſpirits as moſt are in love with themſelves, are the moſt tormented: but if we come to leſſen thoſe great affections which ſtraightly tie us to conceits, and accounts as loſt all which may be loſt; there is no doubt, but we ſhall begin to find a wholſome medicine for all the afflictions of life. A mother, grieved for the death of her ſon, ſaid in Quintilian, That all her evil came from loving too much what ſhe might loſe, and that our paſſions are inſenſibly moſt ardent for things which muſt quickly be taken from us, as if our grief were to take revenge upon the exorbitancy of our love. It is reaſon that weakneth the opinion of evils, which many times torment us more then their effect. It, which giveth light to things obſcure, order to confuſed, vigour to languiſhing, and reſolution to deſpair; there is nothing for which it finds not a lenitive; if poverty make you ſad, why complain you? Ignorant of thy ſelf, (ſaith it unto us) it is not poverty, it is thy fancy which tormenteth thee. No man is ever ſo poor as he is born. Haſt thou brought gold in thy veins, and pearls in thy entrails, that thou complaineſt of the change of thy condition? why doſt thou ſet thy ſelf upon the rack for a thing, whereof Jeſus made boaſt, and ſo many wiſe-men make vows? Expect a little, Death will make thee as rich as Cræſus. If thou thinkeſt thou art poor, for that thou haſt not what thy covetouſneſs deſireth, it is an illuſion. If thou wanteſt neceſſaries for life, after thou haſt lived commodiouſly and happily, it is ſomewhat pitiful: but make thy ſelf a good poor man, ſince God will have thee ſuch; ſuffer a while without murmurring, and the divine Providence will not fail to raiſe for thee the mercy of ſome rich man to become thy ſteward. Pray, be patient, endeavour, take pains, live meanly, thou ſhalt become rich by learning to live contented. If a ſuit be loſt, what cares, what apprehenſions, what pains, what toils are in the ſame inſtant loſt? If it be according to Juſtice, endure it; if againſt Juſtice, thoſe who have loſt their conſcience in making thee loſe thy cauſe, have more cauſe to be ſorry then thou. If thou haſt loſt much in game, it is a leſſon of wiſdom to cure a folly; If thou haſt loſt all, give thanks to God that thou ſhalt never loſe any more ſo baſely, & that thou haſt means to purchaſe a little in this occaſion. If fire and water, winds & tempeſts, harpies & theeves take away thy goods, what wilt thou do againſt chance, violence, & iniquity, but preſerve ſubmiſſion & innocency? The whole mass of worldly wealth is a torrent, which swelleth now upon one side, and then upon another: let that go with patience which thou canst not hold by force. If slander assail thy renown, and condemn thee, perhaps it doth that thou oughtest to do, hadst thou more virtues. Many by despising themselves have prevented all contempts. Tongues cannot hurt thy conscience; we stand before God such as we are, and all the teeth of calumny, take not from us one sole atome of perfection. Others have but one tongue to say, and thou hast two hands to do. Perfect thy life since it hath censurers: verity will force light through those vapours of maligne spirits, and derive glory out of thy proper confusion. If thou beest discountenanced by great ones, put thy self into the good favour of God, who is above all greatness, and after thou hast made thy self a slave to men, live a while a master over thy self. Thou shalt find envy will have consecrated thee, and that thy punishments will make a part of thy felicities. If thou entrest into sadness for being frustrated of some expected good, wherefore art thou so earnest in thy desires, and so credulous in thy hopes? and wherefore makest thou crosses to thy self out of thy own thoughts? If it be for the absence of a beloved friend, thinkest thou he must continually be tied to thee, as if he were a second body? It is in absence where our imaginations oftentimes render all that we affect most present; we enter into the bottom of our soul, and there find the images of our friends despoiled of matter and body: we practise the best amities in mind, where the envious watch us not, the jealous observe us not, and the troublesome interrupt not our discourses. If this good friend be gone into the other world, we every moment run after him, and each hour draw near to him. Let us be satisfied that his death is the cause that death hath nothing terrible for us, and that for him we begin to desire what we most fear.

Slander. Disgrace. Absence of friends. Death.

If we in body must suffer chains, imprisonment, maladies, sharp pains, hunger, thirst, the sword, fire, and all the hostility of nature, we must needs say, all which toucheth the skin, toucheth us very near; and that there are few charming words that can well cast these serpents asleep which devour us; but we must likewise confess, that if our griefs be short, they deserve not so great complaints; and if they be long, their lasting fashioneth us to patience. All is formidable to a body full of long health, but the accustoming to things unpleasing causeth the contempt of them.

Bodily pains.

Nature hath destinated the most nice and tender to great dolours, as women to that of child-bearing; to teach us, that what we fear most, is not always to be most feared. When our courage faileth, all torments insult over us, but if it makes some resistance, we much the less feel our pain. There are who fight even to blood out of bravery, others receive wounds for a very litttle money, others run to the burning chaps of cannons for a smal salary; there are others to be found who have jested at a gash; and others who have plaid on a lute, whilst their member have been slashed with keen razours; to shew, that if there be an evil in nature, there is much more in our opinion.

The Philosopher Zeno sought out torments to taste pleasures, and said they were nothing if they were not thus seasoned. Pain and pleasure interchangeably sway in us, as do day and night our Hemisphere. If we must die, it is but a moment of adversity to enter into a perpetual repose. Evil taketh up all the parts of our life, but death hath only one instant of time. It is so conformed to the most part of the world, oppressed with so many afflictions, that as Zaleucus the Law-maker said, an Edict should fitly have been made, to die, if God had not imposed a necessity upon it. To be born, maketh us tributary to all miseries: but death alone freeth us from ill imposts. Socrates saw his death coming whilst he was a Philosophizing: Anaxagoras in pleading: Calanus braved it, out of temerity, and Canius jested at it, out of merriment.

Notable speech of Zaleucus.

If your evil be in the mind, is it chiefly sin or folly which tormenteth you? Why forbeat you to chastise the one by penance, and the other by the credit you will give to the judgment of the wise? By this means you shall find, that Reason will remedy almost all evils without much violence.

The evils of the mind.

Where Reason is surprized and darkned by the violence of torments, Time quits the medicine. There is no evil immortal: for the mortal, let us make our selves tractable by not thinking on our evils, and they cease to be evils, according as time stealeth them away from us. Think not to dry up the eyes of a mother who hath lost her son, or of a wife, from whom death hath taken her husband, on the day of the burial suffer them to weep, let the wound bleed, and think how to cure it, rather by prayers then by discourses: The most pertinacious dolours disband with time, and we are all amazed that we find our selves above our afflictions, as if we had climbed up thither from out of the bottom of abysses. He who should see the mount Ætna big with flames and thunders, would not think there were any means to approach it, but its furies pass away with time, and we pursue little tracks, which insensibly lead us to the top, where we find verdant grass, and blooming flowers. The like happeneth to us, when we in the beginning consider our evil fortune, it seems our mind can never associate with its disasters; but in the end, the Divine Providence discovereth wayes unto us, (which ere we think on't) bring us to the top of patience, where we gather the fruit of our travels.

Comforts which proceed from time.

Insensible comforts.

Who would not admire the goodness of God, to say, That time doth our business without our trouble, and if we must be sad, we find (I know not what) in our sadness that pleaseth us? so that we prefer solitude and silence before the most eloquent consolations. The friends of Job seeing these his deep miseries, were seven dayes without speaking to him; they let him discourse with his own thoughts, and gather some ease from his own dolour, as we draw remedies out of scorpions.

I (to this purpose) observe an excellent invention in the Emperour Julian, of the Philosopher Democritus, where it is said, that Darius King of Persia had lost the Queen his wife, & that excessive melancholy made him disconsolate. The wisest men of Greece were called to him to mitigate his torments; but it was to play on a lute to the ears of Tygres & Panthers, to go about to cure by words fitly applied, a grief, which had had more of fury then mediocrity in it. The Philosopher let all these great comforters to pass on, and put himself upon time to expect some disposition in the heart of this Monarch; and seeing his mind tired out with his tears, began to relent, he promised to raise the Queen again if he would furnish him with things necessary for his purpose: the other extremely rapt with this proposition, said, he therein would employ all the riches of the world, which were at his dispose; but the the Philoſopher only demanded of him three names of ſuch as had never felt any grief or ſadneſs, to engrave them on the Queen's Monument, which could not in any ſort be found, after a long ſearch throughout the whole kingdom of Perſia. Then Democritus taking his opportunitie: Alas Sir! we may well ſay, the rubies and diamonds of this diadem reſplendent on your head, dazzle your eyes, and hinder you from ſeeing the miſeries of your poor ſubjects, not to be able in ſo great and vaſt an Empire, to meet with three happie men; and yet you wonder, though born under the condition of mortals, that death is entred into your palace. He added many grave ſayings, which the Emperour for his conſolation liked verie well. Whereby we are taught, that we muſt ſometimes make uſe of time to remedie Sadneſs.

If time doth nothing, and that it be an evil neceſſarie which we cannot remedie, (as it happeneth in death, and in other accidents, which thoſe Antients called the blows of Deſtiny) why do we reſiſt againſt heaven, and cenſure the divine Decrees? It is a goodly thing indeed to ſee a man to afflict himſelf with a fatal neceſſitie, which indifferently involveth Monarchs and Peaſants. Muſt God revoke his laws? and muſt he create a world apart to content a ſimple creature, and ſerve it to its liking? But is it not much better to go along with the ſtream of this water, and follow the great current of the divine Providence which maketh all the harmonie in the world?

Necessity forceth patience.

Sect. 4. That the Contemplation of the divine Patience and Tranquillity ſerves for Remedies for our Temptations.

LAſtly, let us behold the aſſiſtances of Grace, which is incomparably above Nature, and let us from the example of the Divinitie take inſtruction how to demean our ſelves.

Remedies and helps of Grace by the contemplation of things Divine.

Let us look on our firſt model, and conſider a ſtrange thing able to make our impatiencies wax red, not with anger but with ſhame, to ſay, that God all impaſſible (as he is) of his own nature not obnoxious to ſword, fire, ſickneſs, or any other exteriour violence, would in all times ſuffer men more violent then the ſword, more ardent then fire, more irkſom then ſickneſs, and many times more cruel then ſalvage beaſts.

It is ſaid, there were heretofore made very goodly mirrours of ſaphyr, which were for Princes and Monarchs: let us not covet thoſe which cannot much avail us; but let us contemplate the admirable ſaphyr enchaſed in the Throne of the living God, in the Prophet Ezekiel, and let us therein ſee and compare our impatiencies, with the mildneſs of the Creatour. It ſeems, that by how much the more a dignitie is ſovereign, by ſo much the leſs ought it to be expoſed to injuries, becauſe the fear which is had of its power ſhould ſtamp in hearts that reſpect, which love (weak) cannot imprint; yet God (a ſovereign Majeſtie, a ſupream Greatneſs, an abſolute Juſtice) hath endured, and doth daily endure ſo many contradictions of men, that it ſeems, that to give credit to his mercie, he occaſioneth ſome preſudice to the terrour of his Divinitie. Many men (ſaith Tertullian) believe not in God, becauſe they cannot perſwade themſelves he is angry with the world, ſince they ſee it in ſo peaceful a ſtate.

Ezek. 1. 26. Quaſi aſpectus lapidis ſaphyri ſimilitudo Throni.

Plures idcirco Dominum non credunt, quia ſeculo iratum tam diu neſciunt. Tert. de patient. c. 2.

What is there more important for God and men, then the knowledg of his Divine nature, then the fear of his Juſtice, then the much to be adored reverence of his ſovereigntie? Notwithſtanding, as if he preferred the glorie of his patience before his own Being, he rather choſe patiently to ſuffer ſo many faithleſs, ſo many wicked ones, ſo manie ſinners, and that the lips of Blaſphemers might dare to ſay there is no God; then, that taking revenge, in the heat of crimes, by puniſhing everie ſin, it ſhould be ſaid of him, Verily there is a God, but he is perpetually armed with lightning and terrours, ever inacceſsible to the prayers of men, as thoſe mountains which throw forth their inflamed bowels. Nay, much otherwiſe; he would be ſirnamed the God of mercie, and the Father of goodneſs: whereupon Saint Gregory hath judiciouſly ſaid, that his patience walks ſtill hand in hand with his charitie. Wherefore, as the love of God towards men is incomparable; ſo his patience, to endure the faults and infirmities of ſinners, admits no compariſon. How many Pirats are there daily for whom God openeth ſeas? How many Idolaters, for whom he cauſeth ſtars to ſhine, fountains to ſtream, plants to ſprout, harveſts to wax yellow, and vines to ripen, as well as for the faithful? How many ungrateful and rebellious children are there, who everie day receiving ſo manie benefits from him, take them as Hogs do Acorns, ſtill grunting towards the ground, and never caſting an eye towards heaven? How manie ſpirits (enemies of truth, and light diſturbers of publick repoſe, tranſgreſſours of laws both Divine and Humane) do daily frame obſtacles againſt the will of their ſovereign Maſter, and yet he ſuffers them, as if he had no other buſineſs in the world but patiently to bear, and vanquiſh by benefits, the malice and ingratitude of men? Hieruſalem is the ſtone of burthen (ſaid the Prophet) which layeth a burthen upon God himſelf. What will this Oracle of God ſay, but the ſame conceits which Saint Hierom ſuggeſteth unto us upon this paſſage, when he writes, that there were ſeen, in places where the Antient wraſtlers did exerciſe, huge ſtones, or certain bowls of Iron or Copper, with which they made trial of their ſtrength: and he witneſſeth that he in a liſt ſaw one of thoſe bowls which was ſo heavie, that he could not liſt it up from the ground, although others robuſtuous of bodie, and eminent in thoſe exerciſes, could eaſily carrie it. Now mark my conceit, and ſay, that as thoſe champions of antiquitie had for object of their ſtrength thoſe weightie bulks, on which they daily exerciſed themſelves? So likewiſe, God, that ſtrong Giant, and great Wraſtler, as if he ſtood in need of exerciſe, takes the ſphere of this great Univerſe, which he beareth, and lifteth it up with all facilitie. He takes the Maſs of ſo many mortals whom heaven covers, and the earth beareth, and there he findeth much reſiſtance: he takes his people which he hath choſen and ſanctified above all the nations of the world, and hence ofttimes verie many ſenſible diſpleaſures come. A true ſtone of burden is that Chriſtian, that Eccleſiaſtick, that Prieſt, that Religious, who belyes his profeſſion, who throws diſorder and ſcandal among the people by his ill example; yet God tolerateth him, God protecteth him, God continually obligeth him: and if needs he muſt draw the ſword of Juſtice out of the ſcabbard, it is with delays, conſideration, and exceſſive Clemencie. O infinite Goodneſs! And who is that man, now, that will not bear with a man? and who is he that ſeeing God of nature impaſsible, buſie in the world, as about his ſtone of burden from the beginning of Ages, cannot bear a ſmall burden, whereto he finds himſelf tied by dutie, by condition, and by nature!

Sect. 5. That the great temper of our Saviour's soul in most horrible sufferings, is a powerful lenitive against our Dolours.

AS for the second Model, which is the Word Incarnate, the true mirrour of Patience, and only reward of the Patient; It is a very strange thing, that all nature being so bent upon its conservation as to suffer nothing, Jesus Christ did miracles incomprehensible to the spirit of Angels, only of purpose to suffer for man! For, how could dolour have laid hold on a God, of his own nature impassible, if it had not passed through all the heavens to take the divine word in the sanctuarie of the Trinitie, which otherwise was meerly impossible! but, the son of God, considering this Impossibilitie, and being fixed in the desire to sustain for us, took the bodie of man to suffer all that which the most cruel could invent, and all whatsoever the most miserable might undergo. Verily, it is an effect of so prodigious a love that it found no belief in senses, perswasion in minds, example in manners, nor resemblance in Nature. We have heretofore heard of a Prince, who desirous to offer himself to death for the preservation of his subjects, took the habit of a Peasant to steal himself from his greatness, and facilitate his death. All histories say he laid down his purple, and crown, and all the ensigns of Royaltie, retaining none but those of love, which caused him to go into his enemies army, where he left life to purchase an immortal trophey for his reputation. But I must tell you he had a mortal life, and in giving it, he gave that tribute to nature, which he owed to nature from the day of his birth, and which of necessitie he was to pay; yea, he gave it to buy the memorie of posteritie, and to beg honour, which is more esteemed by generous spirits, then life. But in what historie have we read, that a man glorious by birth, immortal by condition, necessarily happy, hath espoused humilitie which all the world despiseth, mortalitie which the most advised apprehend, miserie which the bravest detest; for no other occasion, but to have the opportunitie to die for a friend! And this is it which Jesus Christ did. He was by nature immortal, impassible, impregnable against all exteriour violencies, he took not the habit of a peasant, as Codrus, nor a bodie of air, as the Angel-conductour of Tobias; but a true bodie, a flesh, tender and virginal, personally united to the word of God; to quail it with toils, to consume it with travels: and lastly, to resign it as a prey to a most dolorous death; he casts tottered rags over his royal people, and takes pains to stoop down to pull me out of the mire where I lay, and to take my miseries upon him, not sullying himself in my sins.

Absconsit purpuram sub miseriæ vestimento; ad lutum ubi jacebam, inclinatur, non mergitur. Abbas Guerricus.

My God! what a prodigie is this? All ages have observed a thousand and a thousand industries of men which they found out to avoid the pains and torments of life; but never have we seen a man who sought to invent means, and to offer violence to his own condition; to become suffering, and miserable, according to the estimation of the world, since there are day and night so many gates open to this path: yet thou (Oh God of glorie! O mild Saviour!) hast done it, Thou hast found a way how to accord infirmitie with sovereign power, honour with ignominie, time with eternitie, and death with life. It was not possible that sole God should endure death; or that sole Man could vanquish it; but man hath abided it, and God hath overcome it.

Mortem nec solus Deus sentire, nec solus homo vincere poterat, homo suscepit, & Deus vicit. Faustus l. 1. de lib. arbitr.

As for the qualitie of pains; it sufficeth to say, that if men judged of the greatness of Giants by one of their footsteps impressed on the sand: and if we likewise measure the course of the sun by a small thread of shadow; one may have some grosse knowledge of so great a mysterie, by the figures which forewent it. Now, all the sacrifices of the Mosaick law, and so many travails and sufferings of the antient Patriarchs were but a rough draught of the passion of Jesus Christ: from whence we may imagine what the original was, sith the Copies thereof were so numerous and different throughout the course of all Ages. The quality of the sufferings of our Saviour.

The perpetual sacrifice which was evening and morning made in the Temple, the twenty two thousand oxen, and the hundred and twenty thousand sheep which were sacrificed by Solomon at one feast of the dedication of the Temple (so much blood shed, that it seemed a red sea to those who beheld it) was to no other end but to figure the blood of the immaculate Lamb, and of all its members which have suffered after it. But if so much preparation and profusion were needful to express one sole shadow of his passion; what may we conjecture of the bodie, and the thing figured! Besides, if all the antient Patriarchs who were so persecuted in times past, and all the Martyrs who (since the death of our Saviour have endured torments almost infinite in number, and prodigious in kinds) made but an essay or trial of the dolours of this King of the afflicted; what an account shal we make of his pains, which ever ought to be as much adored by our wills, as they are incomprehensible to our understanding! The Lamb was sacrificed from the beginning of the world (saith Saint John;) He was massacred in Abel (saith S. Paulinus;) tossed upon so many waves, in the person of Noah; wandring, in that of Abraham; offered up, in Isaac; persecuted, in Jacob; betrayed, in Joseph; stoned, in Moses; bruised on a dunghill, in the patience of Job; blinded, in Sampson; sawn in Esay; flayed afterward, in the person of Saint Bartholomew; roasted, in that of Saint Laurence; thrown out to Lions, in that of Saint Ignatius; burned, in that of Saint Polycarp; pulled in pieces by four horses, and cast headlong into a ditch full of Serpents, in that of Saint Tecla; drowned, in that of S. Clement; exposed to wasps, in that of many other Martyrs. From whence it cometh that the passion of Jesus is called a short Consummation by the Prophet Esay, and that Saint Paul hath said to the Hebrews, That by one sole Sacrifice he hath consummated those which were to be sanctified for all eternitie. And S. Hilary clearly confesseth, That, Jesus Christ the only Son of God desirous to fulfil this great and mysterious Sacrament of his pretious death, did pass through all imaginable dolours which were (as it were) melted and distilled together; to make of it a prodigious accomplishment.

Jesus is the stone with seven eyes, whereof the Prophet Zachary speaketh, which the heavenly Father sayes he hath cut and engraven with his own hand, thereon figuring all the most glorious characters of patience. He is an Abyss of love, of mercy, of dolors, of ignominies, of blood, of lowlinesse and greatness, of excess, of admiration, and amazement, which swalloweth all thoughts, drieth up all mouths, stayeth all pens, and drencheth all conceptions; Who now then, will dare to complain that he suffereth too much, that he doth too much, that he is treated with less tenderness then he deserveth?

serveth? O our coldnes, and remisnes! whence can it proceed, but from not studying enough on this incomparable Book which comprehends all secrets? we at least should consider the divine Providence in the matter of the burdens of all the world; to diminish our niceness, to gain opinion and understanding which may alter our judgment.

Senec. l. 3. nat. quæst. Præferri scies quid deceat, si cognoveris ubique errorum suum.

A sage Roman shewing to an impatient man the whole world surrounded in a great deluge of miseries, said unto him, I assure my self, you would not so much play the milksop, nor have soul so effeminate, if you would think that the whole world swimmeth in a dreadful sea of calamities. All things conform themselves to the nature of their original; and we have elsewhere said, that Bees bred in the dead bodie of a Bull carry the resemblance of their Progenitour, pourtrayed by certain little lineaments in their proper bodie. The world hath produced us, and Jesus Christ hath regenerated us by his Death and most precious Blood; never should we rest until we carry upon us some token of nature wailing, and of a God suffering: according to S. Paul's precept, Glorifie, and bear the Image of God in your body.

Bees bear the figure of a bull on their bodies.

Sect. 6. Advice to impatient Souls.

IMpatient Souls, to you I speak; I ask you, Is it a small motive to you to suffer that have the Universe for a Companion, God for an Example, and God for the Guerdon of your Patience? All creatures (saith S. Paul) sigh, groan, and are, as it were, in labour, expecting that day wherein all things shall be glorified in the resurrection of bodies; and will you be of so abject a courage as to be like unprofitable burdens, with arms across in the midst of a suffering world, and before the eyes of the God of suffering? Is it not a scandal to the Religion we profess, often to afflict our selves with great and heavy sadnesses, for causes most light? To see too, you would make one think the Law, the Sacraments, and Jesus Christ himself, were cast away: Where is the Consolation of holy Scriptures, the fruit of Preachings, the sweetnes of Prayers? Where is that huge cloud of Examples of so many Patient ones, whose courages you so often have admired? where are good purposes, good thoughts? where are so many resolutions so well taken in the time of prosperity? must the least adversity make you to shrink back? Verily, Ideots and silly women who have neither the wit nor knowledge which you have, do many times bear no slight burdens with much courage; and you, after so many good instructions, lay down arms, and make it appear, that stupidity hath more force with them, then all the precepts of wisdom have power over your weakness. People who live according to nature find remedies for their sadness in nature it self; Bathings, Wine, Plays, Balls, Hunting, open Air, and so many other recreations make them pass away their evil. Is it possible, but that the consideration of the first veritie, and the divine Providence should mitigate yours? What is it can have such power over you? It is strange that things the most frivolous torment you. Call back into your thoughts what I have said to you concerning the matter of your pleasures. It grieves you, you have not thrived in this affair, nor have had the success of reputation which you expected! what a folly is this? as if I should be troubled that the air and winds were not at my disposé. Will you never cease from usurping that which appertaineth not to you? will you never order your own house, without taking care for things out of it? You afflict your self for a word spoken of you! wretched (that you are) to tie your felicity to the condition of tongues. There would almost be no slander, if it were not made slander by thinking thereon. You torment your self for the loss of health, or of some other good which was very precious with you? Impute your cross to your affection, so excessively to have loved a blessing which you might lose, and to have coveted all good things without you, to have an ill guest within your own house. You put your self upon the rack with the fear of the future: why do you set your foot into the possession of another? why do you not leave the future to the divine Providence? why do you reap dolours in a field, where you are not permitted to sow? you incessantly complain of povertie, of sickness, and other inconveniences of life; if you think to live here free from pain, you must build a world a-part, and not be contented with the elements which served your ancestours turns. God here distributed burdens, as the Father of a Family doth offices to all his domesticks: everie one must bear that which is allotted him, otherwise if he do not, he is a bastard, and not a legitimate child: and if having one, he bear it with a perpetual vexation, he deprives himself of the crown of patience, the value whereof is as inestimable as the force thereof hath in all times been judged invincible. Have you forgot what S. Paul said? If you be (saith he) out of the number of those who live in a regular discipline, and who daily have their petty charge in God's family, wherein they are subjects. I assure you, you are not used like children of the house, but as very bastards left to live at random. Believe me, our burdens are like the stone of the Sybils, which to some, weighed like lead, and to others as a feather: oft-times the weight or lightness of your evils proceeds from nought but your own disposition: Imagination hath made you believe it, nice breeding (which hath been bestowed on you) and evil habits wherein you have been perpetually nousled, fail not to accomplish your miserie. Accustom your self a little to do that work well, for which you came into the world. Learn, that you must bear the miseries of man's condition, since you participate of humane nature, and that (thanks be to God) you are not a monster. When you have learnt to suffer something; you will begin to enter into the possession of your soul, in which alone you shall find all felicities, if so you be united to your beginning. Courage, poor impatient one, raise your self a little above your self by the grace which is given you from on high, and so many good assistances, which you can never want. The God of patience and consolation will confirm you, will fortifie you, and will give you the reward of your fidelity.

The seventh Treatise, Of HOPE.

Sect. 1. The Description, Essence, and appurtenances thereof.

The Image and nature of Hope.

HOpe is the gate of a great Palace repleniſhed with riches. It is in my opinion the place which Tertullian termeth, when he calls it, the portreſs of Nature. It looketh on, and conſiders upon one ſide pearls, which are (as yet in the ſhell) and on the other upon Roſes in the midſt of thorns, which it thinks it may enjoy with ſome labour. Such is the nature of Hope according to S. Thomas; It is a motion of the appetite, which followeth the knowledg one hath of a good future poſſible, and ſomewhat difficult. It hath two arms with which it endeavoureth to purſue, and embrace objects, whereof the one is called Deſire, and the other Belief, to be able to obtain what one deſireth. Thus doth learned Occham define it. It is not ſufficient to ſay that a thing is beautiful, pleaſing, and profitable to create Hope, unleſs it be ſhewed it is poſſible, and that one may arrive thereunto by certain ways, which are not out of his power, who hopeth. So Hope, if it be reaſonable, hath ordinarily wiſdom, ſtrength, eloquence, amitie and money for it: for theſe are the things which raiſe its courage. At the gates of this paſſion we ſee huge heaps of people of all manner of diſpoſitions, who flatter it, and behold it; of one ſide lovers, who ſeek for a mate, For Philo ſaid, it was the virtue of lovers: on the other ſide, Courtiers who run after favour; on the other, aſpirers, who canvas for offices, and dignities; on the other, Labourers and Merchants: but above all, there are many young men bold and reſolute, who therein have a great ſhare; becauſe, (as ſaith Ariſtotle) they have little of the paſt and much of the future. On (as S. Gregory Nazianzen affirmeth) for that nothing is hard to a fervent ſpirit. Moreover it ſitteth upon a Peacock, and its face is encompaſſed with a Rainbow, by reaſon, it infinitely charmeth, and recreateth the minds of ſuch as follow it by verie pleaſing ſemblances: and (as King Mithridates ſaith) it hath, I know what kind of ſweetneſs, which pleaſeth even then, when it deceiveth; but if you obſerve it, you ſhall find, it holdeth an Anchor in the right hand to fix the deſire of the wiſe: as on the contrary, it carrieth in the left hand an enchanted mirrour, where it letteth fools ſee a thouſand ſlight trifles, all which turn into ſmoke. Pleaſure waiteth on it, whilſt we hope; for it is that which ſweetneth all the labours of life; and which ſerves for a ſpur to all great and generous action. But if it fals out that things happen not as they were figured in the imagination; then are all theſe Courtiers delivered over to a furious Monſter called Deſpair, which drags them down to the foot of a mountain, and oft-times drencheth them in gulphs and precipices. Behold in few words the nature, definition, difference, compoſition, object, ſubject, the cauſes and the effects of hope. Let us now ſee, how we may govern this Motion.

Sect. 2. That one cannot live in the world without Hope, and what courſe is to be held for the well ordering of it.

THey are of too haughtie a ſtrain who never friendly entertain Hope, and think there is no life for them, if Felicitie be not always at their gate. The condition of creatures is ſuch that all their bleſsings never come to them all at once. It were to go about to expreſs a word without letters, to compoſe a happineſs without joys and contentments ſucceeding one another. How can hope be baniſhed from earth, ſith Heaven, which is ſo well content, hath not renounced it! The bleſſed ſouls, after the viſion of God, do yet hope ſomething, which is, the Reſurrection of their bodies, to which they moſt ardently wiſh to be reunited: thoſe which are repreſented under the Altar in the Apocalypſe, who ask vengeance of their blood at the tribunal of the Divine Juſtice, are inſtantly clothed with white garments, in token of this moſt bright fleſh which is to be joyned to their immortal ſpirits. Heaven, which expecteth nothing for the perfection of its beauties, ceaſeth not to revolve each moment of the day and night, to diverſifie them. But we muſt confeſs that earth is the place of Hopes, which are as ſeeds of our Felicities, from whence it cometh, that what the Grecians call to ſow, we name it to hope. Our ſoul here reſembleth the Firſt Matter, which is perpetually enamoured of new forms: and as the underſtanding of Angels (according to the ſaying of a great Philoſopher) is all that, which it ought to be from the beginning, and becometh not new at all; Contrariwiſe Humane underſtanding is nothing in the beginning, and becomes all in proceſs of time. So our will is like unto white Writing-tables wherein we eaſily write, or blot out all we will. The eſtate of perfection muſt be expected to imprint it with a laſting Character. So many young plants, ſo many little living creatures, ſo many children, ſo many imperfections, ſo many wiſhes warn us that we may live here with hope: we have ſo little of time preſent, that we are inforced to dilate our ſelves upon the future. This inſenſibly delighteth us, and ſtirs us, as Trees which ſeem to take pleaſure to be rocked by the winds. It being reſolved that we neceſſarily muſt expect and hope whilſt we are in the world. It remaineth to conſider, how we may well employ this paſſion in hoping good things, and hoping them by wayes verie direct, and in an orderly manner.

τὸ σωθήναι. Spem.

Carolus Bovillus de intellectu humano & Angelico.

The good husbanding of hopes.

Firſt, It is a ſhameful thing to ſay there are ſuch who hope all that, which is to be feared. One promiſeth himſelf the death of a Kinſman; the other, the confuſion of a family; another, to ſeduce ſome ſilly maid; another, to debauch a married wife; another, to ſatisfie his revenge; another, to ſcrape together as much as his avarice can wiſh; and ſo many other things which are moſt unhappy Hopes, the ſucceſs whereof God ſometimes permitteth, when he will chaſtiſe wicked men. What a horrour is it to hope for crimes, and to feed ones ſelf with anothers evils, as if one ſought nouriſhment from coals and ſerpents! If our thoughts be not alwayes ſo high as the glorie of heaven; at leaſt, let us not abaſe them ſo low as Hell. If they cannot be divine; let them not be inhumane; let them tie themſelves to bleſſings permitted, and not to objects ſo unworthy. One may expect wealth, children, health, knowledge, honour, an office, a marriage, and ſo many other things which are commodious for humane life; without without desiring disasters: notwithstanding, it is not enough to will good, unless one therein observe circumstances and measures requisite for its accomplishment. One of the best rules for the passion of which we treat, is, to adapt ones self to his hopes, to see what comports with his birth, his breeding, his capacity, his genius, his knowledge, his power, his credit and his pains; and not rashly to be stirred up with the desire of things above his strength, unless he will disturb his life, and hasten his death.

To adapt our selves to our hope.

The world is a great Sepulchre of so many little Phaetons, who will guide the sun and hours, although their life be but a continual deviation: they have no other honour but to be fallen from on high, and to have used more temerity in affairs then abilitie: such hopes also are very well compared by the Wiseman, to those little dowls of flowers scattered in the air, to the froth which floateth on the water, and is instantly dissipated by a tempest, to smoke which vanisheth under the blast of winds, & to the memory of a traveller, who passes by an Inn.

Spes impii tanquam lanugo est, quæ à vento tollitur, & tanquam tenuis spuma quæ à procella dispergitur, & tanquam fumus qui à vento diffusus est, & tanquam memoria hospitis unius diei prætereuntis. Sap. 5. 15.

By the sight of a bird we judge of her flight, by the genius of men we make conjectures of their fortunes; needs must there be much extravagancie, when a man in all kinds little, proposeth to himself nothing but great things. I well know, the divine Providence, the worker of wonders, delightes sometimes to strike a stroke with its own hand, drawing out men of most base extraction, to bear them to the highest tops of worldly greatness. It is that, which forged a Diadem for Pupienus upon the same anvil whereof his father hammered Iron: That, which changed Martianus his spade into a Scepter: That, which taught Valentinian to make crowns by twisting ropes: That, which shewed Justin in a Carpenters-shop how to build a Throne for himself: That, which drew Petrus Damianus from the midst of sheep, to be made a Cardinal; and Gregory the seventh out of a Joyners house, to give him a Popes Mytre. But, one Swallow makes not a summer, nor one accident, from an extraordinarie hand, which happeneth scarcely in an age, makes not all fortunes. S. John saith, that the measure of an Angel is the measure of a man; but this is not, but in the celestial City of Hierusalem, where we shall be as the Angel of God. Here our thoughts are high, our aims great, but the limit of our power little. He who doth well understand what he can, wils, but what is reasonable, and shall find that the modestie of wishes makes life more commodious, and happiness more undoubted.

Vulgosius l. 3. c. 4.

Idem l. 6. c. 10.

Apoc. 21. 17.

To this first rule of the moderation of hopes, we must add a second, which is, to give them good foundations, to the end we be not constrained to see the indiscretion of our desires punished by the small success of our pretentions. There are some who infinitely confide in the words of Astrologers, and to speak plainly, it is a prodigious thing to hear the predictions they make upon the life & fortunes of men, which cause amazement among the wise, and love in the curious: as at the time when they answered to the Edict of the Emperour Vitellius, who commanded them to leave the citie, that they would obey on such condition, that he instantly should leave life, which so fell out. Yet we must say that although God should write down in the book of stars the successes of our life, which cannot be easily agreed unto; yet ever would they be extremely encumbred, nor ever happen out of a fatal necessity. That is the cause why for some presages which hit right, there are many other notably false, which makes it sufficiently appear that God hath reserved to himself the full knowledg of what shall befal us. Among other qualities, wch the holy Canticle gives him, it forgetteth not to say, He had hair as black as the feather of a Crow. Where you shall observe the hairs mystically signifie the thoughts, and when the Scripture termeth them black, it will declare the obscurity and depth of God's counsels over the wisdom of men. Tertullian said, man was the care of the understanding of God, who provideth for all, and who cannot be a prevaricatour of his own providence. Can we think men are permitted to enter into those great abysses of knowledge, and to take the rains of nature into their hands? think we that a man who doth not alwayes very plainly see what lies before his feet, can assuredly behold that which is infinitely exalted above his head? Where have not Astrologers sowed lyes? where is it that great ones who hearkned unto them as to their Gospel, were not filled with disastrous successes? By their saying, all which is born at Rome comes into the world like unto little Zara, already marked with red. There are some who consume themselves with anxieties and cares of their life-time, to verifie the words of an Astrologer, and who instead of scarlet find (perhaps) in the other world a Robe of flames. It is a wretched support to tie ones hopes to so great an uncertainty. I find the favour of great and powerful friends is much more certain; for God establisheth them on earth as his images, to be the treasurers of felicity, and distributers of good hap. When they be just, upright, and grateful; men of merit have some cause to hope of their good affections; and an Antient said, that we must approach near to the Destinies and the Gods, and honour the happy. But how many are there, who, adhering too much unto men, make to themselves an arm of flesh without bones, and a fortune as frail as Reeds? Others make themselves brave fellows with their sword, and expect all from their valour. Others from their wit and eloquence. Others from their gold. Others from dexterity in businesses. All this may do well, when a great integritie of long services puts these good qualities into action: but if it happen you have some ray of hope grounded upon some good title; do as Job, and keep it hidden (as long as is fit) in your bosom, for fear that discovering it you lose the pretended effects thereof. There are, who tell all their designs to the whole world, if they see themselves either contraried in the pursuit, or contemned in the small success of them. The Scripture observeth how that a Saul seeking for Asses found a Kingdom, when he met Samuel who foretold him, he was to be the first King of God's people. A meer peasant, though he were, he was so prudent, that an uncle of his examining him curiously of the particularities of his journey, he gave him account of the Asses, and other such mean things; but never did he open his mouth to declare the hidden mysterie. This is the third precept which is to be kept in the ordering of this Passion. To which we will gladly add a fourth, which is, not too soon to reject, nor over slowly to press forward in the pursuit of your hopes; by reason that there are some who are extremely impatient, and presently despair, if all happen not to their wish: Where, they well shew, they are never to make a great fortune, sith this search after good luck is a war, wherein Time is of more use then Arms. There are dayes which be step-mothers, others, be mothers; there be years which are spent with much pain, and little harvest: But there cometh a good one, which recompenseth penseth all sterilities, and with a full hand casteth fruits into our bosom. A good Fisher catcheth some fish, or still keeps the hook in the water; so, vigilant Courtiers either get favour, or incessantly watch the hour of their good hap, to cast themselves into the fish-pool, when the Angel hath stirred the water. Fortune was at Galba's Gate with a diadem, complaining she was wearie of attendance, and would be gone to another, if he took not heed thereto. Felicitie hath wings of an Eagle for some, and towards others, she comes with a leaden pace. There are times and ages, when one may reasonably expect her: but it is [illegible] life a lamentable thing to be tormented all ones life, to run after a fancy of honour and wealth which flouteth us, and never to account, that, as lost, which for us is but a nothing. There are who have lost all their discretion, opinionatively to pursue a hope, and have profited nothing by their labour, but to give a solemn testimony of their unhappiness.

Sine se ante fores sessum, & nisi ecum receperetur, cuique alteri prædæ futurum. Suet. in Galb. c. 4.

It is here most expedient to make use of the precepts which the Nightingale gave to the Fowler in the Fable of S. John Damascen. For he wittily feigneth that this poor bird being taken in the snare would redeem her self by three good words she spake in his ear who had captivated her pretious liberty. The first was, Not to be light of belief, nor inconsiderately to be transported with the first appearance of objects. The second, Not to pursue that, which one cannot attain. The third, To put out of your memory those evils, the remedy whereof is not in your power. Upon these instructions the bird is delivered, which desirous to make trial of the docibility of the man, told him in her language, he was very simple, to dismiss her so easily; for that if he had ripped up her belly, he had found a precious stone which had made him rich for ever. The Fowler, vexed at his own avarice and curiosity, begins to pursue her through the woods and forrests a very long way, till seeing she was out of his reach, he afflicted himself with his ownfolly. But the Nightingal said unto him. Art not thou a miserable man to have observ'd with so little constancy the precepts which concerned thy Happiness? Thou didst imagine there were Diamonds in the belly of a Nightingale; who misled thee but thy own credulitie? Thou most inconsiderately hast followed me, not observing that thou art a man, and I a bird: that thou art an inhabitant of the earth, and I, of the air: that thou hast natural weight, and I, wings. Lastly, thou art out of hope to be able to catch me; and it had not been much better to believe what I told thee, which was not to trouble thy self for an Impossibilitie? Behold, how this great Divine personates Æsop; to give sage directions to Courtiers in love with Hope, whence they may learn the means how to hope well. But, as for others who mock the world, and perpetually promise to those who serve them rewards which end in nothing; they deserve to have the same punishment inflicted, with which the Emperour Alexander Severus chastised an Impostor of his Court, who made very advantageous promises to many honest men, without ever coming to performance; for which, he caused him to be choked with smoke, the Cryer proclaiming aloud, He who sold smoke is punished by smoke. It were better to cut off at a blow the hopes of many, then to draw them at length in insupportable languours. But it is time we pass from humane manners, to divine perfections: and behold, how, by the examples of our heavenly Father, and the practices of the eternal Word, we may rule and settle this Passion.

Damascen. in Barlaam. A witty Fable of S. John Damascen.

Petronius apud Lampridium.

Sect. 3. That God being not capable of Hope, serves as an eternal Basis to all good Hopes.

GOd hath this property, that being uncapable of Hope, he is capable to support all hopes. I say, he is uncapable of Hope, not through the want of ability, but out of a singular excellency, and a most abundant plenitude of all perfections. Hope, is of good to come, and no man hopeth for what he possesseth. Now, God expecteth not any thing in the future, since he from all eternity hath felicities perpetually present. It were good to hear S. Zeno speak of the sufficiency of the eternal God. What is it which God may Hope, sith he hath nothing out of himself. And from whom can he Hope, being he alone is the origen of all things? Who hath no other beginning then himself, shall he expect any good from one elder then himself? And know we not he is before all things, since he shutteth all things within his own bosom? All that he is, he is of himself; and no man well knows what he is, but himself. He alone is perfect, because nothing can be added to him, nor taken from him. He is never damnified, but always equal to himself, because he admitteth not Age, but is one day composed of Eternity.

God is not capable of Hope, sith he possesseth all. Jac. 1. Apud quem non est transmutatio, nec vicissitudinis obumbratio. Zeno Veron. serm. 1. de gener. verbi. Solus Deus est principium, qui ex ipso dedit sibi principium; solus ante omnia, quorum in se unum ejus inclusa sunt omnia: solus est quod est; solus perfectus, quia non potest illi addi, nec minui: Solus indemnabilis, ac semper æqualis, quia in se non admittit ætatem.

One may object here, that to hope for any thing from another; it is not alwayes necessary he be absolutely greater, or more worthy then we. We hope from artificers, we hope likewise from our servants, the performance of businesses which we put into their hands; and therefore one might inferr, that it is not a proposition contrary to reason, to say, that God can hope something from us, as are the praises and service which we are bound to render to him, as were likewise our conversion. To that I answer, it is true, that the greatest Monarchs of the earth may hope from the meanest persons of their kingdom, because they are men, and have dependence of men: and in this, God greatly humbleth great men, when he makes them see that all this glorious pomp of their fortune which seems to afford matter of jealousie to heaven, and of new laws to earth, subsisteth not but by the commerce of merchants, and by the labour and sweat of peasants: all which makes no impression on the Divinity. It expecteth (say you) our praises; as if God were not his own praise to himself; as if he stood in need of a mortal mouth to honour an Essence immortal. Were all the lips of men the most eloquent at this present covered under ashes, what would it concern him? All the world is before him no more then the turn of a balance. Hath he not the morning stars round about his awful throne? I mean those great Angels all replenished with lights and perfections, who praise him incessantly. And were the world annihilated, and the very Angels confounded in the mass of stars and elements; he would ever be God, always as great as himself: and even left alone to his thoughts; in his own thoughts he would find heaven.

God is independent of all creatures, and the source of his felicities proceedeth from the infinity of his perfections. Tenuem momentum flatere, sic est ante te orbis terrarum. Sap. 11. 23. Resoluto mundo & diis in unum confusis, cessante natura acquiescit sibi cogitationibus suis traditus. Senec. ep. 9.

But yet you will say, he may expect our conversion, which partly dependeth on our selves; since he, who made us without us, will not save us without us. It is easie to reply thereupon, that God hath no need of the conversion of men, to augment his glorie; but to establish their salvation: and should he have need; he continually hath his elect before him in the book of his prescience, without blotting forth, or thereunto adding any names. Think you he expecteth till we have done to judg of our works? He knoweth from all eternitie what we must do in such or such an occasion, his prescience science not imposing any necessitie upon our free-will. This great God, sitting in the highest part of heaven continually beholdeth all the actions of men; and the eternity of his vision perpetually present, infallibly meeteth with the quality of our merits. It letteth us go according to the current of the stream, and the choice of our liberne; but if he would proceed with absolute power, there is no will so determinate upon evil which can resist him. And therefore we must conclude, his account is alreadie made both within himself, and without himself; he not any whit depending on the future.

Mens spectatur cultorum Dei, visionisque ejus præsens æternitas cum nostrorum actuum qualitate concurrit. Boet. l. 5. p. 6.

It is more clear then the day, that God cannot hope; but it is likewise most manifest, that he supporteth all good hopes by reason of the capacitie of his Essence, of his power, & of his goodnes: and therefore Esay spake very notably. You have put your hope in our Lord, who is in eternal ages, In our Lord (I say) the true God, whose strength is not limited by length of time. Men are weak; and God is the God of the strong: Men sometimes preserve for a time; but God guardeth us eternally: Men have their wills as changeable as their power is limited; but God (besides that he is of a constancie unshaken) exerciseth a power unbounded. Where, then, may we better lodge our hopes then in the Divinitie?

God supporteth all good hopes, by reason of the infinite capacity of his Essence. Sperastis in Domino in sæculis æternis, in Domino Deo forti in perpetuum. Isa. 16. 2.

There it is where our second Model (I mean the holy humanitie of Jesus) placed all his Hope. My God, my Hope; I did cast my self between thy arms, so soon as I began to be born to the world, and at my going from my mothers bosom. But one may here ask of Theologie, If Jesus had the virtue of Hope; what is it then he might hope? I answer, that if he might pray, he might hope. For, prayer, and (namely) a request is not made but with hope to obtain that we seek for. Now, who doubteth but that Jesus prayed on earth? and doth he not also pray now in heaven? He prayed (saith Theologie) for four reasons. First, for the exercise of his virtue which is most excellent. Secondly for our example. Thirdly, for the accomplishment of his commission; and lastly, for necessitie. I am not ignorant that S. John Damascen hath said, that Christ prayed not, but in appearance, insomuch as prayer being properly an ascension of the mind to God, it could not be that the soul of Jesus Christ should amount anew into the Divinitie, since from the day of his Conception it was there (as it were) enchased, not being able to be separated from it, one sole moment. But this question is satisfied by saying with Vasquez, that it is true that our Lord, in regard of the person of the Word, could not pray, having in this kind no superiour: but by reason of the Humanitie, which might be wanting and indigent without the help of the Divinitie; therefore he mounted up to the source of the word, not by vision and beatifick love, which he alreadie enjoyed; but by the knowledge of science infused, and by a new desire to impetrate something of his heavenly Father.

We must place our hopes in God, by the example of the holy Humanity of Jesus Christ. In te projectus sum ex utero, spes mea ab uberibus matris meæ.

For what reasons our Lord prayed on earth.

Damascen. l. 4. de fide.

I say, he alreadie had Beatitude, and that he was (as it were) engulphed in lights of glorie; he notwithstanding had not yet glorification of his bodie, exaltation of his name, extent of his Church from one pole to the other: which made him pray, and to say with S. John, I beseech thee (O Father) make me glorious and resplendent before the face of all Creatures, as I was from all eternity in the source of thy divine lights, even before thou hadst enlightned the beauty of this Universe. And it is to no purpose to oppose against this, That he had nothing to do, to pray, and hope for, since all he asked was fully assured him. For, it is evident that hopes, though certain, fail not to be hopes although they depend on the future. But, which is more; the eternal Father had so tied our salvation to the prayers and hopes of Jesus Christ, that we could not obtain it, but under this condition. He prayed and hoped for us; but whilst he was yet hanging on the breast of his most blessed Mother, he shewed us we must pour forth all our hopes on the firm rock of the power and goodnes of God. And to speak truly; what are all the hopes of the world, but reeds without support; shels without pearls; seeming colours of the Rainbow without solidity? O! how well doth S. Augustine speak when he compareth hope to an egg? saying, that all Beasts bring forth young ones, but birds produce nothing but hopes, which are the Eggs; we are true Birds whilst we are in this miserable life, still hanging upon leaves, still troubled at time passed, ever uncertain of the future, ranging hither and thither, and perpetually restless, and finding punishments in the greatest contentments of Nature. We brood weak hopes like unto Eggs, which promise us to bring forth wonders, and produce nought but wind. Hope is a marvellous Egg, whereof some eat the shell; others the white; but very few the yolk.

Clarifica me tu, Pater apud temetipsum, claritate quam habui, priusquam mundus fieret apud te. Joan. 17.

The hopes of the world are very deceitful, and have no solidity. S. August. Serm. 28. de verbis Domini. c. 5.

This very well figureth unto us three sorts of Hopes, whereof some are harsh and irksom; others, vain; the rest, in the end good and nutritive. If you desire to see the harshnes of worldly hopes, which we have set in the first place of this division; consider, first, that hoping much, we must have much dependence upon another, which taketh away from us that sweet liberty, which is a good inestimable. To hope is not a thing which dependeth upon our power, but on the liberality of another. It is much, that Hope, which is so slender and scanty, is not wholly ours. If we hope for a good, and expect it from our own forces; we are in danger to become presumptuous, vain, and ridiculous. For, how many see we in the world who daily are undone, by having too much presumed on their own power? How many little Birds with feeble wings, have sought to take a flight which hath only served to render their fall the more notable? If we must expect this good hap from another (besides the submission of dependence which hath alwayes somewhat distasteful in it) I see we most depend on men, some whereof want power; others, will; others, both together; but, if the one, and the other meet for a while, they are not of long continuance. The nature of blessings, which we hope for in the world, is, frail & more frail they from whom we hope them. We oftentimes hope for health from them, who are as sick as our selves; life, from mortals; riches, from creatures, who are all in the povertie of nothing. If we reckon up our evils, our maladies, our suits, our injuries, & our persecutions, we shal find many who will compassionate us, but very few to afford remedy. And that which often most vexeth us, is, that if there be some who are able, after they have promised us so much favour, and so many good turns, they in our cause are sparing of a step, and of the very wind of a word.

Three sorts of Hopes.

Sperare non est possibilitatis nostræ, sed largitatis alienæ. Paul. Orosius in Apol. de lib. arbitrio.

Others sell us under pretext to succour us. These are Hercules's, to whom we offer sacrifice to drive away Wolves, and they torment us more then the Wolves themselves. O how often are we enforced to say with the Prophet, Babylon my well-beloved, is set before mine eyes as a miracle: And then presently, that, which is in the same Text, according to the

Isa. 21. 4. Babylon dilecta mea posita est mihi in stuporem.

Crepuſculum deſiderii mei poſuit mihi in horrorem.

Hebrew, Miſhap is the cauſe, that the bright-day-break of my deſire is turned into the horrour of my thoughts? This Babylon of wordly hopes ſheweth in the beginning, as a miracle; but if we proceed further, we find that thoſe deſires that were as pleaſing as the dawning of day (which at its firſt ſpringing appeareth all over ſtudded with Emeralds and Rubies) turn at laſt, and are changed into the horrours of a ſad Tempeſt.

Cremata fortuna lenocinantis perfidiæ, fatis, & viram, ut ſcorpius, ultima parte percutit.

Many ſeemed to be already arrived at the end of their hopes, when good ſucceſs forſook them in the beginning of their riſing fortune, and if others went towards the end, they fell: that, albeit it had honey on the lip, and light in the face, it carried poyſon in the tail, like unto Scorpions. The vain hope of the world ſuggeſteth us, what the Emperour Zemiſces ſaid to a Patriarch of Conſtantinople, Thou wirt but an oven, and I have made thee a palace, but I will bring thee back to that ſtate from whence thou wenteſt. And all the ſplendour of thy falſe greatneſs ſhall only ſerve to make thy fall the more miſerable. Good God, that thoſe are conſtrained to eat the egg-ſhell, who after they have hoped great felicities, ſee themſelves thrown down, and roughly handled with pains waited on by ignominy, and confuſion!

Sidon. l. 2. ep. 13. Ego te, fumum, ædificavi, ego te, favum, deſtruam.

They hit not upon a much more favourable cond'tion, who eat the white of the egg, and who after they have hoped for great comforts in worldly proſperities, find the acquiſition is painful, the fruition uncertain, and the taſte moſt unſavourie. Never are the hopes of the world ſpecious, but when they are far from us, and all the pleaſure we take in them is like to that of dreams; from whence it comes that they very well are called dreams without ſleep. What pleaſure is it for a thirſty man to dream all night, that he is on the brink of a moſt delicious fountain, if, being awakened, he find that he ſtill hath the fire of thirſt on his lips? Libanius the Orator ſaid he would gladly cite his dreams to appear in judgment, and ſee them condemned as very impoſtours, which many times promiſe golden mountains, and perform nought but matter of ſorrow. By a much ſtronger reaſon we have cauſe to ſay the ſame thing of all worldly hopes which deſiſt not to deceive us, till we be aſleep, but ſurprize us open-eyed; Yet we ſhall do wrong to queſtion them; for they are innocent: but we are culpable to make ſo ill uſe of reaſon, as to run all our life-time after fancies. One of the wiſeſt men of antient times uttered a matter verie remarkable, related by D. John Chryſoſtom, to wit, that all man-kind is tied with a great chain, compoſed of two ſolds of links, which in great number all our life-time are multiplyed, and interchangeably follow one another. One is called joy, and the other ſorrow. But beſides this, there are ſome (ſaith this Wiſe-man) who have fetters on their heels, being tormented with harſh hopes, which, under the ſhadow of ſweetneſs, inſult over them, and hold them as long as they live in a painful ſlaverie. There is a file (addeth he) called Reaſon, which is very excellent to file our fetters; but, there are none, but the moſt conſiderate who find it: fools are enforced to languiſh all their life-time in this Martyrdom, and as they have lived in the fervours of a feaver, they alſo die in illuſion.

Aut poterit cœnabi inſultum, quod non ejus fale condiatur. Job 6. 6. Et ſicut ſomniat, ſitiens, & bibit, & poſquam fuerit experrectus inane habet ſitiri. Iſa. 29. 8. Libanius declar. 37.

An excellent paſſage of a wiſe man mentioned by Chryſoſtom.

Then let us learn to make an eternal divorce from all thoſe frivolous wordly hopes, and to look on Jeſus as a pole-ſtar always immoveable, under whom all mobilities move. What a ſhame is it to ſpend the better part of our age after ſmokes and phantaſtick ſemblances, which pay us with nothing but griefs; and not to hope in a ſtrong God, who ſupporteth the earth with three fingers of his power; in a merciful God, who loveth us tenderly as the apple of his eye! Shall we never learn to ſay, Be our arms in the morning, and our ſalvation in the day of Tribulation? Let us not flatter our ſelves with theſe goodly ſemblances of honour, of greatneſs, of riches, of pleaſures, which by heap preſent themſelves to our imagination; but let us ſay, Lord I will expect the Saviour thou haſt promiſed me. Let us leave men of the world who unbowel themſelves like Spiders by drawing out their entrails to catch flies: but let us imitate thoſe little ſilk worms, who caſt forth precious threads, whereof they make a rich bottom in which they ſleep, and come not forth but to take wings and ſoar in the air. Let us go and produce hopes which are as ſo many threds of gold, that involve us here below in precious repoſe, and a certain expectation of Beatitude, until charity hath perfected our wings to take our flight to the City of peace; where ſo many choſen ſouls ſtretch out an arm unto us. Let us take a very ſtrong comfort, ſince we put our ſelves between the arms of hope, (which we hold as a firm, and an aſſured anchor) to ſtay all the diſturbances of our mind, going forward in our way till we paſs the veil, and enter into the Tabernacle of the Sanctuarie, whereinto Jeſus our Precurſour hath made his entry for our Salvation.

The eighth Treatiſe, Of DESPAIR.

Sect. 1. Its Nature, Compoſition, and Effects.

The image of Deſpair.

HE who would ſet forth the picture of Deſpair (methinks) ſhould do well to repreſent Hope in the manner of ſome bird variouſly diverſified with curious-coloured feathers, & endowed with a moſt melodious voice, that were purſued by a man with much eagerneſs; but when he ſhould think to touch her with his finger, ſhe ſhould inſtantly vaniſh away in the air, and leave, inſtead of her ſelf a black and ugly Hobgoblin, which ſhould poſſeſs all the paſſages both of the Palace, & Throne of this goodly hope. In this property, behold what the definition of Deſpair meaneth, which according to S. Thomas, is a receſs from a good impoſſible, or which one propoſeth within himſelf he can never attain unto. From whence it cometh, that there are two acts which compoſe this miſerable Paſſion: the firſt whereof is a determinate judgment made upon the impoſſibility of the good that is ſought; whether it be loſt, or whether the means to arrive unto it be taken away, or whether it be ſo difficult, that the wit of man cannot purchaſe it at any price. Thence followeth a ſecond Act, of grief and ſadneſs, to ſee it ſelf driven back from the deſired object, without any hope of coming near unto it: for which cauſe, we may wel repreſent the diſmal ſpectre of Deſpair, tumbling ſo many Courtiers with frivolous hope down the mountain into the bottom of a valley, where ſome gnaſh their teeth, ſtamp with their feet, & pull themſelves by the hair. Some run to the ſword, to precipices and halters: otherſlie flat on the ground, drowned in their tears, & drenched in dull ſadneſs, like people wholly ſenſleſs & walking in the way of a Tomb, as having almoſt nothing at all to do with the living. But the thing moſt admirable is, that there are ſome to be ſeen, who, being come to the extremity of miſeries, find themſelves themselves in an instant faln into a happiness unexpected, so that despair seems to have been for them the source of all their hopes.

Sect. 2. The Causes of Despair, and the Condition of those who are most subject to this Passion.

THey who are of a Melancholick humour, are infinitely disposed to the effects of this direful passion. For to say truth, Melancholy is the Pit of the Abyss, from whence issue forth an infinite quantity of evil vapours, which cause night in the most cheerfull brightness, & make the most pleasing beauties of Nature to be beheld with affrightment.

They who are turmoiled herewith, easily resigning themselves over to Despair, are perpetually upon complaints and lamentations; they see publick calamities coming afar off, and, like birds of an ill presage, do prognostick nothing but disasters. They have a singular inclination to believe the worst news, to augment it in their imagination, to amplifie it in their discourses, and to affright the whole world (if they could) with panick terrours, & imaginary fears. The least mishap which befals their family, is (in their opinion) a general ruine: Menaces are blows; blows murthers; the least sparkes are Coles; Theaters strewed with flowers, are scaffolds covered with black for them; and all the actions of men are nought but Tragedies.

Wise Plutarch said, All little Courages were naturally full of complaints. They are like the river of Silias, wherein all sinks to the bottom, and nothing floteth: all passeth with them into the bottom of the soul, nought staies in the superficies: wch is the cause that the heart repleniſhed with cares & apprehensions, discharged it self (what it may) by the tongue.

Besides the material cause of despair, which is observed in melancholy, we find others efficient, which ordinarily fasten upon great and strong passons of love, of Ambition, and of Avarice. All histories are full of miserable people, who having settled their affections upon objects, whence they could not with reason expect any satisfaction, after an infinite number of languours, toils and pursuits, have buried their love in despair, and drowned their ardour in the blond of their wounds. Some have hanged themselves at the gate of their Mistrisses, others have thrown themselves headlong down into ruines, others have been exposed to salvage beasts, rather chusing to suffer the fury of tigers and lions, then the rage of love without fruition.

Dido profuga in alienos folg, ubi nuptias regis ultro optasse deberat. nè tamen fecundas experiretur, maluit è contrario uri, quàm nubere. Tertul. in exhort. ad castitatem.

The Poet Virgil did her wrong, to put Dido Q. of Carthage into the number of the Unhappy, saying, she sacrificed her self to the sword and flames, out of a Despair conceived to see her self deprived of her Trojan. Tertullian justified the ashes of his Countrey-woman, assuring us she was one of the most chaste Ladies in the world, and did more in the matter of Chastity then S. Paul prescribeth. For the Apostle having said, That it is better to marry then to burn; she rather chose to burn then to marry, making her own funeral alive, and rather entring upon the flaming pyle, then to comply with the passion of a King, who sought her in marriage after the death of her husband whom she had singularly loved.

The passion of ambition is no less violent in proud and arrogant spirits (who having been long born as on the wings of glory, and seeing themselves on a sudden so unfortunate, as to be trampled under foot by those who adored them) cannot digest the change of their fortune, anticipating that by violence, wch they ought rather to expect from mercy.

Such was Achitophel, accounted to be one of the greatest States-men of his time, whose counsels were esteemed as of a Deity, when seeing himself faln from the great authority he had acquired, after he had set the affairs of his house in order, he took a halter with wch he hanged himself. And it is thought Pilate followed the like course, when he saw himselfe to be discountenanced after the death of his master Tiberius, & banished by Caius Caligula, the successour to the Empire. This calamity seemed unto him so intolerable, that he sought to shorten his miseries by hastning his death, wch he gave himself by his own hand. Yet Eusebius, who seems to be the chief authour of this narration, and who is followed by Paulus Orosius & others, doth not assure it, as a thing undoubtedly true, but as a populat rumour. For my part, I think it not amiss to believe Tertullian, who conceiveth, that after the death of our Saviour, Pilate was a Christian in his conscience, when he in writing expressed to the Emperor Tiberius the things which occurred in the person of our Saviour with so much honour for our Religion, that from that time the Emperour resolved to put Jesus Christ into the number of the Gods. But if the opinion of this Author were true, It could not be credible, that a man who had a tincture of Christianity should have ended his life by so furious a despair.

Pilatus jam tunc pro suâ conscientiâ, Christianus, Tertul. in Apolog.

Yet, that it might very well; as many examples testifie.

Avarice in this point wil nothing at all give place to Ambition, for there are many to be found, who (seeing themselves unexpectedly deprived of treasures wch they kept, as the griphons of Scythia) would no longer behold the sun, after the sun had seen the gold wch they hid in the bowels of the earth. Witness that covetous man of the Greek Anthology, who strangled himself with the same halter wherewith another man had determined to hang himself, who by chance having found this caitiff's treasure, was diverted from it. This may very well teach us, that it is very dangerous, passionately to affect the objects of the world, because (as saith S. Gregory) one cannot without immeasurable grief lose all that wch with unlimited love is possessed. The evil spirit, who soundeth each ones inclinations, and discovereth their dispositions, powerfully intermedleth in them, and layeth snares for men in all the things wherein he observeth them to be with the most fervour busied. To these occasions of despair, fear of pain & shame is added, which is very ordinary, and is the cause that many hasten their end, before they fall into the hands of their enemies, or are laid hold on by Justice, wch is as much as if one should die, not to die. This was very common among Pagans, who esteemed that a glory, which we hold the worst of crimes: and the like opinion crept very far into the minds of the Hebrews, who thought themselves to be sacred persons, & imagined they did an act generous and profitable to the glory of God, to kill themselves, before the hands of Infidels were bathed in their blood. This is the cause if we believe the ordinary Gloss of the first Book of Kings, and the ancient Interpreters of this Nation, that we cannot conclude the damnation of Saul by an infallible demonstration for having strucken himself; seeing, that according to their opinion, he was not sufficiently illuminated by the lights of the antient Law, that it was a Mortal sin to hasten his death to save the honour of his Religion, & to deliver himself from the scorn of Infidels. Nay, they assure us, that he in this occasion ordered himself as a treasure of God, refusing to deliver up unto enemies a head honoured with sacred unction to be alive defiled by their profane hands. They add that he had before him the example of Samson, who was admired by all his own Nation for being overwhelmed with the Philistims under the ruines of a house. And that after him Razias, esteemed a Saint, and a courageous man, gave himself the stroke of death, and threw his bowels all bloudy from the top of a turret on the heads of his enemies. But now at this time we stand in a clear light, communicated unto us by Councils and School-Divinity, and know it is not at all lawful, so far as that a decree hath decided, that a Virgin ought rather to suffer the loss of virginity of body, by a manifest violence, then of her own accord to tear out her soul. Yet Doctours do not condemn him who throws himself down headlong to avoid a burning, nor him who putteth fire to the powder of a ship taken with Pirats, wherein he cannot doubt but he must perish; but he hasteneth his end to take a prey from his enemy, and to sacrifice himself for a Publick good.

Macc. 1. 12.

Placuit, ut qui sibi ipsis salutarem violentam intulerunt mortem, nulla precessa in illis insania obtinere commemoratio fiat. Ita Concil. Brocarensis primi. c. 34. Conf. 29. q. 3. in Glossa. Leyn. p. 116.

The Doctrine which blameth every other act of Despair, is conform to the opinion of the best Philosophers, who held, it is to die like a licentious beast, to go out of this life without his warrant, by whose leave we entred into it. Seneca, who had been of another opinion, changed it afterward at the end of his dayes, nor would he use violence against himself, wherewith Nero was amazed, and sent him the sentence of death, which he received with a marvellous courage; shewing, that if he sealed not his former opinion with his bloud, it was not for want of resolution, but that he had acquired more light. For my part, I probably think he was at that time a Christian, although not declared; and it is to no purpose to alledge, that he in his last words maketh mention of a Jupiter Liberator, since he explicateth it in his writings, shewing, that by this word he understands no other God, then the sovereign Monarch of the Universe.

Eundem quem nos Jovem intelligunt Illiberem universi, cui nomen unum convenit.

We ought not to take this glory from him, since S. Hierome so clearly giveth it him, placing him in the number of Christian Authours and Confessours of Jesus Christ. And that Flavius Dexter, a notable Historian, who flourished in S. Augustines time, & who wrote the History of Christianity from the birth of Christ our Saviour, to the year 430. expressly saith in the year 64. De Christiana re bene sensit, fallúsque Christianus occultus. But if this be so, it cannot have been but in the last year of Seneca's life, which is 66. of our Lord, when the holy Apostles, S. Peter and S. Paul returning thither the second time, made Christianity in that place to be resplendent. From whence it comes, that they much labour in vain who alledge many passages out of Seneca's book, composed in his Paganism, to disapprove our opinion.

Sect. 3 Humane Remedies of Despair.

THe cause of despair, and the condition of those who despair, being sufficiently known, we must fortifie our selves against this pernicious passion with all the courage and prudence we can use. If we consider the humane Remedies, they will teach us, that the inconstancy of things on the earth which overwhelme us, may raise us, that the state of this inferiour world is as a wheel, whereon we do nought but go up, and come down; and that when we have the most happiness, then is the time we fall to the lowest degree of misery. When the unfortunate are descended into abysses, the prosperous leap up in their places. We have seen of them, as the Wise-man observeth, that have mounted to Empires from the deep dungeons of a prison, as did Michael the Emperour, who was unexpectedly snatched out of the hands of Leo, when he had resolved to burn him alive: was taken from black Caverns, born to the Palace as yet nasty & all horrid, and on his Imperial Throne made to file off the fetters on his feet, for that the key of them could not be found. The proud Sesostris, King of Egypt, who pompously walked along in a chariot, harnessed out with Kings, was diverted from his insolency by one of those miserable Princes, who taught him a lesson of the revolution of humane things, by the resemblance of the wheels of the chariot of triumph, whereunto pride had lifted him. Experience will tell us, that many for having lightly believed their evil fortune, were deprived of very great prosperities; and became unfortunate for no other reason, but that they thought themselves such before their time.

De exitu casuúsque innumerabilium qui egressi sunt ad regnum. Zonaras. in Michael.

Perseverance will instruct us, that in worldly affairs, as are marriages, offices, benefices, suits in law, commerce, good turns, and recompenses; we must not shil fall off out of mood, but patiently expect the hour of our good hap, whilst there is any reasonable likelihood. Scardion in the third Book of his History, recounteth an excellent passage of Pope Innocent the seventh, who employed a famous Painter, named Andrew Mattineus, in adorning his Chappel of the Vatican. This brave workman bent himself to it with affection, and therein used his most exquisite inventions, hoping that he who set him a work, would largely requite his merit in so notable a power to oblige all the world. He notwithstanding saw his labours daily to go on, but felt no rewards coming, which one day put him into Choler, with a resolution to be revenged by some trick of his Art. The Pope had commanded him to paint the seven deadly Sins, but he in stead of taking his proportions for seven places, added thereunto an eighth, wherein he purposed to make a hideous Monster. Innocent more fully informing himself of his design, the Painter answered, he left this place there to represent Ingratitude, as the most capital of all Vices. The Pope well understanding what he would say, smiled, and said, Mattineus, I give consent thou paint Ingratitude as ugly as thou pleasest, but on this condition, that thou place Patience directly over against it, which of all Virtues is the most courageous, from which thou art very much alienated, being unable a little to expect patiently the good I have resolved to do thee: and presently he gave him a good Benefice for his sons preferment.

Lastly, commonly fame will shew us there are people, whose ears are like those gates through which nothing was suffered to pass but direfull things. They burden themselves with all the worst, and becom eloquent in the mishap of their friends, as if they infinitely obliged them by learning their disasters. We shall easily find a remedy for the evil we apprehend, by not being over-credulous in giving ear to these new-carriers, whom Poets will have to be the messengers of Hell. Constancy will assure us, that the evil opinion one hath of his own affairs troubleth the whole business; that we must persevere to the end, and albeit the tempest turmoil us, never to forsake the helm, though tossed in the midst of surges. If it be a last necessity which assaileth us, we must put on the countenance of a Saint to receive it; and confidently believe, that if it take all Hope from us, it will by little and little take away also all our Despair. It is very dangerous at that time to trust our own thoughts, and to entertain dotages of the mind: rather ther, we should seek (by the comfort of a confident Confessour, and by other good friends) to strengthen our selves against the storm which most commonly, onely threatneth us in the haven.

Sect. 4. Divine Remedies.

Remedies for this Passion.

IF our soul have leisure to take wings, and to raise it self above it self, let us look upon Divine Remedies, whereof we may make use to divert, or vanquish this direful Passion; which is verily one of the most poisonous of reasonable nature. And first of all, let us consider, how God being neither capable of Hope nor despair, faileth not to invite us to the one, and to withdraw us from the other, by the operations which he exerciseth on the visible world.

An excellent saying of venerable Bede.

Venerable Bede saith excellently wel in his observations, that he hath three sorts of habitations, wherein he hath lodged six divers things. In heaven he hath placed Verity & Eternity. On earth, Curiosity & Repentance. In hel, Misery & despair. Why should we then take to us a Passion of the damned, wch is not made for the world wherein we live? It is a remarkable thing, that God to make us hope, hath oftentimes strained the laws of nature, doing things wch seemed impossible to all humane judgments; & in works of grace he daily also produceth miracles, drawing to salvation & glory people meerly desperate, according to the opinion of the world. How could we have one sole touch of despair, were we truly faithful, since God engageth even his goodnes & power, to make us hope all that, wch according to Man, is desperate. There is nothing impossible to the omnipotency of God. He did but speak a word, and it was sufficient to vindicate from nothing all this vast world of Creatures. So soon as he ordained it, so soon it was done, and he hath indifferently let us know his greatness, as wel in the production of the least things, as in the creation of the most noble and eminent.

Non est impossibile apud Deum unum verbum. Luc. 1. Ipse dixit, & facta sunt; ipse mandavit, & creata sunt. Psal. 148.

There are three things wch are opposite to admirable works: 1. The weakness of the Agent created, 2. The indisposition of the subject. 3. The frequency of things seen and used. But God takes away these three obstacles to do miracles in nature. He gives to active creatures a strength meerly particular, & wholly Divine, to work above their force. He gives to Passive, a power of submission, & a capacity to receive the supernatural impression of agents, and brings forth effects, which are not onely great, but wholly extraordinary. And which is more, we therein observe five excellencies, which are as five raies of their glory: to wit, Efficacy, Durance, Utility, the End, and the Means, which render all these works of God infinitely recommendable. It is by his cōmand, that burning pillars walk in the air to serve as a standard for 600000 fighting men. That the sea parts in sunder & divides it self into two banks of Chrystal, to make a rampart for his people. That the clouds of heaven shower bread of Angels. That Rocks open their sides to pour forth fountains. That armies of flies and caterpillers destroy legions all of iron and steel. That the sun stands still in the midst of his career. That whales make a temple of their belly for a Prophet. That Sepulchres yield forth the dead alive. All this is done in nature by the ministery of Angels, and the service of men: but, by the virtue of God alone, to whom it belongeth to do miracles; the soul of Jesus Christ it self having not been but the instrument of the World united to it in such like operation. What is it we ought not to hope from a God, from whom we can despair of nothing, & who holdeth total nature at his service to help our confidence? But, not content with it, he passeth to miraculous works of grace, wherein he causeth unexpected productions. I will give you an excellent consideration, to encourage you never to despair, either of your own salvation, or that of other sinners. It is, that God, albeit, by his prescience he cannot be ignorant of the success of souls wch are out of the sweetness of his predestination, and who are not reckoned in the number of his elect; yet whilst they are involved in bodies, he treateth them as his own, not shewing that he despairs of their happiness.

What hindereth the production of admirable works.

God when he pleaseth takes away all the obstacles which oppose thereunto

The wonders which God maketh to appear in the Old Testament by the help of his creatures.

S. Thom. 3. q. 13. 2.

God indifferently treateth elect souls as reprobate, during life, without shewing that he despaireth of their salvation.

God never faileth, with necessary succours, and sufficient Grace, to save us. Psalm. 18. August. ibid. Non est qui se abscondat à calore ejus.

Divines teach us, that there is not any one destitute of the help of sufficient grace to work his salvation; not any one who is not visited with inspirations necessary for this purpose. Thus doth S. Augustine interpret the presage of the 18. Psalm, There is none who can hide himself from his heat. The ardour of the Word Divine pierceth through the coldest shadows of death. The sun is very general, and there is not a creature in the world so little, which hears not news of him: yet all night long he retires from us. And there are many people who are plunged in nights so tedious and irksom, that they seem to be (as it were) eternal. But this son of grace penetrateth into the darkest obscurities: It finds out men who have nothing of man but skin and figure, and speaketh to them with its raies, which are so many tongues from heaven: It spake to Herod after the murder of 14000 innocents: It spake to Nero, in the agitations of a mind troubled with the image of his crimes: It spake to the Emperour Theophilus, when dying he held between his hands the head of Theophobus his Constable, to satiate his revenge: Lastly, It makes us pronounce aloud the excellent saying of S. Clemens Alexandrinus, There are no Cimmerians for the Word of God. He makes allusion to certain people, whom we now call Georgians, or else to those who anciently inhabited in the territory of Rome, in places under the ground, such as that which we now adays call Sybilla's Grot, and it is thought the sun never reflected into their caves; but it is not so in the visits of the holy Ghost: The great sea of divine light is ever at hand, and abundantly overflows him favour of such wils as wil participate therein. I am not ignorant, that certain Divines have said, that some sinners arrive many times to such exorbitancy of crimes & ingratitudes, that they in the end are totally abandoned by God, and have not all the rest of their time, one sole good thought. But the most moderate say, that this happeneth for certain time, and certain moments, albeit, one cannot generally say, that a man may come to an estate so desperate, as to be wholly impenetrable to the graces of God: It is an errour to say, that a crime so detestable may happen in the world, of which she cannot have remission. We cannot set limits, nor bound time in the infinity mercies of God. Moses the Ethiopian, who was so black of body, so stained in conscience, so wicked of life, that he was accounted a devil incarnate, was so changed by the grace of God, that he became an Angel of heaven. An infamous thief having obtained his pardon of the Emperour Maurisius, was put into the Hospital of S. Samson, where he so plentifully bewailed his sins in the last agonies of death, that the Physician who took care of him, coming to see him, found him unexpectedly dead, and over his face a handkerchief bathed with his tears. & soon after he had a certain revelation of his Beatitude. To this purpose Pope Celestine said, That a true Conversion made at the last end of life, is to be measured by the mind, not by the

the time. God cauſed a thief to mount from the gallows to Glory, to teach us, that as there is nothing impoſſible to his power, ſo there is not any thing limited in his mercy. It is onely fit for him to deſpair, who can be as wicked as God is good.

Sect. 5. The Examples which Jeſus Chriſt gave us in the abyſs of his ſufferings, are moſt efficacious againſt puſillanimity.

The ſight of our Saviour teacheth us to perſevere in our good hopes, and not to deſpaire.

BEhold the conſolations we may derive from our firſt model: but if we will conſider the ſecond, we ſhall find that our Lord, who did all for our inſtruction, witneſſed ſtrong hopes in the great abyſs of dolours, wherewith he was all covered over on the Croſs, to encourage us to hope well in the moſt ſenſible afflictions.

That you may well underſtand this point ſo important, you muſt conſider, what then was the ſtate of the body and ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt: the body was ſo full of wounds, that they, who could not be ſatisfied with his pains, did more in him torment his wounds, then his members. He had almoſt no part about him entire, whereof he on the Croſs could make uſe, but his eyes & his tongue, His eies not being pulled out (as Samſon's & Zedekiah's.) there was nothing left for him, but to ſet before his view the Martyrdom of his good Mother, who was faſtned on the Croſs by love, and who imprinted in her ſoul, by a moſt amorous reflexion, all the torments which the King of the afflicted bare on his body. His tongue, which he had reſerved free to be the organ of heavenly harmonies in thoſe fervent prayers he ſent to his Celeſtial Father, was wholly drenched in gall.

But, all that was nothing in compariſon of the dolours of his Soul: For, he was deſtitute for a time of all divine Conſolations, abandoned to himſelf, delivered over as a prey to all the outrageous ſadneſs which may grow in our minds. It was a horrible blaſphemy in Calvin to ſay, that our Lord deſcended into Hell, there to endure the pains of the damned, without the ſuffering of which, he was not in a ſtate to be able to redeem the world. This (ſpoken in the manner as this abominable Noveliſt hath dared to write) woundeth, and offendeth the moſt obdurate ears. But if we will ſpeak with the moſt eminent Divines, we may ſay, that it is very likely that the Agonies of our Saviours ſoul might in ſome ſort enter into Compariſon with the ſadneſs of the damned: not by reaſon of their condition, but of their exceſs. And certainly ſome have thought, that our Saviour ſtirring up in his bleſſed ſoul a Contrition for all the ſin of the world in general, and of every one in particular, was wounded with ſo piercing a ſorrow, that it in ſome ſort exceeded that of devils and the damned. For, all the ſadneſs which may be imagined in hell conſiſteth in acts, which are produced from principles that ſurpaſs not the force of Humane or Angelical Nature: but the pain which our Saviour endured for the expiation of our ingratitude, was derived from the heart of God, according to the whole latitude of the grace and charity of the word Incarnate.

For which cauſe, it is conformable to reaſon to ſay, by Allegory, that this bleſſed ſoul entred into three kinds of ſacred and honourable flames, and of pains wholly Divine. The firſt was, in the garden of Olivet; when he ſaid, His ſoul was ſad to death: The ſecond, when he pronounced on the Croſs, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Complaining, not of the ſeparation of the Word (as ſome antient Writers have underſtood it, little conform to true Theology) but of receſs from protection (as S. Athanaſius doth explicate it in his Book of the Incarnation; and S. Auguſtine, in his 47. Tract. upon S. John.) The third was, at the going forth of the incomparable ſoul of Jeſus, when there was not ſo ſmall a filament of a vein in his body, which reſented not the abſence of this divine Sun.

Yea, my God, all my praiſe ſhall be in thee, and for thee. I will pronounce thy marvels in thine own houſe, and I will offer thee my vows and ſacrifices before all thoſe that make profeſſion to honour thee.*

Sect. 6. Encouragements to good Hopes.

AND will we then in ſo great light of Examples, in ſo eminent protection of divine Helps, reſign our ſelves over to ſadneſs and deſpair among ſo many accidents of this tranſitory life? Deſpair onely belongs to hearts gnawn with dull melancholy, and to ſouls extremely in love with themſelves and the commodities of the world, or to maligne ſpirits who have loſt all the ſparks of good conſcience, or laſtly, to the damned.

Why ſhould we deprive our ſelves of an ineſtimable treaſure of good hopes, wch the eternal Father hath kept for us in his omnipotency, of wch the word Incarnate hath aſſured us on the Croſs with his bloud, & the reſt of his life? Is it not a goodly thing to ſee people who bear the Character of Chriſtianity, to lay down the buckler, and to throw away arms at the firſt approach of ſome affliction whatſoever, to grumble and murmur againſt God and men; to cruciate themſelves like Prometheus on the rocks of Caucaſus, to torment themſelves with a thouſand imaginary evils? Wo to you Apoſtate and fugitive children, who have made reſolutions without me, and who have weaved a web which was not warped by my ſpirit. It is no extraordinary matter (ſaid S. Chryſoſtom) to fall in wreſtling; but to be willing to lie ſtill ſtretched out at length on the earth. It is no diſhonour to receive wounds in fight; but, to neglect them, and to let the gangrene through lazineſs to creep in, is a folly inexcuſable.

Væ, filii deſerentes, dicit Dominus, ut faceretis conſilium & non ex me, & operiremini velamen, & non per Spiritum meum. Iſa. 30. 1. Chryſoſt. ad Theodoram.

We entred into this life, as into a liſt, to wreſtle; as into a field of battel, to fight: why are we amazed, if God uſe us as he did his moſt valorous champions? Let us look upon life on all ſides, and we ſhall find it preſerved by good Hopes, and is totally ruined by Deſpair; Behold, men build after ruines and fires; ſee, others (after they are come all naked from amidſt waves, rocks, frothy rages of the ſea) gather together in the haven broken planks of their unfortunate veſſels, to commit their life to an element whoſe infidelity they know by experience, and taſte proſperous ſucceſs onely by very ſlight hopes. Yet fly they like Eagles into dangers, among all the images of death, after they therein have been ſo ill treated. When Alexander was ready to enter into the Indies, one ſaid unto him, Whither wilt thou go? Beyond the world? where where dying nature is but a dul lump: where darkneſs robs men of heavens light: and the water hath no acquaintance with the Earth. What ſhall you ſee, but frozen ſeas; prodigious monſters; maligne ſtars; and all the powers of life conſpiring your death? To what purpoſe is it to haſten to ſail over new and unheard of ſeas? Inconſiderately to interrupt the peaceful ſeat of the Gods? But, replied he, Let us couragiouſly go on, let us diſcover thoſe forlorn Countreys: Thus did great Hercules deſerve to win heaven.

Hope cauſed Rome to ſet Armies on foot after the battel of Cannas: and France, to triumph over the Engliſh by the hands of a ſilly ſhepherdeſs: wherefore will we deſpair of our ſalvation, ſith the mercy of God was never extinguiſhed, nor can he ceaſe to be what he is? what a thought of a devil is it, to deliver ones ſelf over to deſpair in the ſight of a Jeſus, who beareth our reconciliation on his ſacred members, and pleadeth our cauſe before his eternal Father, with as many mouths as our ſins in him have opened wounds? Know we not, We have a Biſhop, who cannot but compaſſionate our infirmities, ſeeing he himſelf hath pleaſed to paſs through all thoſe trials; and to make experience thereof to his own coſt and charges? It is not the deſpair of our ſalvation which tempteth us, but that of temporal goods; this ſuit, and that money, is loſt: here is the thing which afflicteth this deſolate ſoul, and makes it hate its proper life. O ſoul, ignorant of the good and evil of thy life! It is thy love and not thy deſpair alone which tormenteth thee. Thou then haſt fixed thy Beatitude on this gold, this ſilver, on thy profit by this ſuit; and thou lookeſt on it, as on a little Divinity. Doſt thou forget the words of the Prophet? Silly partridge, thou brooded eſt borrowed egs, thou haſt hatched birds which were not thine: let them flie, ſith thou canſt not hold them.

That, which thou eſteemeſt a great loſs, ſhall be the beginning of thy happineſs: thou ſhalt ever be rich enough, if thou learneſt to be ſatisfied with God. But, this perſon (whom I more dearly loved then my ſelf) is dead, and all my purpoſes are ruined by his death. Wherefore doſt thou reſolve with thy ſelf to ſay now he is dead? began he not to die frō the day of his birth? Muſt he be looked on as a thing immortal, ſince both thou and he have already received the ſentence of your deaths from your mothers wombs? If thou onely griev eſt for his abſence, thou wilt quickly be content; for thou daily goeſt on towards him, as faſt as the ſun which enlightneth us; there is not a day which ſet thee not forward millions of leagues towards thy Tomb. I am content that they bewail the dead, who can have no hope of Reſurrection; they who believe they are dead never to live again. Let them bemoan the loſs of their friends as long as they will: as for us, we ſhall ſoon ſee one another, and re-enter into the poſſeſſion of thoſe, whoſe abſence we awhile lament.

It is not abſence (ſay you) which moſt afflicteth me: but, to ſee my ſelf deſtitute of a ſupport which I expected, that is it vexeth me. Enter into thy heart, lay thy hand on thy thoughts, and they will teach thee, that all thy unhappineſs cometh from being ſtill too much tied to honours, ambitions, and worldly commodities. I would divert thee as much as I might poſſibly from deſpair, but I at this preſent find that the remedy of thy evils will never be, but in a holy deſpair of all the frivolous, fair ſemblances of the world. O how wiſely ſaid Vegetius. That deſpair is in many a neceſſity of virtue. But more wiſely S. John Climachus, who defining the life of a perfect Chriſtian, which he calleth the Pilgrimage, did let theſe words fall, True, and perfect Religion is a general deſpair of all things. O what a happy ſcience is it, to know how to deſpair of all, to put all our hope in God alone? Let us take away thoſe deceitful and treacherous props which beſiege our credulous minds, and ceaſe not to enter into our heart by heaps: Let us bid adieu to all the charming promiſes of a barren and lying world, and turning our eyes towards this celeſtial Jeruſalem our true Countrey; let us ſing with the Prophet, All the greateſt comfort I have in this miſerable life, is, that I often lift up mine eyes to the mountains, and towards heaven, to ſee if any neceſſary ſuccour comes to me from any place. From whence can I hope more help or conſolation, then from the great God omnipotent, who of nothing created this univerſe, and hath (for my ſake) made an infinity of ſo many goodly creatures? Should I ſee armed ſquadrons of thunders & lightnings to fal on me, I would have a ſpirit as confident, as if there were no danger. were I to paſs through the horrours of death, being in thy company, I would fear no danger. Moreover, I hold it for a ſingular favour, and it ſhall be no ſmal comfort to me, when thou takeſt pain lovingly to chaſtiſe me for my miſdeeds, & to favour me with thy viſits. Happy he, who hath raiſed his gain from his loſſes, his aſſurance out of his uncertainties, his ſtrength out of his infirmities, his hopes out of his proper deſpairs, and who hopes not any thing but what is promiſed by God, nor is contented but with God who ſatisfieth all deſires, and crowneth all felicities.

The ninth Treatiſe, Of FEAR.

Sect. 1. The Definition, the Deſcription, the Cauſes and Effects thereof.

The nature of fear, and the bad effects of it.

FEar is the daughter of ſelf-love and opinion; a paſſion truly horrid, which cauſeth all things to be feared (yea, thoſe which are not, as yet in being) and by making all to be feared, hath nothing ſo terrible as it ſelf. It falleth on a poor heart, on a miſerable man, as would a tempeſt not fore-ſeen, or like a ravenous beaſt practiſed in ſlaughter; and confiſcateth a body which it ſuddenly interdicteth the functions of nature, and the uſe of forces. It doth at firſt, that with us, which the ſparrow-hawk doth with the Quail. It laies hold on the heart, which is the fountain of heat, and ſource of life; it ſeizeth on it, it gripes it, it tortureth it in ſuch ſort, that all the members of the body extremely afflicted with the accident befallen their poor Prince, ſend him ſome ſmall tributes of bloud and heat to comfort him in his ſufferings, whereby the body becomes much weakned. The vermillion of cheeks inſtantly fadeth, and paleneſs ſpreads over all the face, deſtitute of the bloud wherewith it was formerly coloured; the hair hard ſtrained at the root with cold, ſtares and ſtands on end; the flames which ſweetly blaze in the eyes, fall into eclipſe, the voice is interrupted, words are imperfectly ſpoken; all the organs and bands are loſened and untied, quaking ſpreads it ſelf over all, eſpecially the knees, (wch are the baſis of this building of nature:) & over the hands, wch are frontier-places, moſt diſtant from the direction of the Prince, who is then toiled with the cōfuſion of his ſtate. This evil paſſiō is not content to ſeizeon our body, but it flieth to the ſuperiour region of our ſoul, to cauſe diſorder; robbing us almost in a moment of memory, understanding, will, courage, and rendring us benum'd, dull, and stupid in our actions. This notwithstanding is not to be understood but of an inordinate fear. And that we may see day-light through this dark passion, to know it in all the parts thereof; I say first in general that there are two sorts of fear, Moral, and Natural. Moral which comprehending filial, and servile, is not properly a passion: But a virtue, which S. Barnaby, (according to the report of Clemens Alexandrinus) called the Coadjutrix of faith. S. Ambrose, the rudder of the soul. And Tertullian, the foundation of Salvation. Of this very same it was S. Zeno spake so eloquently. O necessary fear! which art to be procured by care and study, and not to be met by chance, voluntarily, not out of necessity, and rather by overmuch piety, and tenderness, then by the occasion of sin, which brings a guilty soul vexation enough.

The sorts of fear.

Calvor animæ fluxus animi. Amb. de Paradis. Tertul. de cultu fœmin. O necessarius timor! qui times artis non casu, voluntate non necessitate, religione non culpa. S. Zeno.

Natural fear is properly an apprehension of a near approaching evil framed in the soul, whether it be real, or seeming, to which one cannot easily make resistance. It is divided into six parts, according to the doctrine of S. John Damascen, to wit, Pusillanimity, Bashfulness, Shame, Amazement, Stupidity, and Agony. Pusillanimity feareth a labour burthensome, and offensive to nature. Bashfulness flyeth a foul act, not yet committed. Shame dreadeth disgrace which ordinarily followeth the sin when it is committed. Amazement (which we otherwise call admiration) is caused by an object we have of some evil which is great, new, and not expected, the progressions and events whereof we cannot fore-see. Stupidity proceedeth from a great superabundance of fear which oppresseth all the faculties of the soul. And Agony is the last degree which totally swalloweth up the spirit in the extream nearness of great evils, & greatly remediless.

Six sorts of natural fear.

The causes of fear.

Forasmuch as concerneth the causes of this passiò. if we wil reason upon it, we shal find, that the chief, and most considerable, is self-love, wch is ever bent upon the preservation of it self, & the exclusion of all things offensive, from whence it cometh, that all the greatest lovers of themselves are the most fearful, and the most reserved in the least occasions of peril, as are ordinarily persons rich, full of ease, and nice; who resemble the fish, that hath gold on his Scales, and is the most timorous creature of the sea. The second, wherein many particular causes meet, is the evil to come, namely when it is great, near, inevitable, and that it tends to the privation of our being. From thence arise a thousand specters of terrour, as are poverty, outrages, maladies, thunder, fire, sword, inundations, violent deaths, wilde beasts; and above all, men powerful, cruel, revengeful, wicked; especially when they are offended, or that they have some interest in our ruine, and that they can freely be revenged without any fear of laws, or punishment. Add to these, the envious, corrivals, greedy heirs, friends treacherous, provoked, or timorous, motinous, quarrelsome, violent, and greedy. The third motive of fear, is, the ignorance, and little experience we have in the evils of the world: for, all that which is covert and hidden from us seems the more terrible, as are solitudes, Abysses, darknesses, and persons disguised. From thence cometh, that women, children, and men, bred in a soft, and sedentary life are more timorous, sith the knowledge of dangers, whereof they are deprived, is a great Mistress of fortitude. The fourth source is coldness, and consideration, which is the cause that the wisest justly fear perils, where hair-braind young men, fools, and drunkards carelessly jeast, and make sport: and that was the cause why Sylla, finding himself many times too considerate in the foresight of evils, did endeavour to drown his apprehensions in wine. The fifth is observed in a nature cold, melancholick, imaginative, and distrustfull, which sometimes happeneth to Hypocondriacks, such as was that of the ancient Artemon, who caused a buckler continually to be carried over his head by two lackeys, fearing least something falling from on high might hurt him: or that of Pisander, who feared to meet his own soul: or that other frantick fellow, who durst not walk for fear of breaking the world, which he perswaded himself was wholly made of glass.

Ælian. l. 12. de animal. ὁ χρυσόφρυς ἰχθὺς δειλίᾳ.

The sixth, lastly comes from an ill conscience. For there is not any thing so turmoiled, so torn, and so divided as a soul which hath alwayes before it the image of its own crimes. This was it which made the Nero's and Domitian's to tremble: This which caused Apollodorus (of whom Plutarch speaketh) to have horrible visions, so that it many times seemed to him in his nightly sleeps that the Scythians flaied him alive, and threw his chop'd members one after another into a boiling Cauldron, and that he had nothing alive but his heart, which said to him in the bottom of this Cauldron, I am thy wicked heart, It is I, who am the source of all thy Disasters.

Sect. 2. Of the vexations of Fear, its Differences, and Remedies.

Fear, a troublesom passion.

WE may wel say this passion is one of the most troublesom and vexing among all the motions of our mind; because it is extreamly ranging, sith, not content with the evils which are on the sea and land, yea in hell, it forgeth new which have no subsistance, but in the perplexity of an imagination quite confounded. Besides this, it more spiritually tormenteth us, making our judgment and reason to contribute to our vexations, and many times so long turmoyleth us, that it maketh us to fear, half an age of time, that, which passeth in a moment. For which cause, I account it a loving clemency of God to hide from us the greatest part of the things which befal us, the knowledge whereof would continually over-whelm our wretched life with sadness, and affrightment, and not give us leave nor leisure to breathe among the delicious objects of nature. If so many great and eminent personages, who being mounted to the highest degrees of honour, have been throwndown into abysses, had continually beheld the change of their fortune, and the bloudy ends of their life; it is not credible but that the joyes of their triumphs would have been moistned with their tears, and by a perpetual fear of an inevitable necessity, they would have lost all the moments of their felicity.

The ignorance of our evils is a stratagem of the divine Providence.

Now, in some sort to remedy a plague so general; I finde the troubles wch comes to us this way either are natural timidities, or fears of things very frequent in the condition of human life, or are affrightments upon some terrible and unusual objects. Forasmuch as concerneth timidities wch we see in fearful natures, they proceed either from the disposition of body & melancholick humour, or frò the quantity of heart which is sometimes too great, & hath little heat; or from idleness and effeminacy of life; or from a base birth, and from a sedentary breeding, or from small experience, or from overmuch love of reputation, & ease both of mind & body. Some are timorous in conversation, and fear to approach men of quality, they dread the aspect of those whom they have not accustomed accustomed to see, they quickly change colour, they have no consequence in their speech, no behaviour, no discourse, their words are broken, the tone of their voice is trembling, and their countenance nothing confident; which very often happeneth to young men timorously bred, and little experienced. Others fear all occasions of Ceremonies, of pomp, and splendour, to see and to be seen, and would willingly borrow the veil of night to cover themselves from them. Others are very bad sollicitours of businesses, daring not to say, nor contradict any thing; and if they must needs ask a question, they do it so fearfully, that in asking, they shew how they should be denied. There are, who more fear to speak in publick, then one would a battel: which hath happened to many great wits, as to Demosthenes, Theophrastus, and Cicero, who protesteth that being already of good years, he stil became pale, & trembled in the beginning of his discourse: which in my opinion proceeded from an excessive love of honour, which these men seemed to hazard when they made orations before Princes, the Senate, and people. A block-head exposeth himself with much more confidence, because he hath nothing to lose, and is like a Pilot who steereth a ship fraught with hay: But these were Masters who guided vessels furnished with pearls, such credit and authority they had purchased. Æschines, a man well-behaved, a great talker, and a huge flatterer, triumphantly spake before King Philip, and the Macedonians, where poor Demosthenes had much a do to deliver his mind; so that one might have taken the one for an Ideot, and the other for an oracle: yet there was no comparison, seeing the one had high and sublime thoughts, the other trivial and very vulgar, which were onely made good by the utterance of voice and gesture. Some there have been so afflicted, to have failed in a publick oration, that they thereby have fallen into despair: it so happened to Herod the Athenian, (the proudest Orator of his time) who being gravelled before the Emperour Marcus Antonius, was like to die with grief: yet judicial hearers, do not the less value a learned man for the misfortune of these accidents: Whilst popular spirits account them for disgraces, which more truly fall upon those who intrude themselves out of temerity, where they are not called out of duty, and striving to gain glory, do lose all the little they might have acquired. This happens to some by a precipitate imagination, who think upon the middle, and end of a discourse, when they are (as yet) in the beginning: To others, out of a light and skipping spirit, which in despite of them doth over-flow: To others, by unexpected accidents, as it happened to the learned Oporinus of the University of Basil, to whom it was given in charge to receive the famous Erasmus, by offering him presents of wine in the name of the City: He was prepared for it with a brave and a long Oration; but being trained up to the School (which had little curiosity & quaintness in complements) going about to kiss Erasmus his hand full of the gout, he did it so roughly, that he hurt him, and made him to cry out of the pain he had put him to, by this kiss: which made the good Professour lose himself, nor could he ever hit upon the beginning of his discourse, untill they plentifully had powred out some of the presented wine for him to drink, so to awaken his memory.

Three sorts of fear.

Timidity, its causes and symptomes.

Certainly we must needs tell you, it is like a dancing on a rope to recite a long oration by heart, and there are many rocks for those who are naturally fearful. There is not any thing which so much correcteth these timidities, as to break them in ones youth; to put ones self upon hazard when he hath not so much to lose; to cry out, to declaim; to take on in the theaters of a Colledge; to accustome ones self to see good company; to be fashioned for entertainments, discourses, replies; to learn the garbs of the time and Countrey; to study the art of penetrating spirits; not to be out of countenance with ill success at the beginning; fairly to put on a business what one can, and not to becom impudent by striving to resist fear. For it happeneth that such as were very timorous, become many times so bold by complacence, that they must master their passion which is grown a little too insolent. One would not believe how resolute and fearless a man is, upon all occasions, who hath been accustomed to declaim.

When Luitprand Bishop of Cremona was sent in Embassage to Constantine son of Leo the Emperour of Constantinople, he gave him audience sitting in a throne which suddenly was lifted up to the roof, and was inviron'd with Lions of brass, who by art began to roar, of purpose to astonish him; but he gave not over to speak as confidently, as if all this spectacle had been but a childish sport, because he had overcome himself before in a thousand occasions.

But they who after they have in youth tryed to correct these natural fears, seeing they therein very little profit, should do well to withdraw from great conversations of the world, from the embroilment of affairs, from specious offices, from negotiations (which must be treated with bold, and quick spirits) from warfare, from the Court, from Ceremonies, from orations; to cultivate a sweet repose, without being stired up by wordly ambitions, and to set themselves on the rack to be successfull in a profession, whereunto nature stands indisposed.

This did Isocrates, who had an excellent wit, and very capable of eloquence notwithstanding, finding himself destitute of countenance, gesture and Confidence, he never durst to speak in publick, contenting himself to teach even to his decrepit dayes; and commonly saying, he taught Rhetorick for a thousand Ryals, but would give more then ten thousand to him who would teach him Confidence.

Sect. 3. Against the fear of the Accidents of humane life.

THe second manner of fear is more troublesom, as poverty, scorns, chains, imprisonment, pains, maladies, and of death which assaulteth us in a million of objects plentifully diffused throughout total nature. But we must confess that of all evils there is not any one so terrible to man, as man himself. An enemy powerful, factious and wicked, he employeth all the instruments of terrour, to serve as arms for his iniquity; he inventeth crafty tricks, he whetteth swords, he mingleth poysons, he prepareth fetters and dark dungeons, he tieth tortures, he raiseth gibbets to satiate his revenge: and it seems he holds all the Furies and Divels under hire, to torment the miserable.

Fear of accidents in the world.

Man terrible above all terrible.

What shall a poor beast do which sees it self menaced by many mischiefs, greatly contrary to nature? Think you it is a rock, or an Anvile, which is moved at nothing? we must not brave it on paper, and with a stock at inkstand as Phidanis his Bull, and Rhodamont's courser. All these fears of things adverse to our nature may fall into the life of men the most constant, namely when hostilities (which assail us) are sudden, and violent, that the iſſue of them is irreparable.

Remedies againſt accidental fear. Senec. ep. 13.

Notwithſtanding, it much helps to ſweeten this paſſion, to conſider what Seneca ſaith, that often we fear too much, or to ſoon, or without cauſe. We fear too much by fearing things mortal, as if we were immortal. We have infinite apprehenſions of pains which end with a life ſo ſhort. It is to be ignorant of the things of nature, and to make an ill divident of our thoughts, to caſt perpetual cares upon an evil which is not many times ſo ſoon come, but that it ceaſeth to be an evil, taking away the ſence by the violence, or fortifying it by its faintneſs. We fear too ſoon by apprehending things far diſtant from us. There is but too much time to be miſerable in this life: Let us not haſten to anticipate it, nor let us loſe one ſole moment of preſent happineſs, for imaginations of the future. We fear without cauſe, when we dread things which will never happen; and if they do happen, it will peradventure be for our advantage.

There are who eſcape out of priſon by fire, others who are fallen into precipices very gently, and have in the bottom found their liberty; Others, to whom poiſons are turned into nutriment; others, to whom blows of a ſword have broken impoſtumes: ſo true it is, that the ſeeds of good hap are ſometimes hidden under the apparances of ill.

To take things at the worſt.

Beſides this, give your ſelf the leiſure to find out the whole latitude of the evil which ſtrikes you: Take (if you think good) all things at the worſt, and handle your ſelf as an enemy; yet you ſhall find that this evil is not ſo bad as it is ſaid: that many have gone that way before you; and that if God permit it, he will give you ſtrength to bear it. The fear it ſelf (which is the worſt of our evils) is not ſo great a torment, ſince it affordeth us precaution, Induſtry, and fit means, and ſuggeſteth us wayes to fear no more. If you never have experienced evil you have much to complain, that you ſo little have been a man; and if you have ſome experience of the time paſt, it will much ſerve you to ſweeten the apprehenſion of the evils to come. Vanquiſh your own conceits as much as you can, and pray them not to preſent unto you under ſo hideous a maſk, thoſe pains, which women, and children have many times laughed at: If you in the beginning feel any horrour and the firſt rebellions of nature; loſe not courage for all that, ſince the Poet painted Boldneſs with a pale viſage. We have often ſeen great Captains (as Garcias) to quake in the beginning of dangerous battels, becauſe their fleſh (as they ſaid) laid hold of their courage, and carried the imagination into the moſt hideous perils. Laſtly, be it how it will be, you ſhal find the remedy of your fears, in the preſence of that which you fear, ſince there are ſome who in the irreſolution of ſome affair do endure a thouſand evils, and ſo ſoon as the determination thereof ſucceedeth, though to their prejudice, they feel themſelves much more lightned. Many priſoners who ſtand on thorns in priſon expecting the iſſue of their trial, go very reſolute to execution, ſeeing it is better to die once, then to live ſtill in the apprehenſion of death. David ſhook with fear, wept, and faſted, lay on the ground for the ſickneſs of his young ſon: But after the death was denounced him, he roſe up from the earth, changed his habit, waſhed and perfumed himſelf: then having worſhipped in the houſe of God, he aſked for his dinner; and firſt of all comforted Bathſheba upon this accident: whereat his houſhold-ſervants were amazed. But he taught them, we muſt not afflict our ſelves for thoſe things, whereof there is no remedy.

Fidicle pallent, Statius Theb. Rodericus Toletanus rerum Hiſpan. l. 5. c. 23.

2 Reg. 12.

I conclude, with the laſt kind of fear, which comes from things very extraordinary, as are Comets, Armies of fire, Prodigies in the Heavens and the air, Thunders, Lightnings, Monſters, Inundations, Fires, Earthquakes, Spirits, Spectres, Devils, and Hell. Good God! what terrour is there in this miſerable life, ſince beſides theſe which are ſo ordinary with us, we muſt expect other from places ſo high, and ſo low? But howſoever, we notwithſtanding do find courages which ſurmount them with the aſſiſtance of God, although it do not ordinarily happen without ſome impreſſions of fear; otherwiſe we muſt be far engaged in ſtupidity. Comets, Eclipſes, flying fires, and ſo many other Meteors, do not now-a-dayes ſo much affright, ſince we have diſcovered the cauſes, which is a powerfull proof, that ignorance in many occaſions makes up a great part of our torment. Pericles ſtrook a fire-ſteel in an aſſembly of his Captains and ſouldiers (who were aſtoniſhed at a thunder and lightning happened in the inſtant of a battel) ſhewing, that what the heavens did, was that he was doing before their eyes, which marvellouſly ſatisfied them.

Stratagem of Pericles, Polyænus l. 1.

Superſtition makes a thouſand fantaſies to be feared, whereat we might laugh with a little wiſdom. The Egyptians were half dead, when the figure of a huge dragon, which ſometimes of the year was ſhewed them, did not ſeem to look well on them: and the Romans fell in their Courage, when the Cocks which governed their battels did not feed to their liking. Hecatæus an ancient Hiſtorian, telleth that Alexander's whole Army ſtood ſtill to look on a bird, from whence the augur went about to derive ſome preſage, which being ſeen by a Jew, named Moſellan, he drew an arrow out of his quiver, and kil'd it, mocking at the Grecians who expected their deſtiny from a creature which ſo little knew its own. As we laugh at this preſent at theſe fopperies, ſo we ſhould entertain with ſcorn ſo many dreams, and ſuperſtitious obſervations which trouble them enough who make account of them. Wild beaſts, inundation of rivers, productions of mountains big with flames, ſulphur and ſtones, are other cauſes of terrour; nor hath there ever been ſeen any more hideous, then that which happened theſe late years in Italy, in the laſt fireing of Mount Veſuvius, which is excellently deſcribed by F. Julius Recupitus: Then it, there can be nothing ſeen more able to excite terrour, unleſs in an inſtant the bottom of hell were laid open, and all the hideous aſpects of the torments of the damned. Yet it is a ſtrange thing, how among waves of fire which ran on all ſides, clouds of aſhes which appeared like vaſt mountains, continual Earthquakes, counterbuffs of hillocks and of houſes, of Abyſſes, of Gulphs, and of Chaos's; there were people to be found, who yet thought upon their purſes, and took the way towards their houſes to lay hold of their ſlender ſubſtances; which makes us ſee, that there is nothing ſo horrid where the ſoul of man (returned to it ſelf) findeth not ſome leiſure to breathe. The monſters of the Roman Amphitheater, wch in the beginning made the moſt hardy to quake, were in the end deſpiſed by women, who were hired to combat with them. Things not ſeen, which (it ſeems) ſhould moſt trouble the mind, becauſe they are moſt hidden, are alſoin ſome ſort ſurmounted: ſince we read how that many great Anchorets lay in Church-yards infeſted with ghoſts & ſpecters, and about ſolitudes, in forreſts & wilderneſſes the moſt retired, in the midſt of ſo many illuſions of evil ſpirits; as it is written in the the Acts of Saint Anthony, S. Hilarion, and S. Macarius. There is nothing but the day of Judgment, Hell and the punishments of the damned, we should reasonably fear, and not out of visionary scruples, to free us from all fear.

Sect. 4. That the Contemplation of the power, and Bounty of God ought to take away all our fears.

Remedies. The power and providence of God which preserveth us, ought to drive away all our fears.

BUt if these reasons (which I more according to humane nature have deduced) enter not sufficiently into your mind; lift up your thoughts to things divine: and when you have contemplated all the devastation of this passion, learn a little to deplore your misery, which causeth you to fear almost all, except that which is able to deliver you from all fear. Behold, in our first model, the power and providence of God, which are two perfections able to fortifie our weakness, dissipate all our faintness, and encourage all our pusillanimity. The omnipotency of God not only sets free from the surprisals of fear; but assures all which is under its power & protection, to which we voluntarily have submitted. What should he fear; nay what should he not hope, who hath a God for protectour, and a God absolutely powerful? His power, and his essence walk hand in hand, insomuch as power in God is nothing else but the effective Essence of God.

Apud Deum non erit impossibile omne verbum. Luc. 1.

We need not fear, that his jurisdiction is only extended to certain places, since it is without limits, and embraceth all places: That it is limited to a certain number of Ages; since it is eternal and involveth all Time; That it is greater at one time then at another, in that which interiourly concerneth it, because it is immutable: That it looseth any thing of its vivacity in the revolution of so many years; for that it hath an infinite vigour which comprehendeth all the perfections of Essence. As much as the divine understanding can comprehend, so much the divine power can execute. Both have no measure: and both always go in the same proportion; equalling their greatnesses, whilst nothing equalleth their worth. What Abysses, and what treasures of power must He possess, who hath within himself so inexhaustible sources, and such communications, as are in God, who can endlesly communicate himself in the orders of vegetative, sensitive, and intellectual nature; and lastly in grace and glory, where he doth so many wonders, never emptying, nor limiting his virtue. All this great world, where the sun (as some Astrologers say) is an hundred and fourty times greater then the earth, and progresseth in twenty four hours more then twelve millions of leagues; where there are fixed stars which go in the space of an hour more way, then a Horsman could in seventeen hundred, and twenty six years: All the great variety of this Universe (where there are creatures without number, beauties without end, and greatnesses to our eyes immeasurable) is but an effect of his word; He made it with the least blast of his mouth, and with the least breath of his mouth can unmake it, and instead of it build up an infinity of other worlds much greater and more perfect then this. Good God! what say we, when we say God? when we say the power of God? All that is, and moves in nature, actuateth not, but by this predominant power; and should he once draw back an arm, total nature would cease from its operations, and dissolve into nothing. All those vast armies which made ostent to tear down smoking Cities, and dry up seas, to render mountains navigable, to turn the whole course of nature topsie-turvie, were overthrown by the hand of God, who for this purpose made use of Grashoppers and Flyes, which he calleth his Great Forces in the Prophet. It is he who circumvolveth the heavens, who supports the earth, who distendeth the waters, who quickneth the whole world with his fire and his breath, who darkneth the air with tempests, when he pleaseth; who maketh clouds to pour down in deluges, who swalloweth up the fleets of petty Pharaohs, who flyeth upon the Curlings of waves, who inflameth lightnings, and maketh blood and scorpions to rain upon the rebellions of earth. O power of God! what do we say, when we tell your wonders? Is it not sufficient to strike terrour into the wicked, and to occasion confidence in his children; since it hath an eternal alliance with this great providence which governeth the world? For, in a word, we are in his hand, both we, and all our designs, and all our poor providence: as for him he powerfully actuateth from one extremity to another, & sweetly disposeth of all, without any trouble. What assurance would a good soul have if it would attentively consider it self all covered under the wing of God, all looked upon with the eye of the divine Providence which protects Scepters and Crowns, not forgetting the silliest worm of the earth?

It shielded the little Moses under the waves, and the three children in the flame: It likewise shielded all the just, nor doth it ever permit them to suffer, but to derive lights out of their Eclipses, and glory from their torment. If we speak with S. Thomas; we will say, it is the unchangeable rule of all the alteration, in the world: If with S. Denys; it is a fountain which overfloweth from the highest part of the heavens upon the least creatures of the earth: If with Clemens Alexandrinus it is the superintendent of all this great circle which we call the world: If it be the rule; why do we wander from it? If it be the fountain; why do we deprive our selves of its savour? if it be all eye; why do we departs from its lights? Blind that we are, if we forget it, living daily in its bosom, & between its arms; Disloyal, if we forsake it; unnatural, if we betray it.

Prodigious course of some stars.

LEt us cast our eyes upon the second model, and add to these two great Motives which we go about to deduce the example of Jesus, which should serve us for a Bulwark of Adamant against vitious fear. He was the strong of strongs, and the most noble Courage which ever fell into the strongest Ideas of Angels. The holy Scripture likewise calleth him by the name of a man, and a strong man, from his mothers womb. And as heretofore in the sacrifice which was made for the expiation of sins, the old law admitted not any but males; so it was fit to seek out for a man perfectly man, to celebrate this great and eternal sacrifice which was once made, and which is renewed every day for the redemption of the whole world.

The example of our Saviour ought to encourage us against fear.

All Divines and Philosophers agree, that Fortitude, (which properly resisteth fear and pusillanimity) is a courageous and a considerate dealing in great hazards, conjoyned with a patience in great misadventures. For it hath two arms, whereof the one assaileth, and the other supporteth; and the whole extent of its wonders is very aptly contracted within the circle of four vertues, which are Confidency, Constancy, Patience, and Perseverance. For which cause we may truly say, that the champion that combateth in the honourable list of Fortitude, giving giving notable proofs of his courage by every one of these virtues, with reason, election, and intention (which are the conditions required by Saint Thomas) is arrived at the highest period of honour, generously triumphing over all the Images of terrour. Now this it which Jesus Christ did with incomparable transcendencies for our instruction. For first, he would not out of infirmitie of nature, but through a dispose of the sacred oeconomy of our redemption, be assaulted by the most furious object of fear which ever fell into the mind of man; permitting fear to invade the most elate part of his soul, and to surprise it, as in the Sanctuary of the Divinity.

All the greatest subjects of apprehension which ever men the most valorous had, concluded in the loss of a miserable life; and if they did apprehend an evil to come, it ordinarily was the space of some very little time; and when they exposed themselves thereto, it was by fits out of necessity, and with feeble intentions, and interessed in self-love. But if they had the worst in the beginning of the hazards which they confronted, their confidence was quickly changed into Distrust, their Constancy into Levity, their Patience into Fury, and their perseverance into Smoke. These are the vices which we observe in the comportment of Alexanders and Cesars, and of all the valiant men of the earth: but, Jesus, the true Model of valour, gave up for us a life of God, which is no small object of Fear; for, otherwise feareth the Merchant who is fraughted with slight merchandise; otherwise he who carrieth gold, and precious stones. Should a man to do a generous Act hazard all the lives of men, if they might be confined within his heart; he should endanger nought else but a little straw or stubble: but, our Saviour exposeth a life created, rooted in a life increate; which did as much excel all the lives of men, as the sun doth rushes. He exposeth this life, not to common and ordinary torments, or to mean tortures, but he delivered it over to exceeffive pains throughout all the parts of his body, to unheard of scorns, and to exectable cruelties. He contenteth not himself to have once had them in sight a little before his death, but he looks them in the face from the first day of his conception; so soon as his blessed soul is poured into his body, he seeth two abysses, the one of dolorous pains, the other of deep ignominies which he was to undergo in the undertaking of the reparation of the world; There is not a man who had not rather fall once, then to be three dayes only in the Fear one should be in, to see himself upon the point to fall into a precipice; and yet Jesus would live thirty three years in the object of his pains; nay not only of his, but of those which in so long a revolution of ages were to be practised on all the Martyrs who were members of his body.

Gen. 7. Noah seems to have been one of the greatest courages that ever was, since he was chosen out by God among men to sail in a frail vessel in a general deluge, and to sustain the shock of the fatal convulsions of the world; but the Scripture teacheth us that God with his own hand shut the window of the Ark wherein he was enclosed, and that he saw not any of the deaths and disasters which then happened, to the end fear might not take away his life. There is none but Jesus for whom the Curtains are drawn-aside, to whom all the gates of lights and knowledges are opened to let him see the issue of all his labours; He accepteth them with a powerful reason, a full liberty, and most glorious intentions; He entreth into them with a generous confidence: He remains in them with an unshaken constancy, he endures them with an incomparable patience, he persevereth in them with an entire consummation of love, of sufferings, of virtues, and of mysteries; wasting himself, as the victims of the old Law which were to burn all night till morning. So did he burn in this transitory life, until the Aurora of the great Eternity. This true Joshua never laid down the bucklers until he saw the profane City of Ai the City of the wicked) overthrown under his feet, and the Church established in his blood. And that which also raiseth the merit of his magnanimity in all this, is, that in all the greatest terrours and sharpest dolours to which he resigned himself for our sakes; he did all which concerned our instructions with an entire judgment, in a manner deliberate and resolute, and a spirit equal. He prayed moystned with his sweat and blood in the agony of the garden of Olives, he exhorted his disciples, he went out to meet the souldiers, he delivered himself up to Executioners, he gave order for the safety of his Disciples in the peril of his own person, he healed the wounds of his enemies, he gave lessons of virtues, he rendred Oracles of wisdom, he meditated and preached the Cross; and whilst all heaven was troubled over his head, and the earth trembled under his feet, he was immoveable expecting the time of the Consummation ordained by his heavenly Father.

Levit. c. 6. Cremabitur in altari tota nocte usque ad mane.

Josh 8. Locus Cypressus quod in manu ejus contra urbem Ai.

O the greatness of the Combats of Jesus! O the force of the resistances of Jesus! O the Excess! O the Example! shall we not be ashamed, if from the spectacle of his splendours we cast our eyes upon our own pusillanimity? We now-adayes fear all in the world, and fear not the sovereign Master and absolute Governour of the world. All creatures which should be the objects of our contentments, are the subjects of our fears, ever since we made a divorce from the Creatour; it being a matter very reasonable that God make use of all manner of arms to prosecute a fugitive from his providence, who seeks to save himself in a region of nothing.

Dominus exercituum, ipse Pavor vester, & ipse terror vester. Isa. 8.

O poor soul! thou fearest the poverty which thy Jesus hath consecrated in the Crib, and in Clouts: Thou fearest the reproaches which he hath sanctified in the loss of his reputation; thou fearest the dolours which he hath lodged in his virginal flesh: thou fearest death which he overcame for thee: thou fearest the false opinions of the world. And what fearest thou not, since thou dreadest fantasies which are less then the shadow of an hair! There is but one thing which thou fearest not; to lose innocency and sanctity which thou exposest to so many liberties, and alluring occasions; so prodigal thou art of a good which thou hast not. O thou well-beloved of God, although the most ungratefull to the love of God! wilt not thou dress thy wounds? wilt not thou apply some remedies to those vicious fears which gnaw thee and daily devour thee?

Resolution against fear.

Nulla enormitas, nisi quod timemus, non adipiscamur, aut non admittamus, ne amittamus. Aug. q. 33. & 83.

If thou wilt follow my counsel, thy first resolution shall be to regulate the love of thy self, not to have so indulgent, and passionate a care of all things which concern thee, as if thou wert an only one in the species, and that thy death were waited on by the Sepulchre of the world. Thy aim should be to unloose thy self as much as thou maist from so many ties and Dependencies which multiply thy slaveries. Thou must (as it were) live here a life of Nabatheans, which were people of Arabia, who neither planted nor sowed, ed, not built; but by expreſs laws, flew from delicious and fruitful Countries, for fear that riches might ſubjugate them to paſſions and the commands of great ones. But if we cannot come to this heighth; at leaſt let us have our heart well deveſted from theſe ardent affections which we have towards wordly enablements; and behold them as one would an inconſtant moving of ſhadows and ſpirits which glide before our eyes with a ſwift courſe, and which ever move with the ſtep of time and of the Sun; to account as already loſt whatſoever may be loſt; to caſt your immortal cares upon an immortal ſoul, and to place it in the firſt rank of your affections. But if natural love do yet tie us to health, to life, to honour, and to ſlight pleaſures, to the preſervation of our own perſon; to whom ſhould we intruſt all this, but to the Divine Providence, with whom ſo many juſt have depoſited their goods, their reputation, their life, their blood; and have loſt nothing by this confidence, but have tranſmitted their purchaſes and conqueſts to the boſom of eternity? In all which happeneth to us, let us look toward this eye of God which perpetually beholdeth us, this puiſſant hand of God, this amorous direction: Let us behold it as our Pole-ſtar, as our flaming pillar, as our great intelligence which manageth all the treaſures of our life: Let us learn to repoſe us in his boſom, to ſlumber upon his heart, to ſleep between his arms. Upon the firſt accident which befalleth us; let us readily bend our knees in prayer; let us adore the ordinances of our ſoveraign Maſter: Let us behold with a confident countenance all which is happened, or may happen: Let us ſay, God knoweth all this, God permitteth all this, God governeth all this; He loves me as his creature, he wiſheth me well as one who hath given himſelf to him; he can free me from this affliction, if it be his holy will. He is all good, to will it; he is all potent, to do it. Nay, he is all wiſe, to will, and to do, all that which is beſt. Let us not meddle with the great current of his Counſels. He maketh light, in the moſt darky nights, and Havens in the moſt forlorn ſhip-wracks. Were we wish him in the ſhades of death; what ſhould we fear being between the arms of life?

Qui te tibi committit: meliùs te poteſt ſervare qui te potuit, antequam eſſes creare. Aug. ſerm. 8. de verbis Apoſtol.

Secondly, let us not be corrupted by opinions which invade us with a great ſhew of ſpectres and terrours, and make us ſo often to fear things which are not, and which ſhall never be. It is to be too ſoon miſerable, to be ſo before the inſtant: and if we for ſome time muſt be ſo; let us conſider that all the bleſſings, and evils of the world are not great, ſince they cannot long time be great. Let us take away the maſk from theſe fears of Poverty, of Sickneſs, and above all from humane reſpects, as one would from him who goes about to affright children. Why fear we ſo much ſuch and ſuch accidents, which, they who are made of no other fleſh and bones, than we, do daily deſpiſe? The acquaintance with perils hardneth to perils: and there is nothing ſo terrible, as the ignorance of real truths. Laſtly, let us hold for certain, that a great part of our Tranquility dependeth upon our conſcience: Let us ſettle in it repoſe by a good Confeſſion, let us conſtantly undertake the fear of God, who will cure us of all our fears, ſince the Anchor of the floating underſtanding is the Honour of the Divinity.

The tenth Treatiſe, Of BOLDNESS.

Sect. 1. The Picture, and Eſſence of it.

The picture of Boldneſs.

BOldneſs is very well depainted in the boſom of power, ſhewing a heart in its hand, all encompaſſed with ſpirits and flames, its viſage is repleniſhed with confidence, its habit altogether warlike, and countenance undaunted. It looketh upon good all invironed with dangers, as a Roſe among thorns, or as the golden fleece among dragons, and is no whit amazed; But it is on fire to fly through perils, and to beat down all obſtacles which oppoſe its conqueſt. Good hap walketh before it, by its ſides innocency, benignity, ſtrength, experience, and other good qualities which excite courage. The preſence thereof diſſipateth a thouſand petty Fancies which are loſt in the obſcurity of night, not able to endure the ſparkling of its eyes.

Its Eſſence.

All this natively repreſenteth unto us the nature and condition of boldneſs, which is properly an effect of good hope, and a reſolution of courage againſt dangers. It is no wonder, if power hold in its boſom, ſince all the boldneſs a man comes to him from the opinion he conceives to be able enough, not to yield to the accidents which may aſſault him. This heart of fire, in which ſo many vigorous ſpirits ſparkle, is a token of the bold, who commonly have more heat and vivacity; from whence it cometh that young-men have herein more advantage then old, were it not that they drive more aſſurance from ſome other part, then from the weakneſs of their age. The Eye, Port, and Habit ſuitable to warriours make it ſufficiently appear, it is a virtue wholly military; and if it regard good environed with perils, we may thence conclude, it is the proper profeſſion of Boldneſs to haſten to the conqueſt of a good, but of a good very difficult. For it will not gather palms and crowns but in a field watered all over with ſweats. All thoſe virtues which are by its ſides ordinarily ſhew us ſuch as are the boldeſt, as are thoſe, who have their conſcience moſt clear, who are not offenſive; and therefore leſs fear to be offended; who are underpropped by ſome great favour, and namely the protection of heaven; who are well diſpoſed both in mind and body; who have experience of other hazards from which they ſucceſſively have vindicated themſelves, and the good hap which hath alwayes accompanied them. Thoſe aiery fantaſies which fly from Boldneſs, are fears and affrights which are ſcatered by the firſt ray of its eyes.

Sect.

Sect. 2. The Diversity of Boldnesses.

LEt us now more enlarge our thoughts to consider the differences, causes, effects, qualities, and appurtenances of this Passion.

It is hard enough to make a sound judgment of a man truly bold, so many illusions there are of boldness which present themselves to our eyes, and would have us make that to pass for virtue, which is meer crime and stupidity.

There are sottish and bestial boldnesses which proceed from the ignorance of dangers, and which consider not what is good or bad, hurtful or innocent, perilous or safe in humane life.

This it which makes such, as know not what seamasters are, to laugh many times, and to take delight to scoff in occasions which cause pilots, the most experienced to become pale.

This makes little children sport and dally upon the brink of a precipice; that drunkards and fools go together by the ears, hastening to sword, and peril; and that those who walk, and are active in sleep, to scramble upon house-roofs, passover rivers, and precipitate themselves into accidents; able to make the most hardy to tremble. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil costs us very dear: It setteth before our eyes all the extent of our hazards and miseries; it draweth our evils at length; it frames in our thought, that which shall never happen in effect; it armeth our knowledges against our selves; and, as as Basilisks kill themselves by the reverberation of the mirrours they behold; so very often we cause the death of our selves by the reflexion of our lights.

A primo descendit origo mundi confusum series, atque omnia fata laborant si quidquam mutat esse velit. Lucan. l. 6.

There are in the world who have Turkish opinions, and who believe a fatality in our lives, thinking the hour of death is fixed; and that the heighth of rocks, the descent of precipices, squadrons bristled with swords, desarts full of serpents, flames issuing out of the bellies of scorched mountains, all poisons and contagions hasten it not one sole moment: and that on the other side; brazen walls, sentinels full of terrour, fortresses and castles, flights and coverts cannot deferr it one silly instant. This opinion is very contrary to reason, because it taketh from life all discourse and discretion: and were it true; we need not eat nor drink, make use of arms, of garments, of munitions, of counsel, of Industry, of punishment, or of reward; but to let all our actions loose in a general defection, which is wholly impertinent: and yet those maxims help Generals of armies, and are the cause that Turks throw themselves with a brutish boldness into the most dreadful dangers, and suffer themselves to be killed like flies, out of perswasion of this Destiny. It is very true, that God knows the number of our dayes, and that he likewise by his Providence stayeth the course of our years: but on the other part, he obliging us to a reasonable preservation of our selves, if it happen that out of some temerity meerly extravagant we run into an evident danger of death, and that we therein persist; well is our death according to Gods calculation, but the cause is an effect of our folly and presumption, for which God reserveth a chastisement in the other life. So, that such blind boldnesses, being in no sort laudable cannot have any place among actions of virtue.

There are others which are absolutely impudent, and which deserve the title of shamelesness, as are those bold askers who offer up armed supplications, and will have demands the most disadvantageous to be assented unto: as are those also of deceivers and impostors, who readily lie to ensnare the goods of another. They invent a thousand crafty tricks and guileful impostures which they distribute piecemeal, as seriously, as if they were the most confessed truths of all the world. Some who are men of no account, make themselves noble and illustrious, even to the pretending of their being descended from Demygods: others feign riches in picture, and firname themselves from Barronies and Marquisates, which are no more in being then Chymera's and flying stags: others seem valiant like unto Rhodoments, and would willingly say in the tone of Romances: That they have had brave Combats with Rowland, Oliver, and the Knight of the burning sword. Others are bablers, offensive, and seem to be only born to affront men of worth. There you find throats stretched wide, affected countenances, dissolute tongues, crooked fingers, hands exercised in thests and robberies. There are likewise some who go up the gallows with a countenance as confident, as if they had learned no other trade all their life-time, but the practice of this kind of punishment; others blush not at any crime whatsoever, living in a strange prostitution of renown; and pursuing this course, frame to themselves other diabolical Boldnesses of cut-throats, who out of an overflow of enraged furies, dare attempt upon the sacred persons of Kings and Bishops; esteemed nothing to be safe from their mischief, nor impossible to their daring.

All these manners of proceeding are most abominable, and in no sort deserve the title whereof we treat in this discourse, wherein I intend to speak of generous Boldnesses, which are necessary for humane life; and wherein there are some Military, others, Civil, others, Holy and Religious.

Sect. 3. Of laudable Boldness.

IS it not a wonder to behold, that, which is so illustrious in combats, and is the inseparable companion of true valour, to which so many valiant men have in all times made love, sacrificing themselves in so many members to the honour thereof; to be glorified with such crowns by its liberality? It is it which enkindled a brand of fire in the heart of Alexander, and gave him wings to fly into the thickest squadrons of his adversaries: It, which Cæsar looked on, boldly swimming amidst the roaring waves, fearless of the hail-shot of his enemies arrows: It, which sparkled with ardent flames in Attila's eyes, when at the seige of Aquileia, seeing himself all alone unexpectedly set upon by a number of souldiers; he slew some of them in the place with his own hands, and scattered the rest with the lightning flashes which reflected from his face: It, which crowned Pirrhus in two duels: It, which made Constantine appear like a thunderstroke in the battel against Maxentius: It, which animated Scevola, when (left alone in the streights of an Island by the Ebb of the sea, he withstood a whole Army of Barbarians: It, which accompanied Sicinvius in a hundred and twenty pitched battels, and affixed on his body fourty five five wounds, as so many Rubies: It, which caught Cynegirus after his hands were cut off, to lay hold of a vessel of his enemies fleet with his teeth: It, which caused a souldier of the Roman Army seeing himself lifted on high, and born with his armour upon an elephants Trunk, unaffrightedly to strike him with so strong and violent a blow that he made him let go his hold, and alone become victorious over a beast which carrieth turrets and houses on his back. It is more easie to number the stars in the sky, then to keep a register of so many valorous men who have been throughout all ages. Women and Virgins have had a share in glory of this kind among many nations, envying the Laurels which crown the heads of brave Captains. The Scythian Saxametes married not their daughters until they brought the head of an enemy. The Lacedemonian women defeated the army of Aristomenes who had assailed them at a sacrifice, and they massacred them with spits.

Alexander ab Alexandro. Pausanias in Messeniacis.

Lybissa slew seven men in a battel with her own hand. Semiramis was in a Bath, when hearing the news of the rebellion of a Province of her Empire; she speedily hastned thither not taking the leisure to put on her shoes, or dress her; and brought it to obedience. She caused to be graven on a pillar of her tomb, That Nature had made her a woman, but that Valour had equalled her to the most valiant Captains; that she had made rivers to run along according to the current of her liking, and her likings, by the course of Reason; that she had peopled desart lands, hewed with the sword through rocks, with silver-sowed fields which were unknown but to salvage beasts, and that amidst all her affairs she ever had time for her self, and for her friends.

Æneas Sylvius in historia Bohemix.

Herodot.

In the fore-going Age in the wars of Hungary, we read of a young Christian woman at the siege of Agria, who with her mother and husband fought against the Turks, and the husband being slain, the mother advised her daughter to retire, and to interr the body of her dear spouse. But the valorous Amazon having answered, It was no time for funerals, took the sword of her dead husband, thrust her self into the thickest of the troops, killed three Turks with her own hand, and in the end bare away the body of her wel-beloved on her shoulders in despite of so many enemies, who ceased not to shoot at her. What may one add to this Military Boldnes? Do we not daily see examples of it in our French Nobility, who fight upon occasions, as if every man had a hundred bodies to lose?

Ascanius Contorius lib. 5. Bellar. Transylvan.

There is another, which hath place in civil life, and which maketh men bold in conversation, forward in affairs, courageous in occasions, and patient in adversity. Many who have not this great heart, are content to be eternally what they are, and do cultivate a little life within the limits of modesty. But others breath nothing but businesses, but bargains, but forreign commerces, but sea-voyages; fearing neither storms nor shipwracks. When this hardiness meets with great States-men, it maketh them pillars of Adamant, which a thousand countrebuffs cannot shake. All the malice which is in corrupt minds, impiety in profane, inventions in the factious, daring in the insolent, terrour in the potent, threats in the passionate, and cruelty in the bloody, doth not make them go back one step. They think with wisdom, they speak with liberty, they act with courage; nor have they any other fortune in their heads but the law, other life but innocency, other aim but truth, other reward then glory. Of this temper was the magnanimous Papinian, (the honour of Lawyers) to whom the Emperour Severus, dying, recommended his two sons with the government of the Empire. But the impious Caracalla having embrewed his hands in the blood of his own brother Geta, and desirous this great man should set some Colour by his eloquence before the Senate & People upon an action so barbarous; he freely answered him, it was more easie to commit a paricide then to justifie it, uttering this truth to the prejudice of his head which this wretched Prince caused to be cut off, and which the posterity of great men hath honoured with immortal Crowns. Of the like constancy was Aristides the Locrian, in the Court of Dionysius King of Sicily, who would have married one of his daughters, but the father stoutly answered, he had rather see her in her sepulchre, then in the bed of a tyrant; which cost him the life of his children: nor for all this did he repent him of his free Boldnes. Such also was the great Oratour Lycurgus who managed the affairs of the Athenian Common-wealth, with such equity and constancy, that, being ready to die, he caused himself to be carried to the Senate to give an account of all the actions of his life; and to satisfie all those whom he might have offended in his Government: but such a life, instead of stains, had nought but palms and lights. To this may be joyned the boldnes of Saints, who have so often defended the truth with the peril of their life against the rage of tyrants: as, that of S. Athanasius, against the Emperour Constantius: That of S. Ambrose, against Maximus: That, of S. Chrysostom, against Eudoxia: That, of S. Basil, against Valens: Of S. Stanislaus, against Boleslaus: Of S. Thomas, against Henry King of England. With this, a million of Religious are to be found who have undergone, and do daily undergo the labours of Giants, who forsake the smiling favours of their native soil, to go into places, whither it seems nature hath been afraid to come. Thither they pass through an infinity of dangers, tempests, and monsters; there they live in forlorn wildernesses, among tombs of ice and snow; there they feed upon that, which, to the curious and nice, would be a death to taste. All sweetness and pleasures of humane life are thence banished; rigours, toils, and miseries there perpetually reign; their eyes see none but barbarous visages, their ears hear nought but outcries and yells, their taste finds only bitterness, their travels nought but thorns, their repose but torment, life but anxiety, and death very often a tomb of water. And yet holy Boldnes reserveth to it self courages which it leadeth forth, as it seems, beyond the sun, time, and seasons, to conquer souls to God. Must we not say, this passion is infinitely generous, & that it mounted to a height of virtue almost prodigious?

Notable Boldness: Spartanus.

Voyages of Canada and the Indies.

All are not created to come to the most eminent degree of its excellencies; Nature must therein have a part: and verily in my opinion, the divine Providence prepareth bodies greatly adapted to those daring souls which in them he resolveth to enclose.

Their temperature is hot, their heart little in bulk, but a true furnace of heat, the members well composed, the speech strong, and the arm sturdy. Education and Custom create another nature, which hath alwayes been observed to be extremely necessary in the children which are to be trained up to valour. Those people of India must in some sort be imitated, who set them on the backs of certain great birds to carry them in the air, whereat these little Cavaliers are at first astonished, but in the end, they so fashion themselves thereto, that they despise all other peril. The Romans daily made them to see lions and elephants in the Amphitheatre, and the blood of sword-players shed almost as ordinarily as wine; others lead them out to the sea, among monsters and tempests; others practiced them to Combats, where they quickly learn'd the art of giving and receiving wounds, and to beat men down. David, Theseus, and Brasidas, began the profession of war very young. The son of King Tarquin, at the age of fourteen years, slew an enemy with his own hand. Scipio saved his father in the confusion of a battel, being then but seventeen years old. Probus was without a beard when he was made Tribune in the Army. Alboinus very young, in duel, vanquished the son of Thorismund King of the Gepides; which was the cause that his father, who before bred him among his servants, did set him at his own table.

Cranz. l. 3. Dania.

Study lessneth not courage.

Some think that study and learning are very much opposite to military Boldness; and it is very little to be doubted (if it be excessively pursued in the vigour of years, which are proper for the exercise of arms) but that it will endanger mens Courages to become timorous. But it is of infinite use for Princes and young Gentlemen, who are to be disposed to actions the most elate. For by a laudable temperature it sweeteneth all that, which a warlike humour might have contracted of roughness and incivility; it awakeneth wisdom, it enlightneth counsel, it renders Boldness intelligent and magnanimous; it polisheth the tongue; it gives authority in charges, grace in conversation, invention in the cabinet, Honour among the wise, and glory with Posterity.

Nec nisi bis imperat, nec pro successu timidus festinavit mori, sine ratione medium metuis nosse habenis. Claudian.

After nature and education; to become bold, he must be sensible of Honour, which enkindleth the most timorous; he must vigorously exercise himself in the toils of Military Discipline, and the practice of brave pieces of service; he must not be either vaunting, scoffing, captious, or offensive; but prudent, reserved, active, and laborious; he must very little fasten his affections upon things of the earth, compose himself to the contempt of death, make account one is not born but to die for his Prince & Countrey, and to esteem no life in the world more precious then Glory.

Sect. 4. That true Boldness is inspired by God, and that we must wholly depend on him to become bold.

Why Boldness is not in God.

But besides this, to raise ones self to something more excellent, we must look upon the divine virtues which ought to be the perpetual sources of ours. But if you now ask me wherein we may be aided by our first model, to acquire Boldness; I do not affirm we may properly say, that Boldness is in God, because this passion is essentially conjoyned to a regard it hath towards a thing very difficult and encompassed with dangers. Now we know, that nothing can be difficult or dangerous before God, by reason of his sovereign power and most accomplished felicity. God (to speak perspicuously) can neither be timorous nor bold, but it is he who makes all those who are truly bold within the limits and lists of virtue. Certainly Aristotle saw much, when he said, that the most bold were such as were most in Gods favour.

Aristot. 2. Rhetor. Audaciam esse quæ ratio se habeat ad divina.

I will make good this proposition in the first part of this discourse, and shew a most manifest reason, which teacheth us, that every able man considering what he is, cannot be hardy of himself, by reason of the incapacity and weakness of humane nature, and therefore we must say, that if he have some boldness, it necessarily comes to him from above.

Seven things able to humble a man. Apulei de Demonio Socratis. Homo levi, & cassa umbra pronus & obnoxius corpore fœ similis erroribus, dissimilis moribus, cassis laboribus, fortunæ vanissimus, nullâ sapientiâ, cita morte.

The Platonists said, there are seven things able much to humble a man; the First whereof, is, that his spirit is captive, thorny, and light. Secondly, that his body is brutish, and extremely exposed to all the injuries and impressions of exteriour violencies. Thirdly, that being so inconstant in his manners, he commonly is very constant in his errours. Fourthly, that his endeavours are infinitely vain, and that many times being ready to enter into his tomb (when he comes to behold and consider his whole life already past) he finds it to be full of spiders webs which he with much labour and industry hath spun, but not to purpose. Fifthly, that his fortune is of glass, and many times catcheth a crack when its most resplendent. Sixthly, that if he find wisdom amidst so many errours, it is but too late, and when he scarcely hath time left to use it. The seventh, that wisdom coming so slowly death fails not to make haste, and to surprise a man, when his heart is embroiled with divers designs, and with certain knowledges of having done ill, with uncertainty of doing better. Besides Reason, doth not the Scripture in many places teach the weakness of man, and the necessity he hath of divine succor for his subsistence? Behold, you are but a nothing, and all your works are as if they were not. Man is the very image of vanity, and a sherd of an earthen pot; Hay, that withers at the first rising of the hot sun. The name of God, is a strong and most assured tower, the just shall there have their refuge, and there shall be exalted. Isa. 41. Psal. 143. Isa. 45. Jacob. Prov. 18.

Hence we see, how, all those who have appeared in the world with some eminency have ever had some particular favours from heaven to authorize their actions, and to make men believe, they had somewhat above man. So Moses, Joshuah, Deborah, Gideon, Samson, David, Solomon, and so many others sent by God for the government of his people came with certain characters of his Divinity, which gave them an admirable confidence, and framed in their souls notable perswasions of their own abilities. And it is a thing very remarkable, that such as were not in the way of true Religion, and who consequently could not have those assistances and singular protections from heaven, sought at the least to fortifie themselves with some semblances. All which filled Alexander with Boldness, was, that they had perswaded him he was of Divine extraction, and that this belief had seized on the souls of the credulous people which was the cause that he was looked on as a man wholly celestial, destinated to the Empire of the world.

A notable observation of Pyrrhus.

It is thought that Pyrrhus who imitated him, shewed his teeth in great secret to his friends; on the upper row whereof the word ΑΙΑΣ was engraven, and on the lower, ΑΧΙΛΛΕΥΣ; as much as to say, He was a King as generous as a lion: but that which most made this Elogy good, was, that these letters were thought to be formed by a Divine hand, to give a testimony from heaven heaven of the greatneſs of this Monarch: And this being ſpread among the people, it made them to expect prodigious things from him. Auguſtus Cæſar, who changed the face of the Common-wealth into Empire, mounted on the Throne of the Univerſe by the ſame means. For it is ſaid, that his father Octavius whilſt he ſacrificed in a wood, having ſhed a little wine on the altar, there came a flame from it which flew up to heaven, whereon the Augur foretold him, he ſhould have a ſon who ſhould be Emperour of the world. It is added, that this Prince, being yet very young, in his child-hood, played with Eagles, and made Frogs to ceaſe their croaking by a ſilly command; and that as he entred into Rome after the death of Julius Cæſar, the Sun was encompaſſed with a Rainbow, as a preſage of the great Peace he ſhould produce in the Roman Empire. Veſpatian had never dared to aſpire to the Empire, without the favour of preſages, and namely of that which happened to him on Mount Carmel, when ſacrificing in the ſame place, and being in a great perplexity of mind, what reſolution he ſhould make in this affair; the Prieſt bad him to be of good courage, and the ſecret hopes of his heart ſhould have very good ſucceſs. The world hath not been content to afford theſe favours to men alone, but it hath alſo given it to famous places. Rome, for good lucks ſake, was termed, among other titles, Valence, by the name of Valour; and Cephale, as much as to ſay (Head) to ſhew it ſhould be the Head of the world. Preſently alſo it was flattered with the opinion of its Eternity, ſo that many termed it the Eternal City, which was the cauſe that the Romans in their greateſt deſolations would never forſake the place.

It appears out of all this, that men having not the power to be ignorant of their own weakneſſes, never think themſelves ſtrong enough, if they have not ſome (I know not what) of Divinity; wherefore we muſt conclude, that the true means to have a generous & ſolid boldneſs, is to be well with God, and to tie ones ſelf to this moſt pure ſpirit by purity of heart; for if a little opinion of Divine favour ſo much encouraged Kings and people, what will not the teſtimony of a good Conſcience do?

The moſt bold are ſuch as have a clear conſcience.

What aſſurance can one have in perils, when after he hath committed ſome crime, he feeleth a little Executioner in his heart with pincets and hooks of iron? Contrariwiſe, a good Conſcience is well compared by S. Baſil to that little Kell which environeth the heart, and which continually refreſheth it with its wholeſom waters; to ſignifie unto us that the heart of a good man abides in perpetual ſolace, which among dangers preſerveth it from diſturbances. I ask you, with what aſſurance ſtood the good Malchus with his holy wife at the entrance of the lions den, when of one ſide the glittering ſword was preſented them, and on the other, they heard thoſe ſalvage beaſts to roar, and they notwithſtanding remained immoveable? With what arms? but with thoſe which S. Hierom gives them, when he ſaith; They were encompaſſed as with a ſtrong wall, which they found in the teſtimony of their innocency, whereof they were moſt certain. With what confidence went S. Macarius to lie in the ſepulchres of Pagans, and (wholly fearleſs himſelf) to ſtrike terrour into the ſpirits of the damned! was it not the aſſurance of his holy life which furniſhed his heart with all this reſolution? And ſhall we then doubt but that the true means to be repleniſhed with a holy Courage, is, to ſet the conſcience in good order, and to make entire Confeſſion of ſins to preſerve ones ſelf afterward, in all poſſible purity, from our infirmities?

Sect. 5. That Jeſus hath given us many Pledges of a ſublime Confidence to ſtrengthen our Courage.

Jeſus Chriſt acquired us Boldneſs by his fear.

LEt us next contemplate our ſecond Model, and conſider a thing very remarkable, which is, that Jeſus Chriſt, who putteth us into a holy dread by the conſideration of his greatneſs, hath acquired us boldneſs by his proper fear. Theſe are the words of great S. Leo. I have borrowed fear from thee, and, I have furniſhed thee with my confidence. He expreſly would admit the agony of Mount Olivet in his ſacred Humanity, to encourage our puſilanimity; that we in mildneſs being Lambs, might become Lions by courage: and this is the courſe he hath obſerved in all his actions in this great contexture of pains and dolours, of puniſhments and glory. He deſcended from heaven like a rich Merchant laden with great treaſures, he came to lodge in a wretched cottage among mortals, whom he held for his brethren. He was charmed with a love ſo powerful, and entranced in a manner ſo prodigious, that he made a change, admirable to all the world; taking upon him our infirmities to give us ſtrength; our affronts, to conferr his dignity upon us; our wounds, to beſtow his health on us.

S. Leo hom. de Paſſ.

Chriſtus voluit ſuſcipere infirmitates noſtras, & ſuas nobis conferre virtutes, humana, quærere, præſtare divina, accipere injurias, reddere dignitates: quis mirabilius qui non ferit infirmitates, curare neſcit. Chryſol. ſerm. 150.

When I here below behold a man, well may I have ſome ſmall impreſſion of his example, but I thereby become not enriched with his merit. Now Jeſus hath this property, that beſides the benefit of the celeſtial Doctrine which he communicateth to us, beſides that of example (which is infinitely raviſhing) he maketh in us, under the title of Adoption, a powerful infuſion of his Graces. He continually poureth his virtue on ſouls who are in the poſſeſſion of Juſtifying Grace: as the head on the reſt of the members, and as the root of the vine ſendeth nouriſhment to all the branches which depend upon it. He is our Aaron, who (as it is ſaid in the Book of Wiſdom) is crowned with veſſels of virtue, ſince the treaſure of his merits are ſo many veſſels of ſanctity, which flow over the whole maſs of mankind.

Note, that he communicated to us three Pledges of his ineſtimable Love, to give us confidence; that is to ſay, his Name his Croſs, and the Sacrament of his Body and his Blood. Good God! What daſtardlineſs would not be animated, and what courage not raiſed in the preſence of three ſo much to be adored Aſſiſtances? The name of Jeſus is the Name of Names which we ſhould grave on our fore-heads, as the character of our Chriſtianity, and the aſſurance of our ſalvation againſt all hoſtilities. This is the Name, which the high Prieſt of the Jews bare on his Myter. It is the name, in ſight of which, Alexander, when he went out to beſiege Jeruſalem, became a lamb of an enraged lion, breaking all his choler at the feet of a Prieſt, as waves are daſhed againſt

The admirable effects of the Cross of Jesus Christ.

And what shall I say of the Cross, and of this Royal Standard of the Monarch of Monarchs, said the voice of heaven to Constantine. It is he under whom so many brave Collonels of Christian souldiery have flown from one pole to another as Eagles, fain like tempests upon the armies of Sarazens, cut like keen razours, consumed as with coals all powers opposed against Christianity. How often hath this sign lifted up dejected Courages? How often hath it thrown terrour among legions of Infidels? How often hath it driven away Devils? On this wood, God established his Throne. Jesus Christ (as saith S. Augustine) fought with his Cross. He by it, defeated the Kings and Monarchs of the earth; and having gloriously overthrown them, hath made them to carry the Cross on their fore-heads. O how unhappy be we if we resemble vipers who bear the Cross, but, hidden under their jaws! It is to do like the brood of vipers, to blush at the Cross, and to be ashamed at the venerable scorns of the Passion of our Saviour. But it is our work to bear it in sight of all the world, and to regard it as the sign of our Redemption, and the harness of our protection.

The courage we may derive from the help of the holy Sacrament of the Altar.

What shall we not do with it, and with this adorable Sacrament of the Altar, which maketh us present with God, and God so present to us? Is it not from thence, that so many Saints have gone forth as lions casting fire and flames out of their mouths? as (saith S. John Chrysostom) The learned S. Gregory of Tours teacheth us, that antiently the holy Eucharist was kept in Churches in a little tower of silver. In my opinion, to signifie, that this pledge of the love of God, is a fortress inexpugnable, against the assaults of our enemies, That is it, which at all times fortified Virgins against the ardours of Concupiscence and the importunities of carnal lovers who would have bereaved them of their honour. That, which made Martyrs run to flames and wheels, as others, to delights. That, which made them to look with alacrity upon their streaming blood, and to hold it more precious then oriental pearls.

An excellent observation of S. Gregory.

Numb. 33.

The Scripture telleth us, that the Children of Israel being departed from Marah (as much as to say a place of Bitterness) arrived at Elim, where they found twelve Fountains and seventy Palms. And I must tell you, that when, after mortification of the flesh, the afflictions of the world, the fears of so many accidents which menace us, we come to this divine Sacrament; there we meet with fountains which stream from the wounds of our Saviour; there we gather palms and victories, numberless. Who then would not learn holy Boldness in the school of Jesus Christ? But alas! It often happens that instead of profiting in so good a school, and in the Doctrine of so great a Master; we are bold for the world, and timorous in the affairs of God. What a prodigy is it to see now adayes so many who are only bold, to do ill? If a falshood be to be averred, if a wretched maid to be debaushed, if a revenge to be put forward, even to the effusion of humane blood, if lawful Powers to be resisted, if laws both Divine and Humane to be spoken against; there Boldness and Confidence appeareth. But what say I? Confidence? yea, Impudency, fomented by the mildness of laws and impunity of so many crimes. But, in undertakings made for God, we have hearts of wax, and souls trembling like leaves under the breath of winds.

O detestable Boldness! which art not born but to serve as an instrument to mischief; dost thou not know, there is no assured power against God, who in the twinkling of an eye overthroweth the children and race of Titanians? O senseless man! canst thou not be bold, but from the presumption of thy strength? And hast not thou yet learned, that the things, which according to the opinion of the world, are most strong, are confounded by the weakest? Lions have been fed upon by flies, and wretched rust wasteth the hardest metals. If we must be bold; let it be in things honest; let it be for virtue; for verity; for Gods cause. Should the heavens fall in thunder-claps upon our heads, their ruins have not power to astonish a mind courageous. Turn a square stone which way you will, it ever stands immoveable upon the solidity of its Basis, said S. Augustine. One would have me do an ill act, and if I consent not thereto, I am threatned with the loss of a suit, of a ruine, of my affairs, and with poverty, the worst scourge of all. Let my enemies vomit forth all their rage on me, they cannot make me poorer then I was when I was born. I came not into the world glittering with precious stones, and it was not gold which instead of blood ran up and down my veins; let poverty come against me with all the train of its terrours. When I behold on the Cross a God all naked, who in his nakedness giveth all things; I say, we should account it a glorie to die poor, for a God so despoiled. They threaten me with banishment; the Spirit of God teacheth me not to care what land be under my feet, when my eyes are fixed on heaven, and on the most blessed repose of the living which concludeth all evils in a beatude infinite.

Si tellus illabatur orbis impavidum ferient ruinæ: Quadratum lapidem quo vertis stat. Aug. in Psal. 86.

We must fear nothing in the world, to the prejudice of our soul.

They threaten me with imprisonment, fetters, gibbets, and death, the terrible of terribles. I expect not till it fall on me. I look on it afar off with an eye strucken with the first rays of felicity. What can death take from me but a miserable carkass subject to a thousand deaths, but a life of pismires and flies? And what can it bring unto me, but a cessation from so many relapsing actions, and from a wretched embroilment, which every day endeth, not, but to begin again? O how little are all things mortal, with him who looks on a God immortal! I will walk in the shades of death with a firm footing, and a confident countenance, since it cannot separate me from the source of Lives.

The

The eleventh Treatiſe, Of SHAMEFAC'TNESS.

Sect. 1. The Decency of Shamefac'tneſs, its Nature and Definition.

Shamefac'tneſs a very reaſonable Paſſion.

SHamefac'tneſs is a humane Paſſion, more reaſonable then the reſt: becauſe (being properly A fear of Diſhonour) it makes diſtinction between that which is decent or undecent; laudable or blame-worthy; glorious or infamous; which appertaineth to the Court-hall of Judgment and Reaſon: It hath this priviledge, that it takes its Origen from two very eminent ſources; which are Conſcience and Honour: ſeeing the things which cauſe ſhame in us, are ordinarily vitious, or naught in the common underſtanding of men.

Its ſources, honour, and conſcience.

1 Part. q. 80. Conſcience (which, according to S. Thomas, is a naturall habitude that exciteth us to good, and maketh us to diſapprove evil) inſenſibly ſtirreth in us ſhame ſo ſoon as any of our thoughts, actions, or words tranſgreſs its laws. Honour, on the other ſide, caſts forth a ray from the circuit of its glory which viſibly figureth unto us the blemiſhes that darken its beauty. The love of Reputation is powerfull. It ſeems to be ſome Atome of Divinity which enters into hearts the moſt generous, makes men very deſirous to be wel-eſteemed, thinking by this means to lead a pleaſing life in the mindes of many: which is much more prized then the life of bodies, ſeeing there are ſome who daily ſacrifice themſelves for Punctillio's of Honour, to bloudy deaths, in the moſt exalted heighth of their proſperity. This reputation pompouſly marcheth before Conquerours, and cauſeth a million of Trumpets to be ſounded to make them famous: It cultivateth the verdant Laurels of great Captains: It encourageth the moſt heartleſs ſouldiers to Combat: It cheriſheth the learned, and ſweetneth the toils of their pens: It awakneth arts: it raiſeth the moſt excellent Ladies, as it were, on the wing of glory, by ſingular praiſes of their chaſtity: It entreth into places the moſt infamous, as the ray of the Sun into a puddle, and makes even thoſe who have renounced Honour ſtill to ſeek ſome rag of Renown to cover their reproach. S. Auguſtine ſaith, men are ſo ready to make themſelves be known, that thoſe who cannot be known for their goodneſs, make themſelves many times to be talked of for their wickedneſs, as if they thought, it were as good to be nothing as to ſee themſelves deprived of the knowledge of the living. S. Ambroſe ſaith admirably well, I am not ſo great a man, as to be ſatisfied with my own Conſcience. I have this infirmity that I cannot endure the leaſt ſtain of ſhame without waſhing it off. This is the cauſe, that the whole world endeavoureth to preſerve for it ſelf (as much as it can) an inviolable eſtimation among ſo many different opinions of judgments, paſſions, favours, diſgraces, intereſts, and revolutions of the world. Manners (ſaith S. Bernard) have their colours, and their odours, which are good examples. So ſoon as Reputation is wounded by the object of ſome diſhonour; the ſoul is moved, all the bloud is ſtirred, ſpreading it ſelf over the face with a ruddineſs, as if it proceeded from this wound. It is a favour from heaven, when we have our ſenſes tender in this kind: and I finde the antient Orator Demades ſpake right, when he ſaid, Shamefac'tneſs was the Citadel of beauty and virtue. Likewiſe, the Oracle of Doctours, S. Auguſtine writeth, that a more acceptable ſacrifice we cannot give to devils, then to offer them up our Shamefac'tneſs; for ſo much as if that be once extinct, there remains nothing but to expect a general inundation of all wickedneſs.

The love of reputation is a ſtrong ſpurr.

Sect. 2. Divers kinds of Shamefac'tneſs.

NOw we muſt here obſerve, that there are many kinds of Shamefac'tneſs, one whereof is Holy, the other Humane, and the third Evil. I ſay, a holy Shamefac'tneſs (as that which being a moſt faithfull companion of Chaſtity) cannot endure the leaſt thing contrary to this holy virtue, but that it becomes much intereſſed therein. This moſt evidently appeareth in ſo many good men, in ſo many virtuous women, and chaſte Virgins who cannot hear an unchaſte word but that it fixeth a wound in their hearts. Tertullian ſaid, Virgins ſhould bluſh even at the good they poſſeſſed; meaning, that albeit their virginal body bear nothing upon it but the characters of honour: yet ought they not to permit the view of their beauty, as a pillage, to curious eyes, fearing leaſt every glance might ſteal away ſome tender bloſſome of amiable Virginity. There are ſome who eaſily bluſh at the approach of another ſex, and at words too freely ſpoken, not that they feel themſelves guilty of any thing; but out of a naturall ſhamefac'tneſs, which cannot ſuffer the leaſt thought of things reproachfull: and many times alſo out of the fear they have to be ſuſpected in matters, of which they in conſcience have no remorſe. This is a ſign of a good ſoul, and it is neceſſary for ſuch an one as will preſerve a chaſtity inviolable; to avoid the leaſt approaches, and all which may prejudice Decorum. Libanius an excellent Orator obſerveth, that a Painter one day deſirous to paint Apollo upon a board of Laurel, the colours ſeemed to be rejected, and could not be laid thereon. Out of which, this curious wit invented an excellent rarity, ſaying, That the chaſte Daphne (who according to the fiction of the Poets was turned into a Laurel-tree, flying from Apollo who would diſhonour her) could not endure him, yea, even in painting; although ſhe now was nought elſe, but a piece of inſenſible wood. Whereupon we may infer, that chaſt bodies fear the leaſt images and reſemblances of impurity, and do, even beyond a Tomb, preſerve ſome ſence of integrity. It is read in the life of S. Epiphanius, that he gave a kick with his foot, after his death, at a curious man who looked too near upon him. And we alſo ſee many who expreſly by their will forbid themſelves to be opened, and to have their entrails pried into by diſſections, which ſomewhat favours of inhumanity. We muſt not be too curious in theſe matters, when we make no profeſſion of them. For, ſometimes many maids are more knowing before marriage, then is requiſite for chaſtity. Marcia daughter of Varro, who was one of the rareſt wits of her time, was skilful in all arts, yea, even in Painting; but never would ſhe paint naked ked men, leſt ſhe might offend modeſty. Is it not a brave ſight to behold a Chriſtian, whoſe bloud flyeth up into his face when he heareth blaſphemies vomitted forth againſt God, as a good ſon would bluſh when the aſhes of his father were defamed! What a goodly thing is it to ſee a vice rejected, which, a diſſolute brazen-face, or a confident corrupt ſpirit ſuggeſteth to a young tender ſoul of an Angelical ſhamefac'tneſs, that draweth bloud from the face, and makes uſe of this vermillion as of myſterious ink, to write down the condemnation of diſhonour!

Humane and intereſſed ſhamefac'tneſs.

The ſecond kind of ſhamefac'tneſs is much more humane, and more intereſſed, which is daily obſerved in a thouſand occaſions in the world, when one bluſheth, out of an apprehenſion of incurring ſome blemiſh of a good reputation, in what concerneth Extraction, Body, Wit, Profeſſion, Integrity, Virtue, Condition, and eſtate. Some are much vexed at their own birth, and when they ſee themſelves raiſed to ſome degree of honour, they are aſhamed that their enemies reproach them with the baſeneſs of their beginning; but, they ſhould remember, that Birth is a buſineſs whereunto they are not called; that it is no more in our power then are the ſtars and the winds; and that many great perſonages have boaſted they have mounted higher by Virtue, then their Anceſtours had deſcended by the obſcurity of their extraction.

Obſcurity of birth in great perſonages.

Porus the Monarch of the Indies was the ſon of a Barber: Bradyllus Prince of the Sclavonians, of a Collier: Ortagoras Duke of the Sicyonians, of a Cook: Agathocles King of Sicily, of a Potter: and yet they gloried to have made a large way to greatneſs for themſelves from the recommendation of their valour. Primiſlaus, come from the condition of a peaſant to principallity, cauſed his old homely rags to be kept, that he might ſometimes look on them. The Arch-biſhop Villegeſius ſon of a Carter, commanded wheels to be painted all over his Scutcheons of Arms. There are none but inferiour hearts which are offended with Gods counſels, who is the diſtributour of Glory. Others are confounded for deformities of body, as he, of whom Chryſippus ſpeaketh, who was extreamely diſcontented that he was called Sea-Ram: and Bruec. de conſtantia ſapientis.

Shame of ſcoffing.

Cornelius who wept in full Senate for being compared to a bald Oſtritch: but this tenderneſs of apprehenſion proceeded from over-much prizing the body, which is but a dunghill, even in thoſe who are moſt reſplendent in beauty. We ſhould prevent ſuch a ſcoff upon ſo ſlight occaſions, and to take the word out of their mouth, as Vatinius, a man much miſhapen, who mocked ſo long at his own throat and legs, that he in concluſion left nothing for Cicero to declaim againſt. Others love not to have their age talked of, as if that, which is to be deſired, were a crime. Others muſt not be ſeen in a mean habit, as if they were much greater then Adam and Eve, who in the beginning of the world were cloathed only with leaves and skins. Others are infinitely apprehenſive to ſeem poor, not conſidering that by hiding poverty, they reproach themſelves, and condemn Jeſus Chriſt, who ſpread it over the Crib, as on a Throne of Honour.

Others are dejected with deep melancholy, to ſee themſelves deſpiſed in parts of Wit, Judgment, Underſtanding, Capacity, Induſtry, and Dexterity in matters, whereof they make profeſſion, and wherein they think to excell; namely, when this contempt is offered in company before men of reputation, whoſe good opinion they affect, before their competitours, their corrivals, their enemies, who take a direfull comfort in their confuſion. Then is the time when one ſinketh into the bottom of diſhonour, and when ſhamefac'tneſs covers all the face over. Cronus was ſo abaſhed, that he was not able to ſolve a Sophiſme at King Ptolomy's Table, that he died with diſcontent. A Polonian Prince ſtrangled himſelf upon an oppreſſion of Ignominy, ſeeing Boleſlaus the Third, who was his King, had ſent him a Hares-skin with a diſtaff, to upbraid him with his Cowardiſe in a battel againſt the Muſcovites. But we muſt ſay truly, that all this proceedeth from an enraged deſire of punctilio's of honour which ought never, to ſuch extremity, take root in the ſoul of a Chriſtian.

The ſtrange ſhame of contempt. Laertius. Cromerus lib. 6.

Laſtly, there be who are touched with ſome ſhame for vices, not thoſe which they know do diſpleaſe God, but for ſuch as are accounted ignominious in the opinion of men: as to be a Villain, a Miſer, a Lier, a Traytour, Falſifier, an Impoſtour, a Thief, Unjuſt, Ungratefull, Baſe, and exorbitant in the exceſs of bodily vices, eſpecially when thoſe exorbitances are waited on by ſhamefull puniſhments and publick infamy. All this is able to confound one one who hath any feeling of honour; but if ſhame happen for ſin, it muſt be driven away by virtue; nay, it is much better to take ſhame, then to be taken by it; for the one flyeth the ſin before it be committed, and the other bluſheth to have committed it. There are others to be found who make a little account of grievous ſins, with which they defile their conſciences, and diſhonour their reputation: But if there be any blemiſh, or ſome ſuſpicion concerning the honour of their wife, that thruſts them into deſpair: as it happened to Valerius a man of eminent quality, who was wounded with the moſt ſenſible arrow that ever he received, when the Emperour Caligula reproached him at his Table, and in the preſence of many, with ſome ſecret defects which he ſaid were on his wives body, which was indeed to publiſh an Adultery, and the contempt of a Lord one of his deareſt friends, and of a man of his own nature, fierce enough to take revenge, as it happened a while after, when the inſolencies of this miſerable Prince bare him to a violent and a direfull death.

Seneca de conſtantia ſapientis.

Let us conclude with a third ſort of ſhamefac'tneſs, which is abſolutely bad, and blame-worthy, when one bluſheth for Devotion, for Chaſtity, for Temperance, and other Virtues, which are not accounted of in the ſouls of Libertines and diſſolute people. How many are there, who, to comply with ill company, attribute ſins to themſelves which they never committed, and vaunt imaginary vices, as if there were no Hell for them, but in picture? Others had rather be found in an ill place, then to be often ſeen at the feet of a Prieſt, or at the Communion-Table, in a time when great ſpirits accuſtome not to obſerve Chriſtian duties. They fear leaſt the reputation of being devout may draw along with it ſome ſuſpicion of weakneſs: they are troubled, that nature hath not made them impudent enough, to ſhake off the ſtings of a good Conſcience. It is a monſtrous ſhame to betray ſo good a Miſtriſs as Virtue, and to eſteem the ſervices ignominious which are done her. They who adulterate metals, and poiſon the ſources of lively fountains do leſs ill, then ſuch as corrupt the pure lights of the apprehenſions we ought to have out of virtue. But, although it be many times ill to be ſhamefac't;

shamefac'tnesse, yet there is not any thing more intolerable then to be impudent: for, that is it which putteth all vice into authority, and all the noblest actions into a base and bad esteem.

Sect. 3. The excellency of Shamefac'tnesse, and the ugliness of impudency.

A notable observation of Clemens Alexandr. 2. Strom.

I Have alwayes made great account of a Curious note of Clemens Alexandrinus, who observeth, that at Diospolis a City of Egypt, on the gate of a Temple named Pylon, were seen five figures: To wit, of a child, of an old man, a Hawk, a Fish, and of a Crocodile: A child, to signifie Birth; an old man, to denote death; a Hawk, to represent the eye of God; a Fish, to be the Hierogliphick of Hatred; and the Crocodile of Impudency. And this excellent Authour addeth, that these five statues onely meant this sentence, O you who are born, and shall die, Know, God hateth impudency.

Plato de Republ.

Shamefac'tnesse hath been so recommended by all Antiquity, that when one would praise a man of honour by a most special title, he was called a Man of shamefac'tnesse, as we see in ancient styles; and contrariwise, to name a man impudent, were to qualifie him with the titles of all vices. The Scripture, which is admirable in representing to the life the propriety of all things, hath not forgotten this: For, willing in two draughts to give the picture of a bad man, in the person of Antiochus; it saith, An impudent, and a crafty king shall arise, who shall seek to understand all manner of subtleties. And it is a strange thing, that, going about to set forth a man who was as a mass of ordures and blood, it is content to give him, for the chief of his titles, the term of Impudent in his countenance; leaving us from that, to conjecture, that he had lost shamefac'tnesse, the nurse of virtues, and the Guardian of the Temple of Sanctity. To this purpose the learned Melissa in the sixteenth discourse, speaks two excellent words. The first of all virtues is Innocency, and the second is shamefac'tnesse.

Consurget Rex impudens facie, & intelligens propositiones. Dan. 8. 23.

Melissa disc. 61. Πρῶτον ἀγαθὸν ἀναμαρτησία, δεύτερον δὲ αἰσχύνη.

He who hath once lost it, hath nothing entire, since he hath likewise broken the sacred instrument of all virtues, which is Conscience. Thence we may easily understand, that impudency (which is no other then a neglect of reputation, as Theophrastus a Disciple of Aristotle defineth it) is a great evil: Should I depaint it, I would give it a brow of Brass: What is more impregnable against blushing? I would make it with the eyes of a Frog, black, and bloody: What is more inflexible to modesty? And could I give voice to my Table, I would make the voice of a Scritore to resound from its mouth, who was the most open-throated of men: For, what is more filled with out-cries, or is more tumultuously clamorous? I would give it hands of violence and rapine; for what is more injurious? Wandering feet, for what is more straying? I would set by its side, liberty, and hope of impunity, which are two disorders that support and foment it. Finally, I should bade all vices waiting on it, since he who is not ashamed of doing ill, is capable to produce all manner of monsters. I would figure at its feet a Crocodile, for it is a creature, which, from the least of all, proportionably, becometh the greatest: and impudency, which in its beginnings seems in children but a little spark, doth in conclusion enkindle a huge fire. Besides, I behold in the region of this unhappy passion divers subjects, according to the diversity of Age, sex, and conditions: There see little children, to whom nature hath given a veil of shamefac'tnesse, which made their Native innocency appear upon the first object of malice. And I perceive that impudency by halfe a little breaks in upon them: some have more of it, some less: but all, instantly begin to prattle too freely, and indifferently to take liberty by slight mis-becomming actions. I see others of them at the age of 18 and 20, who have shaken off the yoke of parents, masters, and kinred, tearing away even in a moment the scarf of shamefac'tnesse, and sucking in the breath of liberty, as if they were little wild Asses in a wilderness. O! what dangerous beasts; oh what salvage creatures (saith Plato) are children ill bred? Foxes and Wolves are a thousand times more easie to be tamed, then dissolute youth, which hath folly for guide, & Impudency for companion. O God! what a monster see I here? I also discover young maids, and women to whom Nature (as S. Gregory Nazianzen saith) had supereminently afforded the goodly veil of virtuous shamefac'tnesse dyed in the richest and most beautiful Incarnadine that may be; yet have they defaced it. When they conceived sin, they had got a little shame: after they had brought it forth, they became extreamly impudent in glances, in words, in conversation, in immodesty and dissolution. I have seen Lionesses, and Panthers taken out of the most salvage wildernesses, which one (well practised in the ordering of beasts) with a little industry lead a long through cities and villages; but I never found a bridle strong enough to curb an impudent woman. A cohabitation with Aspicks and vipers would be more sweet and supportable. I see (moreover) in this Region many deceivers and impostours, many Buffons, and banters after bountifull meals, who have belly-talk perpetually in their mouths and actions, such as were those of the Cynick Diogenes, which they colour with a pretext of Nature. Lastly, I see servants banded against their Masters, sons rebellious against their fathers, people revolted against their King, who trample under foot all manner of obedience and justice. I see hideous Monsters of heresies, of impiety and Athiesm, who uncontrolably throw forth blasphemies against Religion. Behold the effects and goodly government of Impudency!

Sect. 4. Of Reverence due to God.

Remedies.

TO reform the Image of Shamefac'tnesse, let us reflect on our first original, and see how God would train us up to reverence by an admirable way of his divine Providence. Is it not a thing very remarkable that the apparitions & communications of the Divinity, although they seem to be most important to awaken our faith, were at all times so rare: that God rather chose to permit doubts in the faith of his Essence, and formal infidelities, then to shew and communicate himself upon all occasions under corporal & visible forms, w^ch might cause any diminution in the reverence due to his Majesty? He is in the world, as a king in his palace, who sees all, and is not seen by any. He looketh on us through so many lattice windows, as there are creatures, yet is invisible to our corporal eies. Verily, it was an antient maxim held by the Hebrews, to oblige them to the reverence of the divinity, that the majesty of God was so potent, and awfull, that no man might see it without dying in the place, w^ch they inferred upon the passage of Exodus, No man shall see me, and live. Exod. 38.

The great reverence of the Divinity.

Thence Manoah, father of Samson, after the admirable apparition of the Angel (the Lieutenant of God) which appeared unto him, said to his wife, We shall die, for we have seen God. And Jacob, according to the interpretation of some Father, after the notable vision of the ladder, said, not by a motion of joy,

joy, but out of admiration, O wonder! I have seen God face to face, and yet I am alive. And albeit God communicated himself to his greatest favourites under visible figures; yet never did he shew himself properly in his Essence, no not to Moses, although S. Ambrose saith of him, that God gave him a clear and most manifest view of his divine presence.

We must understand it, in such manner, as that this great law-giver had most resplendent & most familiar apparitions of God, above the other Prophets. For God seemed to speak with him face to face, as one friend talks to another: notwithstanding we must say, with the greatest doctors of the Church, that for all this, he saw not the essence of God. Such is the opinion of Pope Eusebius, of S. Dyonisius, of S. Irenæus, of Tertullian; and, the text of S. John is therein expres, No man hath ever seen God; and the decision of S. Augustine, who saith, That as for those who have seen him, this favour was granted them, because God appeared when he would, and how he would, in such figure as it pleased him to make choice of, his essence still remaining under covert. Let us also add, for a reason, that as often as God in the old Testament gave to his people visible marks of his presence, he gave them with so much terror and affrightment, that the poor people astonish'd at his approach so prodigious, were enforced to say, Let not God speak to us. We know it by the apparition of the mount Sinai, where they saw voices, that is to say exhalations of flames which made a great noise in the clouds, and burning lamps, and horrible smokes, the sound of Trumpets, and Clarions being mingled throughout all this loud din; which made them to swoon, and become pale at the foot of the mountain, and with suppliant hands to beseech Moses to speak to them, because the voice of God was too terrible. Wherefore was all this done? but to maintain reverence in the people which were ready enough to let themselves loose to impudency.

Alass! How can we live under the laws of God with so little respect, and reverence, even in Churches? Have we not still the same signs? the like advertisements? All in this universe, on us, about us, and above us, is marked with the messages of the feat of God. Above us, God reigneth in the store-house of air and clouds; the pillars of the firmament tremble, the heavens are bowed in all their regions under the glory of his steps. The winds are the Courriers, and Postillons of his will, who run along spreading his name throughout the four quarters of the habitable world. The Sun confesseth, he is but a shadow in comparison of the increated light, and presenteth as many fingers as there are rays, to write down the commandments of God upon the brow of clouds; his decrees move with wings of lightnings, & are heard in the roaring voice of thunders. It is so natural to bear a reverence to his Divine Majesty, that there is not a creature in the world, how insensible soever, which feeleth not the touches of this much-to-be-adored greatness. Wilde beasts, who roam up & down forrests with bloud and massacres perpetually under their paws, by naturall instinct quake at the thundering voice of God. Fishes in the bottom of seas, and abysses with horror hear it: enraged tempests (which seem ready to tear the world in pieces) become silent at the command of the highest, and draw in their wings under his throne: waves and floods which makes a shew not to regard this great All, no more then a single element, dissolve their fury upon the sight of one silly grain of sand, which imposeth a law on them by virtue of Gods ordinance. The very devils, all on fire in the flames of their punishment, wch, infinit misery seems to have exempted from fear, cannot free themselves from this sting. O most mighty! O most sovereign Lord of things visible and invisible! O great Eye, who seest all, and art not seen by any here below. Thou art truly worthy! If we with mortal lips may call thee worthy; yea worthy, to whom all intelligent & reasonable nature should give continual thanks for thy inexplicable benefits; worthy, before whò we on our bended knees should all our life-time remain prostrate; worthy, that for thee we should have praises and prayers everlastingly on our lips. And where is that brazen brow which dares to offend thee in the midst of thy Temple of this universe, frò whence thou on all sides beholdest us! O what a monster is impudency, if it persist insensible to such considerations!

O maxime, O summe invisibilium procreator, ajisen invisè, & nullis unquam comprehense naturis, dignus es verè, si usquam dignum mortali dicendum est ore, cui spiritus omnis intelligentisque naturæ, & habere, & agere nunquam gratias desinat, cui tota conveniat vita genu unus procumbere, & continuatis precibus supplicare. Sect. 5. Of the reverence which the holy Humanity of our Lord bare to his Eternal Father.

The reverence Jesus bare to that divine Majesty.

Let us look on the other Model, & consider how Jesus Christ, uncapable properly either of fear or shamefac'tness caused by any defect, observed all the days of his mortal cóversation so lowly a reverence towards the divine Majesty, that it serves for matter of admiratió to all Angels, & of example for all ages. To understand this wel, I beseech you to take into your consideration two reasons that I wil set before you, which me thinks are wel worthy of your ponderation. 1. That the greatness of actions ought ever to be measured by the end for which God hath instituted them: as if one prove that the actions of understanding are given us to raise us to the knowledg of God, we by the same means infer that those actions are very noble, since they are directed to an end so eminent. Now, wherefore think you, was the eternal word incarnate in the womb of a holy virgin? I say, that besides consideration of human Redemption, & the instruction of all mortals, God covered himself with the flesh of man, that there might by that means be a person in the world able to praise & honor God, as much as he is praise-worthy, & honorable, by a nature create, hypostatically joyned to the divine nature. Philo, in the book of Noahs plantation, saith, that search was made through the world for a voice sutable to the divine Majesty, to speak, and recount his praises, and there was none found. For although the sovereign Creatour hath been praised from the beginning of ages by the morning stars, which are the Angels (as saith Job) yet we must say, that all the praises wch the highest Seraphins may give to the Divinity (if we compare them to the merits of its incomparable greatness) are like a candle in comparison of the sun, a smal drop of water parallel'd with the sea; and an infant-like stutterer who should undertake to declare the prowesses of the most illustrious Cæsars. There needeth a lauding God, a reverencing God, and an adoring God, to praise, reverence, and adore God worthily: otherwise there were nothing sutable to his divine Majesty, there being no proportion between the finite & the infinit. And that wch seemed to be impossible is accomplished in the person of Jesus Christ. All reverencies of Angels and men are dissolved into him, as if one should melt many smal Bels, to make a great one. And verily all creatures being dumb in his presence, he made himself as a huge bell of the great clock of the world, wch striketh the hours, & resoundeth thanks to his heavenly Father. All our reverencies, our homages, our adorations have neither force, dignity, nor value, if they be not united, and incorporated with the homage, submission, & adoration wch this glorious humanity rendereth to his Celestial Father, even above the vaults of the Emperial Heaven. This is the great Angel of

of Counsel, of whom we may pronounce these Apoc. 8. 3. words of the Apocalypse, that he came to present himself before the Altar, having in his hand a golden Incensory, and much incense was given to him, that he might offer the prayers of holy Saints on this golden Altar.

The second reason is, that the reverence and honour we do to one, is justly augmented according as we more clearly know his great and worthy parts; whereupon we may infer, that as our Saviour had knowledges and incomparable lights of the Majesty of his heavenly Father, not only in respect of science increate, but of science beatifick and infused: so had he proportionably resentments of honour so profoundly reverent, that he perpetually lived absorpt in this reverence, as a drop of water in the sea, or a hot Iron in the fornace. There was neither vein nor artery which was not every moment penetrated and overflowed with the veneration he yielded to God his Father.

Men who naturally are dull and sensual, stand in need of exteriour signs to raise them to the reverence of God. For which cause the sages of the world in the falshood of pretended religions, have always affected some tokens of terrour to affright perjured and wicked men. So the Babylonians, when they sat on matters of Justice, went into a Philostr. l. 1. c. 16. de vit. Apollonii. Hall of the Palace, made in the form of the heavens, where were hanged the figures of their gods, all resplendent in gold, and where were to be seen on the roof certain forms of birds which they thought to be sent from an high, as Messengers of the Sun. So Bochyris a most famous Judge of Egypt (ordinarily named as the father and protectour of Equity) that he might powerfully imprint an apprehension of God, avenger of Injustices; when he sate on his throne of Judicature, always had the image of a serpent in embossed work, hanging over his head, as in a readiness to sting him if he pronounced an unjust sentence. This is partly tolerable, partly also praiseworthy among mortal men; but as for the person of our Saviour, he had not any need of exteriour signs, having always a perspicuous vision of the Divinity. And tell me not, this continual sight of God, this so expresst familiarity, might lessen the reverence which ordinarily is preserved in things lesse accustomed. This verily hath some truth: if we speak of men, their perpetual presence many times diminisheth the reverence of those who familiarly converse with them; because being men, their perfections are finite, and imperfections almost infinite, which is the cause they are exhausted like roses, which with their odour cast forth part of their substance. They waste like Torches which annihilate themselves before the eys of beholders, leaving most times nought behind them but stink and smoke. They are to be looked on a far off, and in the dark, as painted women, and adulterate merchandize; but in God, whom S. Denis calleth the Hearth and house of Essences, we must not apprehend these limitations, these defects, Dionys. de divin. nominibus c. 1. and these distrelishes, since he, being of his own nature infinite, is never lessened.

The most blessed soul of Jesus Christ entred into the consideration of his greatnesses, as into a most spacious Labyrinth all repleniished with lights, perfections, and virtues, which never satiate; but on the contrary give (as in an eternal Theatre) spectacles delicious, immortal, and inexplicable. For there it is, where all the blessed draw their felicity; Always greedy and ever full, always in possession and ever desiring; their satiety is without loathing, and their hunger free from torment; still they eat the bread of life, and never waste it. As S. Augustine hath most divinely observed in the Hymn, which Hymn. Dam. de gloria Patr. Cardinal Damian hath framed out of his words. Thence I leave you to consider with what reverence our Lord walked on the earth, as a man suspended in heaven, drenched in God, as a spung would be in a vast sea; a man who held not of the earth, but by roots of compassion and mercy. Still he had his eys lifted up towards heaven in doing miracles, still his hands raised towards heaven in prayer, still his heart contracted with sadness for the irreverences committed against the honour of his father. conversation, drinking, eating, sleeping, dissolved not the sweet conversation he had with God. Sometimes even in company being overwhelmed with the impetuous approach of this holy Majesty, he brake forth into words of reverence, of love, of thanksgiving, as it were, saying, I laud thee my Father, Lord Mat. 11. 25. of heaven and earth, that thou hast hidden those goodly lights from men who make account of the wisdome and prudence of the world, and hast made them known to the most simple and little ones; yea dear Father, for such hath been thy most holy will.

In honour of the lowly reverence which Jesus Christ bare to his heavenly Father, Let us resolve to preserve in our selves three sorts of shamefac'dness; of piety, of chastity, of discretion: Shamefac'dness of piety; by observing a holy and religious modesty in Churches, & all those actions which do appertain to the service and honour of God: Shamefac'dness of chastity; by abstaining from all words and actions which render conversation too free and exorbitant, not without some prejudice to chastity. And therefore (O Virgins) engrave in your hearts this document of Tertullian, who saith, That it is fit a Virgin should blush even at virtue. Lastly, let us have shamefac'dness of discretion in demeaning our selves very circumspectly in all the duties we ought to yield to persons worthy of honour, and namely to those to whom we are tyed by some obligations.

A notable custom of the Babylonians in doing Justice.

The custome of Bocchiris a Judge of Egypt.

Alas! who can endure those that have lost not onely the reverence of a God invisible, but even the shame of men visible? Shamefac'dness is the last shirt of virtue which one never putteth off, but when he is ready to cloth himself with an infinity of vices. It is a strange thing that Adam and Eve, who bare (as it were) in one vessel all the riches of mankind, after they had made that miserable ship-wrack (the losses where of we yet deplore) after they had lost all that which a wretch might lose, and all that which a happy man might desire; they yet still, in the midst of this great breach, preserved shamefac'dness as the last plank of this lamentable shipwrack. They yet were ashamed to see themselves naked; and by this spectacle of their nakedness, were perswaded to penance. And thou wretched and depraved soul over head and ears; thou feares neither God nor man, father nor mother, neighbour nor kinsman, friend nor magistrate, force, mildness, admonition, menace, nor reputation, either good or bad. Ah Caitif! It is to run to a downfal with veiled eyes, to live in this manner: It is to lift up an armed hand against heaven. Thy conscience justifies thee (sayst thou) and thou carest not at all for men; what conscience, if thou neglectest reputation which is the bridle wherewith God useth to repress all sorts of vice? Thou hast no conscience, which notwithstanding, never forsakes any man, enlightning and stinging theives in wild caves, and in the massacres of men, to expose to light vices (which could never endure the rays of the sun which were confined to darkness and Gomorrhian night) to establish them in the conversation of men, to publish them, to practise them openly before the eys of heaven and earth, and to say we should give nature free liberty. Ah! wicked Zimri. Hast thou not read the History in the book of Numbers? hast thou not in this picture observed the effects and disasters of impudency? As that of Zimry, a Prince of Gods people, who hastening to make love to a Midianite, a Cozbi, at mid-day, in sight of all the people of Israel; cast under foot the Laws of God, the shame of men, the honour of Reputation, the reverence of all Posterity: Wretch, whether goest thou, said one to him? Knowst thou not, the Law of God forbiddeth alliance with strangers? what hast thou to do with this Midianite? she will ruine thee. It importeth thee not to say, I will go. But dost thou consider thy quality, and the rank thou holdest, being a Prince of people? Thou well seest, the bad example thou wilt give to all the world, cannot but be pernicious. It importeth not, I will go. Behold thy Parents and neareſt of kin stretch forth their hands to thee, and say; Son, do not our Family this dishonour: Bring not such a crime into our house, which will make us incur the malediction of God, and will overwhelm thee first of all under some notable disaster. It importeth not, I will go. Alas! seest thou not poor Moses, who weeps with all the people prostrated before the Tabernacle of God, that he would be pleased to divert such a thought from thee, lest thou become culpable of the anger of God, which will fall on the whole Army, if thou goest to this stranger? It importeth not, I will go. Son, if thou resolvest to sin, then stay till night; make a veil of darkness further to cover thy wickedness from the eys of the world, for fear lest thy example may serve for a rock of scandal to those who are yet novices in virtue. Yet, thou perversly sayest, I will go in full day light: I will enjoy my pleasures; and who art thou that givest me a Law? Go Zimri, go impudent man, thou in thy calamity shalt know the salary of thy sin. You know the rest of the History, he goes thither, he accosteth the Midianite in sight of all the world. At which time God raiseth a young Prince, as courageous as a Lion, Grand-child of Aaron who followeth him armed with zeal and sword, crying out aloud; Ah Traytour! Ah infamous man! He finds him out in the throne of Lust, in the bed of Iniquity, in the heat of Crime; and with his sword transfixeth him and the Midianite, making the abominable Bed and their unchaste loves to float all in bloud. O bloud horribly (but justly) shed, which still cryeth out with a voyce of bloud, and saith to all posterity! Men, Women, Children, Great, Little, Poor, Rich; fly from Impudency, fly from Impudency, as the last of vices: otherwise know, there is a revenging sword, and a Judgment of God inevitable to all the Shamelesness of Sinners.

Num. 25. The miserable end of an unhappy impudent man.

The twelfth Treatise, Of ANGER.

§ 1. The origin of Anger, its Nature, Causes, and Diversitie.

The marvellous effects of fire.

FIre which is a mean between Spirits and Bodies, doth work very diversly according to the matter and disposition it meets withall; In the heavens it enkindleth the stars with flames the most pure in total Nature: it diversifieth clouds with Gold and Rubies: it maketh Bows and Coronets in the air: it entaineth a heat of life in the body of living Creatures, which being maintained in a good temperature, cause all the harmonies of health; but, when it mounteth up into a tempestuous cloud, when it boyleth in Fornaces, and creeps into Cannons, which are as mouths of fire to pronounce war; it maketh so strange devastations that it vanquisheth the most valiant, beats down the most boysterous, mollifieth the hardest, and terrifieth the most daring.

In the same manner we may say, heat, which in our bodies is an admirable work-Mistris, multiplyeth its effects according to the diversity of the stuffs, and occasions it lights on: it conspireth with our spirits, to serve as an instrument for the soul in its great operations: it exciteth the honourable flames of chaste loves: it disposeth courage to generous resolutions: it polisheth the mind to embrace worthy purposes: It secondeth the Imagination in its apprehensions: it makes it self the steward of the vegetative faculties for the generation and production of men; but if it once meet with burnt bloud, and fuming Choler, which is as it were in the hands of the imagination, when it is touched with some displeasure, it insinuateth it self thereinto, as into a cloud swoln with storms and tempests, which throws forth fires, roareth with thunders, shooteth with inflamed darts, and practiseth nought but ruine.

What Anger is.

This is it we call anger, which is properly an ardent appetite of revenge caused by an apprehension of contempt, and injuries. Now this opinion of contempt springeth in some sort from disesteem, or for that they are forgotten and neglected by those of whom they think they ought to be respected: In others, from being crossed in what they desire most, as in their profession, their ambition, and especially their affections: In others, from being depressed in that wherein they imagine they excel, and principally before such, by whom they perswade themselves they are beloved and honoured: In others, from being derided for defects of nature as well of body as of mind, and of extraction also: In others, from being injuriously disgraced, and insolently outraged by base and abject people, and such as they have obliged. As the opinion of injury increaseth, and as it meeteth with a nature disposed, and matter prepared, this ardour is inflamed: and if it be accompanied with a great power, it teareth down smoking Cities, it desolateth Provinces, it swims in massacres, it raiseth scaffolds all sprinkled over with bloud, and hung with black, whereon it acteth horrible Tragedies.

Dum incipit ratio esse. Sen. de Ira.

How Anger is formed.

The other passions are augmented by degrees; but this ariseth fully formed, and appears perfect so soon as it beginneth. The opinion of contempt no sooner entreth in by the eys and ears, but it striketh the imagination which promptly communicateth its influence to the irascible appetite; and then, as if fire were given to a Cannon, it becomes Thunder and Tempest, which disfigureth the bravest bodies, turmoileth the bloud and spirits, and bendeth all the veins to vengeance. You would say, the heart is not at that time any other then Vulcan's Forge, where the thoughts, like so many Cyclops, labour to make Hail-showrs, Lightnings, and Tempests. It is not known in this Country what kind of language Reason speaketh: It is no better heard then words among the Catadupes of Nilus; strength hath a hand hand lifted up to employ the sword, and a thousand instruments of iniquity, to commit outrages. This passion resembleth the furious Martichora, renowned among Indian wild-beasts, who teareth his members asunder to make of them the arrows of his vengeance; It hath nothing so resolved on, as to destroy all, and to raise unto it self a Tombe in its own ruines. Yet we cannot but say, that there are three very different sorts of Anger, according to the offences and persons who either raise it, or suffer it. In some it is cold in apparance, and more inward; but these oftentimes have the aspect of Virgins, who in conclusion throw forth the fire of Dragons: In others it is fervent and headlong: In others haughty and scornfull: In others dumb and malitious: In others obstreperous and stormy: In some it is frequent and sudden; in others sticking and obstinate. There are some who being offended for frivolous things, cease not to persevere therein for fear some may think they began without reason, in which the less the cause is, the more passionate they become: Others blame their greatest friends for having done them less good then they expected. In some, Anger is but yet in bloom; in others, it taketh great and deep root. Some satisfie themselves with clamour and injuries; others therein employ the hand; others wood and Iron; others would have lightning in their power for some time, of purpose to prosecute their revenge with all advantage. Lastly, this passion thrusts forth all that is hidden in the heart: Which made Cassian, according to the Septuagint, to write, that it disentombed sins which were before (as it were) interred.

Divers qualities of anger.

Vir iracundus effodit peccata. Cassian. de spiritu ira. c. 1.

§. 2. Three principall Kinds of Anger.

WE notwithstanding can say with S. John Damascen, that Anger stirreth up and down in three principall regions, where it produceth very different effects. The first is called the region of sharp choler, the second of bitter choler, and the third of fury. In the first region are all those who have slight heats of the liver; who are angry upon every light occasion, and almost every moment. In this are to be found many women, many children, and lovers; and besides, Hungry, Thirsty, needy, sickly and nice ones, fantasticks and extravagants, as that Smyndrides, who, seeing a peasant taking pains before him, said, his body was quite broken therewith. There needs almost nothing to make choler flye up into their faces, so much they are thereunto disposed. The slightest things put them out of the limits of reason; and if no man contradict them, they frame quarrels to themselves with woods and stones, and with other things inanimate which serve their use; and in the end, fall out with themselves, and skirmish against their own shadow. The great Casarius, a Greek Authour, saith that Mil-stones, having not corn to grind, strike fire: so we oft-times see in Houshold and Communities, when there is no employment, no gain nor profit; the fire of Anger interposeth between man and wife, between brothers and friends; yea, among religious, who are not througly well applyed to the functions of their profession.

Three regions of Anger. Damascen. l. 2. orth. c. 16.

Weak spirits ordinarily cholerick.

Casarius in dialog.

The second Region is that of inveterate choler, wherein malicious souls are engaged, who do nothing else but gnaw their own heart, and envy the felicity of another, closely undermining it as much as they can, both by word and deed. There you behold them all ranked in order, which is nothing but disorder, with a visage ghastly and disfigured, an eye of an owl, a countenance moody, a gate slow, speech wrangling, and most often an enraged silence. O discontented, and dismall Region! I had rather see the Comet which appeared not long since, then to behold a man so composed, who perpetually hath vultures in his entrails, executioners by his sides, and who moreover hath a perty hell within himself. It is of this Anger, the wise man saith, that A stone was very heavy, and sand weighty: but choler incomparably more; I had rather roll Sisyphus his stone, eat sand and coles, then hatch in my heart such anger. Have you ever observed the unlucky Tree, whereof Theophylact speaketh upon the Prophet Nahum, which we in our Language call the Yew Tree. It is a Tree of death, which with its shadow alone, killeth the herbs and plants about it. This worthy Interpreter addeth, that it out of a singular malignity devoureth them. And Dioscorides noteth, that being once set on fire, it will many months keep a melancholy fire, hidden under the ashes, not, almost, to be quenched. Behold the picture of one who is tainted with the cursed choler of the second region; you see him anxious, and burthensome to himself, dull like an old yew, an old Tree in a Church-yard. He is impotent in effect, for revenge; but hath a furious appetite towards it, which he dissembleth under the meagerness of the Countenance of a dead man, and under the coldness of a maligne passion. The fire is, as under ashes, the space of so many months, so many good friends, so many good advises, so many convincing reasons quench some little spark of it, yet there still remaineth some of it behind. So many powerfull Sermons, so many confessions, so many communions cry out, Fire, Fire, poure on water. Miserable creature! thy house smoketh. It will burn thee when thou art asleep; but he hath no ears. And when this serpentine soul shall be snatched away by a sudden death, if you search into the ashes of its body, there you shall yet find fire. The earth which shall cover him, shall be like burning pitch; It shall burn night and day, and make black and thick smokes arise, which shal eternally issue out of it. Preserve your self from this second region, and observe the words of S. Augustine; Choler, which proceedeth from some innocent promptitude, is as a stick; but this is a beam. A stick is the beginning of a beam. For the beam at first is but a stick; if you water it, it becometh a beam: and if you cherish choler by evil suspicions, you turn it into Hatred.

Proverb. 26.

Grave est saxum & onerosa arena, sed ira utroque gravior.

The property of yew Tree, like unto Anger.

Et erit terra ejus in vicem ardentem nocte, & die, non extinguetur, in sempiternum ascendet fumus ejus. Isai. 34.

Festuca in oculo ira est, trabes vero odium.

Festuca initium trabis est, nam trabes quando nascuntur prius festuca est, rigando festucam deducis ad trabem, alendo iram malis suspicionibus perducis ad odium. August. l. de verbis Domini, ser. 16.

The region wherein are the furious.

The third region of choler, is fury, in which all such are, as play the part of mad Orlando, and become as red as the Comb of a Cock, and presently as pale as the dead; who have eyes bloudy like frogs, sparkling like Gorgons, rolling as those of Cain; who roar like Lions, who foam like Boars, who hiss like Serpents, who poyson all they see, like Basilisks, who cast forth fire, like Medea's Bulls; who tear one another like Canniballs; who sup with lights and lamps of bloud like Cyclops; who walk in the night to strike and commit outrages like Furies; who are perpetually in disturbance like Devils; who do nothing but vomit forth blasphemies; who swear by heaps; who breath nothing but wounds, but plague-sores and revenges; who have no more of man in them, but so much as may serve for food to eternall fire, unless they betake them to repentance. There are of them so ardent that they resemble those dogs of hot Countries, whereof Xenophon speaketh, which strike their teeth so eagerly into the skin of a boar, that, together with the gash, they make fire to fly out.

Second region of anger wherein rest malicious and covert souls.

Behold a horrible ſphere of Monſters and Tempeſts, bloody Comets, Horſes, and Arms of fire. It is they, of whom the Scripture ſpeaketh, Simeon and Levi (you veſſels of war, inſtruments of iniquity, Trumpets of fury and blood) never ſhall my Spirit have to do with you, never will I defile the glory of a peaceful ſoul by the contagion of your company. Curſed be your fury, for it is head-ſtrong; curſed your anger and revenge, for it is wicked, and inſatiable.

Geneſ. 49. Simeon & Levi vaſa iniquitatis bellantia, &c. Maledictus furor eorum quia pertinax; & indignatio quia dura.

Two things principally are deplorable, in this third Region: the firſt is, That anger is exerciſed, with out-rages and violence upon the renown, eſtate, body, and ſoul of a Neighbour, who crieth for vengeance before God; and above all, it is much to be feared, when great paſſion is linked to great power, where Fortune permitteth all which vengeance deſireth. For fire, water, and greatneſs never over-flow without bearing down the Common-ſhore. Secondly, It ſo bewitcheth ſome infatuated Spirits of theſe times, that they make Tropheys of the greateſt reproaches which are in Nature; and to make their torments everlaſting, they deifie their Crimes. That is it which the excellent Authour Paulus Oroſius ſaid; Fury, as it ordinarily walketh without reaſon, will make its dolour to paſs for virtue, and boldneſs promiſeth to accompliſh all whatſoever anger ſuggeſteth it.

Paulus Oroſius lib. 2. adverſus Pagan. c. 16. Expers conſilii furor, dolorem virtutem putat, quantum mediatur, ira, tantum promittit audacia.

§. 3. The Contemplation of the ſerenity of the Divine Spirit is the Miſtriſs of Meekneſs.

The Picture of the Tranquillity of God.

LEt us, to this diſorder, oppoſe the ſerenity of God, which we may contemplate when we are far removed from the ſurprizals of this paſſion. If this place would permit me to delineate the Picture of the Tranquillity of God, as the ſublime Tertullian hath done, that of Patience, I would give it a viſage wholly angelical. What is more Divine and Celeſtial, then this virtue? I would ſet it in a fortunate Iſland (all tapiſtred with verdure, and enamelled with flowers) where the Sun ſhould ſmile out of all his Manſions. For, what is more delicious? I would place it on a Rock, ſuch as was that of Egypt, which was never touched by profane feet. What is more ſtable, and more religious? Thereon I would raiſe a Temple to it, ſuch as was that of Adonis, in Greece, wherein Lions were tractable. What is more lovely? I would give it a Scepter of Diamond: what is more ſolid, or powerful over the paſſions of man's heart? I would ſet upon the head thereof a Crown of Stars. What is more ſublime? what more majeſtical? At its feet I would hang Harps and Lutes; for it is the Miſtriſs of holy Harmonies. About it ſhould be little Nightingales, Halcyons, and holy Fiſhes, which cauſe a calm every where: what is more peaceful? A good diſtance from it, ſhould be Sea-dogs, ſtorms, and waves which ſhould roar, without troubling its repoſe; ſince it is immovable. It ſhould have eys lifted up to Heaven, and ſhould live by influences flowing to it from the union it hath with God: as it is ſaid, the Bird of Paradiſe liveth on the thinneſt vapours of the air.

But let us in a word tell you, that Tranquillity is the Eſſence of God himſelf, and that all which is peaceful draweth neer towards God. I am not ignorant of what the Scripture ſpeaketh in many places of God's anger: and among others, David in his Pſalms with a certain admiration; Who is it knoweth the force of thy anger? and can weigh thy indignation in the terrour of thy countenance? But this muſt be underſtood by an Anthropopathia, as Theologians do explicate it; which is done when God is repreſented by ſenſible figures, like unto men. For to ſpeak truly, God hath no anger, nor can any wiſe have it, being incapable either of the form or matter of it. The form is an appetite of revenge, and the matter, a boyling of bloud: as appeareth by that we have ſaid before. Now, we underſtand, that in God there is neither bloud nor appetite. If he in all times hath produced Examples of Juſtice (as he did in the Deluge, in the burning of Sodom and Gomorrha, in the Plagues of Egypt, in the defeat of Sennacherib.) It was with the ſame tranquillity which he had when he made Paradiſe, and the bleſſed by his aſpects. God puniſheth not the wicked out of anger; but the wicked puniſh themſelves by the remorſe of their own conſciences: and if the Divine Juſtice put a hand thereto, the World marcheth in battel-array againſt them, and is all on fire under the feet of its Judge, the Judge being thereby nothing at all inflamed. The puniſhments which fall from Heaven, come not from a head-long precipitation, ſince they are reſolved on from all Eternity.

Quis novit poteſtatem iræ tuæ, aut præ timore tuo iram tuam dinumerare? Pſal. 89.

God, to ſpeak properly, hath no anger.

It was a judicious invention of the ancient Sages, to tell us, there were three ſorts of Thunder-bolts in Heaven; and that the firſt was only to advertiſe, without doing hurt: the ſecond did good, but not without cauſing hurt: the third ruined, and defaced all it met. And thereupon, to ſhew us the mildneſs of God, they ſaid, the Monarch of Heaven and Earth of his own motion ſent the innocent Thunderbolts; but if there were cauſe to throw that which doth but little hurt: (although it were to derive profit from it) he called twelve Gods to counſel: but when thoſe great Artilleries of Heaven were to be ſhot off, which aimed at the ruine of the moſt guilty, it was never done without a general counſel of all the gods. We ſay more then all this; for we affirm that God ſtayeth not a certain time to reſolve on the puniſhment of men, but hath decided it from all eternity, and hath ordained Hell for Crimes, with the ſame Countenance he decreed Heaven for the bleſſed. All is peaceful, and always peaceful in God; from whence it cometh, that men moſt like unto him, as are good Kings, have borrowed the Title of Serenity. Can it then well become a Chriſtian, who makes profeſſion to render himſelf like unto his Heavenly Father, to ſuffer himſelf to be tranſported with the furies of anger, which in man extinguiſh all that is Divine, and leave nothing Humane?

Senec. natur. l. 2. c. 41. Three ſorts of thunder-bolts, which figure unto us, how God proceedeth in the chaſtiſement of men.

§. 4. That the Example of our Saviour teacheth us the moderation of Anger.

To know whether our Lord was ſubject to anger. The anſwer. Aug. l. 14. de civitate Dei, cap. 9. Neque enim in quo ei a verum hominis corpus, & verus hominis animus, falſus erat humanus effectus. An amor affectus eſt hominis? ſed ipſe audiens adoleſcentem ſeipſum de obſervatione mandatorum commendantem, intuitus dilexit eum: an timor? ſed ipſe in anima paſſio-

ONe might perhaps object for excuſe, that our Lord who ought to be the example of all our actions, was angry, when he with a Whip drave Buyers and Sellers out of the Temple. I to this anſwer with a doctrine of S. Auguſtine, very remarkable, which teacheth us, that as our Lord took a true body, when he was born of the moſt bleſſed Virgin: ſo he hath ſhewed himſelf to have real paſſions deſcending for us into the ſhadow of our infirmities, to make us aſcend into the light of his glory. Notwithſtanding, we muſt not think he would undergo all ſorts of paſſions, eſpecially ſuch as carry in them any uncomely miſ-beſeeming: but thoſe he took upon him which were moſt decent, and incident to man. If love (ſaith the Oracle of Doctours) be a humane paſſion; Jeſus hath taken it, ſhewing many times tendernes of affections towards perſons of merit: as it is ſaid, that ſeeing a young man, who had ſtrictly kept the commandments of God, from his moſt innocent nis constitutus vapit pavore & tædio. An gaudium? sed & Lazarus mortuus est inquit & gaudeo propter vos quia non eram ibi. An tristitia? sed & tristis est anima mea usque ad mortem.

cent years, he loved him, and had some compassion of him, for that he entred not directly into the way of the Gospel being withheld by the love of his riches. If fear be accounted among the motions of nature, had not he fear and anxiety when he was near unto his passion? If you look for joy, doth not he say, Lazarus is dead, but I rejoyce for your sake? because by this means the Apostles faith must be confirmed. Lastly, if sadness be the inheritance of our condition, hath he not said, my soul is heavy to the death? But there are other passions which he would never admit, as sensual love, hatred of a neighbour, envy and anger.

An excellent observation upon the terming our Saviour a Lamb.

As for that which concerneth this last passion; it is certain that our Lord was more meek and gentle then all men; from whence it came that he would be called the Lamb of God, by a solemn title, and that he in the Primitive Church was represented under the same figure, as it appeareth in the Christning Font of Constantine, where the statue of a Lamb of massie gold poured out the water of Baptisme. Never in his greatest sufferings hath he shewed one least spark of anger, or impatience; but was always calm and peaceful, even shewing an incomparable sweetness to a naughty servant, who had cruelly wronged him at the time of his passion. And as for that he did, in the matter of buyers and sellers, that ought not to be called anger, but a fervent and vigorous zeal which caused him to punish irreverences committed against his eternal Father.

Good God! Had we perpetually before our eyes this mirrour of meekness; we need not seek for any other remedies. His aspect would remedy all our anger, as the brazen serpent cured the plagues of Israel. This sacred fish would cause a calm whersoever it rested, and the presence of his aspect would banish tempests: but since passion so cloudeth our reason, let us apply remedies more obvious against the motions of anger.

§. 5. Politick Remedies to appease such as are angry.

ANger being a jealous passion ever grounded upon the opinion of contempt, ought to be handled with much industry, and dexterity. There are some who very soon are cured by joy, by the meeting of light-hearted people, and by some pleasing and unexpected accident. This notably appeared at the Coronation of Philip Augustus, where there was a prodigious confluence of many people, who out of curiosity excessively flocking thither, much hindred the Ceremony. A certain Captain troubled to see this disorder, was desirous to remedy it, ceasing not to cry out and thunder with a loud voice to them to be quiet; but the earnestness of those that thronged, had no ears for Thunders: which made him, being much incensed with anger, to throw a cudgel he had in his hand at the heads of such as were the most unruly; and this cudgel being not well directed, lighted upon three lamps of Christal hanging right over the King and Queens heads, which breaking, the oil abundantly poured down upon them. All there present were troubled at an act so temerarious, but the pleasure of the sight put off their anger. The King with the Queen his wife instead of being offended, laughed heartily, seeing themselves so throughly besmeared: and a Doctour thereupon inferring, that it was a good presage, and that it signified abundance of unction, both of honour and prosperities which should overflow in their sacred persons, they had no power to be angry, out of the Imagination of glory which dryeth up the root of this passion. Verily, there is no better a remedy to appease such as are cholerick, then to flatter them with honour, and submission: which likewise was to be seen in that which happened in the person of Carloman. He was a vertuous religious man, brother of King Pepin, who had buried himself in humility, that he might courageously renounce all the greatness, whereunto he by birth was called. It fell out, that being in a Monastery of Italy, not discovering himself, he begged he might serve in the Kitchin, which was granted him: But the Cholerick Cook, seeing him to do somewhat contrary to his liking (not contented to use him harshly in words) with much indignity strake him. But there being not any thing which more vexeth a generous spirit, then to see him ill treated whom he most loveth; Carloman's companion who was present, not remembring himself to be a religious man, entreth into a violent anger, and suddenly taketh a pestle, and throws it at the Cooks head, to revenge the good father who bare this affront with incredible generosity.

Chronicon Casinense.

But so soon as this his companion had declared his extraction, and related all which had happened; the whol Convent fell at his feet who was affronted, and begged pardon of him. Where were to be seen sundry sorts of passions; Some of indignation, others of compassion, the rest, of Reverence. But Charloman thought it a thing intollerable, to see himself honoured in such a manner, whilst his Companion laughed beholding the Cook beaten, and the submissions yielded to this Prince.

There are others, who seeing their friends much incensed, feign to take their part, and seem angry with them; saying, this wicked fellow must at leisure be chastised, to render his punishment the more exemplary. Mean while, they give time, and expect the return of reason, and then they perswade the contrary. Many also have in apparence pretended fear, to flatter the anger of great ones, who take pleasure to render themselves awful in this passion, as did Agrippa towards the Emperour Caligula.

Rigordus.

§. 6. Moral Remedies against the same Passion.

I Will descend into more particulars against the three kinds of choler, which we insinuated. As for the first, which consisteth in that hastiness and heat of liver, that breaks forth in motions somewhat inordinate; First, I say, God is offended to see persons who make profession of a life more pure, and whose soul verily is not bad, to be perpetually upon the extravagances of passions, unworthy of a well composed spirit. Besides, it causeth a notable detriment to our repose. For, by being often angry, our gall increaseth (as Philosophers observe) and the increase of gall maketh us the more anxious, weyward, and irksome to our selves.

More particular remedies against the three sorts of anger.

The only means to amend and correct your self, is, to represent the hurt this passion bringeth, by depriving you of wisdom, of justice, civility, concord, virtue, and of the splendor of the spirit of God. The way to lessen the opinion you have of being despised, is, not lightly to believe tale-tellers, and to find reasons to excuse him who hath erred, not to be curious to know that wch may displease you, to fortifie your self in that side you find to be most feeble in you, avoiding objects wch most ordinarily provoke you; to live with peaceable people, to shun cares, and troublesome affairs, to afford your self convenient solaces; to extirpate petty Curiosities and false opinions which you have of your insufficiency in such sort that you imagine within your self that you ought to be used with great respect, and that you should not suffer any disgrace either by word or deed, but that men and elements must contribute to your likings. Behold from whence your feaver proceedeth, and how you may handsomely remedy it. O soul, infinitely nice! it seemes you were bred in a box, in perfumed Cotton and that you must endure nothing. Broth overmuch salted, a garment too straight, a mustachio ill turned up, the creaking of a door, the wind of a window, the least indiscretion of a servant, puts you out of your self. What do you take your self to be? You believe those flatterers who say, Do you suffer this? you measure not your self by your quality. And yet Kings and Queens, and the Monarchs of the earth have endured, and daily do endure many slight oppositions with great tranquillity: and you, silly worm of the earth, turn against God, when he permitteth any thing to happen contrary to your liking. Frame unto your self a life simple, and free from affectations; take away your wantonness, your pleasures, and petty peevishness. Choller is engendered by overmuch curiosities of spirit: stifle them, and you immediately extinguish it. Know that to quarrel with an equal is hazardous; with an inferiour, is contemptuous; and with a superiour, it is foolish. Set before you the Maxime of Pirrhus, that great Master of fence who said this passion was a Trouble-Trade; and that whilst you continue the same humour you shall be unable for all good employments. Do as the brave Philosopher Agrippinus, of whom Epictetus makes mention, who perceiving that when any misfortune befel him, he thereby became hasty and colerick What is this? (saith he) I play the slave, where I should play the Monarch. O misfortunes! I will deceive you. Thereupon he wrote the praises of every evil which might happen against his will. If a calumny, the praise of the profit, calumny brought. If an Exile, the praise of exile. If a quartane Ague, the praise of the Quartane ague. And by this means he came to such a heighth of Tranquillity, that, so soon as a fresh mischief assailed him, he met it with a smiling countenance, and said, God be praised, behold the way of my exercise.

Seneca de ira.
Ira voluptatibus generatur, & voluptatum suppressione sopitur.
Seneca de ira l. 3. c. 14.
Ira perturbat artes Agrippinus Epictetus apud Stobæum.

And you who are a child of light, fed with the body and bloud of your master! for Heaven, and the company of Angels, you cannot say (when some little inconvenience befalleth you) praised be Jesus: Behold here how the good purpose I have made of patience, is exercised. And then if you feel any rebellion, Take heed you shew it not either by words or outward signs; but get you and lodge at the sign of silence, where the haven of Tranquillity is. Do as those that are ill of the falling-sickness, who retire at the approach of their fits that they may not let any things uncomely appear. Say, Blessed be our Lord God, who teacheth my hands to fight and frameth my fingers to war. The Hebrew hath it, Blessed be our Lord, who is my rock. To shew you, that God if you endeavour to vanquish your passions, will place you upon the holy rock of Tranquillity, from whence he in his immutability beholdeth the motion of all Ages. Take a goodfriend, a faithful companion, who may divert your passion in its first fit, who may admonish you, and play on David's harp to drive away this devil of mad Saul, and take you from the occasions of hurt.

Benedictus Dominus Deus meus qui docet manus meas ad prælium, & digitos meos ad bellum. Psal. 143.
Benedictus Dominus super me. Stabilisque manens dat cuncta moveri.

The second remedy for such as long chew on their choler, and entertain aversions irreconcileable, is, that it were good to ponder and consider the words of Cassian, Let us perswade our selves that whilst we are angry, It is not permitted us to pray unto God and to present him our prayers. Let us take each day to be our last; and let us not think that for being chast and continent, for having forsaken the pleasures of the world and despised riches, for macerating our bodies with fastings, watchings, and labours, much is due to us; if at the end of the reckoning it be found we carry hatred, and anger in our hearts, That alone is sufficient to condemn us to eternal punishments, by the sentence of him, who shall judge the whole world.

The second remedy.
Cogitemus, nequaquam licere nobis orare, nec iratas sundere preces ad Deum; quotidie erdamus nos à corpore migraturi, nihilque, nobis continentia castitatis, nihil abrenunciatione facultatum, nihil divitiarum contemptu, nihil jejuniorum, vigiliarum labori. bus confe-, rendum, quibus propter iracundiam solam & odium ab universitatis judice supplicia promittuntur æterna.
Cassian. l. 8. c. 21. de institutis Renunt.

Take not this as my saying, but take it as an oracle which that great man hath collected from many holy men of his age. When you keep in your heart some hatred against your neighbour, you do a notable wrong to your soul. For first, what have we more sweet, more merciful then altars? There we should seek for mercy, if God had banished it from all the parts of the world; and yet whilst you defer reconciliation with your enemy, you deprive your self of the right of altars: and if you still have some spark of Christianity, as often as you approach to them you hear the voice of the son of God, who speaketh to you in the bottome of your heart, and saith these words of the Gospel; Go first of all, and reconcile your self to your brother, and then you shall come to offer your sacrifice of the altar. By despising these words of our Saviour, and going on, you commit a new sacriledge; by recoyling back, and avoiding the altar and sacrifice, you fly from pardon, and life. And then in what a state are you? what necessity is there that for sparing a good word, you must perpetually live either a sacrilegious, or an excommunicate person?

Vade prius, reconciliare fratri tuo, & tunc veniens offeres munus tuum. Matth. 5. 24.

The third remedy.

Lastly, you must think you are not immortal: the very moment which is now in your hands you must divide it with death: even the sun (which you to day have seen to rise out of his couch) before his setting, may see you in your Tomb. Moreover, know that should you all your life time have preserved an inviolable virginity; should you have built a thousand hospitals, and spent your whole estate in entertaining of the poor; should you have lived in Hair-cloth, among thorns, and in great abstinencies, if you into the other world carry a dram of resolved and determinate hatred of a neighbour, with unwillingness to hear any words of reconciliation, all, which may be in you of virtue or merit, will nothing avail you; your lot shall be with reprobate souls and devils. O God! what a sentence what a Decree, what a punishment is this? and who would now purposely cherish hatred against his neighbour, unless he had lost all Reason, all sense, and discretion. Let us conclude with the third remedy, against the furious and bloudy, who are not content to fume, but like unto Ætna, do throw forth their all inflamed bowels, nor are ever satiated but with outreages & humane bloud. This is it which makes us to behold the goodly duels which have in all times been the profession of servile souls, of fools, or mad men. There we see men, bewitched with a cursed and damnable opinion, seeking upon the least injury to require reparations sealed with humane bloud; to engage seconds to make them complices of their crime, and companions of their misery; to send challenges many times by pages apparelled like women, then to cut one anothers throat with horrible fury; to drag a long chain of allies to make a pitch'd battel of a single combat; and mothers and wives in the mean time to tremble in expectation of the issue of this butchery. Some slight fellow, who hath a soul miserably shallow and base, to cover his cowardice and acquire reputation, will wash his impurity in humane bloud. It is not courage which puts him forward; he who would behold him a little in the business, should see him ready to swoon, to wax pale, and tremble. If he would follow his own nature, he would fly a hundred leagues off and never look behind him: but for a little vanity, that Hacksters may praise him and say he hath sought a duel, he tormenteth his mind, and especially when he is among pots and glasses he shews himself valiant. Ah (Rodomont) Is this your business? you cannot speak, but you must menace to slash a man. Bloudy beast! where have you learnt this, but in the school of Furies and devils? and do not say? he hath put an affront upon me. What affront? a cold countenance, a harsh word, a piece of foppery which you would never have taken notice of, had you not been void of the reason of an honest man. None would affront you, were not you your own affront: behold the root of all these inflamed angers. And he who will give remedy to them, must cut them off in his imagined contempt, where indeed there is none; and therefore it is fit he retire to the haven of silence, and lessen what he may in his imagination, the injury which he thinks he hath received: when you shall have well weighed it, you will find that you of a fly have made an elephant. The true means to forgive all the world, and to pardon it, is to judge of offences, before we be angry. There are offences which we should laugh at; others, which we at least should defer; and some we should speedily pardon.

Multos absolvemus, si cœperimus ante judicare quàm irasci. Senec 3. de ira, c. 29. Terminum etiam maris fluctibus ac tempestatibus fabricator destripsit, arena maris exigua sæpe inter duas acies intercapedo est, si reprimere iram non potui, memento quia indignabundus mare ut altra spumam & fluctuationem effert Simocatta.

If this stay you not, at least think upon the end, and say, Behold a quarrel which begins to be enkindled, there is nothing wanting but a poor word, fair, and advised; yea verily but meer silence, to give remedy thereto. If I augment it instead of lessening it, I do put fire to dry wood, which will make a terrible havock to consume me first. I must be a homicide, or a sacrifice to death, or live in brawls, quarrels, and eternal divisions, which will involve parents, children, brothers, cousins, and a whole posterity. Behold the goodly fruit which brutish anger bringeth. Since I can prevent all this by a little discretion and patience; am I such an enemy of my own good as willingly to seek my proper ruine! The sea is tempestuous, but then needs but a little sand to repress it; and when it hath made all its menaces, which seemed ready to swallow all the world, it retires back, contenting it self onely to leave froath and broken shells.

The direful example of Haman, against the enraged, who are, at a little, offended.

Behold, if you have eyes, the goodly gain which Haman made of his anger; & how, seeking to remedy an affront, he transfixed himself with eternal misery. Mardochem, whom he accounted a beggar, had not saluted him at his entrance into the Kings palace, for which he must be revenged. His reason suggested to him, he was a man of no worth; why wilt thou take notice of him? No, I will destroy him. What! for not saluting thee: He is a Jew by Nation, and peradventure he hath seen on thy garments the figures of the Persian gods embroidered, and dares not bend his knee, lest it might be thought he gave this honour to thy gods, and he should be esteemed an Idolater. It is no matter, I am resolved to ruine him. If thou beest gon so far, take then the head of the culpable, and pardon all the rest who are innocent. No, I will destroy him with all his race. See, I have in my hand the King's Signet-ring, and I go to dispatch letters throughout all the Provinces, that all the Jews may be slain, which shall be found on such a prefixed day. O God! what! a slaughter for the denial of a silly salutation, to make choler swim in the tears of so many widows and orphans, in the murther of so many mortals, in the bloud of so many Provinces? Dost thou think, there is not a God in heaven to take vengeance upon such torturing cruelties? God may do what he pleaseth. But I must be revenged, my wife, and my friends advise me so. Alas! unhappy wretch! He was then, contriving his direful design, when the vengeance of God fell upon his head. Behold him disgraced, lost, and shamefully supplanted by a woman; coming to the palace of the King his Master, he heard the roaring of a lion which said, Take him away; when instantly, behold, he was hanged on a gallows fifty cubits high which he had caused to be prepared for his enemy; his ten male children were made the companions of his punishments, and his whole race was destroyed. O God of Justice! what thunders, and what tempests fall upon men of anger, bloud, and revenge? O God of the patient, and eternal mirrour of patience! may my soul for ever avoid these three regions of Gall, Hatred, and Fury, to become a Mistris over its Passions which have hitherto tormented it, And may it arrive in that fortunate Island, where divine Tranquillity dwelleth: May it enter into thy Temple; and may the eternal odours of the sacrifice of Reconciliation, of Mercy, and Propitiation mount up to thy throne, which thou taughtest us upon Calvary, in the bitter and sharp dolours of thy body, amidst the sorrow of heaven, the darkness of the sun, the opening of sepulchers, the breaking of stones, the effusion of thy bloud, and the desolation of thy Soul!

The thirteenth Treatise, of ENVY and JEALOUSIE.

The picture of Envy.

MAtthias Vienna, in the piece of work which he confesseth to have carefully laboured the space of thirty years to make a present thereof to Pope John the two and twentieth, giveth us a picture of Envy, when he depainteth it borne on a Dragon, with a Coat-armour wreathed all over with serpents, a Helmet on its head figured with Bee-hives, to signifie, that the envious like unto Bees, carry sharp and sweet; and a Target all over pourtrayed with Batts, enemies of light, as is that which beareth it. Should I amply dilate my self upon his conceits, setting aside all the invenventions of Poets and Painters upon this subject; I would place it, not in the desarts of Lybia, where the Sun onely shineth on sands and rocks, but in the midst of Virtues; because such are the objects of Envy: I would give it a fierce eye, a countenance spitefull and dusky; what is more sad and direfull; I would paint it sucking the heads of Aspicks for its ordinary repast, since so, holy Job describeth wickedness, nor should I be deceived, it living on poison: I would set two companions by its sides, which S. Bonaventure giveth it, the one whereof is called Oola, and the other Oliba: the one (saith he) signifieth the sadness which Envy hath at the prosperity of another; the other, the ignominious joy it conceiveth upon other mens disasters. I would make it dine and sup by candle light, but they should be serpentine lights, whereof the same Doctour maketh mention, which cause straws to seem like unto serpents; so the slight imperfections of men which are but straws, are by the Envious esteemed the malices of a serpent: I would have Truth present a Torch before its eyes, to dazle those infernal lights; but the miscreant should turn its face to the other side, for it hateth all which is true and solid: I would make virtue appear before it with a branch of Palm in its hand; but this caitiff should vomit up frogs, to marr this brave monument of worth, according to the ingenious model which Cypselus giveth us. (Verily, the words of the Envious are as so many frogs which on all sides besiege the benignities of virtue) I would paint round about it scritch Owls, and Hyena's, and all manner of maligne creatures. One cannot do too much to expres the malice of it. Lastly, I would make it to feed on it self, as the beast of Martreas the Inchanter, and that it should rise again out of its bloud and wounds, ever ready for new torments. For doth not this infamous passion ordinarily do so?

§. 2. The Definition of Envy, its severall kinds, and first of Jealousie.

Definition of Envy.

But let us leave this pourtraict, and tell you, that Envy (which is a sorrow one hath for the good of his like, thinking it to be prejudiciall to his own ends) ever since by the malice of our enemy it entred into the world, hath many officers, and servitours, who notwithstanding are not alike evil. I see in this Picture some like Rachel, who seeing her self barren, and her sister Leah very fruitfull, would not really cut the throat of her sisters children; but onely with much earnestness desired to have issue; and for that cause she said to her husband the Patriarch Jacob, give me children, or let me die with grief. Many (saith S. Thomas) are in this degree, which properly is Jealousie; for they are pensive, comparing their want and imperfections with the plenty and perfections of others: to see themselves reduced to that condition, albeit, they have no purpose to prejudice the prosperity they behold in another; and such are not the worst. In this rank are many old folks who envy the graces, pleasures, and good successes of young people: many men painfull and little prosperous, who are troubled at the great felicities of their likes: many merchants, and handy-crafts-men, many women and maids, who are vexed with some discontent, when they see the beauty, gracefull carriage, gentle behaviour, estimation, and account wherein their companions are: and others also are troubled to observe in them, wit, devotion, and more virtue then they could wish. Others honour these fair parts, but they would that those who have them were wholly at their dispose, without having recourse to any other.

First degree of the Envious.

Gen. 30. Da mihi liberos alioqui moriar. S. Thom 2. 2. q. 36.

The great love which many have towards themselves, and the desire they shew of coveting to be in all things the onely of their kind, are the seeds of infinite many Jealousies. So we see old Captains, (who having been eminent in a thousand occasions, and having bred and raised to themselves a flourishing reputation out of a world of labours, and in a very long course of years) are stung to the quick when they hear speech of some new prowesses of young people, daring and fortunate, who find out short wayes to hasten to the Temple of honour, and do in little time that which others could not with much pain, industry, service, and toil. This afflicteth the hearts of men experienced; to whom it then seems that this new-come-man is born as a worm in wood, to gnaw and wither up the Laurels, whence they hoped to gather immortall crowns.

The seed of Jealousie.

This passion very often assaileth Prelates, Princes, Sovereign Monarchs: and by how much the dignity is exalted, so much the more the fire of Jealousie therein finds matter and bait. A man who beholdeth himself on a throne, in the most supreme glitters of glory, who seeth so many powers to bow under his feet; who is the God of Battels, of War, of Peace, Life, and of Death; the distributour of Fortunes, the arbitratour of Differencies; who makes himself an avenging Mars, and the pacifier of minds when he pleaseth; who marcheth environed with lightnings of arms, who sendeth thunders and tempests, and calm air in the midst of storms, cannot endure a Companion in this dignity. The least suspicions cause wounds in the mind, which are many times waited on by anger, poison, fury, and massacres. Bloud and affinity is not therein acknowledged, is not assured; virtue hath no credit; parents will have no children, how perfect soever; yea, even those who are worn with old age, borrow vermillion to paint their faces, and still think themselves young enough to command.

Jealousie for honours and dignities.

Diadems and Scepters run the like hazard, and they have but one desire in the midst of Authority, which is, to reserve the appeals of death to themselves, and never to leave the places void, which they have once repleniſhed. This poison creepeth into Ecclesiasticks, into Priests, Religious, Graduates, into the Learned, into Doctors and Preachers, who are willing to bear sway in Letters, in Eloquence and Chairs, and to have none to argue their super-eminency; and when some one out-strips the Course of his years by the lustre of his wit, and in the beginning stands in high esteem, the old Gamesters cannot digest it. Masters spare not to lessen the credit of their scholars. Fountain-heads envy rivolets and the Sun his proper raies; especially, when some barbarous applause of people of slender judgment and little wit, giveth excessive praise to a young man, who discovereth more wind and ostent in brave undertakings then capacity. This frenzy endeavours to insinuate it self into Altars, into Tribunals of Penance, where (without touching so many deserving men, who worthily acquit themselves therein) there are some who are more jealous of their spiritual daughters, then the most passionate husbands of their wives. It seems to some, that now adayes, to have a notable penitent, is to possess a piece of land that yeilds a good revenue, or a fat Abbacy; and that they must have a perpetuall title to it. It is cunning deceit to blind their eies, to captive them, to tie them to a Confession-seat with an indissoluble indissoluble chain, not to permit then conference nor commerce with any, which may let them see their bondage, to be offended if they change Confessour, to throw out complaints, and to make it to be accounted as if it were a sin of Adultery. God forbid such a folly ever enter into a generous mind, and unworthily prophane the Sanctuary. It is very certain that all good directours imitate the sea which receiveth rivers into its bosome, without asking from whence they come, or what Country they passed through, and when they came from thence; nay, so far is it from being displeased, that it hath not any feeling of it; this being not able to cause any diminution of its greatness: so, a good spirituall Father leaveth all the souls he directeth, not in exorbitant liberty, but in a discreet permission, to go, to come, to absent themselves, to return, according as it shall be most fit for their commodity, and spirituall advancement. He neither feels them almost to come near him, or retire from him, so little is his mind busied in the distinguishment of persons.

Learned men subject to jealousie.

Jealousie goeth to Altars.

Jealousie of marriage.

One may here add the Jealousie of unfortunate Marriages, although (to say truly) it is an effect of the Passion of Love. I am not ignorant that great personages and learned Writers have thought, that Jealousie proceeded not at all from Love, because Love is obsequious, and readily taketh the tincture of the affections of the thing beloved, which the Passion of Jealousie doth not, thwarting the most innocent inclinations of a creature, and framing suspicions upon actions. But it is easie to answer to this objection, and to say, that never hath any one of understanding had the opinion that Jealousie might proceed from a generous and well rectified Love; and nevertheless it followeth not, that it doth not proceed from a Love of concupiscence, bad and inordinate. For it is very reasonable, the definition of S. Thomas stand good, as being the most judicious, who said, That Jealousie is nothing else but Love impatient of a Corrivall. And it is to no purpose to say, That there are many jealous Husbands to be found, who notwithstanding love not their Wives. For if their passion be without Love, it is not properly Jealousie, but Malignity, and Envy; because they envy them the sweetness of conversation, the good and honour they might derive from the honest conversation of persons of merit, and do resemble the Dog who eats no hay, nor suffereth the Ox to come near it. The envious man cannot endure it, out of the hatred he hath of anothers contentment; and the Jealous cannot suffer it, through the over-much love he beareth to himself, perpetually fearing least communication of love may not tend to the diminution of the good he possesseth, or pretends to have right to possess. This passion ordinarily is framed out of a dull feaver of indiscreet love; and taketh its originall in minds too greatly in love with themselves, greedy, weak, and interessed; upon one side they have a most strong imagination of the excellency of the thing beloved which they excessively affect; on the other, a certain distrust of their own small capacity, and of the uncertainty of love, which makes them perpetually to apprehend the loss of that which they love. A lover (in Plato) seeing the creature he most loved, did use to behold the stars; wished he were heaven, to look on her with as many eyes as there were stars. These eyes in my opinion, would be very proper for good love; but Jealousie is a monster with a hundred eyes which are enkindled with certain flames like to those of hell, dark and mischievous. And besides, it hath very many ears continually hearkning and receiving

The Jealousie of marriages, which may hold the first place among the envious.

Definition Jealousie according to S. Thomas.

Plato in Anthol. Grac.

all, which any one will pour into them. Its loves are rages; benefits, snares; thoughts, crimes; words, outrages; designs, follies; and events, tragedies. So soon as it observeth in the things beloved the least inclination to another, suspicions are framed, distrusts and giddy fantasies in a man who would willingly number his wives hairs on her head, for fear lest she should have laid apart some of them to give them to a lover. And if these suspicions be fortified by some ill accident, or some reports of a venomous tongue, then do we see anger, anxiety, fury, and despair to come forward, which many times run to fire and bloud, to precipices and halters. What is more ugly or monstrous then this passion? Think you not you see the pit of the Abyss, whereof S. John speaketh in his Apocalyps, when he saith, That the pit of the Abyss is open, and the smoke comes out of it as from a great fornace, wherewith the Sun is darkned, and in the midst of this smoke strange grashoppers are seen which waste and consume all that is verdant. What is the pit of the Abyss, but Jealousie? And what are those smokes, but its suspicions? and what is the darkned Sun, but Reason all over oppressed by Passion? and what are those grashoppers, but the evil effects of cruel Jealousie which over-runneth mankind? Ah! How many innocent Ladies have been wounded by this monster in their honour, more precious with them then life! Ah! How many miserable wives have served for victims to the fury of enraged husbands, who have thrust a sword through the moiety of their own flesh to satisfie their barbarous Tyranny! Our eyes are still moistned with this bloud, and our minds cannot speak of it but with horrour. All the Jealousies men entertain for the goods and persons of the world, have this proper that they presently make their deformity appear in the disorder of sundry passions which tos and turmoil them.

Description of Jealousie.

Compared to the pit of the Abyss. Apoc. 9. 2.

Who could see a jealous heart, should behold a huge swarm of disturbers and suspicions which issue thence, as spirits of Hell, and hasten to whisper in its ear; she becometh cool in love; she was in such a place to watch an opportunity to see such an one. If she be simple, she dissembles; if she be prudent, she is cunning; if she be pensive, she contriveth plots; if she be lightsome, she figureth fruition to her self. Never did a more detestable plague come out of the Abyss to trouble the peace of Marriages; never was any thing seen so unjust, never any thing so cruell. An innocent creature who abhorreth sin as hell, sees her self wounded in reputation, more dear to her then life, transfixed with mortall arrows all covered over with ordure and bloud in the soul of a passionate man: afterward this unhappinesse stretching farther, first filleth the house with division, then the neighbours with curiosity, and the whole City with a tale which trotteth on tongues.

The havock it makes in the heart.

Advice to women.

Many times they pass from sport to actions tragicall, direfull, and diabolicall. It hath happened that Jealous women running up and down the streets and fields, to discover their husbands loves, have been torn in pieces by wild beasts: and husbands have been hanged and strangled for having sought by infamous wayes into the secret of confession. Many times banishments and murders have followed which have put all into combustion: witness Theodosius his apple, and Mariamne, of whom I have spoken very amply in the first volume of this Book. It is undoubted, that a husband makes his wife loyall, by accounting her such, and that he who suspecteth evil in an innocent creature, gives her occasion of sin. Never doth a generous husband slightly fall into into these weaknesses. Women also are most injurious when they give cause of suspicion by a licentious life which striketh the understanding of the most stupid man. It is to cast oil into the flame, and to wish it may not burn, when one in all occasions carrieth her self ill, and cannot epdure suspicions, which ordinarily wait on actions too free, as the shadow on the body. And that which is more insupportable is, that certain women chaste enough in their conscience, will needs many times appear Libertines to increase the distrusts of a husband, and to hold his soul in a hell of torments; when they should by all wayes endeavour to divert his Jealousies.

A woman is ill advised to complain of the Jealousie of her husband, when she thinks it sufficeth to have a husband for the Sacrament, and a friend for her own liking; and so that she preserve her self from the extremity of Infamy, that all is permitted her in wedlock. When she imagines it a decent thing to be alone, and (in the obscurity of darkness with men who are not reputed Angel-Raphaels, guardians of Chastity) to roam and run up and down the streets, orchards, and gardens; to hearken after appointments, walks, and junketings; to receive and write love-letters; to be quaint, and to desire to be esteemed such; to serve others in their humours, and to wish to be alike served; to wear a wanton garment; to be bare-brested; to talk freely; to live wantonly; to despise all that is said to follow her own pleasure. Doth not all this tend to prostitution of Honour, and to shipwrack of Chastity?

§. 3. Two other branches of this stock, which are Indignation, and malicious Envy with Calumny its companion.

Two other sorts of the envious Indignation.

But let us lay aside that which concerneth the Jealousies of marriage. There are others plunged in this passion, who have a perpetual indignation to see those to prosper who are really wicked, or whom they in their thoughts do imagine to be so. They would willingly call God in question, and see not (to speak with S. Augustine) that the fish which they esteem happy in the bait, hath the hook already in his throat. I behold others who afflict themselves, and are unquiet, not for these considerations onely, which were more tollerable; but because others are far more excellent then they, either in wit, industry, beauty, or in estate, desirous (out of an irregular appetite of proper excellency, and most palpable ambition) to stand in all things transcendently conspicuous, to the prejudice and abasement of others: and such Envy (saith the most eminent of Doctours) is of all, the most perfect and absolute; and is ordinarily to be found among concurrencies of age, of fortune, and profession. We see others who are not content with simple thoughts, but thrust their passion forward to wretched effects; and I observe that these are disposed to evil by divers motives. Some have a dark and cloudy Envy; as the Philistims who went and secretly filled the pits with earth, which the Patriarch Abraham had made with much labour for the benefit of many: so we behold them, who silently seek to frame obstacles against all the good works which they observe to be begun, casting the stone of scandall as far as they can, then pulling back the arm which threw it. Others are possessed with a furious and fantastick Envy; as that of Saul, who setting himself loose to the extravagancies of his maligne spirit, sought to transfix David with his Launce to the wall, when he for his Recreation plaid on the Harp: so we see mischievous souls, who out of a transportation of frenzy, do brutish acts against such as wish them well. Others have a determinate Envy, and a formall habitude, which proceedeth to rage, to glut themselves in bloud and massacres; such was that of Joseph's brothers, and of Cain who embrewed his hands in the bloud of Abel, out of the jealousie of a sacrifice.

Augustin. in Psal. 91.

1. Reg. 18. 11.

It seldome happens, but that this Fury concludeth in some execrable Tragedy. At least, it hath calumny for a perpetuall companion, which is a hideous monster, whose picture antiently Apelles drew. He figureth it unto us a Woman (for it is a feminine vice) to skirmish with the Tongue in the want of courage and virtue. It hath by its sides two waiting-women, one whereof is called Surprizal, and the other Deceit, because these are the two vices which make Calumny prevail; the one surprizing credulous spirits; the other sophisticating and disguizing Truth. It is very curiously decked and pranked up; for who would not abhor it, if it had not some exteriour attractive to surprize the unwary? It nevertheless shews in its countenance passion and rage; for it is as hard to hide Love and Hatred, as a Cough or Fire. It holds in one hand a Torch, like that of the Furies; and who hath not heard that a great personage called it the Phaëton of the world, because it sets all afire, and in combustion? With the other hand she catcheth a poor man by the hair, as if she were ready to strangle him; and albeit he implore heaven and earth to his aid, there is not any one to deliver him out of the hands of this murthereſs. These are the effects of the tyranny of this passion. Before it, marcheth a vast fellow, dry, frightfull, and lean, whose eyes are sharp: He is Envy's Agent, and the inseparable companion of Slander. On the right hand is seen a man with great ears, such as were Midas's, who makes a shew to receive this impostress with open arms. Ignorance and Suspicion (seeing the disposition and inclinations he hath) do put a yoke about his neck, and lead him by the nose. Behold just so they are composed who readily hear Detractions. They for the most part are open-eared to receive all poured in; but otherwise suspicious and ignorant. Lastly, Repentance cometh behind, all mourning, and ill clad, saying, What have we done? This creature was innocent, and then with a finger sheweth Truth, which in the Evening presenteth her self to enlighten darkness. It is the misery of humane things, that one never almost repenteth a wickedness, but when it is remedileſs. Nothing may be added to the conceit of this excellent Painter, so happily he hath hit it. I will onely say, that if you desire to know the officers and inferiour ministers of this tyrannicall Passion (they are not all equall in qualities or vices) I find three principall Orders of them.

Lipsius de Calumnia.

Divers degrees of Calumniations.

The first is, of those who slander of purpose to vilifie the actions of others, and to weaken their reputation, whether they be disposed thereto by some motive of pride which cannot endure any thing eminent but it self, or through some jealousie; (as it happeneth in concurrencies of professions and conditions) or out of some pretension of interest. These are not gone so far yet, as to black Slander: for they do not report any criminall matters; but content themselves to fall upon some defects, sometimes slight, and sometime sufficiently ently apparent: yea, they seem to be reserved in matter of Slander; for they do as the Spies of the Land of Promise, who first told its beauties and singularities, before they mentioned its monsters: They lick the person before they bite, they know the number of his virtues and perfections, as if they had undertakē to make Panygerick of them, saying, this man is witty, is sober, is temperate, is just, and other such like; nevertheless there is always a conclusion, which in the end marrs all. You see likewise of this sort, who cover the praises of another under a sad silence; others, who ascribe to chance that which was out of virtue; others, who by comparison of excellent men extenuate the acts of him whom they would blame; others, who punctually decipher all the defects of a good action; others, who say they have great compassion of his imperfections of whom they speak, and would have supplyed them at their own charge, if it were in their power. To conclude, all such have some honest cloke for their Passion.

The second order is much more dangerous; for it comprehendeth those who publickly and confidently speak of defects not common and incident, but important and notable. So you find an infinite number of them in the world, who seem to have studied the lives, the estates, the families, and genealogies of a whole City; and as nothing can exempt it self from the curiosity of their eys, so none escapeth the poison of their tongues.

The third order is that of the Devil, the father of Calumniatours, and containeth such as invent mischiefs and crimes with defamatory libels, to brand the reputation of persons most innocent, and many times very virtuous. And as it is said, that the ink of the Cuttle-fish poured into lamps, maketh the bravest pieces of Painting to be seen with horrour; so these wicked tongues, when they have cast their poison upon the lights of a life the most innocent, make it appear with hideous deformities. One cannot say how damnable this vice is, for it proceedeth from a source of Hell, to ruine and extirpate all the members of humane society: and if there be a disorder which deserveth that all men detest it, and by common consent make war against it, This stands in the first place. Such as forge Calumnies are extremely detestable; but those who lend their ears to receive them, and do easily believe all which is suggested to their credulity (against the same persons whom they have loved, without hearing their justification) grievously offend the divine Majesty, and shew they have little judgment, but much wilfulness. An ear very hard to evil reports, is needful in a time when the tongue is so soft, and streaming in an overflow of words.

§ 4. Humane remedies of Envy.

Humane remedies against Envy.

IF you at this present seek for humane remedies which may be applied against the poisonous passion of Envy and Jealousie; I can then tell you that this evil laies hold very often by the eys; and that it is expedient to guard them with a careful heed, and to divert them what one may from objects which are of power to excite many inordinate motives in the soul in this kind. To what purpose is it to be so curious in the affairs of one, towards whom you have no affection; since by understanding his prosperities, you very often learn your own disasters? you look on his lands, his houses, his bravery, his pomp, his family, his alliance, his friends, and all that (entring into your heart through the curiosity of your eys causeth therein fits of a lingring feaver) which wastes and consumeth you. The amorous eye sucketh in a sweet poison, and the envious eye feeds it self with a venome which is full of bitterness. It (peradventure) expecteth, that beholding the parts of the person it hateth, it shall see the mischief it wisheth; but God permits it there, to find what least it would, and that those envenomed aspects serve for a torment to the soul.

S. Gregory Nyssen in the life of Moses saith it resembleth the Vulture whom carrions nourish, and persumes kill. All the evil it meeteth, prepareth a refection of Serpents for its mind; and all the good, afflicteth it to death. Greg. Nyss. in vita Mosis.

Accustome not your self likewise easily to believe those tale-tellers, who (to gain your good liking by base servitude) relate the vices and disasters of the party whom you envy: for, that much avails to foment your Pasion. Prosper hath sagely said, that the envious are ready to believe all the evils in the world which the tongue of a complaining spirit telleth them touching the mishaps of such as they hate; and if any one by chance (not knowing the disease) happen to speak good of them; they sufficiently witness by their contradiction, that they believe not what they say. Prosp. l. 3. de contemplat. c. 9. Omne malum quod mendax fama citaverit statim credunt: seraliter ei, qui illud verum non esse probare voluerit, contradicunt.

Secondly, it is very behoofful incessantly to labour in the mortification of pride, and the exorbitant appetite of ones own proper excellency, as being the principal root of the pasion of Envy, as affirmeth the fore-alledged Authour, saying, that Sathan became envious out of pride, and not proud through Envy; we must infer, Pride is not the fruit of Envy, but Envy a sprout of Pride. The ambition you have, every where to have the highest place, to be in great esteem, to possess a petty sovereignty in all favours, necessarily makes you envious and jealous; so that one cannot praise any body in your presence, but that this commendation instantly seems to tend to the diminution of your reputation: Your heart bleeds at it, and the bloud flieth up into your face; nature arms her self to beat back a good office (which a charitable tongue would render a person of merit) as if it were a great injury, and a suit commenced against you. It is a sign you deserve little praise since you cannot endure it in another. How would you be esteemed, since you first of all betray your own reputation, shewing your self to be of so weak a judgment that one cannot speak a good word of another, but it ministers matter of an evil thought in you? Were you as rich in merits, as your mind figureth to you; you would no more be moved, when a good word is spoken of another, then a man infinitely wealthy, to give a small piece of coine to a poor creature who were in want. Non superbia fructus invidiæ fuit, sed invidia de superbia radice processit. Prosper. ib. Multis abundat virtutibus, qui alienas amat. Vincen. Bel. l. 1. c. 7.

I add also a third remedy (that many have found to be very efficacious) which is, to know, and much to esteem the gifts God hath given us; to content our selves with what we are, and with the state the divine Providence allotteth us, without attempting on forreign hopes, which would (perhaps) be great evils unto us. S. Chrysologus saith, that Envy once shut up Terrestrial Paradise with a sword of fire: but I may say, it daily stoppeth from us the sources of many contentments which would plentifully moysten all the parts of our life: that many would be happy, if they could tell how to manure their fortune, could content themselves with their own mediocrity, and take the felicities which Nature presenteth them, without being troubled at others. Miserable that they are, not knowing how to be happy, unless another be unhappy! unfortunate Paradisi nobis amœna flammea custode sepsit.

that they are, to forsake Roses which grow in their Gardens, to hasten to reap thorns in their Neighbours! Tertullian writeth, the Pagans in his time were so inraged against the Christians, that all their comforts seemed nothing to them in comparison of the pleasure they took to hate and torment them. This is the fury which many envious now a days practice. All their prosperities fade, all their joys languish, and all their good successes never are accomplished, whilest they see those to flourish whom they persecute. It grieves them they are what they are, that God hath fixed them in a mean condition, and that they are not born to be of those great Colosses, which shrink and daily fall by the sole burthen of their weight. If they knew the black phantasms of cares which leap on the top of silver Pillars, and go athwart gilded Marbles (to find out these pompous lives who most commonly have but the bark of happiness) they would every day a thousand times bless their condition: but this malign ignorance which sealeth up their eys, makes them complain of all that they should love, and causeth them to love all they ought to complain of.

Tanti non est bonum, quanti est odium Christianorum.

Lastly, to remedy the bitings of Envy, you must entertain a spirit of love and correspondence, often representing unto your self, that a man who loveth none but himself, and wholly lives to himself (not able to endure the prosperities of another) is a piece unloosened from this great Universe which altogether bendeth to the unity of our Sovereign God, who is one in Essence, and who gathereth all creatures into the union of his heart. What would this jealous man have, who is so desperately passionate concerning this creature? Doth he not well see, that loving so inordinately he takes the course to be no longer loved by her, and loseth all he desireth most, by the violence of desiring it? A woman out of a desire to be beloved, would not be tyrannized over. She wisheth love, not fury; fire of Seraphins, not of Devils. These Courtships are offences to her: these suspicions, injuries: these prohibitions, rigours; these solitudes, imprisonments. How can she love a man, who loves not any but himself, who will play a God in the world, who will fetter the freedom of creatures, which is, the Will: for which God himself hath made neither bands nor chains? How can she affect an Argus who observeth her, who watcheth her, who reckoneth up her words, who questeth at her thoughts, who prepareth racks of the mind for her in the most innocent pleasures? The sole consideration of the ruines and miseries which envy and jealousie do cause to themselves, were able to stay these exorbitancies, were it once well considered: but if these humane reasons seem yet too weak, raise your self to divine.

§. 5. Divine Remedies drawn from the Benignity of God.

Remedy by the consideration of the first model.

God doth all by seeing and by being seen.

O Man! Behold (for a first remedy, among all the divine ones) thy first model, and contemplate the benignity of God opposed to thy malice. It is an excellent thing to consider against an envious ey; that God, who will reform us to his likeness, doth all the good to the world by simple seeing, and by being seen. For by seeing, he giveth Essence and Grace; and by being seen, he causeth Heaven and Beatitude. Thus doth Saint Augustine assure us, that the Science of God is the cause of all things, which draweth Being from the Abyss of nothing, and brings the shades of death into light. The World is known by us, because it is; but it is, insomuch as it is known by God, so efficacious this knowledge is. O what a goodly thing it had been, to see this great World, how it displayed its self in all its pieces, and smiled in all its mansions under the ey of God! The Heavens were stretched forth like a Curtain, the Stars were enchased in the Heavens as Diamonds, the Clouds suspended in the air as floating bodies, the Air was diversified in Meteors, the eternal veins of Fountains began to stream, the Earth to cover its bosom, and liberally to afford us, out of its entrals, infinite many blessings from the benignity of his aspects.

Tell me not that, which the natural History mentioneth, that the Ostritch hatcheth her little ones by the rays of her eys; yet never shall she bring forth Eggs by looking on the earth: but the Ey, (that is to say) the Knowledge of God, hath such virtue, that it is the maker of all creatures. O beauty! O greatness! O goodness! Beauty, to inhabit in the Idea of God, as in a Paradise of Glory. Greatness, to have a capacity infinite. Goodness, to rest in the bowels of the mercies of the Creatour.

The differences of our knowledges from those of God.

See (a little) the difference that is between our knowledges, and that of God: you think it a goodly matter to know a man, and to wish him well; yet he thereby becomes neither white nor black, hot nor cold, good, rich nor learned; for, our knowledges are small in their capacities, limited in their effects, and inefficacious in their operations. How many brave Captains, and learned Authours are there, who are still well thought of in the opinion of men! but whether they be living, or whether they be dead (if their Souls be in an ill state) this knowledge, and this love nothing contributeth to their felicities. But so is it not with the knowledge of God (I speak of an amorous knowledge:) It gives Being, and Grace: Being, because all things known by God, are, in God, in a more noble manner, then in themselves.

Here, we behold dying creatures who fade, wither, and shrink insensibly into nothing, were they not supported by the Divine hand: but, in the house of God, in the Palace of Essences, the Summers are of Cypres (saith the holy Canticle) insomuch as all therein is immortal, vigorous, perfect, and incorruptible: and there it is, where the blessed (who have not here seen the world but by two eys of flesh, and have seen it tottering, and altogether imperfect) behold it in God, fully stable, equal, and absolute, in all its dimensions. The Saints perpetually have before their eys the incomprehensible mirrour of the Divinity, in which they at ease behold all that which concerneth them, and may conduce to their greater contentment. Cant. 1.17.

Beatis pervium est omnis forme illud divinitatis ἀρχέτυπον, in quo, quicquid eorum interest, illustrissimi Concil. Senonense.

I add, that this knowledge causeth Grace. For, what makes Predestination, but that preparation of grace and glory which God hath conceived from all Eternity in his understanding, to communicate it to his Elect? See what God doth, seeing; and, God seen; what doth he else but actually make Heaven, and Beatitude which consisteth in the clear vision of God? So soon as a soul predestinated to enjoy without delay the glory of Heaven, is gone out from the bands of its body: it hath for guide, this divine splendour which Divines call the light of Glory, which is a quality infused into the understanding, that so elevates and fortifies it beyond its condition, that it is able to endure the lightning flash of Eternal Beatitude. Is it not of this light, holy Job spake, when he said, He hideth light in his hands, and saith to his friend, it is his inheritance and possession.

Then

Then God (all good) communicateth himself to this Soul enobled with such a quality, not by some image or representation, but by its very essence intimately united to the glorified understanding, and from thence, what followeth, but an admirable transformation! The Soul is wholly absorpt in felicity: and, as a small drop of water poured into the Sea, instantly takes the colour, and tast of the Sea. So the Soul's tast is fully inebriated, and coloured with the Divinity: it is almost no longer in its self, but becometh wholly like to God, not by nature but by participation. We know (saith S. John) when we shall see him, we shall be like him. And S. Gregory Nazianzen dareth to call it God. And as we have two principal parts of the soul to content; the Understanding and the Will: so God all benign abundantly satisfieth them, making thither to stream, as by two Dugs of glory, all the delights and contentments proportioned to their condition. For the understanding which naturally desireth to know, is illuminated by a most excellent knowledge of things the most hidden which it seeth in God (as in an incomprehensible Mirrour) and seeth them, not in the manner of the wise men of the world, who flutter round about Sciences, as little Flies about Lamps that singe their wings, and make their tomb in the flames: but it seeth them with a vision sublime, calm, and delicious, which giveth to the Will (that is made to love) amorous eagerness, ever desiring, and ever having what it desireth. O what miracles doth the eye of God (enkindling with one sole aspect of many Divinities) when it maketh so many blessed ones, like unto it self! as if the Sun rising should, in the Heavens, create a million of little Suns; and on earth, an infinity of Diamonds: all which should bear the image of this bright Star.

Joan. ep. 1. Greg. Naz. Hymn.

Avidi, & semper plenique quod habent desiderant. Pet. Damia. in Hymn. de gloria Paradis.

All those blessed ones illustrated by this aspect (albeit they shine diversly according to each one's merit) are so far from envy, receiving the flames of eternal Goodness; that every one accounteth the felicity of his companion, for the accomplishment of his own. There you shall hear no speech of envy occasioned by inequality of felicity, where the union of Charity shall eternally reign. Go to then, O thou Envious, O thou malign Man! God hath made thee to his likeness, to carry, as he, (in proportion) rays of love and compassion in thy eys, towards men; and thou there beareſt gall, bloud, and poyson. Nay, so far art thou otherwise, that if it were in thy power to make benefits to grow from thy aspects, thou wouldst rather desire the eye of a Basilisk, to poyson, burn, and consume the estate and person of thy Neighbour. O miserable Owle, where wilt thou find waters strong enough to wash a stain so criminally opposite to the sovereign bounty of the Creatour.

The blessed although unequall in glory are not envious.

Non erit tibi aliqua invidia disparis claritatis, ubi regnat unitas charitatis. Augus.

§6. The merciful Eye of Jesus serves for an Antidote against all sorts of Envy.

The eye of Jesus watching, sparkling, weeping.

LEt us next consider the second Model; and if we be stung by the bitings of Envy, let us cast our eys upon Jesus Christ, as heretofore did the Israelites on the brazen Serpent, to free themselves from Serpents of fire. The eye of Jesus was a gentle eye, and eye of love, of compassion, and of mercy, which opened (as the Gates of the East) to let in day-light, and the spirit of life. It always had in our cause the symptoms which Physicians gave a sick eye, which is, to watch, to sparkle, and to weep: yea, the eye of the Saviour of the World was to watch incessantly for our Salvation, even to the passing of nights in Oratories dedicated to God, as S. Luke observeth. Is it not this eye the Prophet Jeremy meant, when he said, I see a waking rod? The Interpreters think he alluded to the Scepter of the Kings of Egypt, which had an Eye pourtrayed upon the top of it: and that such was the Scepter and power of Jesus for our sakes; a power not harsh and imperious, but sweet and charitable: which spent it self without wast in the watches wherein it persevered for our salvation. Others, following the Hebrew letter, instead of a waking Rod, read a twig of an Almond-tree, which first of all other Trees, flourisheth, and expecteth not the Summer to tell us news of the Spring. So the eye of Jesus, so soon as it began to exercise the functions of life, was seen all in blossom, and in an amorous aspect for us. In blossom, when at his arrival, he caused the Angels to sing the Hymn of Glory and peace; of Glory to God, and of Peace to men. In blossom, when, at the age of twelve years he so sweetly darted forth beams in the Temple of his Father. In blossom, when, from the top of a Mountain, he looked on his poor famished people who wandred through the Desarts, as Sheep deprived of their sheepherd. In blossom, when he stayed upon so many miserable bodies, detained by incurable maladies, to give them health. O Eye of Jesus! Eye of the Nazarean! always flourishing and blown for the comfort of Mortals.

Et erat pernoctans in oratione Dei. Hier. 1. 11.

I say, in the second place, this Eye sparkled when he was to give the example of zeal (which it behoved him to have) the honour of his heavenly Father: then it was when he was armed with terrours and lightnings, to cast astonishment into wicked souls, and to deliver those from their tyranny who thereby were oppressed: There was seen I know not what of glittering and flaming to sparkle from his eys, and the Majesty of a Divinity did shine on his face; saith S. Jerom. Have you heretofore considered the Angel of the living God, who was as a Centinel, in the great flaming pillar of fire which led the Israelites in the passage of the red Sea? Have you observed, how (placed just in the midst of two Armies, the one whereof was of the people of God, and the other of the Egyptians) he darted rays of favour on the heads of the Elect, which were all lighted with a Celestial light, notwithstanding the thick darkness of the Egyptian night; and at the same time he threw on Pharaoh's Diadem and on his warlike Horses the avenging Dart of God's anger, to involve them in remediless misery? So the eye of our Lord hath always beheld (and at this day likewise doth lovingly behold) such as fear his holy name, and do tremble out of the reverence they bear to his Divine Majesty: but as for perverse souls, who have hands armed against Heaven, he hath sparklings sharp and quick, which are the messengers of his justice. As for thee (Libertine) this sparkling ey; for thee (Harpy) for thee (bloudy Devil) for thee wicked creature) it throws forth sparks of fire which in this life will begin to burn thy sinful soul: but, as for souls (chast and loyal) he hath sweet influences, and mercies. In the last place, I likewise say, to shew the benignity of this eye, that it was almost always weeping, and dropping for us in tears a thousand times more pretious then those of Myrrhe. O what tears were those of Jesus! Jesus was the Firmament which divided waters from waters, heavenly tears from earthly tears. And seeing Interpreters say, that the mass of waters was divided into two substances, whereof the one, congealing into a bright Chrystal, made Heaven? and the other, remaining on the earth, made the Sea; I may say, the tears of Jesus were all Chrystalline, and wholly celestial, as that Palace of God, which we see over our heads; but ours are salt, bitter, and storm like the Sea. Jesus yet walking on the earth was, towards the wicked and proud, a mount Sinai, which roared, thundred, lightned, and seemed to be as the Charriot of the God of Hosts; but in respect of the miseries of the earth, and the pains likewise which waited on sinners; he was a Mount Lebanon that ceased not to make the waters stream forth in the spring, which issued from the snows wherewith the winter had wholly covered it. Jesus the true Lebanon, in whiteness of innocency: Jesus the true Lebanon, in the continual waters of his eys, which can no more be dried up then the fountains of Lebanon. Jesus also the true Lebanon, in the sweetness of the odours of his eternal sacrifice. He burnt as the incense of Lebanon, and dissolved as the snow of Lebanon; at the same time, giving us fire and water; Fire to enkindle our love, water to wash our sins: O how these waters have quenched the flames of the sword of the Cherubim, able to burn all the earth with the fire of Justice! O how sweetly distilled these tears for us on the day of his birth, when he moistned the clouts of his poverty! O how often have these tears bathed his eys in the sacrifice of prayer! O how pitifully these tears bedewed the pomp of his triumph, when he wept over miserable Jerusalem! O how efficacious were these tears, when he offered them for us in the bloudy Sacrifice of the Cross, and rendred up his sweet soul into the hands of his heavenly Father, bleeding, and weeping, and looking this last time on the earth in his mortal conversation, to lift it up to Heaven!

§. 7. A Detestation of Envy.

Will we not then enter into the joy of God by participation of the joys and prosperities of men, whence we shall take a holy and magnificent possession in the quiet we shall find in our hearts, perswading our selves that that saying is most true, That he who loveth virtues in another, hath them abundantly in himself? There is not any way more short or honourable to felicity, then to arrive thither by a contentment taken in the happiness of our likes. In wishing their hurt, we resemble the Thunderbolt, which to strike a Rock, breaks the cloud that bred it; we ruine our selves by our proper labours, and profit not but by the Justice of our punishment. But by loving in another, that which others envy, we shall become absolutely rich, and totally powerful in the Kingdom of perfect love. Let us not satisfie our selves with not envying any, and to take pleasure in the good success of good men; but let us have an eye of affections, a liberal hand, and a heart wide open to the exercise of charity, always remembring two rare documents given by two great Apostles, S. Peter and S. Bartholomew.

Multis abundat virtutibus qui alienas amat. Plin. Jun. in Epist. ad Cornel.

The first teacheth us that the virginity of the soul consisteth in brotherly love. Rendring (saith he) your souls chaste in the obedience of charity, in the brotherly love, which you ought mutually to preserve. The other hath in S. Denis, left us in writing this Royal Sentence, which saith, Love is the greatest, and least Theology, because all is abbreviated in this great Word. Who is it then would enter into the Hell of Jealousie, to rob himself of all the joys of chaste marriage, and to live like Ixion on the wheel of an eternal torment? Were is not much better, to tear away this frantick love, this troublesome curiosity, this easiness to believe tales, this rashness of judgment, and all that which fomenteth passion; then to raise matter of Laughter, of Comedies, and Tragedies, to defile your conscience, betray your bed, dishonour your children, and ruine your house?

Thou envious, and jealous creature! what dost thou answer to this eie of our celestial Father, which causeth by seeing, Essence and Grace, and by being seen produceth heaven? What dost thou answer to this eye of Jesus, waking, sparkling, and weeping for thee? Wilt thou yet have an eye of the Basilisk to scorch plants, break stones and kill men? Ah thou pusillanimous thing! to be envious against thy neighbour for a good which thou hast not, and which thou with excessive passion desirest. Thou dost envy profit, thou envyest credit, honour, riches, and the talent of nature, and all which thy jealous heart beholdeth. Thou wilt not (saist thou) bereave others, but dost only complain of the want thou findest in thy self. And how knowest thou whether these blessings (thou seekest for, with desires as ardent as fire) Would not be great evils unto thee? How knowest thou whether in prosperity and abundance thou mightest not lose thy self with ingratitude, forgetfulness of God, arrogance, and sin? How knowest thou whether the Saviour of the world hath not expressly deprived thee of these temporal favours, to assure thy predestination? Cease to envy, that, which God will not give thee. Ah! Thou on the other side, to be perpetually arguing with God about the prosperity of sinners, and out of petty infidelities to waver in the belief of his holy Providence. Ignorant of celestial blessings, and stupid admirer of the bread of dogs! who seest not that all these favours are rough obligations, and rich punishments, which will rather increase the misery of the wicked, then lessen their pain. God promiseth thee a Kingdom if thou be faithful; and thou longest for the dishes which sinners feed on at the table of the world, even tearing one another with a thousand torments, and as many disturbances. And thou on the other side, wicked as thou art, not only to envy the good of thy neighbour, but to desire, and work his hurt with impatient madness, one while biting his reputation, another while hindring his good; one while deliberately wishing his death, and another while having direful enterprises upon his life: what canst thou expect from this infernal passion, but an eternal damnation? Wouldst thou know whom thou are like? Behold (I pray) in Histories the Mount Ætna which rends and throweth forth its all-inflamed entrails, as if it would scorch and consume the flowers, which in the mean time flourish upon its top. Thou ceasest not to cry out, to storm, to thunder against this man; Thou castest forth fire and flames from thy throat, with which it seems thou art resolved to vomit up thy heart infected with poyson. What gettest thou by this brutish fury? This man whom thou wouldst swallow alive, by the permission of God shall flourish over thy head.

Joseph triumphant mauger the enraged envy of his brothers.

Let us go, let us go to seek in Judea for the cruel brothers of Joseph, and let us shew them the innocent, not any longer groaning under the weight of fetters, but borne on the wings of glory, and mounted upon the Chariot of Pharaoh, in a habit full of Majesty, and in a pomp which dazleth the eyes of those, who have now no other word in their monthes but Abrech, Abrech, which was an Acclamation of Joy, by which the People acknowledged him, as the Father and Protector

of

of all Egypt, Abrech, Abrech. O wretches! know
Gen. 3. 19. you this man? This is he, of whom you said, Behold our Lord, come let us kill him.

Look well upon him; this is he, whom you inhumanely did despoil of his garments, to imbrew them in the bloud of beasts, and represent them to your deplorable Father, to give him the stroke of death. Acknowledge your own blond; this is he, whom you threw into the bottom of an old Cistern, and banquetted over his head. Detest your fury; This is he whom you did sell to the Amalekites; Behold what your envy hath brought him to! Bend your knee with all the people who adore him, and say, O caitif Envy, the Hang-man of the envious! mayst thou never find any habitation but in hell, whence thou first cam'st to trouble the peace of men.

Heavenly Father, I beseech thee by that Eye which createth Heaven; and (thou word Incarnate) by that Eye which hath wept so many tears of compassion and love over us, banish this fury from our hearts, and make thy holy charities there to flourish, which shall by us for ever be as much adored, as they have been to mankind profitable, who hath no subsistance but in thy mercies.

The fourteenth Treatise, of MILDNESSE and COMPASSION.

§. 1. The great Miseries of Man make Compassion necessary in the world.

HEaven is repleni shed with Sanctities, and Felicities; with sanctities without blemishes, with Felicities without disasters: and hell is filled with ordures and miseries; Ordures, which never are washed off, miseries, which are without end. But this world wherein we live, as it hath sanctities which are not without hazard, and Felicities which cannot be without change: so it hath sins waited on by pardon, and miseries comforted by remedies; yet against iniquities God hath given us penance, and against calamities, mercy. God in heaven produceth another God, not in substance, but in person, and on earth a second image of himself, which is this divine mercy. It is an infinite goodnes of the Father of nature and grace, to have here below seated this excellent passion, to the end great maladies might not be without great medicines.

Deum extra se effici, creaturis omnibus providendo, S. Maximus.

Man hath no greater evil then man.

Of all living creatures there is none more miserable then Man, nor is there any likewise more mercifull then Man, whilst he is man, and that he despoil not himself of that which God hath made him, to do that which ought never to be so much as thought on. And if he forget Mildnes, and Compassion, which is naturall to him, our sovereign Creatour teacheth it him by his own miseries. Alas! How can one man harden his heart one against another? on what side soever he look, he seeth the tokens of his infirmities; and scarce can he go a step but he finds a lesson of humility against his vanities. If he consider what is above him; he beholdeth the heavens and the air, which so waste and change his life, that (yet) without them, he cannot live: If he cast his eye round about him, and under his feet; he sees waters, which in moistening him, rot him; and earth, which being spread as a Table before his eyes, fails not to serve him for a Tombe.

Man, as he is the most miserable of all creatures, so he is the most mercifull.

It is a strange thing that even evils are necessary for him, and that he cannot overslip things which kill him. Smelling, tasting, meat and drink, sleep and repose, do with his life what Penelope did with her web: what one hour makes, another unmakes; and the very sources of the greatest blessings are found to be wholly infected with mortall poyson. But if man come to examine himself; he finds he hath a body frail, naked, disarmed, begging of all creatures exposed to all the injuries of elements, of beasts, and men; and there is not a hand so little, which strives not violently to pull off his skin. Heat, cold, drouth, moisture, labour maladies, old age, exercise him: and if he think to take a little repose, idleness corrupteth him: If he enter farther into himself, he meeteth a spirit fastned to the brink of his lips, which is invaded by an army of passions, so many times fleshed for his ruine. And yet we must truly say that of all the evils of man, there is not any worse then man. It is he who causeth wars and shipwracks, murthers and poysons; he who burneth houses, and whole Cities; he who maketh Wildernesses of the most flourishing Provinces; he who demollisheth the foundations of the most famous buildings; he who reduceth the greatest riches to nakedness; he who putteth Princes into fetters, who exposeth Ladies to dishonour, who thrusts the knife into the throats of the people, who not content with so many manner of deaths, dayly inventeth new to force out a soul by the violence of torments, by as many bloudy gates, as it receiveth wounds. Good God! what doth not man against man, when he hath once renounced humanity? Now, what remedy would there be in so great and horrible confusions which make a hell of the earth? were it not that God hath given us this wholesome mercy, which it seems is come from heaven to unloose our chains, to wipe away our tears, to sweeten our acerbities, repair our losses, and re-beautifie our felicities! Mercy tilleth the fields of heaven, and had it not descended on earth, all which God did, had been lost (saith the golden mouth of the west.)

Chrysol. ser. 41.

§. 2. The Essence of Compassion, and how it findeth place in hearts the most generous.

GOd (then) hath caused Compassion to grow in our hearts as a Celestial inspiration, which stirreth up the will to succour the miseries of another; and taketh its source (as Theology observeth) from a dislike we conceive out of the consideration of a certain dissent and disorder which we see in civil life, when we behold a man like unto us according to nature, so different in quality, and so ill handled by the mishap of the accidents of life. Thence it comes to pass that all good souls have tender hearts, and especially such as know what worldly miseries are (as learned men, and those who have had experience of them) and who think they may also feel them in the uncertainty of life and condition of humane things. The bowels of mercy open with some sweetness in the evils which nearly touch us: namely, when we see persons innocently qualified, delicate, well disposed, to fall into great calamities and ruines of fortune; Honourable old men ill used; young people snatched away in the flower of their age, & beauty; Ladies despised and dishonoured; afflictions without remedies; or remedies that come too late, when the evil is ended: and moreover, when those afflicted persons shew constancy and generosity in their affliction, it penetrateth into the deepest apprehensions of the Soul. Yet we still find, among so many objects of miseries, hearts which have no compassion; and (as if they were made of Rocks or Anvils) are never mollified with the sufferings of mortals. This proceeds in some, from a great stupidity, from a nature very savage: in others, from a narrowness of heart caused by self-love, which perpetually keeps them busied within themselves, never going forth to behold the miseries of another: in some, from long prosperities, which make them forget the condition of men: in others, from the nature of a Hang-man who takes delight in bloud, in fire, and in all horrid things. Such kind of men think Nature did them wrong, in not having given them the horn of a Rhinoceros, the paws of Bears, the throat of a Lion, the teeth of Tygers, to crush, to quail, to devour and tear men in pieces. They supply, by a cursed industry, that, which by nature faileth them. They make themselves mouths of fire by the means of flaming Furnaces, and boyling Caldrons: hands, by the invention of Iron hooks; arms, with combs of steel: fingers, with Scorpions; and feet with the claws of wild beasts. You would say, these are men composed of the instruments of all torments, or rather Devils crept into humane bodies, to create a Hell on Earth. Such are those Tonoes of Japonia, who study to saw, to hack asunder, to beat, and bray in a Morter the courage of Christians, thinking the greatest marks of their power to be Scaffolds and Gibbets, where are practised inventions of Devils to draw life, drop after drop, out of a miserable body.

Detestation of cruelty.

But not speaking at this present of these extremities of cruelty which arise out of Hell: it is evident that the hardness of heart, and the harshness of a nature devoid of Compassion, is a Monster in Humane Nature. All great Souls have (I know not what) tincture of goodness, which rendreth them pliant to the afflictions of such as suffer. It is a feeling which God hath poured into the mass of Mankind, and which he would have communicated by the prime men of the world, to all posterity. The tradition of the Hebrews holdeth, that the Patriarch Noah recommendeth mildness even among beasts, accounting it a capital Crime to tear off a member of a living beast. And the most sage Common-wealths have walked in the same ways, since, that, of Athens condemned to death a young Child, who took delight to prick out the eyes of Crows, and having made them blind, let them fly for his pastime: It judged this heart was base and bloudy, and practised its first Apprentiship of cruelty upon Birds, to exercise it one day upon men. The Carthaginians publickly condemned a very industrious Citizen for no other cause but for having made a Lion tractable, supposing that a man who had so great conversation among wild beasts would lose all he had humane in him, and put on the manners of a Tyrant.

Mildness of the first men.

Falius Quintilian. l. 3. cap. 9.

Plin. l. 8. c. 16.

What can those answer to this call of Nature, who are ashamed to compassionate their Neighbours, seeing pity extends it self even to beasts? They fear, that by shewing compassion it may be thought their courage therby is greatly effeminate; & see not that to seem valiant, they cease to be men.

Conquerours have wept over their Laurels, as yet all verdant, blaming the just rigour of their Arms, albeit, they could not hate the glory. Marcellus desired to quench the coals of the City Syracusa with his tears. Titus seeing the City of Jerusalem all covered with dead bodies, found his heart much softned therewith, protesting it was an act of Compassion of great courages.

Heaven, and not an effect of his own disposition. There is some touch of Divinity in good natures: and God hath always been pleased that they who neareſt approach to him, should be the most humane. The first Images of the Saviour of the world, were ordinarily painted in the form of a Lamb; and it was likewise a Lamb of God which represented him in Great Constantine's Font, and which poured forth the water of Baptism; to shew us that the fountains of his Bounty ran throughout the whole Church. The Holy Ghost hath never been seen in the form of an Eagle or of a Hawk, but of a Dove; to stamp on our manners the impressions of his bounty. It is an insupportable thing, when there is observed (even among those who approach neareſt to Altars, and who consecrate the Lamb of God in their hands) some to be of imperious spirits, and wills inflexible, who torment poor Subjects, and make them groan under their Commands. They resemble Semiramis who on her Banners bare a Dove, which in its beak held a bloudy Sword, as meaning to say, That under a woman's face, she had the courage and stern violence of tyrants. So their name, their character, and degree, testifieth nought but mildness; but their manners are full of rigour and acerbity, which wound hearts even to bloud. This happeneth to many out of a certain stupidity, in such sort, that it seems they entring into office, at that instant drink of the water of forgetfulness, which in them blotteth out the memory of all they were, to become that which they ought never to be. They forget their inferiours are men, who put their pretious liberty (to wit a good inestimable) into their hands as a pledge, and that they must very skilfully handle them, there being not a creature in all nature more tender or more sensible then the King of Creatures. They consider not that the power of one man over another, is a thing which is always somewhat suspected by nature on what side soever it come, and that it must be practised insensibly, so that the flesh be rather cast into a slumber, then irritated. To others, it comes from a most refined pride, which being under the Subjection of a Superiour, kept it self close in the interiour of the Soul, a Serpent inchanted, and fast asleep; but so soon as he sees himself armed with a Sword of Authority, he cuts with both edges, not sparing any one, as if the great mystery of making a dignity valuable, were to encompass it with all the Ensigns of terrour. Some are not of a bad nature, and do resemble the Sea, which is not by nature salt; but the Sun stirreth up unto it vapours, cold, dry, and terrestrial, which being burnt by heat, spread themselves on the superficies of the water, and cause saltnes: so these lights of Authority which environ a man raise smoaks in him, which, being not well tempered by prudence, leave a bitter impression on manners, communicating some haughtiness to words and conversation. It is gotten in others by a long assiduity of superiority, which is the cause that beholding themselves perpetually with a head of gold, and a breast of silver, they consider not that being in some sort like to Nebuchadnezzar's Statue, they yet have feet of clay. Others come thereunto, by an indiscreet zeal, & out of small experience of humane things, who are no sooner raised unto some degree, but they talk of reformation, of correction, of chastisements: and to see them, you would say, they were so many Archimedes who seek for a place out of the world, to set foot in, of purpose to turn the whole world topsy-turvie. Their power is not always answerable to their purpose, wch makes them them sad and dejected in their courage, causing them to fall back to the other extremity; from whence it cometh that they are one while harsh, and another time gentle; and by inequality in their manners, thrust all into disorder. That is it which Saint Gregory the great observed in Abbot Urbicus, saying, that his Monastery was in distemper, because he made himself unequal, one while flattering some, and another while reprehending the rest with immeasurable anger. Lastly, there are others who have a very good conscience, and whose manners are rigid, and they be not imprudent; but they have such a desire to frame the whole world to their humour, that out of the assiduity of their admonitions they render themselves somewhat burthensome to their inferiours, and authorize the saying of that Ancient, who affirmed an honest man was a great burthen. There are natures, like to Caper-shrubs, which grow worse by too much manuring, and are much better being left to the goodness of their own nature.

§. 3. Moderate Severity is necessary in Government; but it ought to be free from Cruelty.

IT must of necessity be acknowledged that they who govern States and Common-wealths stand in need of severity in so great a corruption of mens manners; there being almost nothing so pitiful as the goodness of a Prince disarmed, who serves for a butt to reproaches, and a sport for insolency. The Senatour Fronton, who had experience of many Kingdoms, said it was a miserable kind of life to live under an Emperour who permitted nothing; but much more wretched likewise was the estate of such as live under a Prince who permitted all; as it happened in the time of Nerva, who caused those men to sit near him that had conspired against him, and presented them swords to give the blow, and asked them whether they were sharp enough. His over-faint goodness, which could not engage it self to punish any, made men almost to desire the rule of the most cruel; good men being unable to endure to be equalized with the most dissolute. Needs must Justice hold its place, to cut off rotten members, to repress the insolent, and to make honest men live in the sweetness of repose. But it being very hard to find this divine temperature which is between softness and too much severity, it is always far better to lean towards Mildness, then to incur the least suspition of Cruelty.

Dion. in Nerva.

Cardinal Petrus Damianus, seeing himself one day very civilly entreated by the Pope, and at the same time menaced by his Arch-deacon Hildebrand, who was a most severe Cardinal, answered according to Plutarch's Fable, that beat dispoyled more then the North-wind. These stormy spirits are not always the most efficacious. It is not sparkling flames, but invisible heats which melt metals, and sweetest influences are those which cause the greatest effects in total Nature. Our Saviour, in the Prophet Esay, is called a Rod, and a flower; to correct some, and comfort others: but never is he termed a sword to kill and destroy. Power, which is given by God, ought to be managed according to his intentions; and as we cannot but see on all sides the effects of his bounty; so it is not lawful for a man to defile the Character of the Divinity by rigours insupportable. O what a brave thing it is to possess a great Kingdom in the hearts of men by bounty and munificence! to make one self a Throne of peace, to which love raiseth an eternal Basis, on which God raineth from above with full hand an infinity of Benedictions! A Prince which so liveth, findeth Corps du gard in the most unfrequented Wildernesses, assurance in perils, protection in battels, good hap in affairs, success in his enterprises, prosperity in his house, veneration abroad, and admiration among Forreign Nations. When he sleeps, a million of eyes wake for him; a million of mouths open at altars to carry thanksgivings to God for the favours he received from heaven: and were he not in his Throne, all his Subjects would make steps of their bodies for him to mount up unto it. His Joys are pure, his pleasures innocent, his repasts without fear of poyson, his repose dreadless, his life a miracle, and his memory a blessing. But what a spectacle is it to see Tyrants close hidden like old Owls in perpetual nights; with a mind beset with horrid fantasies, filled with suspicions, seized by distrust; for whom Thunders seem to roar, and for whom Heaven seems to prepare all its Thunderbolts! What a horrour is it to see them come in publick, cloathed with Iron, and despoiled of the peoples affections! To see them tear their members in the torments of their Subjects; to suck in bloud; to break bones; to make terrours to march before them; and after them massacres! What honour is it for them to be hated like plagues and poysons; to make a Hell of their life, a Tyranny of their manners, and a publick vow of their death? Lastly, the divine Providence (which sharpneth the sword of Justice with the tears of the miserable) falls on their heads; some have been consumed by strange maladies; others have been abandoned to the fury of people; massacred by a thousand hands, punished with a thousand deaths, dragged over lay-stalls, buried in dunghils; even stones and metals have been punished, which had no other Crime but to be insculped with their features: Their life hath been a reproach; their memory, the butt of all maledictions. All this is not of power to teach us, that there is not any thing so sovereign for the Government of minds as Mildness and Compassion.

§. 4. The goodness of God beateth down the rigour of men.

IF we be not fully convinced of this verity; Let us behold our first Model, against the infamy of this unnatural passion; and let us first see the benignity of our heavenly Father in natural and civil life; thence we will consider the mercy of Jesus in the life of Grace. God is sovereignly good, as Theology noteth, by three sorts of Goodnesses; of Nature, of Manners, and of Bounty: His Nature, and his Manners make him to appear good in himself: His Bounty out of himself in so many communications as he imparteth to all Creatures. The Platonists said, he had the understanding of a Father, and the heart of a Mother; to provide for the great Family of the World: and one of them, rapt with the Considerations of his Bounties cried out, As for thee, O God of Sanctity, Saviour, and Conservatour of all Man-kind! thou hast the heart of a Mother, admirably to comfort the calamities of so many miserable mortals, and there is not a day, a rest, nor a moment, which is not replenished with thy benefits. You would say he is perpetually bent upon the care of the very least creatures, to give them the contentment and satisfaction they can derive from their condition. He is in the feathers of the Peacock, to frame a Mirrour unto himself of his train; In the throat of Nightingales, there to make Musick; in the innocent thefts of Bees, to lade them with booty;

Remedies.

booty, in the Husbandry of Ants, to maintain them in their little Granaries. The Authour of the Egyptian Theology saith, that the Eternal Father, willing to please all living Creatures, gave them bodies fashion'd to their likings and inclinations: and as there are other instruments necessary for a Taylour, others for a Smith; So he hath given other members to Lions; others, to Bulls; others, to Fishes, and Birds. He gives to a Lion (which is a predominant Beast) a Robustuous body, Eyes of lightning, a Roar of Thunder, a Gate Haughty; To Bulls, Horns to defend themselves; To birds, a little head and a sharp beak to cleave the air, feathers to cover them, wings to fly; To fishes, a Tail to serve them for a Rudder, and little finnes to be unto them as Oars.

S. Basil likewise observed, that this great Father of a family distributeth to birds of prey a body fit to seek out for their living, and to such as are of a more peaceable disposition, members sutable to their nature. So true it is that there is nothing in the world which is not replenished with the wisdome of this great Master-workman. He provideth and armeth each one according to his Kinde; Some have naturall arms to resist such as assail them; others have a marvellous promptitude to fly from that which is contrary to them; others have an incomparable dexterity to defend themselves; some poize themselves in the air with their feathers; others grapple with their claws; others fortifie themselves with their horns: and if there be some which serve as a prey to the rest, God supplieth this necessity with a very great fruitfulness which he affordeth those poor little creatures exposed to the violence of the stronger. Thus discourseth Lactantius. To conclude, There is not any creature so little which beareth not his own Mill, his chimney, his habit, his ware, and his shop about him: and, if this paternall Bounty continually open its hands to replenish all creatures with benedictions; what would it not do for man who so divinely and so happily busieth the divine providence, and is the rule of all the rest of the world!

S. Basil in Hexam. Lactant. l. de opificio Dei cap. 2.

It were to enter into a vast Labyrinth of discourses and reasons, to represent at this time before our eyes, how this eternall understanding maketh infinite many engines to concur in all the creatures of this great universe, to contribute to our benefit, our protection, and delight. I will onely expresse one thing very considerable which he powerfully doth above the ordinary nature of elements, to divert the inconveniencies of people, and to afford them favours beyond all humane hopes. Behold how under the torrid zone (which would otherwise be inhabitable, by reason of excessive heats) he causeth rain to fall so commodiously, that he seems to distill it through a Limbeck in rule and measure! Behold, how in Egypt, (when the Pharaohs covered the land with arms and chariots against his people,) he made Nilus most gently to overflow to supply the want of rain, which (as it is said) never falls in that Country! We will also tell you what modern writers have observed in certain Islands, where there are neither Rivers nor Fountains for the use of the living, God gives them certain trees which (at a time determinate by his Prouidence) fail not to sprinkle down water with so much advantage, that the thirst of man and beast thereby is sufficiently slaked? Who is he that considering all these works of nature will not cry out that God really is (what Isidore of Pelusium said) the common Magazine of all the people of the earth, from whence they incessantly derive an infinite number of liberalities, and the true Temple of sweetness and benignity wherein altars are perpetually covered with victimes!

Isidor. l. 2. ep. 152. Ταμεῖον φιλανθρωπίας, &c.

What doth he not in civil life, to make men live in peace, abundance and tranquillity? What good Laws inspireth he not into them! what laudable instructions suggesteth he not, even to people adverse to his honour! what industries, and what inventions in all acts! what conveniencies in trade! what authority imprinteth he on the face of Kings and Magistrates! what obedience he causeth insensibly to creep into the hearts of people, so that bloudsuckers, and murderers do also adore some rayes of Justice! And forasmuch as he permitteth poor and miserable creatures in the world, (which seems to have some repugnance with his bounty;) we see by experience, it is so necessary that we may say of them what the glorious Hanna did in her Canticle, The poor of the Earth belong to God, and he hath laid the whole universe on their shoulders: without them, acts would fail, industries would languish, the services and benefits (which the rich derive from men who are their likes) would wholly cease; and, which is more, the two most eminent virtues of the world (Mercy and Patience) would be banished from the earth. Besides, God hath an incomparable care of those necessitous people whom we think to be wholly abandoned. He hath numbred their hairs, he hath taken the task to preserve all their bones, he moisteneth the dry bread of peasants in tastefull sweetness, he diverteth them from the apprehension of their miseries, he fitteth them to their conditions, he comforteth their labours, he crowneth their patience. Lastly, to expresse the tenderness of God's mercy in a word; there is not so much as our own tears from whence he doth not make us to draw sweetness and consolation, for our solace. O ineffable Bounty! O greatness unheard of! O inexhaustible liberality! And can we then beholding this model have a heart shut up against all manner of liberality? what a horrour is it to see men burn with enraged avarice which sticks to their bones as doth their marrow, and which shall sleep with them in their Tomb!

§. 5. The Mercies of the Incarnate word are able to soften the harshest hearts.

But with what admiration is not the heart of man seized on, when he entreth into the great Abysses which are discovered in the second model, in the Oeconomy of our Redemption?

Have we any proof more manifest then that which is so well weighed by Saint Anselm in these words? What greater mercy can there be then to see a humane nature despoiled of the robe of Honour, and of the diadem of Glory, by a just chastisement of its rebellions, condemned to a prison of flames and darkness, even then when it was unable to free its self, and when there was neither Angel nor man could deliver it from the misery, whereinto it was plunged? to see it (say I) sought unto by God when it flew from his liberality, and to consider how the heavenly Father transported with unspeakable love, said unto it, Take my onely Son to redeem thee from so many remedilesse calamities, and that this onely son disdaineth not to become its ransome, delivered himself for it to torments so enormous, and confusions so hideous.

Quid misericordius, intelligi valet, quam quod peccatori aeternis supplicijs debitato, & unde se redimeret non habenti, Deus pater dixit, accipe unigenitum meum, & da pro te, & filius dixit, tolle me & redime te? Anselm. l. Cur Deus homo.

The earth (saith S. Augustine) expecteth light and rain from Heaven, and we from a Messias expect truth and mercy: He came after so long expectati ons, pectations, and had repleniſhed the earth with his knowledge, and the effects of his benignity. What ſhall we now admire in the ineffable myſtery of the Incarnation!

If we caſt our eys on the heavenly Father, we there ſee a work of the power of his Arm, wherein he ſeems to have exhauſted all his ſtrength. The Heavens and the Stars (ſaith Saint Gregory Nyſſen) were but the works of the fingers of this Divine Majeſty: But in the Incarnation he proceedeth with all the extent of his might, with all the Engines of his power, and all the miracles of his Greatneſs. It is a Maxime among Politicians, that a man, to appear very great, ſhould not waſt all his force at an inſtant; but ſtill to reſerve to himſelf ſomewhat to do, wherein he may make his ability to be ſeen, as it were by degrees, by daily ſurpaſſing himſelf. From whence it came that Seneca ſaid to Nero who had cauſed a certain Pavillion infinitely pretious to be made, that he therein had ſhewed his weakneſs; for if it ſhould chance to periſh, he could not recover it: and were it preſerved, it would be an everlaſting reproach to him, to have done to the uttermoſt of his power. Behold the proceedings of humane prudence. But our Celeſtial Father ſetting aſide all other conſiderations (and forgetting his Greatneſs, to be mindful of his mercy) did a work in our behalf which hath ſo limited his power, that we may truly ſay, That God cannot in the world in all Eternity make any thing greater then a Man-God.

Plutarch. de Ira.

And if we on the other part do reflect on the Holy Ghoſt, it ſeems that this third perſon (which in the ſphere of the Trinity had a myſterious barrenneſs) ſpringing from the incomparability of a new production in the divine emanations, would make recompenſe in this myſtery, pouring out at once, heats, lights, and beauties in the bleſſed Virgin, there to form the body of Jeſus Chriſt, and to raiſe this holy Humanity to the union of the Word Increate. But what piece meriteth more admiration, then to ſee the perſon of a God-Man, then to ſee a Jeſus Chriſt, who in himſelf uniteth Divine and Humane Nature, who carries in himſelf the laſt lines of the love and power of his Father, who beareth the conſummation of all his deſigns for the government of man, who includeth all poſſible communications to an inferiour Nature in one inimitable communication, who makes himſelf the ſource of Grace and Glory in an Angelical and Humane Nature, as he is the ſource of life and love in the Trinity! O what a goodly ſpectacle is it, to behold how he bleſſeth by his preſence, how he repleniſheth by his greatneſs, how he governeth by his power, how he ſanctifieth by his influencies, both Heaven and Earth! If we yet doubt of his love and fatherly goodneſs, let us look on his hands, and we ſhall ſee that he hath written our Name with his nails: Let us ſee his heart which was opened for us by that Launce which at the latter end of his days digg'd from out his Entrails the remainder of his life: and we ſhall obſerve how we therein live, how we therein breath, and how we therein honourably burn, as in a great Furnace common to all intelligible Nature. If you would know what you have coſt (and happily do not believe) your Creatour, ask your Redeemer and he will tell you. Let us alſo behold the effects which have ſucceeded from the alliance of the Divine Nature with the Humane: and let us reverence the Divine Goodneſs which hath raiſed up all the great Maſs of men in a ſupernatural Being, to innocency, to felicity, to light, and to life eternal. Who was more deſtitute then Man, more brutiſh, and more ignorant in ſo great a night, and in ſo horrible confuſions of Idolatry? and Jeſus by his Incarnation hath revealed unto us the ſecrets and wiſdom of Heaven. Who was more unfurniſhed of wiſe direction? and he affordeth us his examples. Who was more forlorn? and he adopteth us for his Children. Who was more needy? and he gives us the treaſure of his merits. Who was more hungry? and he nouriſheth us with his fleſh and blood. Who was more unhappy? and he divideth his Beatitude among us. If after ſo many benefits, we remain ſtill faithleſs to his fidelity; he expecteth us with a ſingular long forbearance: if we delay, he ſtirreth us up: if we fly, he followeth us: if we return, he ſtretcheth forth his Arm. He waſheth us in his bloud; he regenerateth in his love: he makes it his Trophey to have conquered us, as if he entred afreſh into the poſſeſſion of an Empire; and cauſeth our proper ſins to contribute to our glory. If we endure ſomewhat for him, he endureth with us; he weepeth over us; he prepareth eternal ſources of conſolations: and, as it is ſaid, that there is a certain Fiſh which ſweetens the water of the ſalt Sea in its mouth: ſo Jeſus mingleth all our acerbities in the inexplicable ſweetneſſes of his benignity.

Paſſer apud Maiolum.

And yet thou (O Man) wilt in preſence of this Model ſtill remain a little Tyger, as irreconcilable to Amities, as ſtreight-handed to works of liberality. Believe me, among all the Enſigns of Greatneſs which thou canſt have, there is not any more ſenſible then the charitable communication of one man to another by ways of liberality and alms, which God receiveth in the nature of Victims. It is a Divinity for one man by his benefits to oblige another, and this is properly the way of eternal glory.

The ſource of Charity.

Who are they, in your opinion, that firſt of all deſerved the title of Cardinal, which is now adays accounted among the great Dignities of the Church? Do you think that Nobility of Extraction, Favour of Great-ones, Eminency of Wiſdom, Prudence in the government of Empires gave theſe Titles to the Primitive Church? I ſay all theſe qualities are very conſiderable; yet nevertheleſs it is true, that the firſt fourteen Cardinals who were called by this name, were fourteen perſonages of honour and merit, who under Pope Silveſter were ranged in as many ſtreets of the City of Rome, to take care of the poor. So true it is, that they who begat us to Chriſtianity placed the magnificence of men, not in Garments which are the food of Moths; not in pretious ſtones which are the excrements of the Sea and Land; not in Coaches and Horſes which are the notes of poverty and dependence; not in Titles which are imaginary felicities: but in the relief of perſons neceſſitous who are the Images of God. A learned Biſhop ſaid to a Pope; He deceives himſelf who thinks that a conſcience ſo near to the Divinity, is tied to its Intereſts; For my part I imagine you do not believe there is any other gain for you, but that which takes birth from your liberality, and that you think you receive good, as oftentimes as you do it.

an enraged sea. Inform your self a little of the wants of Cities and Towns, and you shall find many (abandoned of all consolation, and destitute of all necessaries) who yet are your flesh, your brethren, and your co-heirs in Jesus Christ: and now, whilst all smileth in your houses, and all is resplendent with a lustre of fair accommodation in your own persons; there are poor old men couched on straw among cobwebs; there are women afflicted with long and irksome maladies, environed with very many children whom they see dying before their eyes, not having any means to give them a bit of bread.

They are forsaken by kindred, friends, and all manner of assistance, as if they were some monsters of nature thrown on the shore by the sea's anger. There are Virgins for whom dayly snares are laid, that they may fall into sin under colour of poverty. There are some who have been heretofore very fortunate according to the world, who are faln into great wants, and at this present (when they have so many tears to bewail their misery under the covert of some poor cottage) have not a tongue to complain; for, having lost all, they yet retain shame which tieth the hands of their poverty, and hindreth them from stretching them out to the cruel rich, from whom they expect nothing but denial. Know we not, how in certain places men many times have run up and down the streets armed with Fury and Rage for bread, and have snatched (as it were) out of bloud and flames a nourishment worse then death? Know we not, there are many who have been divers days without bread? And how often have others eaten such, as they were fain to shut their eyes when they put it in their mouths? Are we ignorant, that certain Mothers have prostituted their Daughters out of a cursed and vitious constraint to help their miseries? Their hands peradventure had been more merciful, if they had hewed them in pieces before they sacrificed them to dishonour; but, behold whether the tyranny of Avarice and Prodigality have transported the affairs of Christendom! What Rock would not be mollified among so many direful Objects? What eye of ice would not melt amidst such spectacles of disasters? Will you not then in your houses establish the sacrifice of Mercy, which God would have to be perpetual? Will you not consider what you may do without much prejudicing your Revenues? Will you expect death to do good, and to make your Torch to be carried after you? They who have renounced Faith, Truth, and Light (I mean Hereticks) have not renounced Mercy: they exhaust themselves for their faction, and many times do acts of liberality to ours, who help the poor. But what say I? Hereticks? The Turks in their salvage life give the Tenth part of their goods to the poor. There are some who build Fountains, and pay men wages to give drink to Passengers; and some thereto add Camels to carry their fardles. Will it not be a great honour to you at the day of Judgment, if persisting in this inhumanity, you see your self worse then the Infidels, and that the Character of Christianity hath served you for no other purpose, but to reproach you in the eternity of your pains with the exorbitance of your Infamy? Good God, divert this misery from thy servants: and since thou so freely hast opened thy heart unto them; Let them never shut up the bowels of their Compassion against thy brethren who are the poor.

HISTORICAL

HISTORICALL OBSERVATIONS
Upon the four Principall PASSIONS,
Which are as four DEVILS, DISTURBERS
OF THE HOLY COURT.

LONDON,
Printed Anno Domini. M DC LXIII.

To the READER.

DEAR READER,

I Here find that which Job, the first Writer of the world, saith, that our thoughts are as the Branches of our soul, which multiply and extend as far as their root giveth them vigour and nutriment. You see, the affection you have shewed to these Books of the HOLY-COURT, hath served for vital humours to my wit; to produce many discourses; and with much labour to undertake that which I supposed to be profitable and satisfactory for you, which I have ever more esteemed then my own repose.

When I thought I was at the end of my design, you have caused me to set forth a fourth Tome, wherein I conceive I have comprized all the secrets of humane life in the moderation of Passions. It would here have been fit for me to end, were it not that some Lords and Ladies, who make up a part of this innocent Court by the good example of their lives, are not fully satisfied unless I afford them Histories. This then hath moved me, to crown these Treatises with most select Historical Observations, to expose to view the disorder which ill rectified Passions introduce, and the profits they bring when they are ranged under the Laws of discretion. I meant expresly to have drawn them almost all out of our own History, for two Reasons; whereof the one is, That the Passions of Infidels of Antiquity, and even those of many other Christian Nations have passages too full of horrour and brutishness: But ours, albeit they have extravagancies inconsiderate enough, are more within limits ordinary to nature corrupted by sin. The second is, that writing this to the Court of France, I propose to my self I should more efficaciously perswade by domestick examples, which are partly already known to our Country-men, then by forreign and unheard of Histories.

Now all Passions of the Court relate to four Principals, which are Love; Desire of Honours, and Pleasures of the world; Anger always animated to Revenge; and Envy which draggeth along with it the black Passions of Jealousie, Sadness, and Despair: I will content my self to pursue these Tracts, scoring out unto you the disasters of such as have yielded to these Motives, and the felicity of others who have gloriously surmounted them; And to add a pleasing variety to this last piece, I will conclude with many short and remarkable Examples suited to those four mentioned Passions.

THE DISASTERS Of such as have yielded to the PASSION OF LOVE. AND The Glory of Souls, which have overcome it.

1. LET us begin with that Passion which is the Source of the rest, and which in all times hath caused trouble among men, to give a ground to our discourse.

The children of great Clodoveus, became not so soon tractable to the severity of Christian manners, but suffered themselves very often to be transported with very violent exorbitances, and particularly with unlawful loves; which caused ill example in their house, and great disorder throughout their Kingdome.

Gregory of Tours observeth sordid and shameful affections in the person of King Caribert Grandchild of Clodoveus, which cast an Eclipse upon the lights of the Diadem of this great King, and could never be rooted out but by patience, by prayers, and by the effects of the puissant hand of God.

Gregory of Tours l. 4.

The Plot of Queen Ingobergua to cure her husbands passion, succedeth ill out of too much affectation.

Queen Ingobergua, who knew the humours of her husband to be addicted to inconsiderate love, and who was jealous enough of her bed, took not among her attendant Ladies those Nymphs of the Court

Court which are full of attractiues, and deserve admiration: but purposely chose out base and despicable wayters, thinking it was a singular remedy against the Kings malady. She had at that time in her Court and service two daughters of a Cloth-worker, the eldest of which was called Marcovessa, and the youngest Miresleur. Caribert (whose love was more lustfull then ambitious) became desperately in love, and courted them to the prejudice of his honour and wedlock, which wounded the soul of the Queen with a very sensible arrow, seeing the havock this passion made in the mind of this Monarch. Jealousie suggesteth her a trick which seemed sufficient to divert him from this infamous servitude; if this passion might be cured by another, and that a jealous woman did not irritate the wounds of love by its proper remedies. She calleth the Father of her two servants, and commanded him secretly to practise his trade in some corner of the Court, whither she very cunningly brought his Majesty, to make him see the base extraction of his Mistrisses, and to throw shame and confusion upon him. But he (who at distance saw this wile comming towards him, and the solemn preparation of it) was displeased, saying, that if nothing were wanting but nobility to render these maids worthy of his love, he would sufficiently ennoble them by his person, and that it onely belonged to him to raise inferiour things, by loving them: and as great ones will rather be flattered in their passions, then censured; instantly he made a shamefull divorce with the Queen contrary to laws both divine and humane, to take to wife the younger of these sisters which was Miresleur. But, love (which being of its nature a slave, saileth not to be disdainfull) quickly put a distaste of her unto him, to make him look after the elder who seemed the more modest, and wear a religious habit; whether desirous to inflame love by this pretext, (which ordinarily is eager to pursue all it can least obtain) or whether she did it to give lesse advantage and suspition to the jealous spirit of Queen Ingobergna: The fire of Concupiscence (which spareth not to inflame Linsey-woolsey, aswel as Satin) continually blowed by the wind of ambition (which promised this creature a giddy Fancy of a Crown) burnt so strongly; that this spirit (which had more cunning then beauty) caused so much madness to creep into the heart of this miserable King that he resolved to marry her; which he did, qualifying a prodigious whoredome with the title of wedlock. The Queen was ready to dye, and addresseth her complaints to God, and men.

The Bishops, who were assembled in the Council of Tours in favour of her, made Canons against incestuous marriages; but the Canons at that time were not strong enough against the arrows of love. S. German Bishop of Paris sent forth thunders of excommunication; but passion armed with authority made no more account of them then of flying fires, which are quenched in their birth. God thereto put his hand by the prayers of the Church, and took away this religious woman by a horrible and sudden death which affrighted the King, and he in the end conceived shame and sorrow for his fault, deriving his salvation out of necessity, since he could not gain it from the glory of his resistance. That which remained him of life was short and miserable, and his passion having rendred him contemptible to his own subjects, he quickly left Crown and Sceptre to pay a tribute to his Tombe.

Gregory of Tours. l. 5.

2. Another kind of sottish love appeared in the government of young Merovens, which I will here relate, as being able to minister matter of terrour to youth which takes liberty in clandestine marriages. King Chilperic his father happened to bear away the bloudy spoil of his brother Sigebert who had been traiterously murthered by the subtle practices of Fredegond, when he was come to the Eve of his triumph. The famous Brunhault widow of the deceased King (as yet very young) was become a party of this miserable booty, and saw her pretious liberty enthralled in the hands of her Brother-in-law, and sister, who was born for vengeance, and exercised in massacres. Her fortune represented nothing unto her but a thousand images of terrour; and the cruelty of her adversaries made her apprehend all that which notable mischievous wickedness can do, when it hath the sword of power in hand. Yet her bloud was spared to consume her with languors, sentence of her Captivity was pronounced by giving her the City of Roan for prison. A trusty man was sought for, to execute this Commission, and the King cast his eye on his son Merovens a young Prince, of a nature sweet and facile, and endowed with excellent parts which made him to be beloved, and beheld (as a rising star) by all the eyes of France. This was to put fire too near to stubble, not considering that the calme of such natures is ordinarily the most turmoiled with storms of love. So soon as Brunhault (who according to the relation of S. Gregory of Tours was a very beautifull and well-spoken Princess) began to unciel her eyes which had hitherto been drenched in a deluge of tears; she appeared to Merovens as a blushing Morn which riseth the more fair after a shower; and the arrow of love sharpened by compassion made such flames to sparkle in his heart, that he was enforced to quench them with his bloud. He saw himself the captive of his fair prisoner, and already well felt he was not born to be predominant over a beauty so triumphant. The easinesse of his nature suffered him not to be long in resolving to give way to his passion. He instantly declares himself, and coloureth his request with the title of marriage. Brunhault gives ear (whether for the love of Merovens, or whether out of the hatred of Fredegond his mother) supposing it was an opportunity to carry fire very far into the Royall race.

A notable example of Merovens to divert youth from licentious marriages.

They secretly marry, the Nephew espouseth the Aunt, by a crime unheard; Love is their Pope and King, from whom they take dispensation and leave. Fury conceiveth this marriage: Temerity signeth it but misery sealeth the contract. Merovens returneth from Roan still hiding his fire under the ashes. He gives account of his commission. The King his father resolveth to send him to take possession of Guyenne, which he judged to be fallen unto him by the death of Sigebert. He seigneth to depart from the Court with intention to go to Bourdeanx, but the counterpoise of love insensibly carryed him to Roan, and he fasteneth to Court his pretended spouse, and forgets all cares and affairs, to please his passion: which being not kept within the limits of moderation, made a great noyse, and was carryed to the ears of the Court. King Chilperic went to Roan with an Army to quench the fire in its beginning, thinking there was some notable plot contrived against his state; but he finds these lovers had no other arms, but those of Cupid; and that the excess of their passion had given them so little leisure to think on their own safety; that seeing themselves beset by souldiers, they had recourse to altars which were then secure refuges; for the miserable Chilperic durst not violate Sanctuaries in the presence of Pretextatus Bishop of Roan, a man courageous and zealous for things divine.

He

He promiſed himſelf to take this new married Couple by the want of victual, and other natural neceſſities. But he ſeeing the buſineſs to be drawn, at length patience ſlips from him, and he made them to come out of the Church, with promiſe of impunity. His ſoul was ſoftned, ſeeing a young Queen, a widow; and miſerable by the cruelty of his wife. Nature pleadeth in his heart for his own blood, he embraceth them both with tears in his eyes: and (not to affright them) entertains them with fair hopes; and whileſt they little think of it, he ſends Brunhault into Auſtraſia her own Countrey, and keeps Merovens under good and ſure guard, judging one could not well truſt him if he were at his own diſpoſe. In the mean time Fredegonde, immeaſurably diſpleaſed with the proceedings of this affair, and ſuppoſing the King her husband went on too remiſſly, made it a great crime of ſtate, and of manifeſt conſpiracy: wherein ſhe involved the Archbiſhop Pretextatus. He was Merovens his God-father, and could not but have ſome tenderneſs towards this Prince his God-child, which being ſiniſterly interpreted, drew much miſery upon him. He with his movables and papers were ſeized on, where they found certain packets of Queen Brunhaults, which ſtrengthned the ſuſpition they cóceived to his prejudice. He is ſent for to an aſſembly of Biſhops; where the King coming in, chargeth him with the crime of rebellion, accuſing him to have withdrawn the people from their obedience, to crown his ſon; and thereupon roundly required the Prelates that juſtice might be done according to holy Canons. The witneſſes are heard, and confronted, who do not throughly enough prove the crime whereof he was accuſed. Pretextatus juſtifieth himſelf by a ſolemn proteſtation of his innocency, which cauſed compaſſion in many. But theſe Prelates aſſembled were partly weak, and partly ſold to ſerve the Kings paſſions; there was almoſt none but Gregory of Tours, who having an invincible ſpirit in a little body, encouraged the whole Aſſembly to the defence of the truth; the menacies of the King, and murthering flatteries of Queen Fredegonde being unable to ſhake his conſtancy; Other batteries were likewiſe made to ruine a man half dead, by ſtirring up againſt him divers calumnies from which he very happily vindicated himſelf; untill at length ſome treacherous Biſhops counſelled him to accuſe himſelf (by way of humiliation) of the offence of ſtate which was objected againſt him. They told him he muſt not appear too juſt before his Maſter; that it was not reaſonable the King ſhould receive an affront in this affair; that he was a mild Prince, who would Pretextatus ſhould owe his ſafety to his clemency, & that he no ſooner could ſpeak one word of confeſſion but he ſhould be freed from this vexation, and reſtored to his Dignity. The unfortunate Prelate (giving ear to the hiſſing of ſerpents) made his tongue the ſnare of his ſoul, & owned an imaginary crime, to undergo a real unhappineſs. He had no ſooner pronounced the word, but the King tranſported with exceſſive joy proſtrated himſelf on his knees before the aſſembly of Biſhops, demanding that his robe (for ignominy) ſhould be cut off, and the execrations (thundred againſt Judas) to be pronounced over him. The cópaſſió of ſome procured moderation therein. Nevertheleſs he was inſtantly degraded, condemned to baniſhment, & delivered to the Kings guard, who led him to a little deſert Iſland near the city of Conſtance in Normandy, whence he eſcaped to be in the end maſſacred by the practiſes of Q. Fredegonde.

This ſtep-mother was not content to ſee Merovens cóſined to a priſon, but ſhe violently urged he might be ſhaven, & ſhut in a Monaſtery, which was executed. But it is a great error to think to make a religious man by holding a ponyard to his throat & by taking hair frō his head, when the cóſent of his heart cannot be had. The thoughts (which according to the Interpreters of Scripture, are as the hairs of the ſoul) were not taken away by the roots frō this miſerable Samſon. They much perſecuted him about his paſſed loves; that he quickly forſook Cowl & Monaſtery, to begin new ſtirs. He went directly to Tours, (which gave much trouble to good S. Gregory) & ſpent nights upon the tomb of S. Martin, faſting & praying to have a revelation which might promiſe him a crown. But ſeeing Chilperic purſued him with armed hand, he fled from town to town, and from Sanctuary to Sanctuary, finding not any one who would ſupport his rebellion. In the end he gets into Auſtraſia, & returneth to the embracements of his Spouſe, as it were to end himſelf in thoſe eyes which had enkindled his firſt flames. But the cunning Queen (conſidering that her ſubjects were raiſed in alarms upon his coming, and fearing ſhe might draw upon them the total ſtorm of Chilperic's arms, preferred reaſons of State before thoſe of love,) beſought him to retire. They of Tours (who were ſuſpected by the King for having firſt of all favoured his flight) thinking not to find their own ſafety but in his ruine, called him back again under color to ſupport his arms, & to become of his ſide. The Prince (in whom paſſion cauſed a continual drunkenneſs of reaſon) being more eaſie to believe, then prudent to examine reaſons, turned towards them; and preſently found himſelf caught in their ſnare. When ſeeing himſelf betrayed, and ready to be delivered into the hands of his father, and ſtep-mother (whom he more feared then a Panther) he addreſſed himſelf to Geilan his confident friend, and prayed him to give an end to his miſerable life, ſith having found ſo much infidelity in his beloved, treachery in his friends, and cruelty in his father, there nothing remained for him but a Tomb to bury all his miſeries. The other thinking to do him great ſervice, thruſt his ſword into his body, and ſeparated his ſoul. Which may be a fearfull example for youth, to make them for ever to abhor the charms of love.

That of Carloman was as light, (although it had not, ſo long a ſequele of accidents.) Paulus Æmilius recounteth that this young Prince, accuſtomed to ſottiſh and ſordid love, having in a ſtreet perceived a creature which to him ſeemed handſom; he began to follow her, being mounted on his horſe; but the maid very chaſt (to avoid his courtſhips) caſt her ſelf ſpeedily into a houſe, whether Carloman (ſpurring his horſe) deſperately followed her, not obſerving that the door of the houſe was too low; which ſmote him, and ſtrok him down ſo unfortunately, that he left both love and life. It was a direful thing to ſee ſo great a Prince to die in jeaſt: but the ſports of this paſſion are ordinarily bloody, and Venus came from a ſea of water, to ſwim in a ſea of bloud. Paulus Æmilius.

3. I will here alſo let you ſee the effect of a paſſion (to all extremity) diſſolute & ſcandalous, which made a great noiſe throughout all Chriſtendom, and will ſerve to make men deteſt the wickedneſs of ſuch as break conjugal bands, to ſatisfie their luſt. The young Emperor Lotharius, grand-child of Lewis the Courteous, loved in his younger years a Lady, much mentioned in the Epiſtles of Popes, under the name of Valdrada. She had a commanding beauty, was of a humour full of attractives and wiles, which ſurprized the young Prince with an affection ſo ſtrong and catching, that after a thouſand croſſes he could not be unlooſed from it, but by death. Nevertheleſs, Concilia Gallicana tom. 2.

Scandalous love of the Emperour Lotharius and Valdrada.

Time and reason inviting him to think upon a lawful marriage, he espoused Theutbergue a beautiful & virtuous Princess, who was thought fit to quench the fire of his unchast love, and hereafter to enkindle his heart with flames more chast and happy. But fascinated by his evil Genius, he presently took an aversion against his wife, being seldom personally with her; and perpetually in mind, and affection with her, who had laid hold of his first love. Whether it were that this audacious woman imperiously ruled over him, (as a man timorous in his passions, who durst not yet confidently do a mischief) or whether he were sufficiently disposed thereunto by the violence of his love he undertakes a very scandalous business, which was to unmarry himself, fasly imputing adultery & barrenness to his wife. The criminal process is handled in the Ecclesiastical Court; Gontier Archbishop of Colen, who had great power and great faults, supporteth the Princes part what he might, and having won Theutgard Archbishop of Trew on his side, he drags along souls set to sale by a torrēt of authority to which none make resistance. The innocent Theutbergue is condemned in two pestilent Synods, and handled as a prostitute, the Crown is taken from her and put upon Valdrada's head, who appeared with a marvellous pōp, whilest the other groaned under the ashes of a publick penance. The chast Princess, who not so much regarded eminent wedlocks as the honour of her purity (which she meant to preserve to her tomb) appealed to the Pope, which at that time was Nicholas the first, and wrote mournful letters to him, able to rent rocks asunder. The common Father of Christendome heareth her complaints animated by truth, and deputeth two Legates to do her right. These Prelates had not courage enough to decide the matter, and seeing themselves upon one side assailed by their conscience, and on the other, besieged by the powerful contentions of Lotharius and two Archbishops, they found out a way how to wash their hands frō this judgment, They shew, that since two Provincial Councils had passed upon it, and that the Archbishops Gontier, and Theutgard had born sway therein; it were good that the same men took pains to go to Rome to let the Pope see the acts of those two assemblies, and to justifie all their proceedings. These two Prelates (who thought nothing was impossible to their credit) refused not the commission. They go armed with impostures and tattle, to oppress truth, and overwhelm innocency. The Pope, a clear-seeing and charitable man, intressed himself in the cause, & in ful assembly discovereth their jugling with such vigour and perspicuity, that all the Fathers cast their stone at them. The mischief they meant against the innocent Theutbergue falls back upon their own heads; they are excommunicated, degraded, deprived of their offices and benefices, to be reduced to the communion of Laicks. Never did men practise a mischief with more unluckiness and less success. A Legate is dispatched to annul all they had done, wch was the courageous Arsenius, who caused all the process to be reviewed, drave away the impudent Valdrada, restored her honour to Q. Theutbergue, & tied her marriage with an indissoluble knot. Nevertheless this judicious Lady, well forseeing that those loves (wch are re-enkindled with the fires of S. Peters thunders, would neither be happy nor faithful for her) saith, she was satisfied to have put her honour into safeguard, & that having observed so much evil disposition in her husband, and treachery in the world, she desired to spend the rest of her days with God. Lotharius was transported with joy upon this news, and addressed an humble supplication to the Pope, shewing he had obeyed his commandments; being dutifully bent to take his wife again: but since the piety of this Princess, who is not born for worldly matters, is suggested with the thought of entring into religion; it would please him to favour her generous purpose; & to give him leave to marry Valdrada, wch would be a means, to take away all the sin & scandal of his miserable life. The holy Father answers, that he much commended the charity he had towards Queen Theutbergue his spouse; but that it was fit this good affection might begin in himself, & should he throughly resolve to enter into a Monastery, the permission he required for his wife should hinder nothing. This answer confounded him, and seeing that of two wives, he was despised by the one and interdicted from the other, he lived in the world as a man without soul or contentment. Mean while, he hoped that God calling Theutbergue; he at least should then have all facility in his marriage with Valdrada: but the Pope, considering the evil practises of this lustful love wch had scandalized all Christendom, and the former usage of his wife; he let him understand that this match was for ever forbidden. Provoked desire burns to fury: and he again beginneth a most notorious whoredom, since he could not colour it with the title of marriage. Thereupon menaces & thunders from Rome follow, and the name of Valdrada is mentioned in all excommunications reiterated one after another. The miserable Lotharius seeing himself crossed by God and men, perpetually pricked with remorse of conscience, resolved to take a journey to Rome; and to present himself to Hadrian the second, successour of Nicholas, & to get his absolution, and to mediate the affair of his marriage; his heart still propending towards her, whom he so unfortunately had loved. The Pope harkened to him, and received him to penance, & disposed himself to say Mass, wherein he was fully to finish the affair of his reconciliation. When he came to the instant of Communion, he takes the venerable Hoast in his hand, and addresseth himself to King Lotharius and all his complices ready to communicate, and sayes to them, Sir, if it be true, that, having renounced your unchast loves, you this day do present your submissions to God and to the Church in all sincerity; cōe near, you and yours, to this blessed Sacrament with all confidence in the mercy of God; but if you still retain the old leaven of your inordinate affections, get you from the Altar both you and all those who have served you in this business, if you will not be involved in the vengeance of God. This speech was a stroke of thunder that affrighted the King and his followers, and which made many of them instantly to retire. Lotharius was ashamed to go back; and albeit he yet felt the flames of his love to burn in his heart; yet failed he not to pass further with his greatest intimates and friends. From that time not anyone of those who had unworthily cōmunicated, had any health; all miserably died, & the poor Lotharius, returning from his voyage, found the end of his life & direful passion in the city of Placentia: Valdrada submitting her self to a just penance obteined absolutiō from Pope Adrian. Gontier and Theutgard seeing thēselves deposed without hope of recovery, armed their pens against the Pope to no purpose. But afterwards Gontier made great submission that he might be reestablished; yet obteined not what he desired: for it was answered him that it was from respect of honour & temporal gain that all these humiliations proceeded; & therfore it were much better for him to persevere in the exercise of his penance, wch was so much the more bitter unto him for that he had in the be-beginning of this busines prostituted his Niece to King Lotharius under the hope of marriage, which his ambition figured to him. So true it is, that God chastiseth vice with a rod of Iron, in such as too near approach the Sanctuary.

Valdrada is not alone (among the Ladies of the old Court) who hath made her self to be talked of in so ill a sense. Love appeared as weak and shamefull in Ogine Queen of France, Mother of Lewis Outremer, who transported with foolish affection married her self to a young gallant named Heribert, son of him who had betrayed and imprisoned Charls the simple, her husband.

Annals of France.

5. The like passion was scandalous in the time of Philip le Bel in three noble Princesses married to three sons of France; who were all accused of unchastity by their own husbands, and fell into horrible disasters, to teach women of quality, in what account they ought to hold the honour of chastity.

6. But verily never any thing in this kind did equal the exorbitancy of Queen Eleanor, who renounced France which had eyes too chast to tolerate her disorders. She going along to the conquest of the holy land, with King Lewis the young, her husband, lost piety and reputation, resigning her self to the love of a Sultan Saracen, the turbant, nor dusky colour of a hideous man being able to stay the fury of her passion. She was the daughter of William the last Duke of Aquitane, who in his time was a scourge of mankinde; he alone at one meal did eat as much as eight men; and this vast body filled with wine and viands burnt like a Fornace, throwing out flames of choler and lust on all sides. S. Bernard knocked him down like a Boar foaming at his feet, presenting the holy Hoast before him, and by that miracle made a Hermit of him. His daughter imitating his evil habits, had no part in his conversion, living in all liberty. Which was the cause that the King, under colour of affinity, made his match with her to be broken, and restored Guyenne to her which she brought. This bold woman, not amazed at this divorce, espoused Henry of England, a man as passionate as she, where she found a terrible business, when (her unquiet spirit, powerfully bustling in affairs of state, and the interests of her husbands children) she saw her self shut up in a prison, where she lay for the space of fourteen years in rage and langueurs, which put a penance upon her more irksome to her humour, then it proved profitable to her soul.

Good God! what heavy horrours, what Tragedies, and what scourges of God do alwayes fall on sin! What a pleasing spectacle it is to see, amidst such confusions, victories gained over evil love!

The honour the French have borne to the virtue of Chastity.

7. It is very true, that he who would recount the remarkable acts of chastity, resplendent in the Court of France, and especially among Ladies, for one (who ought to be forgotten) a thousand might be found, who had lived with very singular testimonies of Integrity: but it is certain that Historians have an itch to set down mischiefs and crimes rather then virtues; which is the cause, that when so many honourable women walk in the beaten track of a well ordered life, we no more admire it then the ordinary course of the Sun: But if one step awry, all curious eyes look on her as on a star in Eclipse.

Yet in so great a negligence of Historians to write the rare effects of modesty, we do not want good arguments which testifie the love our nation hath in all ages born to purity.

8. Nicetas a Greek Authour (in the lamentations of the city of Constantinople taken by the French) cannot hold from admiring Baldwin the conqueror thereof, who, entring into a vanquished City wherein there were many beauties, never did he cast so much as one wanton glance; beginning his triumph from the victory he got over himself: and that which he practised in his own person, he caused to be exactly observed among his attendants, commanding his Heralds twice in a week to proclaim throughout the Imperial Palace, that all such as should have any ill purpose towards the chastity of Ladies, and meant to debauch the wife of another, were to take heed under grievous penalties never to lodge within the circuit of the house. Verily this is a rare example of integrity, able to shame the nobility so much defamed by giddy & base luxury, which hath blasted the lustre of its conquests, & not spared to raise up bloudy tragedies which still make Historians to lament.

9. Clodevaus, who brought not virginity from Paganisme, so much honoured virgins, that, in the liberty of arms, he permitted not any to touch either their bodies, or lands. He bare a singular reverence to S. Genevieve who made profession of this angelical virtue; he willingly gave ear to her request, and often granted her what he had denied the greatest in his Kingdom, even to the drawing of offenders from the gates of hel, who had already the executioners ax over their heads. Baronius ad annum. 499.

10. Gontranus his grand-child made himself much worthy of praise by a notable act he did in the behalf of Chastity. It happened that in his time, one Amalon Count of Champaigne (who no more spared the honour of Virgins then his own, of which he was infinitely prodigal) caused a Virgin as fair as chaste to be taken, that he might dishonour her. Whilst he expected the success of this theft, he feasted and drank (according to his custom) immoderately. Wine, which enkindleth concupiscence, quenched it in him by reason of his excess: and whilst he more thought upon sleep then love; this poor unfortunate victim was stoln into his bed with all menaces and violences that fury could invent. The poor Virgin seeing this Holophernes was fast asleep, thought it were not amiss to renew the History of Judith, to vindicate her honour from this gulph whereinto the craft of this treacherous man had precipitated her; she takes a sword which hung at the beds-head, draweth it out of the scabbard, and gave him a wound on the head, which awakened him from this dead-sleep, and made him cry out Murder. His servants speedily ran thither, and were ready to knock down this Amazon, when the other, touched with remorse of conscience, hindred it, and gave her leisure to escape through the throng of the people. The wound (being mortal) quickly carried him out of the world, after he had had some time to detest his sin. But his kindred and allies sought for nothing but to cut this young Judith in pieces, who had dared to lift up a sword against a man of so eminent quality. Wherefore she had recourse to King Gontranus, & prostrated her self at his feet, telling him all the story which had passed between the Count & her. The King hearkned to her, and freed her, taking her into his protection, against all such as would enterprise upon her life, or honor. Greg. Turon. l. 9. c. 27.

11. Lewis the Courteous consecrated his Kingdom by the honour he gave to chastity, resolving not to enter into his father Charlemaignes palace, untill it was sanctified. He instantly banished thence all those plagues, which laid snares for the honour of the Princesses his sisters, replenishing his whole Royal palace with a holy odour of virtue and reputation.

12. S. Lewis may serve for an Example to all Princes, inasmuch as may concern the continency of the married. To banish all Love-toyes from his heart, he Vita S. Ludovici.

Conjugal & Chastity of S. Lewis.

resolved perfectly to love the Queen his wife, whom he espoused in his most tender years, & both of thē lived & conversed with so much integrity, sweetness and admiration, that one would have thought them a pair of Angels on earth. The husband secretly stole into the chamber of his dear spouse; and much he feared to be met by the Queen his mother, who seemed (to such as did not well understand her intentions) to be somewhat jealous to see them together. But to say truely, she managed these interviews in their tender youth, that their health might not be prejudiced, and their marriage might become the more fruitful. And the good King, to give her no cause of suspicion, had little dogs in the lobby of purpose that they might bark and afford him leasure to save himself and not be surprized by the diligence of Blanneh in the Queens chamber. His love was accompanied with so much respect & confidence, that he dispatched not any business without communicating it with her; in such sort, that when he was to conclude the conditions of his deliverance with the Saracens; he freely told them, he could not sign them without the advice of the Queen his wife, who was not far off. At which these Barbarians were much amazed; but he answered them, it only belonged to them to account their wives for slaves, and that his, was his Lady and Mistris.

13. Our most Christian King (an imitatour of S. Lewis in the virtue of purity) possesseth it in such a degree that in him it more dependeth on a gift from God, then the temper of man. Praises are often given to Princes, wch are as colours in the air, and have no foundation in their merit; but this hath taken such an incorruptible root in the integrity of his manners that it will never dy; which might minister matter for me here to enlarge, had I resolved to write a Panegyrick, and not a History which treateth of things past; as Prophecy, tho se which are to come.

14. I think I have sufficiently touched in the first & second Tome the notable acts of Charles the Eight, and Chevalier Bayard; and I am confident, History will never suffer the austerities of holy K. Robert to dy; who to mortifie concupiscence sometimes lay on the boards the seven whole weeks before Easter.

Helgandus Monachus Floriacensis.

15. I do not account thē contemptible, who having not had the happiness to live in this great purity of S. Lewis, have not spared to resist love which had formerly mastred them. Dagobert, a young King bred in all virtue, by the care and zeal of S. Arnold his Tutour, took liberty in vice very irregularly, so soon as this grave directour had obtained leave to retire from the Court. There are spirits which resemble the wooden Dove of Architas the Philosopher, wch flew by engines whilst they had their operation, and soared in the air; but so soon as they ceased, it trailed the wing on the earth. Such was our Dagobert, who perpetually having this worthy man Arnold by his sides; he spake as an Oracle, and lived like an Angel. There was not any thing more chast, more devout, and more affable: which was the cause his Tutour, thinking there was no more need of him about his person, urgently entreated he might be permitted to withdraw into the Country, which the King gain-said even to the expression of anger, if he spake any more of this retreat. Nevertheless, redoubling his importunities, he prevailed; and so soon as he was separated from his scholar; he, who before, was a dove with wings of silver, & who in acts of virtue took a strong and confident flight, suffered himself to fall into the mire with a scandal as shameful, as the excess was violent. Lust assaulteth, and on all sides besieges him. Licentious youth takes possession of his soul, and continually blows love and beauty into his ears. It many times happeneth that the passions of young men which have been too severely restrained, so soō as they have found passage; do the more violently overflow, as if nature went about to take reverge upon art and precepts. They must sometime be shewed the world with contempt, they must be enured against its assaults, they must be prepared against its deceits, that they be not like foolish pigeons which have never seen any thing but suffer thēselves to be taken with the first baits. S. Arnold, who was a man that breathed nothing but wilderneses, in my opinion held the spirit of Dagobert in a life too much restrained, wch, in the first approach of liberty, flew out into most violent extravagancies. He presently took an aversion against Q. Gomatrude his wife, & in a liberty of doing all which flatterers told him fell to him as an inheritance, he durst to repudiate her, and take a young Lady named Ragintrude, whom he most affectionately loved. Lust is the throat of hell, wch never sayes, it is enough; and when shame hath no bridle to withhold it, it makes no difference between things sacred and prophane, and the greatest crimes pass with it, as matters indifferent. This love is not content with common passion, he entreth into Cloysters, and takes a virgin out of a Monastery, who had begun to dedicate her self to God. To her he addeth many others, and makes a little Seraglio of his palace. All France groaned to see so sudden and deplorable a change of life in their King. S. Arnold is invited by some good men again to visit his young plant, & to take in hand the rains of the Kings direction, which he had forsaken, but whether he were charmed by the sweetness of his solitude, or whether he feared he should have no favourable admission after so solemn a leave; (which he with so much importunity had begged) he would not hearken to it rather choosing to send his sighs to the ears of God then the King's. S. Amand determines to undertake the matter, which he did with Ecclesiastick vigour, and a most undoubted confidence; but the sick man was too tender to endure a tongue armed with sword and fire; so far was he frō disposing himself to remedies, that he could not suffer so much as the presence of his Physician, causing him to be sent into another country. Pepin of Landen, who was the prime man in the Court, thought fit to instil some good counsel & sage words as occasion offered, but the King transported with the exorbitancy of his youth, told him he was a troublesom man, of whom it were fit to rid the world, since he was so hardy as to censure the innocent delights of his Master. For which cause, this great pillar of state, shaken by the storm of a violent passiō much tottred, & was very near to have been thrown down. The Reverence wherewith his virtue was honoured, (which proceeded almost to veneration) saved him to reserve his reasons for a better disposition. During this time the Q. dieth, and the affections of Dagobert began to slacken either out of satiety or shame. This good Counsellour lays hold of his opportunity, & takes him on the Bias; shewing him, his honour & repose joyned with the good of the state required of him a happy posterity; and that it was a very easie matter for him, since he had honoured Ragintrude with his affections for her exquisite beauty and the excellent gifts wherein she surpassed, that he might take her to wife, & limit his love within lawful wedlock, wch would draw upon him the blessings of heaven, & the love of all his people. This speech happily entred into the Kings heart, and he resolved to follow the Counsel which was presented him by good a hand. He dismisseth all the women wch had tyranniranized over his affection; he marrieth Ragintrude: and, as if in an inſtant ſome charm had been taken away; he in himſelf (by the hand of God) made ſuch a change, that his life was a Rule of virtue, and his converſion, a miracle. The Court wch commonly followeth the inclinations of the Prince, took with him a quite other face; vice & vicious are thence baniſhed, & all virtues thither brought chaſtity as in triumph.

Ricardus. 16. I verily think, it is many times an act as hard & heroick to free ones ſelf frō a miery bog wherein-to one by miſchance is fallen, as to live perpetually innocent. For which cauſe, I much eſteem the reſolutiō of Philip Gods-gift, who being in the beginning diſtaſted with Engelbergue his wife, after he had repudiated her, & taken Mary the daughter of the Duke of Moravia, out of a violent affection which long had embroiled him; he was ſuddenly converted, and laid hold of the occaſion of his ſalvation. The Complaints of the ſcandal he gave, flew to Rome, & returned with Cenſures and Thunders, Cenſus and Meilleur (two Legates ſent by the holy ſee) durſt not touch this wound which they judged to be incurable. Peter, Cardinal of S. Mary abſolutely incenſed him, putting the Kingdom into interdict, and the King into deſpair, who vomited nought but choller and flames. Two other Legates deputed for a third trial proceeded therein with much ſweetneſs, which ſo gained the ſoul of Philip, that he began to ſubmit to reaſon. Yet the charms were ſo violent, that his reaſon thereby became infirm, and his conſtancy wavering. His buſineſs was laſtly decided by a Synod, and it was dangerous leſt it might ſtir up a ſtorm, when this Royal heart (which was come to plead before the Council, and to diſpoſe of his affections to the heighth of his contentment (there wanting not too men of authority who flattered his paſſion) was ſuddenly touched, takes the Queen his wife, reconcileth himſelf to her, ſets her behind him on his horſe, carries her to his Palace, and cauſed to be ſaid to the Legates, and the other Prelates aſſembled, that they had no more to do to trouble their heads any longer about his buſineſs; for he had happily determined it. If Henry the eighth, King of England, had taken the ſame courſe; love would have been diſarmed, innovations hindred, concord eſtabliſhed, and all the diſaſters baniſhed out of England.

Great Triumph of Philip Gods-gift over himſelf.

Laſtly to conclude this diſcourſe, I verily think, never woman better managed love then Queen Blanch mother of S. Lewis. She was very lovely: and among thoſe great lights of perfection which encompaſſed her on all ſides, ſhe wanted not beauty, which was the cauſe, that continuing a widow in a flouriſhing age, there were Princes in her kingdom who durſt promiſe themſelves, that ſhe would reflect on thē for a ſecōd marriage. Among others, the Count of Champaign propoſed this good hap to himſelf, more then was to be believed, & ceaſed not to play the Courtier, even to the fitting his gallery with verſes and Emblems of the Queen. This prudent widow, who had to do with great ones in the beginning of her authority of Regent, engaged not her ſelf to any, nor did ſhe likewiſe rejects their ſuits: but ſo ſoon as ſome of thē perceived ſhe had no purpoſe for thē, they preſently took arms to diſturb the Kingdom, & leſſen the authority of the young King. The Count of Champaign ſaw himſelf by neceſſity embarked in the faction, but he had much ado to defend himſef from the affection which poſſeſſed him for this exquiſite beauty. For which cauſe he pleaded like a lover, & betrayed his faction, diſcovering the things moſt important: which gave Queen Blanch a great light to guard her ſelf frō the wicked enterpriſes of her enemies, and diſſipate all factions.

Obſervations upon the paſſion of DESIRE.

Wherein we may behold the miſery of ambitious and turbulent Spirits.

THe winde, which is an inviſible power, and which appears before our eyes no more then nothing, maketh tall ſhips to move, pulleth up trees by the roots, overthroweth houſes, exerciſing on land and ſea powers too-too viſible. Deſires, and hopes likewiſe (which, to ſay truely, are but imaginations almoſt unperceivable) vex Empires, embroil States, deſolate Cities and Provinces, and make havock, ſuch, as we cannot in thought conceive, nor can our eyes ever ſufficiently deplore. Marvellous effects of the paſſion of deſire.

It is a ſtrange thing, that from a little fountain-head which onely diſtilleth drops of water, great rivers grow; and from a deſire which inviſibly hatcheth in the heart of man, lofty ambitions, burning avarices, and enraged covetouſneſs proceed, which deſtroy mankinde.

Our firſt deſires reſpect body and life, which is the foundation of all the bleſſings we can hope in this world; and here it is, wherein thoſe who flouriſh in Empires and eminent fortunes, ſhew paſſions and care, able to make them immortal, if humane nature might reach to ſuch a ſtate.

Strange deſire of life in Lewis the eleventh.

We all know that Lewis the eleventh was a Monarch, who by the greatneſs of his wit and power, darkned all the Kings of his time; but we likewiſe cannot be ignorant, that he had moſt ardent Paſſions which gave him infinite diſturbances, the cōſideratiō whereof may ſerve great ones for the eſtabliſhment of their repoſe. Never any man more loved life, nor more feared death, then this mighty Prince; who ſeeing himſelf laden with infirmities, and aſſailed by old age, (a diſeaſe incurable) employed the whole power of an ample Kingdom to hold together a poor thread of life. There was not any remedy in the world wch. he tried not; there was no ſecret in phyſick which he opened not: his profuſion cauſed him to give a Phiſician 1000. crowns a month: and although this Monarch were one of the moſt eminent of his time, and that he ſought nothing but to climb over the heads of Princes; yet he made himſelf a ſlave to Hippocrates his diſciples, to idolatrize health. It is to be thought, if Medea had in his days returned into the world, he would have put himſelf into her hands, of purpoſe to wax young again, like another Peleus. So ſoon as he heard ſpeech of a man who cured maladies by certain extraordinary wayes; needs muſt he come from the utmoſt limits of the earth: and for this cauſe he called S. Francis de Paula who drave away feavers & plagues from humane bodies with ſo much eaſe; yet could he not prolong the Kings days, whom God would puniſh by the privation of that he moſt loved. He alſo took the holy viol of Rhemes to keep it in his chamber, and therein to find treaſures of life, which was bootleſs; to teach us, there is no greater a Hang-man of our hearts then inordinate ill-rectified deſire. The deſire of life tranſported him to extraordinary actions. For having been all his life time very plain in apparel, towards his latter days when he went out of his chamber, he ſumptuouſly cloathed himſelf, he ſhuffled his officers & changed them out of a certain deſire of novelty, that it might be known, he was yet alive: he cared not to be curſed, ſo that men believ'd him to be living. Yet, if he had done all this to lead the life of a man, and of a King with ſome reaſonable contentment; his cares might have been the more excuſable. But all this great endeavour was but to drag along a miſerable life among the diſtruſts of his neareſt allyes, among mong jealousies of his own son, among woodden and Iron cages wherein he kept a Bishop of Verdun for the space of fourteen years, among chains and cloggs of Iron, (which he called his threads) among disconsolate sadnesses, which they sought by all means to sweeten, one while making Clowns to sport before him, another while furnishing out a musick of Hoggs, ranged under a pavillion of velvet, which they pricked through the ears with bodkins to make them chant forth their goodly warblings. What inventions doth a passionate man finde out, to prolong his punishments!

Next unto life, the most ardent desires are for wealth and honour, which make turbulent and busie spirits to disturb the whole world, without enjoying one hour of repose. One might as soon number the stars and the sands of the sea, as reckon up the souls of this kinde, with which the Histories of all Nations are stuffed. For, in matters that concern particular ends, you on every occasion see children bandied against their Parents and Kindred in mutiny one against another, who bely their bloud, betray nature, and devour lands, bloudy and smoaking for imaginary pretensions in the matter of their inheritance.

2. But it would be very hard to finde a spirit more covetous, more factious, (and more tempestuous to encrease his estate) then was that of Lotharius the son of Lewis the Courteous: Hence it was that he shamefully degraded, shaved, and shut the King his Father in a Cloister: Hence, that he contrived so many matches, and plotted so many Conspiracies: Hence, that he levyed so many Armies, and gave so many battels: Hence, that he ransack'd so many Churches, put the Clergy to ransom, threw down Justice, and exhausted the Nobility: Hence it was, that he had alwayes an eye towards the field, and an armed hand to ruine the inheritance of his brothers: Lastly, hence proceeded that bloudy battel of Fontenay, where an hundred thousand men of account died in the place; so many rivers and seas of bloud must an outrageous ambition swim in, which is wedded to particular ends, and covetousness.

Prodigious victory which in the end Lotharius gained over himself after a great storm of passions; in becoming Religious.

But howsoever it were, he by an unexpected miracle became victor over these two passions, when (after he had embroiled his whole life) he was sensibly touched with a divine inspiration, and forsook the Crown of an Empire, to take that of a Cloister, changing his pride into humility, his impiety into devotion, and his ambition into penance. It it an Act which only appertaineth to a Hand wholly divine, to draw light out of a Chaos, and pull this serpent out of his cavern; but it was likewise a most incomparable happiness, to see him to dy a good Religious man at the years-end, and to receive the Crown in the beginning of the Career, although it be not likely, that those grievous sins were so soon expiated, but that a good part of them were reserv'd for purifying flames.

Shallow and Fantastick ambitions.

3. For as much as concerneth the diversity of ambitions, there are some shallow and fantastick which resemble that of a silly Trades-man in Constantinople, who gave all the wealth he had gathered in his whole life, that he might (but so much as one hour) wear the Crown on his head, and play a King of the Cards on a stage, where he was used with all manner of scorn: Even so many Courtiers suffer themselves desperately to run into certain barren vanities, busying themselves about Genealogies, Marriages, Extractions, right and left Lines; to finde, in the Ashes of Troy the great, an ally of their bloud, and to make themselves diadems in picture.

Codinus in Eclog.

Lucianus in Peregrino.

Others are a little Hypocondriack, and have humours not unlike those of Peregrinus, who presented a Letter of challenge in a great assembly of Grecians, inviting all the world to come and see him burn alive, wherein he failed not, throwing himself into the fire to gain the glory of a generous man. All our Gladiatours are in this state, who desire to make themselves famous by infamous Duels, and have a greater appetite to live in the fantasie of men (such as themselves) then in their own bodies.

The ambitions of Ecclesiasticks and Religious much more subtle.

4. There are other covert desires of honour which sleep in the bosom of men consecrated to God, and enkindle their flames with the fire of the Incensory, which are much more subtle, and which devour, as fire from heaven.

Crodielde daughter of King Caribert, a Religious woman, raiseth many troubles by her ambition.

5. This was verified under the reign of Clotharius in the person of Crodielde a religious woman of the Monastery of St. Croſſe of Poictiers. She was daughter of Caribert, and following the example of the Queen St. Radegonde, she had generously despised the world, to take a husband in the house of God: But, as these kind of persons are commonly treated with much honour and fair entertainment; their passions sleep like the silk-worm foulded up in its threads, which in the end breaks its prison, becomes a butterfly, and flies aloft in the air.

She had a violent desire to hold the highest place, and to yield to none, as far as her power would extend. She patiently enough endured S. Radegonde, because she had been a Queen: but so soon as death had closed up her eyes, and that she saw, without any regard had of Royal bloud, Leubocee was chosen and confirmed for Abbess of the Monastery; she brake her bands of silk, which so tenderly tied her to the Cross, awakened all her sleeping passions, took the wings of such an exorbitant ambition, that having opened the locks, & broken open the doors, she went out accompanyed with Basines her Cousin and forty others, Religious Libertines, to provide for her self at Court, and to procure to be chosen Abbess.

The good S. Gregory of Tours relateth, that she coming unto his City throughly wet, and much tired with her journey, besought him to take her and her virgins into his protection, against the violences of the Abbess of Poictiers, who had treated her with all manner of indignity. She added that for this purpose she was going to the Court, and prayed him, that expecting her return, he would be pleased according to usual charity to provide for the entertainment of all her religious women. The good Bishop, who was very busie about his studies, and the function of his charge, would not undertake the trouble of maintaining so many virgins, which he feared as much as a vast army; but entertained her very canonically, saying he could not approve her going forth, & that if she were offended with her Abbess, she ought not therefore to forsake her Monastery without leave; but peaceably to inform Moroveus the Bishop, who, by the obligation of his place, was to order all their differences. She, who would not hear speech of this man, answered; He marred all, and that order cannot be expected from the Authour of disorder; so that, seeing S. Gregory nothing disposed to feed so many mouths; she provided elsewhere, and went directly to her Uncle King Gontran, leaving all her religious under the charge of Basines. Gontran received her very courteously, as his niece, and gave her many gifts; but, having well considered her business, he would not meddle with it, saying, It was an Ecclesiastical affair; and that he would recommend it to the Bishops of the Province; which he most exactly did, without prescribing them any thing to the prejudice of right, or the dishonour of their dignity. Crodielde thereupon returning to Tours found her sisters much impaired, impaired, and knew by experience that religious women dissolve in secular life, as salt in water, although thence it took its original. They were so chargeable to all, but especially to S. Gregory, that he prayed and made vows for their departure, which caused them to hasten their retreat to Poictiers, where instead of entring into the Abbey, they withdrew into the Church of Saint Hilary.

In the end, Godegesillus Archbishop of Bourdeaux arrived with his Suffragans, to decide the matter: but these Mistrisses (who had good noses, smelling that this assembly was not to favour their faction) levied a regiment of souldiers to defend them, of which they make Childeric to be the Captain; a wicked & a most resolute fellow, who failed not to be well followed, such store there was of Frizlers and effeminate youngsters who put themselves into this army of women. The Bishops failed not to march directly towards them, accompanied with the Clergy, and a great multitude of people, to summon them to reenter into the Monastery; but this Amazon instantly commanded her souldiers to strike, which they did with so much violence, that the Crosiers and banners seeing themselves so unexpectedly charged, began to totter; the Bishops, Priests and Deacons fled: there was a general dissipation of the people, and many were wounded in the place, the Church it self being stained with humane bloud. Crodielde running on to the higest degree of insolency, as if she had been puffed up with her victory, entreth into the Monastery with her Hacksters, & takes her Abbess, who is dragged by the hair, used with all hideous extremities, and confined to a prison. She caused all the religious women to come who had opposed her, she torments them with sundry tortures, layes hold of the Charters, seizeth on all the papers, maketh her self Abbess; and bearing a barbarous soul in the heart of a woman, exerciseth rigours and cruelties which struck horror into all the world. The Bishops had no other defence, but the Thunders of Excommunication, of which these creatures, abandoned by God, made very little account. Macon Governour of Poictiers was entreated to use a strong hand, but he excused himself, saying, he would not contend with the daughter of a King, without commission. But it was not fit, matters should so continue; and honest men unable any longer to see the Church groan under an unheard of Tyranny, implore by most humble supplications the aid of three Kings, Clotharius, Gontran, and Childebert, who being sensibly touched with these disorders, gave large Commissions, power, and commandment to Governours to assist the Bishops of Tours, Colen, and Poictiers, who were appointed to determine this difference. Order is at this time well observed, Justice is there supported by force: the gallants, who had adhered to the faction of the Nuns, scatter under the terrour of arms & Royal authority. This Empress of Rebels is taken, and carried to the Council to give an account of her deportments. She comes thither in an audacious manner: retaining still some thing of her arrogancy and insupportable haughtiness, even in her depression; and after she had employed arms, she skirmisheth, what she could, with her tongue; which was by falling on the life and manners of her Abbess, whom she accused of many trifling things, reproaching her (among other points) to have made a garment for her niece of a Cope taken out of the Treasury of the Church, which was false; to have caused secular persons to eat at her Table, to have a bath in the Monastery and to play at Chess. For this required to have her deposed, that she might be put in her place: wherein it plainly appeareth, that ambition is not only furious, but blinde in its fury. She who swallowed Camels, maketh an anatomy of a fly: she who was defiled with the crimes of Tyrants, reprehendeth slight recreations which had been permitted under the government of S. Radegonde. The Abbess replyed very modestly to all her objections, and made her innocency appear as bright as the rayes of the Sun, whereupon she was re-established with honour and applause in her dignity; & the other condemned to ask her pardon, and to submit to her commands: To which she stoutly answered, she would never do it, and that they should rather advise upon the means of putting the Abbess to death, then to use her in such sort. But she persisting in this obdurateness is again deprived of the communion of the Church, separated from all her complices who are placed in diverse Monasteries there to do penance: yet she still finding herself to be supported by some, by reason of her noble extraction, on a time stole her self from the just punishment of evil carriage, and fled with her Cousin to Childebert's Court, where being not able any longer to raise storms, she was constrained to be quiet, rather for want of force, then through the defect of courage. One may by this proceeding see the Tempests which arise from ill rectified desires, when they are underpropped by some manner of power, and that there is nothing so sovereign, as in their root to mortifie them.

5. But they never are so insolent, as when they bud in the hearts of people of base extraction, who behold themselves unexpectedly raised to some extraordinary favour.

Ambitions which bud in hearts of base extraction are most insolent.

S. Lewis had taken into his friendship his Chirurgion named Peter la Broſſe, because, besides the experience he had in his profession, he had made himself praise-worthy for the goodness of his wit and great loyalty. This favour mounted much higher under Philip the third, successour of S. Lewis: for he not content to honour this man with a particular affection; bestowed benefits upon him with such an inestimable profusion, that he raised him to the dignity of Chamberlain, and conferred honours and largesses upon all his kindred. This fellow, seeing the young King had not the moderation of the father, to proportion his affections to his reputation and the good of his state, usurped upon his spirit, entred into all his secrets, and needs would intermeddle in State affairs, from which his birth and the much limited capacity of his wit ought to have deterred him.

The example of a Chirurgion of S. Lewis wisely repressed and chastised by the prudence and justice of Philip the 3 King of France.

The King had in a second wedlock marryed a most virtuous Princess, Mary of Brabant, who held in his heart that place which the Law of God and the Sacrament of Marriage gave her. It is a wonder, how this child of the earth entreth hereby into jealousies, and thought the tender affections of the King towards his dearest spouse might lessen the good favours of his Master, whom he was desirous to possess in the title of a Sovereign.

He sought to cast the apple of discord into so happy a marriage: &, seeing this knot could not be broken but with much labour, having a soul sold to Iniquity, it is thought he found means to poyson Lewis eldest son of Philip, and of Isabel his first wife. This young Prince is by a sudden death taken away to the infinite grief of all the Court: Physicians being consulted with upon it, judge his life was shortned by poyson, not knowing the authour of so detestable a crime. The wicked man in the mean time gives close counter-blows, and under-hand fixeth this suspicion upon the innocent Queen. And, albeit, her behaviour (which did print innocency on the mild aspect of her face) ſufficiently freed her before all good men; yet the intereſt which commonly ſtep-mothers have in the death of their husbands children, and the ſubtle ſlights of this devil (who coloured the matter with zeal of publick good) began to blemiſh a life which was as free from ſtains, as the brighteſt ſtars. The King is already half wavering, but loath to precipitate any thing in an affair of ſuch importance, he reſolved to conſult with the Oracles of that time, & to have recourſe to the lights of heaven, ſince they on earth were eclipſed. There was in thoſe dayes a religious woman in Flanders, who was thought to be endowed with the ſpirit of Propheſie, and to tell the moſt hidden things; to whom he reſolved to ſend the Abbot of S. Denis to ſatisfie him in the truth of the fact. La Broſſe, who expected a more ſpeedying diſpatch upon his informations, began to be troubled, and fearing this Propheteſs might marr all, ſo wrought, that the Biſhop of Bayeux his kinſman agreed with the Abbot to undertake the journey of Flanders with him. He being very ſubtle, ſought to prevent the Virgin, & to accommodate her to his likings, wherein he could not prevail according to his wicked purpoſe; and it is likewiſe thought, ſhe let him ſee preſumptions pregnant enough againſt La Broſſe his kinsman. But he, ſurprizing her by way of conſcience enjoyned her ſilence, ſaying, It was not fit for her to ſpeak, ſince her ſpeech might peradventure be the cauſe of the death of a man whom ſhe could not expoſe to this danger without mortal ſin. The Abbot, being come to acquit himſelf of his Cõmiſſion, found her wholly reſerved, and could get nothing out of her, which made him to ſuſpect ſome deceit. Both of them returned to the Court where the Biſhop, being queſtioned by the King concerning his proceedings, ſaith, the religious woman had told him things under the ſecret of Confeſſion, which was not fit for him to reveal. To which Philip readily replyed, that he ſent him not to hear her Confeſſion, but to know the revelations ſhe had from God in the diſcharge of Innocents. The Abbot ſaid aloud, he well perceived there was jugling in the Biſhops proceeding, and that he went not ſincerely to work, which was the cauſe that a ſecond Embaſſage was appointed to this religious creature, whereof Theobald Biſhop of Dol and Arnulph a Knight of the Templars, had the Cõmiſſion, & they ſo wel underſtood how to handle the matter, that ſhe ſpake in theſe tearms. Tell the King, If any one hath ſpoken to him in an ill ſenſe of the Queen his wife; let him not believe it: for ſhe is truly, and ſincerely good, and cordially faithfull towards him and his; her virtue cannot be obſcured by the darkneſs of Calumny. This anſwer cured Philip's mind in the matter of ſuſpicion againſt Mary, and turned it upon his bad ſervants, although the want of proofe permitted him not, to hazard the puniſhment was due to them.

But God, who draweth brightneſs out of the boſom of darkneſs, diſcovered the miſchief of La Broſs by a notable accident. One of his truſty friends paſſing by the Abbey of S. Peter at Melun is ſurprized by a ſharp ſickneſs; which made him think upon his laſt paſſage by the aſſiſtance of good Religious men of that Monaſtery; and finding himſelf touched to the quick with remorſe of conſcience, he declared his crime, and gave a little Caſket to a Religious man who heard his Confeſſion, charging him to give it to the King with his own hands, and to no other; which he very faithfully did; and when they had opened this box of Pandora, there were diſcovered all the miſchiefs and practiſes of La Broſſe, and his hopes to be diſſolved. For he was preſently put in priſon and brought to his triall, which was followed by a Sentence that condemned him to be hanged and ſtrangled on a gallows of Felons. Here it was where the ambitious deſires of this diſloyal ſoul were to determine, who found that worldly fortunes in which God is not, are groſs ſmoaks that produce nought but tempeſts.

6. To conclude; we finde (in the laſt order) bloudy and furious ambitions which cauſe revolutions of Empire, and ſhake the pillars of the earth. Nicetas obſerveth one very terrible, wherein the French were witneſſes, arbitratours, and revengers. The French [illegible]

During the expedition they made in the Land under Philip Gods-guift, there appeared a ſtrange accident, and a horrible confuſion in the ſtate of the Eaſtern Empire. Iſaac Comnenus, who held the reins of the Empire, is menaced much miſery by his neareſt allies, and thoſe whom he had advanced to the greateſt dignities. He thereupon conſulteth with a South-ſayer, who, amõg popular ſpirits, was in great reputation, but who, according to the opinion of Nicetas, was a cheating Impoſtor that ſought to paſs for a Prophet, although his words conſiſted of a thouſand falſhoods. The Emperour with much courteſie having ſaluted him; he diſpoſed himſelf to leap, and to expreſs poſtures which ſavoured more of a man poſſeſſed and frantick, then of a Prophet: notwithſtanding, without ſaying any thing elſe, he threw his ſtaffe at the Emperours Image, and (for an ill preſage) put out the the eyes of it. Iſaac Comnenus, making no account hereof contemneth the South-ſayer & in few dayes is deprived of the Empire and of his eyes (by a horrible conſpiracy of Alexius his neareſt kinſman) and in this condition confined to a loathſome priſon all the reſt of his life. The tyrant (who had put out his eyes) takes his bloudy ſpoil, and finding no reſiſtance, poſſeſſeth himſelf of the throne of Conſtantinople.

Alexis, ſon of the Emperour made blinde, eſcaped out of the chains and hand of the parricide his uncle, and goes to the French Camp, where he made a lamentable narration of his diſaſters. He prayes, he beſeecheth, he conjureth theſe brave Conquerours by all things the moſt ſacred, to take pity upon a miſerable Emperour, and to ſuccour his father againſt the moſt execrable treachery that ever was practiſed in the world, ſaying, It onely belongeth to them to trample dragons and monſters under-foot. Beſides the glory of this action, he promiſeth them wonders, arms, ſhips, munition, to advance the deſign they had for the conqueſt of the holy Land. The French were divided in opinion upon this buſineſs: ſome deſiring to purſue their journey, others judging this occaſion well-deſerved to ſtay them; there being not any actions in the world more glorious, then to do juſtice to the afflicted, diſpoſſeſs bloudy uſurpers of Empires, and to reſtore true Kings into that rank which nature and the conſent of people had given them. This Faction carried it, and ours, uſing the advantage which their firſt ſervours afforded them, put themſelves preſently in a readineſs to take Conſtantinople. One who ſhould well weigh the exploits of arms they did in ſix days, would think their army had conſiſted of Giants, who bare Mountains and piled them one upon another to over-look the ſtrongeſt Citadels in the world. What they did exceedeth ordinary prodigies and will ſcarcely find credit with poſterity. Two thouſand foot, ſeparated from the reſt of the army, aided onely by five hundred horſe, entred into a City wherein there were threeſcore thouſand horſe, and four hundred thouſand ſouls able to bear arms. This ſo filled minds with terrour, that the tyrant, as timorous in warr as he had been violent in peace, leaves his place without resistance, & putting his richest treasures into covert, he goes to Sea, in an instant to change a great Empire into banishment.

The furious ambition of Alexius (the Tyrant of Greece) puniſhed by the valour and Juſtice of the French.

He went out at one gate, and young Alexis entred in by the other, causing his troops to march in good order, and was with applause received by the chief Citizens, who had used much compassion in the afflictions of his Father. There was then seen a strange alteration, when they went to take this poor blind Emperour out of prison, to carry him in triumph to his throne; he thought himself a sleep, and in a dream, and imagined it so sweet, that he in his blindness feared the day-light. He learned from his son all the success of this negotiation, and the valorous atchievements of the French. He knew not what he should believe, what he might hope, nor what to admire. A world of wonders overwhelm his mind; and more then ever he bewaileth the loss of his eys, to behold himself bereft of the sight of these incomparable men who seemed to be sent from Heaven.

Finally, he saith, he is satiated with Empire and worldly greatness, and that he putteth all his state into the hands of his son. His son embraceth him with all unexpressable tenderness, calling him his Lord and Father, and protesting he will not intermeddle with any thing of the Empire but the cares, whilest he liveth, leaving the dignity to his discretion who had given him birth.

The Father, on the other side, answered, that the piety of his son was more to him then all Empires, and that he hereafter should repute himself the happiest man in the world, being enlightned by the rays of such virtue, in the deprivation of temporal light. This was an admirable strife, which made it appear, that if there be impetuous desires in the Courts of great men, there are likewise sometimes to be found moderations, which surpass all mens imagination. I am not ignorant Nicetas saith, that this affection afterward turned into jealousie: but we must note this Authour is passionate against Alexis and his father, by reason of the amity he contracted with strangers. The French judged it fit that the son should reign by the authority of the father, and in respect of his infirmities, take the whole government of the State into his hand, which he did, & all seemed to prosper in his beginnings; when, after the retreat of ours, who had made havock enough in the City, out of the liberty of arms: rebels stirred, who put the whole City into combustion, exciting it against the young Emperour, and saying, that under pretext of publick good, he had called in strangers to the saccage of his Country, which made him unworthy both of Empire and life. The conspiring was so violent, that Alexis, having no leisure to look about him, was betraied by one of his intimate friends named Mursuflus, who, pretending to put him into a place of safety, threw him into an ugly dungeon, where, twice having tried to put him to death by poyson, and seeing his plot succeeded not: he out of a horrid baseness caused him to be strangled. Deceitful felicities of the world! True turrets of Fayeries, which are only in imagination! Where shall your allurements prevail from henceforth.

The poor Father, hearing the death of his son, and the sudden alteration of affairs, saith,

Good God! to what calamity do you reserve my wretched old age? I have consummated evils, and evils have not yet ended me. I am now but a rotten trunk deprived of vigour, and the functions of life: and if I have any feeling, it is only of my miseries. Take this soul which is on my lips, and which is over-toiled with worldly Empires, and put it in a place where it may no longer fear either hostilities or treasons. Ah! poor son, thou art passed away like froth on the water, and Fortune did not raise thee within the imaginary circuit of her Empire, but to cast thee down headlong. I bewail not my blindness, it is the happiest of my evils, since it bereaves me the aspect of the horrible accidents which by heap pass through my ears. Dear son! thou hast out-stripped me; but, I follow thee with a confident pace into the shades of death, which shall for me hereafter be the best of lives.

He gave up the ghost in these anguishes, whilest the City of Constantinople was divided by a thousand factions, & turmoiled with fatal convulsions w^ch^ ministred matter of presage of the change of Empire.

The people weary of the government of the Angels (whose names were Isaac and Alexis) had already chosen one called Canabus, a man before unknown, who was quickly put down by the power and violence of Mursuflus. He was a Prince arrogant, incontinent, and more cunning then prudent; who kept not long that Scepter which he by such wickedness had usurped. For, scarcely two months and a half were past, but that the French returned, and besieged Constantinople which the new tyrant had already very well fortified. But the Grecians then were so cowardous and affrighted, that they made very little resistance, and flew before the French, and other Western and Northern people, as before so many Giants. Mursuflus, as faint-hearted in peril, as he had been adventrous to commit a treason, puts himself upon the Sea to fly into Morea; but is taken and slain by the Divine Vengeance, which perpetually hath an armed hand over furious and bloody ambitions. The City and Empire of Constantinople yield in the end to the Western power: and Baldwin Earl of Flanders is chosen Emperour by the consent of all the Army. Nicetas a Greek Authour, who lived at that time, deploreth this change with the Lamentations of Jeremy. But it was God's judgment, who would purifie the Eastern Throne defiled by so many wicked actions, making a Prince so chast to sit thereon, that Nicetas himself is enforced to praise and admire his singular continency, as I have observed in my first Treatise.

Throughout all these Discourses we now see how the desires of the ambitious are chastised, and how their hopes being vain, their joys are likewise short and unhappy.

7. Historians give most of our Kings this praise: that they never had turbulent and troublesom spirits, but loved Peace and maintained Justice. Moderation of the Kings of France.

The History of the Fathers of the West assures us, that in the general combustion of Wars between the French and the English, there was a good Hermite named John of Gaunt, who ceased not to beseech heaven to quench the fire of these fatal Divisions, and that he was sent by God to mediate peace between the two Kings.

He first went to our Charles the Seventh, whom he found infinitely disposed to all the conditions of a good Peace, and this gave him occasion to promise him infinite many benedictions from heaven, that he should have a Son (successour of his Estates) to crown his Felicities: which happened to him (as being a voice from God, and an Oracle of Truth.) But when the Religious man came to the King of England, he would in no sort hearken to him, but caused him to be used in a manner unworthy his person, which drew the anger of God upon his Kingdom, and occasioned him great calamities.

This subject is so plentiful, that I am willing to abbreviate it, ambitious desires being so frequent, that they have more need to be corrected, then sought into.

Observations upon ANGER and REVENGE.

BEhold here the Paſſion from whence ſparkles, flames, and coals proceed, which make horrible havock, unleſs Grace and Reaſon cauſe ſome temper.

There is not any devil more familiar in Court, more injurious to civil converſation, more pernicious to States, then Choler and Revenge. Pride, which is born with the moſt eminent conditions, nouriſheth it, flatterers enkindle it, inſolent tongues ſharpen it, fire and ſword end it.

In ſome it is haughty and cruel; as it appeared in Dagobert, a young Prince, ſon of Clotharius the Second, who in his tendreſt years, had (I know not what) of ſalvage in him, which ſavoured of the manners of Paganiſme, or the humours of his Grandmother Fredegonde; albeit, he afterward gained victories over himſelf. The King his Father had appointed him two Governours; Arnold, to rectifie his manners; Sadragefillus, to breed him up to Arms and Court-like behaviour. The firſt governed him like the Sun; the ſecond, as the Nothern-wind.

Aymonius l. 4. P. Æmilius. Annals of France,

The one inſinuated himſelf with much ſweetneſs; the other undertook him with too proud and arrogant an approach, which in him rather cauſed Averſion, then Inſtruction. From whence it came to paſs, that he being one day invited to the Princes table, where he did eat apart, as the Kings ſon; he placed himſelf right over againſt him, took Dagoberts glaſs and drank to him: wherewith he was ſo deſperately offended, that inſtantly he fell upon him, and taking a knife on the table, cut off his beard, and moſt contemptuouſly diſfigured him.

Choler of Dagobert ſomewhat rough.

Sadragefillus, in this plight, preſented himſelf to King Clotharius, who was likewiſe enraged, and cauſed his Son to be purſued, commanding his Guard to apprehend him: but he ſaved himſelf in the Sanctuary of Montmartre under the protection of S. Denis, until his fathers anger was pacified, who ſpared not to give him a ſharp reprehenſion, and to raiſe Sadragefillus to great dignities, to take away the acerbities of the affront he had received.

Another time, S. Arnold asking leave of the ſame Dagobert to retire from Court, out of the deſire he had to paſs the reſt of his dayes in ſweet ſolitude; the King many times denied him: and he growing a little earneſt in a good cauſe; he furiouſly draws forth his ſword, threatning to kill him if he perſiſted in this requeſt. A Lord there preſent ſtayed the blow, and the Queen, ſhewing her husband the unworthineſs of his Choler, ſo gained him, that he came to himſelf, gave his Maſter full ſatisfaction, and permitted him to go whither he thought good, moſt affectionately recommending his perſon and ſtate to him.

Seneca hath well ſaid, that Choler was not a ſign of a courageous, but a ſwoln ſpirit: as it by experience appeared in Dagobert who was little war-like. For, being but in one piece of ſervice againſt the Saxons, where he received a very ſlight hurt; he made ſo many ceremonies about it, that he ſent a lock of his bloudy hair to his father to implore his aid. It is true that this Prince, being in his youth a little unruly, harkened afterward to the good reaſons of his Council, and became very temperate.

Generous anger of King Clotharius.

2. There are Martial angers which are generous and bold, when a heart upon a good occaſion is inflamed to the avengement of ſome Injuſtice; as it happened to Clotharius the Second, who coming to ſuccour his ſon Dagobert preſently appeared marching along the Rhine, & made himſelf remarkable by a notable head of hair: whereupon, Bertrand, Captain of the Saxons, darting ſome inſolent words at him; the King ſuddenly paſſed the river with great danger of his perſon, obſerveth his enemy, purſues him, ſtrikes him down from his horſe, and cuts off his head, which he fixed on the top of a lance, to fill the Saxon Army with terrour. Thus ſhould the anger of a great Prince be bent againſt proud and unjuſt adverſaries, not againſt his own Subjects. This ſpur hath ſometimes added valour to the ſweeteſt natures; witneſs Charles the Simple, who ſeeing that Robert had gathered together a huge army of Rebels againſt him, paſſed the river of Aiſne to charge him; and the other putting himſelf into a readineſs to reſiſt him, animating his own ſide, and braving in the head of his army; Charles looked him in the face, as the Butt againſt which he ſhould unburden all his gall, ſpurs forward directly towards him, and ſo ſucceſſully hits him with a thruſt of his lance in the mouth, that he tore out his tongue and killed him.

Valour of Charles the Simple.

3. Yet Choler is extremely dangerous in matter of Arms, eſpecially in things where ſome reſolution is to be taken with counſel and maturity. For it troubleth the art (ſaid an Antient) and many times cauſeth errours irreparable.

The paſſion of anger is very prejudicial to Military art in a General.

This is but too much verified in the fatal day of Creſcy-field, where Philip of Valois, one of the moſt valiant Monarchs which ever handled Sceptre, gave battel to Edward King of England. The Engliſh Army bravely encamped, heard Maſs, leiſurely took its repaſt, and coolely expected the enemy, to fight with firm footing: at which time, our Philip animated with anger, and above all, fearing leaſt the Engliſh might eſcape him, haſtned his Army what he could, cauſing it to march, and tyring it out on the day of battel. The Monk Baſelius, a man well experienced in feats of arms, ſhewed him, it were much better to expect till morning: on which he ſeemed to be reſolved; but this Choler had already put fire into his ſouldiers: and although ſome cried out, Stay, Enſign-bearers; yet thoſe who marched before; were ſo afraid to be out-gone by them who followed, that they had not the patience. When they came to join battel, the Genoway Archers who were in the French Army, proteſted aloud, they were not able to do their duty, and inſtantly diſbanded; whereupon the King grew into a freſh anger, and commanded to cut them in pieces, which with all poſſible violence was executed; ours being cruelly bent to devour their members, whilſt the arrows of the enemy fell upon them like hail, and the horſe gauled with ſhot, horribly neighing, ran away with their riders, and all the place was covered with dead bodies. This trouble of mind coſt the loſs of a battel, wherein (Froiſſard ſaith) were eight French againſt one Engliſh-man, and thirty thouſand men (where among others, the King of Bohemia, and Charles Count of Alencon the Kings brother) were ſlain in the place. Behold the diſaſters of an ill-governed Paſſion, which is never well known but by the experience of its miſery.

Philip of Valois, a great and a generous King loſeth a battel, out of a peeviſh humour of anger.

4. There are other nice and haughty Cholers, which are brought forth in the Curioſities of an imperious life, as it happened to many Emperours who took a glory in being angry, and to make their brutiſhneſs famous by bloudy effects. Bajazet ſhewing one day the pleaſure of hawking to the Count of Nevers, cauſed almoſt two thouſand Falconers to be killed, for a hawk which had not flown well. He well deſerved to be ſhut up in a cage (as he was afterward) for ſporting with ſuch prodigality with humane humane bloud. It is much more intolerable, when Christian Princes flie out, as did Lewis the young, (who being offended by Theobald Count of Champaigne) entred into his territory, and made strange spoil, even to the setting of the great Church of Vitry a fire, and therein burning fifteen hundred men, who fled into it as into a Sanctuary. But this enraged Passion knew no distinction between sacred and prophane, and the confusion of this fancy confounded heaven and earth. Good French men abhorred an act so barbarous, and S. Bernard (who then flourished) made the thunders of Gods judgments to roar in the Kings ear, wherewith he was so terrified, that re-entring into himself, he fell into a deep melancholy, which caused his mind to make a divorce from all worldly joyes, wherewith he became so dejected, that he was like to die, had not S. Bernard sought to cure the wound he gave, shewing that the true penitent ought to be sad without discomfort; humble, without sottishness; timorous, without despair: and that the grief of his fall should not exclude the hope of his rising again.

Lewis the Young admonished by S. Bernard, chastiseth himself (for his anger) by sadness and penance.

But they are more tolerable who punish themselves with their own choler, as H. King of England, that bit his lips, gnashed his teeth, pulled off his hair, threw his bed and cloaths on the ground, eat straw and hay, to express his impetuous passion.

5. They who are arrogant, and given to contemn and flout others, draw fire and poison on their heads when they assail impatient natures, which have not learnt to feed themselves with affronts and injuries.

Danger of scoffing. Polydor. Virg. l. 9.

A word flying like a spark of fire raiseth flames; which are not quenched but with great effusion of bloud. Philip the First, hearing that William the Conquerour, who was very gross, would not suffer any man to see him, by reason of a corporal infirmity; It is no wonder (saith he) if this big man be in the end brought a bed. This being told to the other, who was of a capricious spirit, he protested he would rise from his child-bed, but with so many torches and lights, that he would carry fire into the bosome of France. And verily he failed not therein, and in this fury so heated himself, that he died in proper flames. A man hath little to do to enkindle a War at the charge of so many lives, for a jest, a cold countenance, a letter not written obsequiously enough, for a word inconsiderate.

William the Conquerour of England, very suspicious.

6. The Flemings were to blame, when revolted against Philip of Valois; they out of derision called him The found King, and advanced a great Cock on their principal standard, the device whereof was, that when he should crow, the Found King should enter into their city. This so exasperated his great courage that he waged them a battel, and with such fury defeated them, that Froissard assureth, that of a huge army of Rebels, there was not one left who became not a victime of his vengeance. Lewis Outre-mer was detained prisoner at Roan, for having in his anger spoken injuriously against Richard, the young Duke of Normandy. And Francis the First ruined all his affairs, for having handled Charles Duke of Bourbon with some manner of indignity, therein complying with the humour of the Queen his Mother.

History of Froissard. The scoffs of certain rebellious Flemings severely punished by the generosity of Philip of Valois.

7. The Anger of potent women is (above all) dreadfull, when they are not with-held by considerations of conscience, because they have a certain appetite of revenge, which exceedeth all may be imagined. Queen Eleonor, wife of Lewis the young who had as violent a spirit as ever animated the body of a woman, seeing her self repudiated by her husband, albeit upon most just reason, conceived such rage and fury against France, that being afterward remarried to Henry of England, she incessantly stirred up all the powers of that Kingdom to our ruin, and sowed the first seeds of war, which the continuance of 300 years, which, an infinite number of fights and battels, which, the reverence due to Religion, the knot of mutual Alliances, and Oath interposed in sixscore Treatises, could not wholly extinguish.

Anger of women.

Queen Eleonor an enemy of France.

Duplein Annals of France.

8. There are other angers free and simple, which proceed from an indiscreet goodness, but which fail not to occasion much evil to themselves, when they assail eminent and vindicative people. It was the misery of poor Enguerrand of Marigny, who having governed the Finances under Philip the Fair (and afterward seeing himself persecuted by Charles of Valois unkle of Lewis Hutin heir of a Crown) was transported with so much heat, that it cost him his life.

Anger out of simplicity many times cause hurt for a word too free, witness that of Enguerrand.

For this Prince sharply asking an account of him of the treasures of the deceased King; he freely answered, It is to you (Sir) I have given a good part of them, and the rest hath been employed in the Kings affairs. Whereupon Charles giving him the lie; the other transported with passion, had the boldness to say unto him, By God, It is you your self Sir. This reply being of it self very insolent, and spoken at a time when all conspired to his ruine, sent him to the Gallows of Mountfaucon, which he had caused to be built in his greatest authority. Men cold, and well acquainted with affairs, who commonly think much, never speak ill of them that can hurt them

9. All these extravagancies which we have produced, have proceeded from fervour; but there are others cold, and malign, as are Aversions and Hatred, which are no other then inveterate and hardened angers, so much the more dangerous as they proceed from a spirit more deep, and are plotted with more time and preparation.

So did Lewis the Eleventh who had many Labyrinths in his heart wherein he kept his revenges, and oftentimes took delight to send them abroad with ceremony and pomp, to take the more pleasure in them. So soon as he was King, he set himself to revenge his injuries, as if power given from heaven ought to be an instrument of passion. He persecuted a good subject which was the Count of Dammartin) for no other crime, but for having obeyed and executed the order of Charles the Seventh who had sent him into Daulphine, to stop Lewis who then turmoiled and perplexed the King his father. He prevented this plot, and fled into Flanders; yet ceased he not afterward to hate this good servant: and albeit he prostrated himself at his feet, praying him to forget what was past; yet he caused his process to be made in Parliament, upon accusations, which did more manifest the Passion of the King, then any crime in the life of the Count. Notwithstanding, the close practise was so great that he was condemned to death: and although Lewis, terrified by his own Conscience and the general opinion, would not have it to proceed any further; yet he confined him to the Bastile, where he had spent the rest of his dayes if he had not found means to save himself. But whom would he spare who put away, and deprived of Office his best servants, for having hindred him during his sickness to come near unto a Window, out of the care they had of his health? This passion was a Devil in the heart of this Prince, which made him odious to many, and filled his whole life with disturbance and acerbity.

Aymonius, l. 5. c. 39.

10. A revengefull spirit spares nothing to please it self, and oft-times openeth precipices to fill them with death and ruine. It is a strange thing, that one sole Abbot of Saint German de Prez named Gaulin, had Wicked revenge of an Abbot, and of John Brochyas against the French.

Wicked revenge of an Abbot, and of John Procida against the French.

had almost ruined the whole Kingdom of France, for having been bereaved of an Abbacy. He many years revolved his revenge, and after the death of Lewis le Begue (under whom he had received the injury which he proposed to himself) he went to Lewis the German, whom he inflamed with so much cunning to the conquest of the Kingdom of France, that he set a huge Army on foot to surprize the heir of the Crown in the confusion of his affairs: and the trouble was so great, that needs must Lorraigne be cut off from the Kingdom of France, to give it to this Conquerour.

So did John Prochytas the Sicilian, who (having been deprived of his estate by Charles of Anjou) conceived a mortal enmity against the French, which made him contrive that bloody Tragedy of Sicilian Vespers. This unfortunate man, disguising himself in the habit of a Franciscan, went to Peter of Arragon, to shew him the means how to invade Sicily: and seeing that he, and his wife Queen Constance, bent all their endeavour thereto, he ceased not to stir up the Country, where he had much credit, and used so many engines, that in the end he caused one of the most horrible massacres which was ever projected. On an Easter-day, in the time of Vespers, the French had all their throats cut throughout the Island of Sicily. No age, sex, condition, nobility, nor religious, were spared. The black spirit of the Abyss drew men from the Altar to run to the sword, which they indifferently thrust into the bosom of their guests: nor were so many crys & lamentations, nor such images of death flying before their eys, able to wound their hearts w^th^ one sole touch of compassion w^ch^ useth to move the most unnatural. Rage (blown by the breath of the most cruel furies of hell) made them to open the bellies of women, and to dig into their entrails to tear thence little Infants conceived of French blood. It caused the most secret Sanctuaries of nature to be violated, to put those to death, who had not (as yet) the first tast of life. Shall we not then say, that the passion of revenge, which hath taken root in a soul half damned, is the most fatal instrument that Hell can invent to overthrow the Empire of Christianity?

11. All these accidents well considered, are sufficient to moderate the passions which make so much noise among man-kind. But let us consider before we go off this stage, that Anger and Revenge are not creatures invincible to Courtiers, who yet retain some character of Christianity.

Glaber.

Great moderation in St. (King) Robert.

Robert, one of the greatest Kings that ever ware the Crown of France, saw his two sons bandied against him, when (provoked by the practises of the Queen their mother, who ceased not to insult over them) they ran to the field with some tumultuary troops, and began to exercise acts of hostility which made them very guilty. The father (incensed by their rebellion, and forcibly urged by the sting of the mother's revenge) speedily prepares an Army, and entreth into Burgundy to surprise and chastise them. Thereupon William Abbot of S. Benigne of Dijon goeth to him, and shews that these disorders were an effect of the Divine Providence which we should rather appease by penance, then irritate by anger: that, if his Majesty would call to mind, he should find that his youth was not exempt from errours committed by the inconsideration of age, and the practise of evil counsels: that he ought not to revenge with sword and fire, that which he had suffered in his own person, and that as he would not any should enterprise upon his hereditary possession, so it was fit, not to meddle with that which was God's, who had reserved vengeance to himself. This speech had such power that the good King was instantly appeased; caused his children to come; embraced them with paternal affection, and received them into favour, tying their reconciliation with an indissoluble knot. What can one answer to the mildness of a King accompanied with so much power and wisdom, but confess, that pardon is not a thing impossible? since this great Prince upon the words of a religious man, lays down arms, & dissipateth all his anger, as waves break at the foot of rocks.

Helgaudus in vita Roberti Regis.

12. We must confess, that Regality was never seen allyed to a spirit more mild and peaceable, and that his actions should rather be matter of admiration, then example. He pardoned twelve murtherers (who had a purpose to attempt upon his life) after he had caused them to confess and communicate, saying, It was not reasonable to condemn those whom the Church had absolved, and to afflict death upon such as had received the bread of life. But what would not he have done, who, surprizing a rogue which had cut away half of his Cloak furred with Ermins, said mildly to him, Save thy self, and leave the rest for another who may have need of it!

13. This mildness is very like to that of Henry the First, afterward King of England, who seeing his father's body to be staied in open street (upon the instant of his Obsequies) and this by a mean Citizen, who complained the soil of the land where the dead (which was William the Conquerour) was to be interred, was his Ancestours inheritance: he was nothing at all moved, but presently commanded his Treasurer to satisfie the Creditour, and to prosecute the pomp of his Funerals.

Generous acts of Lewis the Eleventh.

14. Lewis the Eleventh did a King-like act towards the ashes of the fair Agnes, who had possessed the heart of his father Charles the Seventh, and had persecuted him (the son) in her life-time. At her death she gave 60000 crowns for a foundation to the Cannons of Loches, to pray, and to build a Tomb for her in the midst of the Church. These men (prudent according to the world) accommodating themselvs to the time, & honoring this rising Sun (mounted to the throne of the Kingdom, after the death of his father) presented themselves before him, asking, they might be permitted to demolish the tomb of this woman who had so ill used him: but he with incredible generosity answered, he made not war against the dead, & that so far was he from ruining the monuments of Agnes, that he would command his Treasurer to give them 6000 Florens to preserve them.

Humility & wisdom of Queen Anne to overcom the passion of anger.

15. Sage and devout women, albeit the Sex is too apt for revenge, fail not to re-enter into themselves and blame their proceedings, when passion hath transported them out of the lists of reason. Anne of Britain seeing King Lewis the Twelfth very sick and in danger of his life (upon the consideration that he left her no male-child) caused a Ship to be rigged out, laden with great riches which she sent into her dear country, of purpose to retire thither so soon as the King were dead.

But, the Marshal de Gié, who commanded in a City of passage, judging that his charge obliged him to let nothing pass out of the Kingdom during the Kings sickness, did without any other order upon this resolution arrest all the goods of the poor Queen. She was a Bee w^ch^ lived in the sweetness of devotion, but yet had her sting: so that being much provoked by this act, she pursued the Marshal, and made him come to a trial at the Parliament of Tholose, where he was condemned to be banished out of France. But the good Queen calling back reason (after the stirring of her choler) with-held the blow, granted liberty to the delinquent, protested he was a worthy Lord, and had proceeded in all he had done, according to the rules of state. Whence it appeareth, that those cruel souls are most unreasonable which persist in hating, because they have once begun; and never lay down a wicked hatred, for which they have no other reason but their own wickedness.

Great and magnanimous goodness of Lewis the Twelfth.

16. Lewis the Twelfth her husband might have taught her this lesson, who having received ill measure under Charles the Eighth his Predecessour when he was Duke of Orleans, some flatterers counselling him to ennoble his entry to the Crown by the beating down his adversaries, answered in this memorable manner.

That it was not fit for a King of France to revenge the quarrels of the Duke of Orleans; and for this purpose he marked with a cross all the names of his enemies written down on paper: Whereat many wondred, thinking this note promised them nothing but a pair of gallows; which made them presently fly, so much they were urged by their own conscience. But he assembled them all together, and let them understand he had signed their names with a Cross, that they therein might behold the lesson which the authour of life dictated unto us on the Cross, which was to forgive those who persecute us. Francis the First, his successour following these steps pardoned the rebellious Rochellers, moved by the pitiful clamours of great number of little children who cried for mercy at his entrance into the City. Our most Christian King hath renewed the examples of the like clemency. I speak nothing of the Christian generosity of Henry the Third, who seeing himself taken away from Throne & Life by a most detestable Parracide, left the revenge thereof to God in the sharpness of his wound. Henry the Fourth had a soul infinitely mild, and if we find in his life some humane defects, yet therein there are a thousand divine virtues which shadow them by their great lights.

Incomparable mildness of Lewis the son of Charlemaigne.

17. But, if we compare goodness with offence; scarcely shall we find (throughout all the histories of the Christian world) a Prince who in this point hath equalled the virtue of Lewis the mild, son of Charlemaigne. This name cost him an invincible patience, which made it well appear that a nature too easie is exposed to infinite difficulties. His own children (Lotharius, Pepin, and Lewis) rebelled against him, and (out of a horrible daring) took Queen Judith from his sides, whom he in a second wedlock had married, caused her by force to take the veil, and holding a dagger at her throat, made her promise to perswade her husband to forsake the world, out of their Ambition to usurp his Scepter, and pull the Diademe from his head with hands of Harpies.

The poor Prince saw himself in one night abandoned by his army which slipt away before his eies, and went to yield themselves to his unnatural sons: but, some honest men staying about him, he besought and conjured them to save themselves and to leave him alone in peril, since he was the victime of Expiation, and that his sins had reduced him to this Calamity: and verily he went like a victime to the Altar, accompanied with the Queen his wife and his grand-child Charles, to render himself up a prisoner into their hands, to whom he had given both livelyhood, and life. This heart truely-mild, said by the way to those who lead him, Let my sons do what they will with me, and all that God shall permit: I only pray you (since I have never offended them) not to expose me to the fury of the multitude which commonly are very unjust to those who are depressed, as you now behold me: and above all, I will ask this favour of them, that they abstain from maiming any member of the Queen my wifes body, whom I know to be most innocent; or pulling out the eyes of Charles my grand-child, for that would to me be more bitter then death. In this manner he came to his sons Camp, who hypocritically received him with all reverence, promising an usage worthy his condition: and in the mean time assembled a venomous Council of maligne spirits to degrade him. The sentence was given contrary to all form of Justice, by subjects against their Sovereign Prince; by children against their father; by guilty against the innocent, without hearing him, without seeing him; and on a sundain it was publickly executed at the Assembly of Compiegne. Duplex.

This King, the best in the world, on his knees in the Church, in the presence of his vassals, among an infinite number of people, held a scroule in his hand, which contained the imaginary causes of his condemnation; they enforced him to read it himself; to open his mouth against his own innocency; to ask forgiveness of the Assembly which did him an irreparable wrong. Then, to conclude this cruel scene, he is constrained to take off his belt, and to lay it on the Altar; to despoil himself of his Royal Robes, and to take from the hands of certain infamous Prelates, a habit of penance, with which he was put into the hands of the Guard, and a few dayes after, led along in Lotharius his train.

All Histories mourn in the horrour of this narration, and there is not any who in his thoughts condemns not the Authours of this attempt. But this good King (being re-established by the endeavour of his best Subjects) did never pursue his injuries, witnessing in all occasions an extreme facility to be reconciled to his children: and when, afterward he was upon the point of death, he rallied together all he had of life, spirits, and strength, to forgive them, and asked of God that he would not take vengeance upon their crimes. This was to fulfil the whole law, and to do at the Court all that which the most perfectly religious can perform in a Cloister.

18. I will yet tell you for a conclusion, that there are certain industries, which they who are near great ones, may use to appease their Anger, and to divert the pernicious effects, by some delay, which is the best Counsellour this furious passion can have. Argentré.

This is to be seen in the course that Bavalon took with the Duke of Britaigne. The Prince being offended with the Count of Clisson Constable of France, resolved to take him in a snare, & undo him. To compass this enterprise, he made a great feast, whereto he invited all the principal Lords of Britaigne, courting Clisson with incomparable courtesie. Address of Bavalon to appease that anger of the Duke of Britaigne.

After all, he let him see his Castle of Lermine, where leading him from story to story, and from chamber to chamber, he brought him to the chief Turret, praying him to consider the fortifications, to reform the defects, whilst he spake a word to Seigneur Laval, brother in law to Clisson. He no sooner entred in, but he saw himself arrested by the Guard, and put into irons, with commandment given to Mounsieur Bavalon Captain of the Castle, to throw him (the next night) in a sack into the water. Bavalon, who perceived his Master was very quick, and thought that night might give him better counsel, resolved to do nothing. In the mean time solitude and darkness having recollected the Dukes spirits together, which had all day been scattered by the tempest of passion, he found his heart infinitely ballanced between the satisfaction of revenge, and the apprehenſion of the inevitable dangers which would wait on it, imagining the ſhadow of the Conſtable already drowned (as he thought) would draw fire, bloud, and havock upon his deſolated Country. The hideous viſions which already pitched battel in his diſtempered brain, the diſplayed Enſigns, and Armies heaped together from all parts, drew deep ſighs from him, which were obſerved by the gentlemen of his chamber. Bavalon about break of day comes into his chamber, and being asked concerning the ſecret execution of his command, he anſwered, It is done, loth to open any more, until he could clearly look into his maſters mind. The Duke upon this word beginneth his ſobbs again, with beating his hands, which teſtified great deſpair in him. But he inſiſting, and many times demanding whether Cliſſon were drowned; The Captain replyed, He was, and that he about mid-night had buried the body, fearing it might be diſcovered. Then began the Prince afreſh to curſe, and to abhor his own anger which had tranſported him to this out-rage; and ſaid, Would to God, Bavalon, I had believed thee when thou didſt counſel me to do nothing, or that thou hadſt not believed me, when I ſo paſſionately commanded thee. His truſty ſervant ſeeing he ſpake in good earneſt, and that it was time to declare himſelf, aſſured him Cliſſon was alive; and that he had deferred his commandment, out of this conſideration, that, if he perſiſted in the ſame mind, he ſhould alwayes have means enough to execute him. The Duke (rapt with this prudence) embraced him, and gave him a thouſand florens, for finding out ſo excellent a remedy for his Paſſion.

Obſervations upon ENVY, Which draweth along with it Jealouſie, Hatred, and Sadneſs.

WE enter into black and Saturnian Paſſions, which are Envy, Jealouſie, Fear, Sadneſs, and Deſpair, wherein we ſhall obſerve a venomous malignity which repleniſheth the heart with plagues, the life with furies, and the world with Tragedies. I will begin this order with two Court-Monks who in their time made a great noyſe: one of which being born for cruelty, and bred in maſſacres; his life was a continual crime, and his memory a perpetually execration.

Lamentable envy & enmity of Ebroin againſt S. Leger.

But the other (profiting by the experience of his evils) opened himſelf a way unto glory, and drew upon him the bleſſings of poſterity. Under the reign of Clotharius the third, Ebroin governed the State in the quality of the Mayor of the Palace, who was of a ſpirit ambitious, cruel, and ſubtle; valuing nothing above his own ends, and placing conſcience under all things in the world. He entred into this charge like a Fox, and ſwayed therein like a Lion; doing nought elſe but roar againſt ſome, and devour others; there being no power able enough to bend his pride, as if there were not riches enough in all the world to ſatisfie his avarice. God (who oftentimes ſuffereth not things violent to be long-laſting) gave an end to his tyranny by the death of his Maſter, whoſe reign was ſhort, and life moſt obſcure. He left two ſons, the eldeſt of which bare the name of Childeric, and the youngeſt was called Thierry. Ebroin ſeeing himſelf, like creeping Ivie (which ſeeks a pillar for ſupport) not to ſtand fair in Childeric's mind, whether this Prince were too clear ſighted, to diſcover his jugglings; or whether under the reign of his Father, he had otherwiſe uſed him then his condition deſerved; it made him arrogantly to adhere to Thierry's faction, thinking he had power and credit enough to make an alteration both in nature, and State-affairs. He then raiſeth a controverſie in a matter which was ſufficiently decided by birth, and aſſembleth the Eſtates to deliberate upon it; where there were ſo many creatures, whom he accounted to be obliged to follow his liking, that the palm of ſo doubtfull a battel ſeemed to him already abſolutely gained.

There was then in France one Leger, a man of great birth, of an excellent ſpirit, of an eminent virtue, accompanied with grace of body, and other parts which made him fit for the Court.

His Uncle, who was a great Prelate, had very nobly bred him, giving him admittance into the Palace and his affairs; but, the ſweetneſs of his nature, not born for much trouble, made him addict himſelf to the Church, and become a religious man, but was afterward taken out of his Monaſtery to be Biſhop of Autun. His degree and merit then obliged him to be preſent at this Aſſembly, where it was treated of making a new King: and ſeeing Ebroin inſolently ſupported the younger to the prejudice of Nature, and the laws of the Kingdom; he undertook to diſſolve his buſie practiſe, and to reduce miſled minds, unto reaſon. Notwithſtanding this violent Mayor of the palace ceaſed not openly to declare his deſign in full Aſſembly, in favour of Thierry; uſing many pretexts and colours which put a quite other face upon a buſineſs ſo unreaſonable. Good men, who more feared his bloudy countenance, and his irreconcilable enmities, then approved his reaſons, looked one upon another, expecting that ſome generous ſoul ſhould ſtand for truth: and all of them imagined, that having declared themſelves with much weakneſs, and ſmall effect, they might not ſerve ſo much for a ſupport to Childeric's cauſe, as for an object of Ebroin's revenge. Cruelties and Jealouſies often ruine many good affairs; and they took the way to overthrow this, if Leger had not riſen up, who ſpake with ſo much reaſon, grace, authority and courage, that he alone gave a countrepoiſe to Ebroin's malice, and drew all the ſoundeſt in the Aſſembly to his ſide: where Ebroin's adherents (ſeeing Truth carried as in Triumph by hands ſo courageous) did disband, ſtudying more their own preſervation, then to ſerve his ambition.

Childeric mounts up to the Throne which nature had prepared for him; Ebroin, who knew the main and manifeſt contradictions he had framed againſt his right, hath a ſoul full of affrightments, and already accounts himſelf for a dead man; he ſearcheth for ſome ſanctuary to hide himſelf, but findeth none more ſafe then Religion. Neceſſity makes a Monk, where piety could never make a Chriſtian. He comes and throweth himſelf at Childeric's feet, offers him his head and life with moſt humble ſubmiſſion, by which he begged of the young King, that (if his goodneſs permitted him not to moiſten the entrance into his Throne with the bloud of the guilty) his Majeſty would pleaſe to confine him to a Monaſtery, to bewail his ſins, and daily to die as many times, as he ſhould call to mind his own ingratitude. Childeric (who was not born to bloud, and who at that time had his heart buſied enough with the joy of his victory (which is a time when Mildneſs coſts him leaſt) permittted him to retire into the Monaſtery of Luxevil in Burgundy. Mean time, Leger (who had given ſuch teſtimonies of his capacity, courage, and fidelity) is put into Ebroin's place, and undertaketh the abſolute government of all the affairs of the Kingdom.

His

His virtue ſhould have diſpenſed with him at this time, not to give others occaſion to think that he had beaten down Ebroin's tyranny, of purpoſe to raiſe himſelf upon his ruines. But there are certain chains of Adamant in charges and Court-dignities, which oftentimes captive the moſt auſtere. His Rival burſts with anger to ſee him lifted up to this dignity, when his calamity enforced him to be tied to a Coul, which is a piece he never had thought was for his purpoſe. He was a ſtrange Hermit, like to Nicephorus (Gregoras his Fox) who, being blacked over with Ink, counterfeited the Monk, and told the Poultry, he much repented him to have uſed them ſo ill, but that hereafter they might confidently converſe with him, ſince his habit and condition permitted him not to live otherwiſe then innocently. This miſerable man had no other repentance, but that he had not proſpered in his ambition; no other poverty, then the impotency of taking away other men's goods: no other obedience, then the hypocriſie of his ſubmiſſion: no other ſinging, then the ſorrows of his fortune: and no other Religion, but his habit. All his prayers tended to nothing elſe but to demand ſome change of State, that he might change his fortune; whereas Leger (taking ways quite contrary in his government) made Religion, Juſtice, and Peace to flouriſh.

His zeal oppoſed impiety; his equity, injuſtice; his ſweetneſs, violence: and his authority carried all that was reaſonable. But, there is a certain unhappineſs in the manage of State-affairs, which makes a man hate his own quiet: and virtue too regular, is often troubleſom even to thoſe it intends to oblige.

Leger is offenſive to ſome, becauſe he makes them more honeſt then they would be: to others, becauſe his lights manifeſt their darkneſs; whileſt others think, that in the newneſs and change of a Miniſter of State, they ſhall better make up their own reckoning. Childeric himſelf takes a diſtaſt againſt the faithfulleſt of his ſervants: and whether that Ebroin's faction breathed this paſſion into him, or whether it proceeded from his licentious youth; or whether his humour felt too much conſtraint in the innocent ſeverity of the manners of his Mayor of the Palace: he ſhewed him not ſo pleaſing a look as he had accuſtomed. He, deſirous more efficaciouſly to ſound the King's opinion, moſt humbly beſought him to give him leave to paſs the feaſt of Eaſter in the City whereof he was a Biſhop, which Childeric eaſily aſſented to. But perverſe ſouls (who enkindled the fire of diviſion, undercolour of friendſhip) told the good Prelate, that the eaſineſs his Prince had witneſſed in this late occaſion, was but a bait to undo him, and that he had reſolved to cauſe his perſon be ſeized on, of purpoſe to murther him. One fears all from a power that taketh the liberty to do all: which was the cauſe that Leger entred into great affrightments upon this news, and reſolved to leave the Court, to free himſelf from Envy and the dangers which threatned him. He communicateth his intention with his greateſt confidents, who are nothing of his opinion, and they ſhewed him he muſt not yield to a little ſtormy guſt, but rather die in the midſt of the waves (holding the Helm in his hand) then to forſake the veſſel: that his flight would give matter of ſuſpicion to the King; of advantage to his enemies, and of confuſion to his own friends: and that (hitherto) there was not any ſign of diſgrace which might make him to begin, where the only extremity of evils might conſtrain him to end. Notwithſtanding, whether fear had taken too much hold upon this good Prelate's mind, or whether his conſcience reduced into his imagination, the repoſe of thoſe innocent days he had ſpent in the Monaſtery; he takes a ſudden reſolution, not to forſake the world by halves: but by laying down the government of the affairs of the Kingdom, to rid himſelf alſo of his Biſhoprick. The concluſion of this buſineſs is followed by a ſpeedy diſpatch; which made the King wonder, who ſent truſty perſons to invite him to return, and to give him aſſurance of his good affection towards him but his zeal had its ear in heaven, not to hearken to the perſwaſions of the earth. He goes to the Monaſtery of Luxevil, where he ſees Ebroin, who was there held as a fettered beaſt, and not in a condition to bite. The Abbot, who knew the differences that were in Court, fearing, leaſt hatred might hatch its egg by the help of a Religious habit, cauſed them to be reconciled, and to talk together, although he had ſeparated their abode: fearing that too frequent converſation might in them awaken their former averſions. Time ſlideth away very quietly with them, until the arrival of a very unexpected accident. Childeric (after the departure of S. Leger) uſeth the greatneſs of his power licentiouſly, and ſoileth both his Name and Dignity, with inconſiderate actions; which quickly made this great Miniſter of State to be deplored, and all the Envy to be caſt upon the King, for having ſo eaſily diſmiſſed him. The contempt of his perſon began ſo to creep into the minds of his ſubjects, that defamatory Libels went abroad upon his Paſſions and Government, which ſeemed to have no other aim, but the weakning of his Authority. He thought to quench a coal with flames, and entreth into courageous anger againſt thoſe whom he ſuſpected to raiſe any queſtion upon his actions.

He cauſeth a Gentleman named Bodil to be taken, and having cauſed him to be tied to a poſt, he commandeth him to be ignominiouſly whipped, contrary to the manner of ordinary puniſhments; which occaſioned ſo much acerbity in the Nobility, that all in an inſtant rebelled againſt him. Bodil, tranſported by the fury of his Paſſion, and encouraged by the number of his Complices, out of a horrible attempt, kills Childeric whileſt he was a hunting: and paſſing on to the Palace, extendeth his revenge (like a Devil fleſhed in maſſacres) to the perſon of the Queen (great with Child) whom he murthered. The Court is drenched in deep deſolation; the pillars of the State totter: there is need of able men to free them from this danger. The friends of Ebroin and S. Leger (who ſought their own ends in the employment of theſe two) invited them with urgent reaſons (covered with the good of the State) to return to the world; aſſuring them that all France went to ruine, if they ſupported it not. Ebroin (to whom South-ſayers promiſed wonders, and who, under hope he had to forſake the Monk's Coul, had already ſuffered his hair to grow, to be the better diſpoſed for all occaſions) ſhewed himſelf nothing hard to be perſwaded.

Saint Leger therein uſed more reſiſtance; but in the end ſuffered himſelf to be over-come, leaving the ſweetneſs of Solitude to enter again into the troubles of the world; which never paſſeth unpuniſhed, but in ſuch as do it by the Laws of pure Obedience. He is received into his Biſhoprick as an Angel, and his friends do all they can to bring him to the Court, and to gain him a good esteem in the Kings mind, who seemed to stand in need of such a servant, to purchase the more authority among the people who with much satisfaction had tasted the sweetness of his Government. Ebroin (on the other side) seeing Thierry (Childeric's brother) had taken possession of the Kingdom, was very confident of his return, having formerly been of the faction of the young King: But he being neglected, Leudegesillus, an ancient favourite of Thierry's, had undertaken the government of affairs. The furious Monk storms like a mad-man for the dignity of Master of the Palace which he had possessed; and being unable to creep into it by mildness, he entreth thereinto by open violence. He rallieth together all his ancient friends; in this new change of State, he gathereth a tumultuary army, and flyeth into the field with so much speed, that he almost surprized the King with his Favourite, to use them at his discretion. Necessity enforceth to offer candles and incense to this devil; he is sought unto for peace, great recompences are proposed to his crimes: his ambition takes no satisfaction but in the object of his design. He draweth Leudegesillus to a conference under shew of accommodation; and (being a man without Faith or Soul) he killeth him, emptying his place by a murder, to repleniſh it by a Treachery. Notwithstanding, he lets Thierry know, his arms were not taken but for his service, and that he had no other purpose, but to reduce all powers under his Scepter. The other was in a condition of inability to defend himself; which made him resolve rather to take him for a servant, then to have him for a master. In the end; this horrible fury (hidden under the habit of a Monk) never ceased until it carried him to the neareſt place of a Royal Throne. So soon as he was possessed of his former dignity, he bent all his powers to vengeance, and thought upon nothing but of ridding his hands of such as had crossed his fortune. S. Leger was the very first he aimed at in his wicked plots; he dispatcheth troops to make havock about the City of Autun, and gives commands to murderers, (executioners of his revenge) to lay hold of his person.

The good Prelate (who heard the lamentable cries of the people) afflicted by the detestation of these hostilities, went forth, and presents himself before these Barbarians, as a victime of expiation, to deliver himself over to death, and to stay the stream of the miseries which overflowed his Dioceſs. He was prepared to make an Oration, but (they as Tygers, which had no commerce with musick) presently fell upon him; and having taken him, they pulled out his eyes, to lead him in triumph to Ebroin. He had already poisoned the ear of the young King, having set forth this sage Bishop as the most execrable man on earth, and the most capital enemy he had in the world. There remained nothing (but to produce him in this state) fully to accomplish the contentment his brutishness did aim at.

He at the same time caused Guerin (S. Leger's brother) to be taken, doubly to torment him in that he most loved: and having presented them both before the King, he beginneth to charge them with injuries and scorns; the Saints eclipsed eyes, and faces covered all over with bloud, nothing mollifyed the heart of this Polyphemus. Captivity tyed not the tongues of the two brothers, nor excess of miseries dejected their courages. They spake with all liberty what might be expected from their constancy; rendering thanks to God, that he in this world had chastised them with temporal punishments, as true children; and menacing Ebroin with an eternity of torments, which the anger of God reserved for the exorbitancy of his wickedness. This cruel creature, who expected some more pliantness in so great a misery, was immeasurably offended, and instantly commanded them to be separated, and Guerin to be speedily put to death.

He received the sentence of death with great fortitude, embracing his blind brother with all unexpressible tenderness, and encouraging him to the last conflict, with words full of the spirit of God. After this, he is bound to a pillar, and knocked down with stones. Ebroin, who would relish his revenge by long draughts, found out in his heart inventions of a hangman, to torment Saint Leger, causing him to walk on stones as sharp as razours, and appointing his face to be disfigured, by cutting out his tongue, his nose, his lips, to send him from thence a prisoner to the Monastery of Fecan. All this was executed; yet the patience of this incomparable man (by so hideous torments) no whit shaken, blessing God for all these things, and incessantly praying, and forming some stuttering inarticulate sounds, to instruct and exhort those who visited him.

A while after, he is called again before this Tyrant, who made a sport of his pains, and sought to make him end his life by despair, to kill the soul with the body. But when he perceived his heart was of so strong a temper, and that the dreadfull horrour of a poor body (carried up and down among so many tortures) made nothing for his reputation, he gave order to Chrodobert to put him to death; and instantly he was delivered to four executioners who led him forth into a forest, which retaineth the name of S. Leger. The blessed blind man perceiving his hour approached, said to them, I see what you go about to do; Trouble not your selves, I am more ready to die, then you to execute me. Thereupon, three of the murderers relenting, prostrated themselves at his feet, and craved pardon, which he very freely granted, and putting himself upon his knees prayed for his persecutours, recommending his soul to the Father of souls; at which time one of these four executioners persisting in his obduratenes cut off his head. The wife of Chrodobert took the body, and interred it in a little Chappel, where it did great miracles which have deserved the veneration of people. Some time after, the detestable Ebroin (continuing the wickedness of his bloudy life) was slain in his bed like another Holophernes, and suddenly taken out of the world, not shewing any sign of repentance; to be reserved for an eternal torment.

Behold all which Envy, Jealousie, and the Rage of a man abandoned by God can do; which letteth us manifestly see, that there are not any men in the world worse then those, who, degenerating from a religious profession, return to the vices of the world. And on the other side, we may behold in the person of S. Leger, that there is not any Passion which may not be overcome; nor honour which may not be trodden under-foot; nor torments which a man is not able to set at naught, when he with strong confidence throws himself between the arms of the Cross, there to find those of Jesus Christ.

The Fifth TOME.

LONDON,

Printed Anno Dom. MDCLXIII.

To the READER.

HAving employed my first Volume in pious and profitable discourses, I haue purposed to set forth in this fifth Tome a sufficient large Court to serve for example. Which I have done by uniting to the Histories which I have already published, these which I have here added a new; which are almost all taken out of the holy Scriptures, and handled in a style more solid and contract then specious and enlarged.

If this Work hath somewhat delayed its coming forth into the light, it hath been businesses other Wayes coming upon me, that hath staid it. We have had adversaries to deal with, very well known, that have by their Requests and by their Libels exceedingly troubled themselves to molest us. I have answered them in two Bookes after a long silence, for that the necessity did seem so to require, and Authority therein did expresly command my obedience. I have done it with the greatest modesty and sincerity that I was able: and I may with confidence say, that it hath been to the satisfaction of people of quality and desert.

Since, as I understand they have continued their Replies, where they largely witness their sharpness, against me. But what offence have I committed, if in a Cause so good, and by order from my Superiours I have undertaken the Defence in general of a Society, in which I have lived near these fourty years, and have never learned any thing therein but Wisdom and Virtue? They have so little matter, that they are compelled to use old News-books against me, which have spoken nothing, but what hath been interpreted to my honour. I have served God, the King, the Queen, and all France, without ever offending any person, they might be ashamed to reproach me with that which hath been so much for my credit, and to imitate those people that threw their Gods at the heads of their enemies for want of arrows.

God keep me from losing so much time as to read their Writings, or any desire to answer them. I should seem to have lost my understanding, if I should busie my self in fighting against shadows and Lies put into Rhetorick, so fully refuted by our Justifications, and so manifestly condemned by the judgement of the Queen Regent and the rest of the Powers that have acknowledged and maintained the Innocency of this Society against all Accusations.

These Books of evil Language are intolerable to all honest people, and even odious to those that are rational of their own party; in so much, that I pity their Authours, to whom the pains of so great a Volume with so little success hath already served for a large punishment.

Instead of Replies to all those slanders, I do sincerely offer up Prayers to God for our Persecutours, that he may please to kindle in their hearts his holy Love, which may purge out this gall of bitterness, this carnal Wisdom, and cause them to bring forth the fruits of Truth, Justice, and Charity.

The which I have endeavoured to do in this Work, wherein I conceive that I have acquitted my self of the promises that I made to the Publick by treating on the true Histories of great Personages; and especially those whom the holy Scripture hath honoured by its style, for the edification of all the World.

It is in these illustrious Representations that the mind contents it self; it is here that it contemplates the Virtues of famous Persons, like the beams of the first Magnitude; it is here that it quickens it self to the imitation of their glorious deeds, and that it fore stalls the delights of its own immortality. It is here, that it learns to endure adversities without departing from the duties of its Calling, and firmly to keep its Constancy like the shadow in the Quadrants, that remains immoveable under the blasts of the most furious Winds, not forsaking the measures of the Sun.

Receive therefore (courteous Reader) the fruits of this my labour sprung up in the midst of a Tempest, that it may find calmness in thy favourable acceptance.

THE

THE MONARCHS.

THE wiſeſt of Monarchs ſpeaking in the holy Scripture unto the Princes of his age, and proceeding at large to give a full warning to all thoſe that ſhould bear part in their honour, and imitate their lives, delivereth theſe words by way of Oracle. Hearken O Kings, not onely with an ear of fleſh, but attend with that of the underſtanding and heart, to give entrance thereby to the Spirit of God. If you eſteem it a moſt glorious honour to govern innumerable people, and to behold from the throne of your Magnificence, Nations bending under your Scepters; Know ye, that this Power which lifts you ſo high above the reſt of mortals, is borrowed from Heaven, and is a gift which hath its original from God, who is the Sovereign of all Monarchs of the World. It is He that will examine all your works, and ſearch into the ſecreteſt of your thoughts. You forget that notwithſtanding all the ſervices that men render to you, you are but the Servants & Attendants of this powerfull King: You have not judged ſincerely; you have not kept the Laws which your ſelves have preſcribed, nor rendred juſtice to your Subjects, nor walked according to the commands of Him, whoſe perſon you repreſent. This is the reaſon, why He will appear to you ſuddenly and terribly, ſeparating your ſoul from your bodies. You ſhall ſee Him on His Throne of Juſtice, compaſſed with terrours, and you ſhall know that He exerciſes moſt ſevere Judgment over thoſe that bear rule over men. All thoſe poor people, which tremble under your power, ſhall be lovingly and mercifully dealt with by God; but the mighty ſhall be mightily tormented, if they behave not themſelves as they ought; and ſhall know that the greatneſs of their Sovereign Authority ſhall avail them nothing, but to ſerve to augment their juſt puniſhments.

The words of the wiſeman directed to the Kings of his time. Sar. 6.

There are no plagues more fatal to the deſtruction of Princes, then thoſe, who (under colour of raiſing their authority,) would make themſelves great by power to commit (and that without puniſhment) all kind of enormities. Royalty is an invention of God, appointed not for the benefit of the Kings, but of the Common-wealth. It was not inſtituted for the vain-glory of men, but for the ſafety of the World; and Princes are more for the peoples ſake, then the people for theirs.

The end of Royalty.

All the great things were made to ſerve the leſſer. The Sun (the Prince of Lights, and the heart of Nature,) ſerves as well for the eyes of a little fly, as for thoſe of a Monarch. The Ocean within that its monſtrous extent of Seas and wonders, tenders its ſervice to the little Fiſh incloſed in a ſmall ſhell, which cannot ſubſiſt without its attendance: The one poſſeſſes not the leaſt beam, nor the other the leaſt drop of water, which it imployes not for the Commune.

Great things were made for the leſſer.

The Eternal Father would not that the great things ſhould be great in vain; but that they pay for their greatneſs, by the favours and cares they are to take for the little ones. Thus God commanded Moſes to carry all that great people that he had brought out of Egypt, to ſerve them all as a Mother: and (if we will believe S. Baſil of Seleucia) Kings are made to bear the World.

Orat. 1 in Adam.

In ancient time they were lifted up upon Bucklers on the day of their Conſecration, to cauſe them to underſtand, that they ought to ſerve for a Buckler for their whole Realm. Nature hath made neither King nor Subject amongſt Men. Kings are not born Kings, but by the conſent of thoſe people which have made themſelves a Law to obey him whom God ſhould declare to them by his birth, or whom themſelves ſhould make by Election. Royalty is a power of all the particulars united together in one man, to be applyed and exerciſed according to the Law.

The practice of Romulus to be noted. Navar. l. 1. c. 9.

When Romulus founded the Monarchy of Rome, compoſed of diverſe people that offered themſelves to him, he expreſly ordained that every one ſhould bring to him ſome of the earth & fruits of his country, whereof he compoſed a maſſe, and cauſed it to be buried in a great pit, which he called the word: intending to ſhew by this ceremony, that Royalty is a heap of Wills, of Powers, of Riches, united in one only power. This is a borrowing which Kings make without obligation to reſtore again, but with obligement to render it better. They ought to do as the Bees, which take of the flowers, to make Honey thereof. They ought to temper and bring to perfection the Virtues and Qualities of the whole Communalty in their own perſon, to compoſe thereof the publick happineſs.

Wherefore do you think that the ancient Hebrews planted trees at the birth of the children of their Kings, which they held as ſacred, and dreſſed them with carefull diligence, to make thereof one day thrones for thoſe little Monarchs, when they were come to the Crown; but onely to teach them, that they ought to cover the people with their protection, and to enrich them with goods, as the tree defends men from the tempeſt with its leaves, and nouriſheth them with its fruit? They are not properly Maſters in a ſtrict ſenſe, for that the Maſter may do whatſoever he will with his goods without giving account thereof: But a King cannot use his subjects, but according to the law: he must intreat them, as the Goods of God; for that he is accomptable therefore to the Sovereign Judge of Heaven and Earth, whose Steward he is for a certain time, and not proprietary for ever. If he abuse this trust, although the people cannot recall the authority, which they have given to him, and which hath been established of it self by a long prescription; nevertheless he is answerable to the Divine Majesty for all that he doth.

Navarrus in Manual. The Divines hold, that a King, which should reign onely for his own honour and pleasure, would sin grievously, and put himself upon hazard of loosing his salvation.

Royalty a glorious servitude. To speak then the very truth; Royalty is a very great obligement, & a glorious servitude, & he that shal wel consider all its burthens, would not so much as stoop to take up a Diadem lying on the ground.

Doctor Navarrus and other Divines, that treat of the duty of Princes, say, That to be a King, is to be the peoples man, who is charged before God upon the peril of his soul, to take care of their affairs, and to maintain them in peace, as far as shall be lawfull and possible, to defend them from their enemies, to render justice to them by himself or his officers. That is, to choose men of ability and virtuous, to undertake those charges; to watch over their actions and their behaviour; to chastise the evil ones that trouble the publick quiet, and to recompence the good ones. That is, to keep the Laws, to root out abuses, to cause piety and good manners to flourish, to stop all injustice, corruptions and exactions. As also to facilitate trading, to order the conducts for Souldiers, to take care for the reparations of publick buildings, for Ammunition and provision, for the health and conveniency of his Subjects, and to exact nothing of them above their ability: and that which is exacted, to husband it for their benefit, to employ the customs with the greatest fidelity, as the blood of men redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ: This is, to take order for the Education of Youth, to honour the Church, and persons of desert, to Authorize good Magistrates, to have a particular care of acknowledging the good services of men at Arms, which do sacrifice themselves in a thousand occasions for the Common-weal. It is to have great compassion on the poor, especially Widows and Orphans, to hear willingly the Petitions of those that are afflicted and oppressed, to take thought for all, watch for all; to do that in his Realm, that the soul infused doth in the Body.

Royalty a marvellous profession. It is too much power to say that which Nero said by the tongue of Seneca; Among so many mortals, I am the onely one chosen in heaven to perform the office of God upon earth: I am the Arbitratour both of life and death, I am the distributer of fortunes, the favours that come from above are not bestowed but by my mouth: I cause the rejoycings of cities and countrys, nothing flourisheth but by my favour. If I speak but a word I make a million of swords to come forth of the scabbard, and if I command, I cause them to be put up again. It is I that give, and take away liberty, which make, and unmake Kings, which remove Nations, which lay waste rebellious Towns, which hold the happiness or unhappiness of men in mine hands.

What other thing is this that he vaunts, and so proudly boasts himself of? but onely to confess himself responsible to God for so great an account: whereof this miserable Emperour acquitted himself so ill, that having lived like a beast, he dyed like a mad-man. There is no man worthy to reign, but he that can tremble at the very shadow of Royalty.

Great Princes the workmanship of God. Great Princes are not made by the suffrages of men alone, but by the finger of God: they are born in Heaven by the Divine Decrees, before they appear upon earth by humane birth. To speak the truth, there are wonderful qualities required to make a well-accomplished King; and this is a thing more hard to find then the Phenix nest. Very rare. When the children of Israel had this conceit, that Moses was lost, they repair to his brother Aaron, and intreat him to make them a God, to sit in the place of their Conductour, as if they meant to say; after Moses, no less will serve them then a Deity. Nevertheless, God hath never suffered that there should be a perfect Monarch in the World, in whom nothing hath been wanting; for there would have been a hazard, lest he should have been taken for a God, and thereby have caused a perpetual Idolatry.

The Heathens have made Gods of some Emperours vicious enough; what would they not have made of perfect ones, seeing that men naturally do bear a certain reverence towards virtue? Look a little narrowly into the life of the greatest Monarchs of the World, as of David, Cyrus, Alexander, Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Constantine, Charlemagne; and you shall finde that all those beauties, which have so dazled the eyes of the World, have had their spots, and the most part of the rest have inherited a Renown but little commendable; that is, To be none of the worst amongst many bad ones.

Whatsoever excellency the most famous of them had, proceeded from the especial gift of God: and whatsoever meanness was in them, proceeded from themselves; who alwayes mingled somewhat of Man with the work of the great Work-master. Nevertheless, good Instructions are very useful for Princes, to rouse up, and make active the endowments they have from above: yet it is not in those Panegyricks so well composed, that they learn their duty; for, there they may sooner learn to forget it (when being puft up by those flatteries) they think themselves to be in deed, that, which they are there, but in flourish.

It is not my intent here to discourse at large how Princes ought to govern themselves, but to contract in a few words that which is necessary for their direction, and I am perswaded that the Scripture, S. Lewis in his Testament, and Lewis the eleventh in that Treatise which he composed himself for the instruction of the King his son, have said hereto sufficient, and that the rules of reigning well cannot be drawn better from any, then those that have been of the same profession.

The perfection of a Prince may be comprehended within these five Qualities, Piety, Wisdom, Justice, Goodness, and Valour. Piety fits him for God: Wisdom, for himself: Justice, for the Law: Valour, for Arms: and Goodness, for the whole World.

Piety, or (to speak more properly with S. Thomas) Religion is a true virtue, that appropriates Man to God, and makes him to render that honour that is due to him as first Original, and chief Lord of the whole frame of Nature. Synesius in that excellent Treatise that he made for the Emperour Arcadius concerning government, sayes, That this is the foundation on the which all firmness subsists. This is that spirit of life, which Kings do breathe from heaven, which fills their understanding with enlightning, their heart with Divine love and confidence, their Palace with holiness, and their Kingdom with a blessing.

It belongs to a King above all, to be Pious and Devout towards God, even by the Title of Royalty

it self. Who should honour that highest Majesty, more then his Vicegerent here on earth? Who should represent his virtues, more then his image here below? Who should render greatest thanks for his favours, more then he that receives them in the most abundance? besides the obligement that binds the Prince unto this virtue; he finds the chiefest interest there. Prosperity for the most part is found on their side, which honour the Deity, saith Titus Livius in his history. And Aristotle who proceeds by way of Policy only, counsels a Monarch to be exceedingly religious, for that thereby he will be more beloved and reverenced by his subjects, which expect lesse evil and more good from a Prince which is joined to God by Religion. This also procures him an assurance in his affairs; and makes his prosperity the sweeter, and adversities the lesse afflicting.

God who is the Master and Teacher of Princes, doth so strictly recommend this virtue to those Kings, that were made more especially by his own election, that he commands them to receive from the Priests a Copy of the Law of God, or else to transcribe it with their own hand, to carry it alwayes with them, and to read it all the dayes of their life, to learn thereby to fear the highest King, and to keep his instructions.

Now the Piety of a Prince ought not to be ordinary, but it ought to excell in three things chiefly, in an inward sense of the Deity, in his worship, and zealous affection. An Ancient said, That he which believes the Gods, makes them, and that they have no need of our Sacrifices, but that they would have our Heart. The King ought to acknowledge God with a very deep sense of piety, as the chiefest essence, the chiefest light, a Trinity within an Unity infinite, an Eternal Spirit, whose power is Almightyness, whose Will is the highest reason, and whose Nature is nothing but Holiness: That he is a Mysterious Silence, a Lovely Terribleness, an Immensenesse of Glory, which sees all, and knows all, from whom all Beings have their rising, which gives and takes away Empires, before whom the World, and all its Kingdoms, and all its Monarchs, are but as it were small atoms moving within that immoveable Beam. This sense will cause the Prince to tender his Crown and Person at the feet of God with a perfect humility, and whole dependence on him in all things: he will learn the mysteries of our faith, and all the great Maxims of Religion, not for disputation, but to believe and adore them.

The service of God.

In prosecution of this deep sense, it behoves him to profess the outward worship and service for the performance of his duty, and the example of his people: as by his assisting at divine Service with great reverence; honouring the holy Sacrament; shewing himself exceeding devout towards the most holy mother of God, towards the Angels and Saints; frequenting Confession and the Eucharist; hearkning willingly to the word of God, and regulating his prayers and daily devotions, by the advice of those that direct his conscience, and above all accounting it the chiefest devotion to be carefull of his people, just in his Government, and full of compassion towards the afflicted.

It is also expedient to take heed that the Prince in this do neither too much, nor too little; it is not fiting that he take upon him the devotion of a Priest or Religious man, which might a little diminish the credit of his profession, nor that he should likewise become too careless and negligent in Divine matters, for fear least he fall into Libertinism, which is the gulf of all misfortunes.

Zeal.

True Piety in a Monarch shineth forth most of all in zeal, which is a most ardent love of the honour of God; and to attain to this, he ought above all to keep the Law of God, avoiding all grievous and scandalous sins, and he ought continually to take care, that God be served in his own house, and throughout his whole Realm.

That Blasphemies, Sacriledges, Heresies, Simony, and all impieties be scattered & vanish by the beams of his power: That the Pope, which is the Father, and chief Shepheard of all Christendom, be respected with a holy Reverence. That the Bishops be honoured and maintained. That the Church be provided of good Pastours. That the Clergy live under Rule and comelinesse, & that it be maintained in its rights. That Hospitals, Monasteries, and Religious houses be protected & preserved in their estates. He ought not to suffer in any manner whatsoever, according to the order of Lewis, that sacred places be violated in the Warrs which may happen between Christian Princes. He ought to have an earnest zeal and indefatigable for the advancement of the Faith and Religion, and according as the times and occasions shall permit, to employ his arms and person to subdue the pride of Infidels, and set up the Standard of the Cross. This is the portion which God reserves for Christian Princes, which should never partake of true honour, but that which is enclosed within the glory of Jesus Christ (saith Julius Firmicus to the children of Constantine) Nevertheless in designs of war against the Infidels nothing should be too fervently hasted, under pretence of zeal, to the prejudice of the Realm; but to attend the coming in of God, which knowes the times and opportunities, and that sometimes gives in without much labour, which men at other times undertake without good advice, and with little success.

Wisdom doth very excellently agree with piety, as being a science of Divine and Humane things, not idle, but with an active relish and skill for the directing of our life. If a Prince do not study to get this wisdom, he is ignorant of his profession, and makes himself contemptible to his Subjects. He is given by God to his Kingdom, as the Soul to the Body, and how can he then subsist without understanding? He is given as the Eye, what can he do without Light? He ought himself to be the Light, and would it not be a shame for him to be covered with perpetual darkness? The King shall reign and shall be wise, Jer. 23. 5. saith the holy Scripture: this is the onely thing that Solomon desired of God at the beginning of his reign: and he gave him this request in such a manner, that he repleniſht him with a wonderful ability.

The greatness of Wisdom.

Wisdom maketh a man more worth then a thousand, it multiplies it self into many heads, and gathers together the riches of the Universe into one onely heart. The Wiseman draws an harmless Tribute from the Learning of all Ages, he learns the lives of all, for to husband well his own, he enters into those great Labyrinths of time past, as into his own house; he makes use of so many re inventions of the best wits of the World, as of his own Patrimony. You may say that the Soul of a learned Prince hath run through many Ages in diverse Bodies. Wisdom maketh him to pass through long wayes with small charges, and to discover the whole World without going out of his Closet: He learns, he discourseth, he judgeth, he approveth, he condemneth, that which is past, makes him profit by that which is to come: Good Counsels do enlighten him, and even the follies of others erect him a Theatre for Wisdom.

Yet

What the wisdom of a Prince should be.

Yet he must take heed, lest of a Prince becoming a Philosopher, he cease not to be a King: he ought not to study onely to know and dispute, but to have the knowledge and practise of Excellent things: To think to become wise by the reading of Books only, is like thinking to be hot by the remembrance of fire. He must of necessity traffick with his own understanding, with his own experience: and that he may profit by Teachers, he must be a teacher to himself. I would not that all Princes should be such Philosophers as Marcus Aurelius the Emperour, nor so eloquent as Julian the Apostate, nor so curious in every Art as Hadrian. It is a Science which comes very near to ignorance, to study for that which will profit nothing, and to take the pains to learn that which would be better unlearned.

Hillel. Author Hebraeus nonnullis in Corona. 1. Lege.

Seeing that the Scripture is the Book of books, and that the Ancients called the Bible the Crown; a King ought not to be ignorant thereof, yet not to make himself a Divine, but thereby to learn his duty. Natural Phylosophy (which sets before us the great spectacle of the Creatures, thereby to ascend to the Creatour) is not unprofitable for a good understanding: that which teaches to reason & discourse is good for every occasion: but the Moral, Political, and History make up the best part of a Kings Library; and if he make a little digression, into Musick and Painting; it cannot but be commendable.

Promote that knowledg that puffs not up vain spirits; but that rather, which humbles the solid ones: for, by learning that which we know not, we understand our Ignorance; and know by experience, that one might make a great Library of that, which is beyond the knowledge of the most learned in the World. There are none but those that know little, and which know ill, who take upon them to have a sufficiency of knowledge: they crakle like little Rivulets, whereas the greater Rivers run quietly. That Prince, which by reason that he hath studied, will carry all his counsel in his own head, shews, that he hath little profited by his study: for in this mortal life, a man is so far wise, as he seeks still to become so: but, after that he thinks that he hath atteined it, and hath no more need of others help; then he begins to be out of the way. The use of wisdome is to become wise, as that of the eye, is to see.

The wisdom of a King may be seen by a reasonable tincture of Learning, by the knowledge that he hath of himself, and the frail flourishing of all humane things, by the discreetness of his words, by his modesty in prosperity, by his constancy in adversity. It will shew it self by a Greatness, without Affectation; a Majesty, without Pride; an Humility, without contempt; a Comeliness, without Striving: where every thing declares a King, without any shew of making him seem so: it will shew it self by its Temperance, by the moderating of his passions, and by prudence in the government of his life and estate.

This is to have deeply studied; to be able to overcome his Anger, to disarm Revenge, to moderate a Victory, to overcome concupiscence, to regulate his Affection, to keep under Ambition, to restrain his Tongue, to over-rule his Delights, to asswage his Discontents, to live like a Saint, and speak like an Oracle. This is exceedingly to have profited in wisdom; to be able to proceed in all affairs according to the laws of true prudence. But, the false maketh that its principal which is but the accessary: it takes Greatness and pleasures for the chief aim of a Kings life, it consults little, it judgeth ill, it decreeth nothing. But the true prudence can look unto the end, can take a right mark in all businesses, it doth all things with advice, it brings Judgement without pasion in all occurrences, and gives an effectual order for the performance of all that w^ch^ hath been wisely concluded: the remembrance of that past, the nderstanding of the present, and foreseeing of that to come, makes up its whole perfection: a quick apprehension prepares, an acuteness works it, good advice orders, foreseeing confirms, and performance crowns it. It is by these steps that a Prince ascends to the Throne of wisdom, which is an unestimable Gift, and the true favour of the Deity.

S Lewis, whose life might have been the school of the ablest Philosophers, although he bore in his mind the best maxims of Empires, yet ceased not to read good books, and as he had seen in the time of his imprisonment in the East, that a Saracen prince had a Library of the Books of his Law, he caused the like to be made at his return in his palace, where he spent many hours, and would converse freely with men of learning and desert. Demetrius Phalerius, advised Kings to instruct themselves often by reading, for that there one may learn of the dead, which they cannot know by the living.

The next to Wisdom followeth Justice, which performs in a manner the chief duty that is required of a Prince: and Royalty seems to be nothing else but an excellent science of Justice: as Justice is taken for that habit of virtue, by which we render to every one the right that belongs to him. Tertullian said, that Goodness had created the World, but that Justice had made the Concords thereof. This wise mother of Harmonies ceaseth not to open an ear to the dissents that are made in the World, to correct the disagreeing Voices by its own love, and to bring all to its own end: Ambition inventeth extravagant sounds, Covetousness sends forth enraged cries, tyranny makes an infernal Musick: but Justice corrects all these excesses, and if it meet with valiant and incorrupt souls to serve as an instrument, it sends forth incomparable Melodies, which delight the ears of God, and rejoyce the whole fabrick of Nature.

There are two great Virtues which make all the equalities of mans life; Truth equals the understanding to all the objects, and Justice, the hearts to that which is right.

Lying and Injustice make every where great inequalities which fill Kingdoms with Disorder: Consciences with Crimes, and the World with Confusion. But Truth and Justice render light to dark things, strength to feeble, certainty to doubtful, and order to the confused.

We naturally take a delight to behold the fair bow in heaven, which compasseth the air with a crown of glory: but Alcuin the School-master of Charlemaigne writes, That that which makes it the more admired is, for that amongst its other beauties, it carrieth the ensigns of Justice. It shews the fire and the water, in its red and blew colours, to instruct us that Justice holds the fire in its power to consume the wicked, and the water to bring refreshment to those scorching heats of calamities that trouble the miserable.

Justice is Gods profession, & an Ancient said, that his continual exercise was to weigh the hearts & the works of men, and to distribute rewards, and ordain chastisements according to the good and ill deserving of every one in particular. The Scripture saith, that he is glorious and magnificent, but that these magnificences are chiefly seen upon the mountains of wounds and robberies, when he beats down with an invincible arm the great ones of the earth, loaden with the spoils of iniquity. The Hebrews said, that God took such delight in Justice, that he had bestowed even the Saphires of his own Throne to engrave the Law thereon.

that

The Saviour of the world is named the Just by the holy Ghost in the writings of his Apostles, not in dissimulation, but by his Essence. All the great Imitatours of God have honoured this quality, and have held it in the number of their dearest delights. Job maketh it his crown and his garment: David, his virtue: Solomon, his wisdom: Josias, his love: Augustus, his exercise: and Trajan, his honour. The memory of so many Conflicts, Sieges, Battels, Conquests, Triumphs, whereby the life of this great Emperor was so famous, are found but in the record of a few lines: but that which remaineth engraven in the memory of all Ages, is an Act of Justice which he performed even then when marching forth of Rome in great state to go to the wars (as I have related in the first Volume) he harkned to a poor widow woman which desired Justice of him; he alighted from his horse to understand her business at large, and restored her to her right before he departed thence. Which thing did so wonderfully astonish S. Gregory, that he prayed (as they say) for the soul of Trajan, and saved it: the which the D. Alphonsus Ciaconius justifies in a learned Treatise, although the Cardinal Baronius be of another opinion.

By all this, it is apparent and manifest, that a Prince ought to have especial care above all things, not onely to be just, but to make it appear both by his words and deeds that which he bears in his heart. He is the greatest King, according to the Philosopher Diogenes, which is the justest; and if he be without Justice, he is nothing but an empty Name, and a shadow of Royalty. The most excellent thing that a King can do in that his Dignity (said the Wiseman) is to worship the Deity; to ordain Laws; to conduct Armies; and all this is to be done Legally, according to the rule of Justice. The people feel it not if he be devout, if he be sober, if he be discreet, if he be chaste: but if he be unjust, this is a publick mischief, this all presently feel, as if the Sun should go out of his bounds, or if some malign Constellation should cause burning, or floods to happen upon the earth. King Nebuchadonozor is represented in the Prophet Daniel, by a Tree, under the which, the fowls made their nests, and under the which, the other living creatures remained under covert; to give us to understand, that Princes ought to stretch forth their Power, even like branches, to protect their Subjects by rendring them Justice.

A true Prince (to speak as Cassiodore doth) ought to serve for a Temple to Innocency; for a Sanctuary to Temperance: for an Altar to Justice. You therefore (O Monarchs!) that take delight in the glittering of your Crown, know ye, that it is given you from above, to be Gods Vice-gerent, rendring to every one that which belongs to him. You ought to watch like an Angel over your whole Estate, and not to suffer at any time that the smallest things should be destitute of your tendrest cares. Hearken to that which God speaks to you by his Apostle, Masters, render that which is just and right to your servants; seeing that you cannot be ignorant, that you have a great Master in heaven, to whom you must give an account of your actions. Hearken to that which he commands you by his Prophet: Do Judgment and Justice, deliver those that are oppressed from the hand of the persecutours: Take good heed you afflict not the stranger, the orphan, nor the widow. The Justice of private persons is manifest in their particular commerce, but that of a King hath other Kinde of beams to make it appear and be beheld in its glory. Jer. 21.

If you be a true King, as nature hath not given you an hundred mouthes to speak, nor a hundred hands to do all that is necessary with your Government; it is fitting that you make a good choice of those to whom you commit the managing of your Arms, of your Revenues, and of your Laws. Never suffer you, that your Name which is sacred, and your Authority which is inviolable, should serve for a pretence to wicked ones to oppress your Subjects. The huntings of men are for the wilde Boar, the Wolves and the Foxes; those of Princes ought to be after the Outrageous, the Robbers, and Tyrants. Acts of Justice in punishment and reward.

All offences are but the overflowings of Injustice: there can be nothing chaste (saith Saint Augustine) where adulterers are; nothing safe, where robbers; nothing out of danger, where murderers. If the sword of the Prince, the revenger of iniquities, do not stop the audacious, cities become forrests, and forrests everlasting terrours; if there be not Laws for men, and punishment for offences. Corrupt nature would never make an end of offending, if Government restrained not its enterprizes. The chiefest care of him that is set over people, is to take away the evil, and the evil-doers, that honest people may live in safety: for this cause are Kingdoms, Magistrates, Arms, Laws; the world would be nothing but robbery, and the life of man confusion, if Justice did not suppress the violence of disordered affections. But to speak the truth, the Prince that should be severe in punishments, and should have an heart lockt up at rewards, would be as it were lame of one arm: he ought equally to be ready to chastise offences, and to recompence well-doing. When the Government of Kings is so loose, that vices come in request, and those that commit them; it is almost a kind of sin, then to do well: and when virtues are so unhappy, as to be deprived of the honour which is due to them, it is a scandal of that age, and the shame of Crowns.

It is not sufficient to appoint Judges to hear and determine of suits, he must be well informed of their proceedings and their actions, he must sometimes imitate S. Lewis, which gave judgment under an Elm about the differences of his Subjects, and consecrated the Woods and the Fields by the sincerity of the Oracles that went forth of his mouth.

The Emperours of Constantinople heard likewise the controversies of their people; and as Codin saith, when one party pleaded, they held one ear uncovered, and covered the other; to signifie, that they kept it for the adverse party.

It is a weakness of judgment to go about to decide a business, having heard but one party; one ought to have an ear somewhat hard at such diversity of reports, which are made by parties diversly interessed in a business, otherwise it is to be feared, that a long repentance will quickly follow a short determination.

Civil Justice is exercised within Bars, and on Judgment-seats; but the Military hath been oft very much neglected by some former Princes in its time, when having lost the opportunity of making a good Peace, they have afterwards made an unhappy War.

Those Judges that buy Justice, it is a very great chance if they do not sel it, and those fouldiers which are are not paid by the Taxes levied for that end; are as it were authorized to pay themselves by the permission of spoils and plunderings. Our Laws & our Age may blush, when the Roman histories tell us, that one Scaurus, conducting an Army, oftentimes lodged in the fields, where there were trees loaden with fruit, and yet the souldiers durst not lift up the hand to gather one onely: the passing by of a great army left every thing in the same order in which it had found them. And amongst Christians one Regiment onely of Souldiers hath often made a desolation in the Country, an affrightment in the towns, and as many sackings, as quarterings. Those which sit at the Stern of Empires and Common-wealths, are greatly accountable to God for that which hath past in this business. Kings ought not onely to maintain Justice by their Arms, but to teach it by their behaviour, & to consecrate it by their examples. The Doctor Navarrus hath set down diverse sins against Justice, by the which, Princes, Common-wealths, & Lords may offend against God mortally; as, to take unlawfully the goods that belong not to them, and to keep them without restitution. To govern loosly and negligently their Kingdoms and Principalities. To suffer their Countries to be unprovided of victuals and defence necessary, which may bring their Subjects in danger of being spoiled. To waste and consume in charges, either evil or unnecessary, the goods which are for the defence of their estates. To burden excessively their Subjects with Imposts and Subsidies; without propounding any good intent therefore, & without having any necessity (not pretended, but) true and reall. To suffer the poor to die with famine, and not to sustain them with their Revenues in that extremity. Not to hearken to reasonable conditions for a just Peace, and to give occasion to the enemies of the Christian name, to invade their Lands and root out our Religion. To dispense either with the Law of God or Nature. To give judgment in the suits of their Subjects according to their own affection. To deceive their creditours, to suppress the Liberty and Rights of the people, to compel them by threatnings or importunate entreaties to give their goods, or to make marriages against their wills, or to their disadvantage. To make unjust Wars; to hinder the service of the Church; to sell offices & places of charge so dear, that they give occasion to those that buy them to make ill use thereof. To present to Benefices with Cure of Souls, persons unworthy and scandalous. To give Commissions and Offices to corrupt and unfit officers. To tolerate and permit vices, filthiness, and robberies by their Servants, and to condemn to death, and cause to be slain unjustly without due order of Law, and to violate the marriage-beds of their Subjects.

All these things and others which this Doctour hath noted, cause great sins of Injustice in the persons of great ones, unto which they ought especially to take heed: and to prevent the same it is most necessary that they be instructed in the duties of their charge, and in the estate of their affairs, bending themselves thereto as the most important point of their safety: and seeing that the passion of Hatred or Love, which one may bear to some person, will trouble the judgment and pervert Justice; S. Lewis counselled the King his Son, strongly to keep his heart in quiet, and in the uncertainty of any differences, alwayes to restrain his own affection, and to keep under all movings of the spirit, as the most capitall enemy to Reason.

Many Princes have often lost both their life and Scepter for giving themselves to some unjust action; and there is no cause more ordinary, for which God translates Kingdoms from one hand to another, then Injustice; as on the contrary, those Princes which have been great Justiciaries do shine as the stars of the first magnitude within God's Eternity, and even their ashes do seem as yet to exhale from their Tombs a certain savour, which rejoyceth people, and keeps their memory for ever blessed.

Goodness, its Excellency.

But one cannot believe the rare mixture that Justice and Goodness make joined together: Goodness is an essence profitable & helpfull, which serves as a Nurse to Love; it hath its originall in the Deity, and from thence disperseth it self by little veins into all created Beings, and mixeth it self with every object, as the light with every Colour. It drives away, and stops up evil on every side, and there is no place, even to the lowest hell, where it causeth not some beam of its brightness to shine. Beauty which amazeth all mortall eyes, is but the flower of its essence; but Goodness is the fruit thereof, and its savour is the savour of God which all creatures do taste and relish. God, which as Cassiodore saith, is the cause of all Beings, the life of the senses, the wisdom of understandings, the love and glory of Angels, having from all eternity his happiness compleat in his own bosom hath created man, that he might have to whom to do good, as Gregory Nyssen writes: and S. Cyprian saith, that this eternal Spirit did move upon the waters from the beginning of the world, to unite and appropriate the Creature to its self, and to dispose it for the loving inspirations of its Goodness.

The Prince, which according to the obligement of his Charge, would make himself an Imitatour of God, ought to be exceedingly good, with four sorts of Goodness; of Behaviour, of Affability, of Bounty and of Clemency. I say, first of Behaviour, for that there is small hope of any great one, which is not good towards God; which keeps not his Law, and rules not his life thereby: if he have any virtues, they are all sophisticate, and if he do any good, it is by ebbing and flowing, by fits, and for some ends. No person can be truly good towards others, which doth not begin with himself; he must needs have Christian Love, without which no man shall ever see God: if he posses this virtue, he will first have love of honour to those which have begot him, a conjugall love for his wife, a cordial love to those of his bloud, and all his kindred: from thence it will spread it self over his whole house, and through all his estate; and will cause him to love his Subjects with a certain tenderness, as his own goods, and as the good Shepheard cherisheth his flocks. He will imitate our Lord, which looked from the top of the Mountain upon the poor people of Judea that followed him, and his heart melted for them: with singular compassion. Herein doth truly consist the virtue of Piety, which gives so great a lustre to the life of Princes.

Now, according to the Goodness that is in his heart, he must needs pour it forth upon all his, by these three Conduit-pipes that I have said, of Affability, of Liberality, and of Clemency: Affability, which is a well-ordered sweetness both in words and converse, ought to increase together with a prince from his tender age. This is a virtue which costeth nothing, and yet brings forth great fruit; it procures treasuries of hearts and wills, which do assist great ones, when need requires.

A good word that cometh forth of the mouth of a King, is like the Manna that came from heaven, and fell upon the desart. It nourisheth and delighteth his Subjects: it hath hands to frame and fashion their hearts as it pleaſeth him: it carrieth with it chains of gold ſweetly to captivate their wills. The command that cometh with ſweetneſs is performed with ſtrength invincible, and every one naturally delights more to obey him, that ſeemeth to entreat in commanding, then a power that cometh with an armed hand and threatens to root out that which refuſeth it.

It is fitting, nevertheleſs, that the Prince diſpenſe his favours according to the deſerts of his Subjects: for it would be a great inequality to be alike to all the world. Affectation oftentimes ſpoils the profeſſion of courteſie, and when one gives too many words at too cheap a price, and almoſt indifferently to every one, it maketh one think, that they are none of the ſincereſt: falſe gold is too high in colour, and a diſſembling courteſie is too glorious in appearance: this deceiveth ſome which are not accuſtomed to it, and have no great skill in diſcerning, carrying it ſelf like the Ivy, as fairly over crackt pillars, as ſound ones; but thoſe which are better adviſed are quickly wary of empty courteſies, when they with good reaſon expect better effects. Kings, although they are great, are not able to enrich the whole world, there are very many which muſt be contented with good words, but to think alwaies to eſcape paying with this coin, is to deceive himſelf and the whole world.

There are ſo many hungry ones, which cannot feed upon flowers, which expect gifts and rewards, after they have been at great charges, and run through great hazards for the glory of the Prince and the good of the State, that it is neceſſary, really, to acknowledge their ſervices.

The Prince which thinks himſelf bound to give nothing or very little, betraies his birth, ſhews himſelf to be lowly minded, and of as low a fortune, having little reaſon to expect a great harveſt from that field where he ſowed nothing; he declare his too much gredineſs after temporal goods; and if he knoweth little what the love of his Subjects is worth, he heaps up the Indian clay, and neglects that patrimony of hearts, wherewith God, as rich as he is, contents himſelf: it happens oft that he finds himſelf afterwards in the midſt of thorny affairs, where his ſilver without friends ſerves for nothing but to loſe.

But although it behoveth him to give, one can hardly ſay how difficult this profeſſion is to do it rightly; there can be no greater loſs then to give away all, and to give unadviſedly to thoſe which deſerve leaſt. He that gives too much and above his ability, deſtroies his liberality intending to confirm it, for that by giving too much, he taketh the way to be able no more to give any thing. John Michel in his Anatomy of a Body Politick, ſaith, that the Doctour Bricot in an Oration which he made to King Francis the Juſt, ſhewed him that he was like to S. Francis, whoſe name he bore; that his hands were pierced, and could hold nothing, as it were, which he gave not away; and if that he took not heed, this would conſume all his Revenues, and that thereby he would make more poor in his Kingdom, then S. Francis had drawn to his religion.

Thoſe Sovereigns that ſtarve their people to nouriſh the unſatiable greedineſs of ſome particular, are like thoſe Mountains that bear fruit, not for the uſe of men, but for the birds of prey; they give to a few, that which they take from the whole, and oftentimes fatten full monſters and abominable ones with the blood of the Publick, that they make the ground to tremble under their feet, and the heaven to thunder upon their heads. Others give that which they can hold no longer; as Manuel Comnenus, which offered his ſilver to his Souldiers then, when he was in the hand of the Saracens. Others give after an evil manner, more for that they are not able any longer to deny, then with intent to gratifie. Others give ſlowly and little, in ſuch a faſhion, as after they have long time fed men's hopes with wind, they pay them at length almoſt with ſmoak. Others repent themſelves preſently for having given that which they could hold no longer, and have no other content by their liberality, then to repent of their haſtineſs. He that would be truly liberal and magnificent, will avoid all theſe rocks, he will give with good advice according to his ability, and with a comely grace, to the poor Gentry, to the Souldiery maimed by his ſervice, to Churches, to Religious perſons, to people of Virtue, Knowledge, and Deſert, which do ſhew themſelves profitable for the Publick.

But to ſay truth, it is a great gift to pardon that by Clemency, which one might juſtly puniſh by Juſtice: this is that admirable quality that Kings have, and neareſt approaching to God: they cannot create, they cannot raiſe men from the dead, and yet to give ſafety and life to a man, is to give him, as it were, a ſecond Creation, it is to give him a being without a not being, and to beſtow on him a Reſurrection without cauſing him to taſt of death.

What would a man do which ſhould ſuddenly be made an half-god, and which ſhould be tranſported amongſt the ſtars? What would he dream of? In what buſineſs would he take moſt pleaſure, unleſs it were to do good, and amongſt all good, to give and preſerve the foundation of all the reſt, which is life? There is nothing more glorious then to be able and not willing to revenge an injury: the power makes the greatneſs of Majeſty, but the good will giveth its perfection.

The Hebrews ſaid, that the chiefeſt work of God was Mercy, that he dwelt in his Tabernacle from the beginning of the world, unto the day of judgment; and that giving all the reſt of the time to Clemency, he reſerved but one day for Juſtice.

Away with thoſe Kings of the Macedonians, that would appear in their ſtatelieſt walks with the head of a Lion; this was not to ſhew their greatneſs, but to teſtifie their brutiſhneſs. The heart of the King, (ſaith the Scripture) is in the hand of the Lord: within that hand that doth nothing but open it ſelf to fill every creature with a bleſſing from heaven to earth; how can it take then there any thought unto it ſelf of rage, of killing, or of ſacking? It ought to be merciful even in puniſhing, taking great heed to do nothing by way of revenge, but doing all by Goodneſs.

Clemency doth not exclude Juſtice, but moderate it, and if it ſuffer the life to be taken away from one that is faulty, it is to preſerve a thouſand Innocents. It is a cruelty to pardon nothing, but it is a double cruelty to pardon all, ſeeing that one cannot equal the evil to the good, in ſo great an equality of lives and manners, unleſs one overthrow a whole State. It behoves him wiſely and with good advice to diſcern, that which is worthy of pardon, and that which is worthy of puniſhment. There are peſtilent crimes, ſcandalous, and which draw great conſequences with them, which the Prince cannot leave unpuniſhed without condening himſelf. There are other faults committed by error, by frailneſs, by ſurprize, by ſtrong inducements, mighty temptations: & thoſe that have yielded once ther-to have done a thousand other worthy actions, to blot out the memory of one ill. If Clemency hath no place in such occasions, it will have nothing to do about a Prince, and if it find no employment with him, it is to be feared that the vengeance of God will find work there to busie it self.

The wisest of Kings is of opinion, that this virtue is the foundation of thrones; whence it follows, that that Prince which is unprovided thereof, puts his own person in danger, and his estate into shaking.

It is to deceive ones self to think, that a Prince may be secure there, where there is nothing secure against the violence of the Prince. Despair of Mercy hath often caused horrible cruelties to ensue, and it is needful alwayes to take heed of the force of a last necessity. There are some things which ought to be pardoned, by the contempt of punishing them; others by the profit, and others by the glory, and it is always to be remembred, that we have a Judge over our heads, which suffers us to live by his only goodness, being able every moment to punish us by his Justice.

At last, to conclude this little Treatise, Valour procures an high reputation to a Monarch, making him terrible to his Enemies, and amiable to his Subjects. Greatness maintains it self by the same means which gave it its beginning; and it renews new vigour by those qualities which have been the Authours of its original. Our first Kings attained to this dignity by their valour; and by that stoutness which they had to expose their courageous persons to very many hazards for the safety of the publick: this made them admired, and lifted them up at last upon the Target to be shewed throughout the whole Army, and chosen by general consent to command over others by the title of their deserts.

The fame of Valour doth so easily run through, and with such approbation, the minds of people and valiant men, that it sufficing not it to make Kings upon earth, it hath made amongst the Heathens Gods in Heaven. They have deified an Hercules, and a Theseus, for having cut off the head of Hydra's, and overcome Minotaurs; and not contenting themselves to have consecrated their persons, they have put wild beasts and monsters amongst the Constellations, for having served as objects of their victories, chusing rather to eternize beasts amongst the Stars, then to diminish any thing of the eternal glory of those valiant men.

Alexander being crowned King by his father Philip, before he took possession of the Kingdom that fell to him by the decease of his Predecessour, assembled together all the great ones of his Kingdom, and said to them, that he would counsel them to chuse such a one as should be most obedient to God, which should have the best thoughts for the Publick Good, which should be most compassionate towards the Poor, which should best defend the right of the weak ones against the strong; but above all, that should be the most Valiant, and should adventure himself most boldly for the safety of his Country. And when they had all confirmed to him that which his birth had given him, he took an Oath, that he would keep all he had propounded, as he did, testifying in all his actions his Goodness and Valour above all the Kings that had gone before him.

A Monarch shall give some proof of himself, by diligently studying the art of War; in often frequenting the exercises thereof; in being able to judge of places and Armies, of Captains, of Souldiers, of Defences, of On-sets, of Polices and Stratagems, of Fortifications, of Arms, of Provision, of Munition, and giving exact order for every thing that belongs to Military affairs. He must often shew himself in the Army, by exhorting, encouraging, consulting, resolving, giving orders, and causing them to be executed, by shewing readiness of courage in dangers, and an invincible heart in the midst of bad success. But he ought not at any time to mix himself therein without great necessity, seeing that the hand of one man can do very little, and the loss of a King brings a dammage unrecoverable.

The young King Ladislaus thrust himself into danger at the Battel of Varna, against Bajazet the Turk when he had there lost himself, and that they had taken away his head, and put it upon the end of a spear, as a sad spectacle to the Christians: This caused their whole Army to be routed, which before was half victorious, and gave the victory to the Infidel.

War is a long and difficult profession, and one of the most dangerous, which never ought to be undertaken but upon necessity. I cannot, neither ought I hear to teach it by words, reserving that to the skill of the more understanding, and to the experience of perfect ones.

I am only obliged to advertise, that great heed is to be taken, lest any one take rashness, or salvage rage instead of true valiantness. Those are no Bravado's nor terrible looks that give the most valiant blows in Armies. It pleaseth not God, that a Virtue that doth such wonders upon earth, and places the Hero's in the heaven, should be accomplished by such feeble means. This is no effect of boasting, nor of ignorance, nor of fury: this is a branch of generousness, which teacheth the contempt of dangers and of death it self, for the glory of God, for the defence of ones Country, for the subduing of the impious Infidels and wicked ones, for the exaltation of the true Faith, of Religion, and the glory of ones Nation.

Oh the excellency of this divine Virtue, which protects so many people with the shadow of its branches and laurels; which causes a calm to be be found in a tempest; safety in the midst of dangers; comfort in disasters; an upholding in the midst of weakness! Happy are the wounds of the valiant, whence flows more honour then blood. Happy their immortal Souls which flie hence into heaven, carried upon the purple of so generous blood, and which flying hence, leave to posterity an eternal memory of their prowess.

Time hath no sythe for them; Death is unprovided with darts; Calumny loseth its teeth there, and Glory spreads (throughout) the Ensigns of their Immortality.

THE

THE MONARCHS.

DAVID. SOL[illegible]

David is a great mixture of divers adventures, of Good, of Evils, of Joyes, of Griefs, of Contempts, of Glories, of Vices, of Virtues, of Actions, of Passions, of un-thought-of Successes, of strange Accidents and Marvels. It is not my purpose to set forth his Life here, which is exactly contained in the holy Scripture, but to make some reflexions on the principal things therein, that concern the Court. We will consider him in a two-fold estate, of a Servant, and of a Master, and will observe with what wisdome he preserved himself in the one, and with what Majesty he behaved himself in the other.

The whole beginning of his History is a continual combat against an horrid monster, which is the jealousie of Saul, which torments him a thousand waies, for to adorn him with as many Crowns. An Antient said very well, That the greatest secret of ones life was to undergo destiny, and endure patiently the ordinance of God concerning our lives and estates, for by learning Patience, we learn to forget our misery: but by bearing the Divine appointment with Impatience, we row all our life against a torrent which swallows us up.

A great secret of life.

Anthol. φέρε τὸ φέρον ἡ φέρω.

David was at the heart of God, but he was not at the heart of Saul: God had made him for to command, and Saul would not allow any waies that he should be obeyed: He sought his life, when as God had appointed his Crown for him: He desired his death, and procured for him immortality.

God and man did strive, who should exalt or depress this man; but the counsels of the one were immoveable, and the endeavers of the other were violent in their on-sets, and feeble in their effects.

The qualities of David.

As soon as David was seen, one might see some Divine thing, a little body well made, enlivened with a great spirit; a comelinesse which could not be learned at school, but which was a gift from above; a mildnesse without weakness; a behaviour without affectation; a valiantness without ostentation; a gallantness without vanity; a virtue that was made to be admired by all, and imitated but by few.

Men of God.

All flowers have their being from the earth by their roots, but they have influences from heaven much different. Men also are all of Adam's clay, but the gifts of God do manifest themselves in some so visibly, that it is wisdome to give them place, and but headiness to fight against them. This little boy neglected, which fed the sheep, and whom the father would not so much as reckon amongst the number of his sons, this is He, whom Samuel chose for King by Gods direction, who commands not to measure Kings any more by their stature, but by their endowments from heaven.

David's entrance into the Court.

He comes first to the Court under the quality of a player on instruments, there he makes himself known for a good Souldier; admired as Commander of an Army; and crowned as a Conquerour. Saul was tormented with an evil spirit, which was maintained by his melancholick Humour, and nourished by his passion. They seek out for him a fair young man, which withall was skilfull in playing on the Harp, for to make him merry. One of his servants said, that David the son of Jesse would be very fit for that employment; he is sent for in the Kings Name, he comes, he pleaseth while he played on the instruments, but he displeases while he handled his weapons, when as Envy begins to cause his valour to be reputed for a fault. Such kind of enraged asps never sleep at the sound of Musick, his devil is offended at this comelinesse, is incensed by those gallant actions, and even vomits its poison against those which cast flowers at it. Saul knew not that God prepared him this little Musician for to be his heir, if he had known that which Heaven intended to do with this child, that would have sufficed to have troubled all the Musick.

He was at that time happy in his blindness, and his first mischance was to have eys which could not endure the lustre of another's virtues. This young Shepherd, which in his apprenticeship had learned to fight with Lions and Bears, would go to the Wars as well as his brethren, who do blame that his curiosity, and despise his person.

There must always be some famous exploit for to put a man at first in great credit at the Court, all that which is humane goes on very slowly; and an ability is not gotten but by long experience. But when God will put to his hand, he gives to a man in one happy moment, that which thirty years pains could not obtain. The Combat with Goliah was that, that raised David: Heaven had prepared this Giant for to serve for a trial of his valour, and for an ornament of his proweſs. One man alone, which had affrighted a whole Army, nine foot high, and armed with five hundred pound weight of iron, continues for the space of fourty daies his stately bravado's, challenging the stoutest of the Israelites to combate.

Goliah.

All their hearts are frozen at the sound of his terrible voice: there is not his like in the world which dares come forth against him. The King propounds great riches, and his Daughter in marriage to him, which would take away this blemish from the people of God printed on the face of the whole Army by this Philistim.

David hereupon presents himself, and goes forth to fight with him, not with the gilded Arms of Saul, but with a Sling.

The Giant scoffs at him, and finding him sufficiently armed to defend himself from dogs, but not for to set upon men, he looks now upon this little body as a fit prey for some bird of rapine. But this Champion of the Lord of Hosts, reads a lesson first to him of Religion, before he shews him his skill in fencing. Thou comest to me (saith he) with a spear, a sword, and a buckler; but I come to thee in the name of the God of Armies: of the God of the hosts of Israel, at which thou this day hast scoffed with so great insolence.

It is written in heaven, that this great God will deliver thee into mine hands, and that I shall take away thy head from off thy shoulders, and that I shall make a great feast for all beasts of prey with the flesh of this monstrous body, and this shall be the means for thee to learn that there is a God in Israel. He saith it, he doth it, he strikes his adversary with a blow of the sling in the midst of his fore-head, and makes this mighty tower of flesh to fall in a moment, this terrible Giant, cutting off his head with his own sword; which put the whole army of the Philistims to confusion, & lifted up the glory of the chosen people to an incomparable heighth.

Behold the fountain of all great evils that David suffered afterwards: all the Laurels that he gathered in the field of the battel, carried an evil tincture of Saul's envy. The great ones admire him, the people applaud him, he is the subject of the Songs of the Daughters of Jerusalem, which set him above Saul.

The horrible envy of Saul.

It is this musick that enraged his evil spirit, and would not give him any rest; Goliah overcome in the opinion of all the world, is still upon his legs to torment him: here is the cause of his rage, as it was before of his fear. David must be destroyed, because he hath saved the Nation, he must be put to death because he hath restored the people to life, he must be dishonoured for having upheld the honour of the King, he is sufficiently faulty, because he is too virtuous.

They say, that Love and Tears are learned without any master; and I may say, that there is no great need of studying at the Court, to learn Envy and Revenge. It is a strange thing that Saul of a simple country-fellow, should become so malicious and subtle a Courtier, as to practise the most refined dissimulations of the Court. He had resolved to destroy David, and yet conceived that this Duel with Goliah, had set him in too high an esteem in the opinion of the people: and that if he should openly attempt against his life, he should bring his own into danger. He thought best to bestow on him a chief place in the army, under pretence of honour, which might be most subject to the violence of the Philistims, believing that his courage would carry him into dangers, and that the Philistims being incensed by the death of their country-man, would no waies spare him, and that by this means his death would be imputed to his Destiny, and not to the envy of Saul.

Envy is easily learned at the Court.

But after that he saw that he returned from the manifest dangers, with a crowned head, with the applause of the people, and that he behaved himself within the Kingdom with very great wisdom; he began to suspect him more then before: he took heed of bestowing great riches on him, and married his eldest daughter which he had promised to him, to another, using him by this means injuriously.

Nevertheless, for that his honour was engaged therein, and that one might justly complain of his faithlesnes, he took advice to marry him to his younger, which was Michol, with very harsh & dangerous conditions, making him to buy a thing that was due to him, by the death of 200 Philistims, conceiving that by so great a number of men, and so many fights reiterated, he might be entangled in some mischance; or if he should escape that, the best that could hap was only to gain a woman of a costly humor wch would be to him but for a reproach, and much discontent.

Behold how man's reasoning doth propound: but God which catches the subtle in their devices, and overthrows the designs of the malicious to establish his own counsels upon their ruines, caused the victories and the marriage of David to succeed to his good content, together with the good will and admiration of all the Court. Jonathan the eldest son of Saul was so astonished with his valiant exploits, his rare virtues, and his incomparable brave carriage, that he loved him as his own heart, and bereft himself of the most precious things that he had, to adorn him withal. David likewise swears unto him reciprocally an immortal friendship.

Humane wisdom overthrown by the power of Heaven.

The love of David and Jonathan.

These two souls, to speak according to the phrase of the Scripture, were united together with an indissoluble affection. Their hearts were two furnaces which continually breathed forth flames of sacred love, & might sooner be found without any thoughts then to be without thinking one of the other. Their separations were as so many dyings, & their meetings again did prevent their Paradise. The longest daies were but as a smal moment while they lovingly conversed together, then they never perceived that the time ran away; and they never departed from each other, but with promise to visit again as soon as may be. Each of them in their absence seemed to it self a wandring soul without habitation, and without a body; their spirits made wonderful transpirations for to joyn themselves together, and talk to each other as in an Idæa, when Saul hindred their visits.

Poor

The good offices of Jonathan.

Poor Jonathan, which was of an incomparable mildneſs, declared to his father, as much as he could, the Innocency of David, and the great ſervices that he had done for the Crown; and when he ſaw his ſpirit moved againſt him, he was almoſt ready to die; therefore he ceaſed not to repreſent to him with horrour of mind the monſtrous impiety that it would be to ſacrifice ſuch a perſonage as he, which had ſo often devoted himſelf for the ſafety of his Country, the out-cry of the people, and the vengeance of God. At other times he dealt with him with ſweet and perſwaſive language, cauſing him (as it were) to touch with his fingers the brave carriage and excellencies of David, and aſſuring him, that there was not a man in his whole Kingdom which was of a more harmleſs and pleaſing converſation, and that it was the joy of his heart and his only ſafety to have him alwayes at his ſide.

Saul cleared for a while, again returns to his evil ſpirit.

Saul ſuffered himſelf to be overcome with theſe his diſcourſes, whether it were indeed that he was perſwaded, or whether he feigned himſelf to be appeaſed, and ſuffered David, whom he had driven far of, to return again near his perſon. But this mad-man, upon a day when he plaied on the Harp in his preſence, took his launce, and endeavoured to ſtrike him through therewith, which he had done, if David by his nimbleneſs had not avoided that evil blow; and leſt that any ſhould charge him with this perfidiousneſs, he excuſed it by the diſtemper of his ſpirit. Jonathan endeavoured yet another time this reconciliation, but having been repelled by Saul by pricking words, and with threatnings to kill him, if he did not give over this his friendſhip with David; he ſaw clearly, that there was no more ſafety for his friend, and gave him the counſel which was for himſelf the ſharpeſt of all, cauſing him to retire.

David goes from the Court, and makes a ſad departure from his friend, for to avoid the unmerciful fury of his father.

Theſe two dear ſouls on the day of this ſad departure were pierced with a thouſand darts of grief, and were a thouſand times upon their eyes and lips for to fly from thence, and to mingle themſelves one with the other. The time paſt cauſed them to remember that which they had loſt; the preſent, that which they were to loſe; and that to come, was unto them a bottomleſs pit of terrour and affrightment. They apprehended the one for the other, as many dangers as there are upon the earth and ſea, and they could not promiſe themſelves any thing but dayes without comforts, and nights full of terrible dreams and torments. They poured out ſo many tears, and fetched ſo many ſighs, having no other eloquence but that of their hearts mutually wounded in their lodging, that it was a thing worthy of compaſſion, even of Saul himſelf.

David is purſued, and eſcapes.

This mad-man ſeeing that he was eſcaped out of his bloudy hands, would have cauſed him to be taken and ſent forth ſouldiers for to bring him back. But his wife Michol having deſcried the evil intent of her father, advertiſed her husband of it, and made him depart ſuddenly in the deep ſilence of the night, putting in his place an image in his bed. The houſe failed not to be ſet upon, the next morning; and the Guard of Saul entring by force, paſſed on unto the bed and found there the counterfeit. Michol was accuſed hereof and chidden by Saul, but ſhe excuſed her ſelf, ſaying, That her husband had compelled her to do this, threatning to kill her, if ſhe would not obey, and that the preſence of ſo manifeſt a danger had forced her to procure this invention. He ceaſed not to encreaſe his anger, and to invent every day new means to deſtroy him, whom he ought to have preſerved above all men.

The life of David in baniſhment.

In the mean time, David knew not whither to retire himſelf, and ſaw himſelf every day, amongſt the nets, hunted like a poor beaſt, which cauſed him to paſs a life, ſo worthy to be eſteemed by the whole world, in very many bitterneſſes. He would have taken the boldneſs to have gone to Samuel, who was yet alive, but this his interview would have been prejudicial both to the one and the other, in the mind of Saul, which turned all its ſuſpicions into fury.

His arrival at Nob cauſeth great diſaſter to the High-Prieſt.

He removed himſelf from thence unto the town of Nob, to the high Prieſt Ahimelech, who ſeeing him in very ſmall equipage, was ſomewhat amazed at his arrival: But David for to confirm him, told him, that he went about a certain urgent buſineſs, which the King had given him in charge, and that it was neceſſary that it ſhould be done without noiſe: the which had compelled him to take but few people with him, which were come forth very ſuddenly, without having leiſure to take order for neceſſary things for their journy; whereby, he ſhould do him a great pleaſure to give him ſome bread, and to help him to ſome weapons, which the haſte of the buſineſs would not ſuffer him to take.

The Prieſt anſwered, that he had no other loaves then thoſe of the ſhew-bread which were conſecrated, but that they might make uſe of them, if they were purified, and eſpecially if they abſtained from all converſe with women: of which David having aſſured him, he gave them thoſe, and having no other ſword then that of Goliah, which was kept in Tabernacle for a Monument, he preſented it to him, wherewith he was very well contented, judging it the beſt of all, and ſo went forward in his way.

Saul having heard a report that David had appeared, entred into great forreſts, and going through a wood with a lance in his hand, being compaſſed by his Captains and Officers, ſharply complained of the unfaithfulneſs of his ſervants, asking them with reproach, What it was that David had promiſed them, and whether he would give them every one Lordſhips, or make them Captains, or Camp-maſters, that they had thus forſaken their Prince? That it was a pitiful thing to behold him betrayed of his own children, for to uphold a rebel, which ſought nothing but an occaſion to get his Crown from him.

Doeg acceſeth the high-Prieſt being innocent.

Hereupon Doeg, maſter of the ſhepherds of Saul, an Idumean by nation, and of barbarous behaviour, having been at Nob when David paſſed by there, and deſirous to get favour with his Maſter, accuſed Abimelech the Prieſt, with all his company, for having helped David with weapons and proviſion, and having teſtified a good affection to his party: which cauſed Saul to ſend for him preſently, and handle him with great anger, reproaching him with villany, and ſuſpecting him of treaſon. The other anſwered very wiſely, that he being retired from the knowledge of buſineſs at the Court, and of the Bed-chamber, he could not know the intents of David, but knowing very aſſuredly the good-will that the King had teſtified towards him, the great charges & commiſſions wherewith he had honoured him, the favour that he had ſhewed to him by ſo nearly allying him to his houſe, he could not, nor he ought not to drive him away from his lodging, having received no command from the King, & not being able to underſtand by any the offence that David had incurr'd.

Bloudy effects of the jealouſie of Saul.

This excuſe was very juſt and lawful. But the violent are never contented with reaſons, intending to be maſters of the Laws, although they are ſlaves to their brutiſh paſſions. Saul commanded without any other other form of proceedings to kill him with those of his company, which the souldiers did very much abhorr, and there was not found one that durst lift up his hand against those sacred persons. But Doeg that villanous butcher, which had a long time been bred up in slaying beasts, having gathered together the small rabble of his servants, set upon the high Priest and the Priests which accompanied him, to the number of 85. which were all murdered in one day, and this cursed servant stretching further yet the command of his Master, drave on his murderers to the sacking of the Town of Nob, which they filled with fire and bloud.

What will not the jealousie of State do? what will not tyranny, rage, and fury, when they are seconded by evil servants which blow the coal able to devour both men and Towns? Saul, the plain Countryfellow, the cordial man, the child of one year, after he had suckt the breath of this serpent, kills the high Priest and the Priests, buries the smoaking Towns in the bloud of the miserable Citizens. A thousand poor bloudy sacrifices stretched out upon the cart, pleaded sufficiently before God with the voyce of their bloud, for to pull down this inhumane Tyrant, for whom all the furies prepared their pincers and torches.

Poor David having understood by Abiathar the son of the high Priest all that was past, was pierced with a most bitter grief, accusing himself as the cause of the death of those unhappy ones, and took along with him, him that brought him this sad news, using him as his own brother. He perceived well, that the spirit of Saul was wholly envenomed, and in despair of remedy, he saued himself in the cave of Adulla, where he thought he had been hid from the eyes of the whole world. But his father and his brethren flying the persecution, ceased not till they had found him therein, and did wonderfully pierce his tender heart, lamenting for the change of his fortune, because they perceive not any more in him a David triumphant, the object of all the thoughts and discourses of all tongues. But he comforted them, promising not to forsake them, and recommended all that was deareſt unto him, which was the person of his father with that of his mother, to the King of Moab, untill that he knew what it would please God to do with him.

David saves himself in the caves of the desart, whither father and mother go to seek him.

His piety towards them.

At the same time, all the banished, all that fled for safety, and all the miserable betook themselves unto him, unto the number of 400. men, which entrenched themselves in a fortress, going forth every day for to rob, to maintain themselves thereby. In the midst of all these misfortunes, the good Prince kept alwayes in his heart a true love of his Country, and knowing that the Philistims had laid siege before Keilah, he failed not to go to help it, and to deliver it, although this ungratefull City was intended to deliver him to Saul, if he had enclosed himself therein; the which he would not do, having consulted with the Oracle of God, but retired himself to the desart of Ziph, whither Jonathan that burned with a great desire to see him, came to find him secretly, and they were for some time together with unspeakable expansions of heart. This good friend comforted him, and assured him, that he should be King after his father, and for himself he would be content to be his second; which sufficiently witnessed the wonderfull modesty of this Prince, and the incomparable love that he bore to David.

Banished men repaired to him.

The visit of Jonathan, secret and very profitable to David.

But the Ziphims, men for the time that would provide for their own safety, sent their deputies to Saul to advertise him, that David was retired into their quarters, and if it pleased him to follow him, they would deliver him into his hands. At the which Saul was exceeding joyfull, and entred the chase to entrap him, compassing him on every side, and hunting him like a poor deer chased by men and dogs with great out-cries. The danger was very manifest, and David in great hazard to be taken, had it not been for a happy message, it may be, procured by Jonathan, that advertised Saul, that the Philistims had taken the field, and made great waste upon his lands, at which he returned to bring remedy thereto, deferring his former design till another occasion.

In the mean while, David ran from desart to desart, with his troops, and was hardly able to live, which made him have recourse to Nabal a rich man, and that had great means, entreating him for some courtesie for to maintain his people, which had used him with very great respect, defending his house, his flocks, and all his family against the spoilings of robbers. This Nabal, that was clownish and covetous, answered the deputies of David, that he knew not the son of Jesse, but that he was not ignorant, that there were evil servants enough, which were fled from their masters, and that he was not in case to take the bread from his hired servants for to give it to high-way men. This word being told to David, incensed him so much, that he was going to set upon his house for to rob and sack it. But Abigail the wife of Nabal, better behaved, and wiser, without busying her self to discourse with her husband, that was a fool and drunk, caused presently mules to be loaden with provision necessary for the men of war, and went to meet David, to whom she spak with so great wisdom, comelines and humility, that she turned away the tempest, and stayed the swords already drawn out of the scabbards for to make a great slaughter in her house. David admiring the wisdom and goodnes of this spirit of the woman, married her after the death of her husband. It is so true, that a good deed bestowed on a high person in time of his affliction, and when he hath most leisure to consider it, is a seed-sowing which in its time brings forth and bears fruits of blessedness.

The rudeness of Nabal towards David.

The wisdom of Abigail his wife.

A good deed done to a great one afflicted is of much value.

After that Saul had driven back the Philistims he returns to the pursuit of David, accompanied with 3000. men, with a purpose to take him, although he should hide himself under ground, or should fly through the air. And indeed he crept up rocks unaccessible, which were not frequented by any but by wild goats; and as he passed that way, he entred into a cave for some natural necessity where David was hid, with a small number of his faithfullest servants, which failed not to tell him, that this was the hand of God, which had this day delivered his deadly enemy into his hands, and that he should not now lose time, but to cut him off quickly, whilst that he gave him so fair play, and this would be the means to end all those bitternesses, wherewith his life was filled by the rage of this barbarous Persecutour.

David furiously pursued by Saul.

This was a strong temptation to a man so violently persecuted, and whose life was sought by so many outrages. Nevertheless, David stopping all those motions of revenge, resolved in his heart, by a strong inspiration of God, never to lay his hands upon him which was consecrated King, and contenting himself with cutting off the skirts of his coat, he went out of the cave after Saul, and crying with a loud voice, he worshiped him prostrate on the earth, holding in his hand the piece of his cassock, and saying to him, Behold my Lord, my Father, and my King, the innocence of my hands, and do not believe them any more which filled you with suspicions

His generousness in pardoning his enemy, very admirable.

ſuſpicions of poor David: you cannot be ignorant at this time, that God hath put you into my power, and that I could have handled you ill, and by taking away your life have ſaved mine own. But God hath kept me by his holy grace from this thought, and hath preſerved you from all evil. I never yet had any intent to hurt your Majeſty, having always reverenced and ſerved it, as your moſt humble ſervant and ſubject; whiles that you ceaſe not to perſecute me, and to torment my poor life with a thouſand afflictions: Alas, my Lord, what is it that you deſire? Againſt whom are you come forth with ſo great furniture of Arms and Horſes? againſt a poor dead Dog, a miſerable little beaſt? I beſeech the living God to judge between us two, and to make you to know the goodneſs of my cauſe.

The greatneſs and benefit of clemency.

One may avouch, that great and glorious actions of Clemency do never hurt Princes, but that often they do place or keep the Crown upon their heads, God and men concurring to favour that goodneſs that approaches ſo near to the higheſt. Saul was ſo amazed with this action, that he ran to him, and embraced him weeping, and ſaid to him, this is a ſure ſign, O David, which I acknowledge at the preſent, and whereby I know for certain that you muſt reign after me, ſo great a goodneſs not being able to be rewarded but by an Empire. I do pray and conjure you only to have pity on my poor children after my death, and not to revenge your injuries upon them: hereupon he ſwore to him, to deal with him afterwards peaceably.

David goes out of the kingdom, and retires himſelf among ſtrangers.

But as this ſpirit was unequal, and did oftentimes eaſily depart from reaſon for long ſeaſons; David reſolved to go out of the Kingdom, and to betake himſelf to Achiſh King of the Philiſtims: Some may ſeek occaſion to blame his behaviour in this matter, and may think it ſtrange, that he ſhould retire himſelf to the Philiſtims, the ſworn enemies of the people of Iſrael, eſpecially after this reconciliation and oath paſſed between him and Saul. But it muſt be conſidered, that his life was no wayes aſſured within the Kingdom, and that Saul at another time having given ſo ſolemn a promiſe to Jonathan for the ſafety of his friend, yet would have killed him with his own hand: and further, that he was every day in danger to be ſet upon by arms from the other party, with effuſion of blood both of the one and other, and that it ſeemed better to him to avoid the occaſion, then to ſee himſelf perpetually obliged by ſo miſerable a neceſſity to defend himſelf.

Further he conſidered, that he brought his chieſeſt friends into danger, not being able to retire himſelf amongſt them, without making them guilty of treaſon, and expoſing them to ſlaughter: laſtly he found not ſo much ſecurity amongſt other Kings, which having no war with Saul, would have made ſome difficulty in entertaining him, or might have delivered him up, after they had received him, for their own commodity.

This made him reſolve to take his refuge amongſt a Nation, that bore an irreconcileable hatred againſt
1 King. 27. Saul. But foraſmuch as ſome have thought, that he bore arms for Achiſh againſt the people of God, this is manifeſtly convinced of falſhood, by the Text of the Scripture, where it is expreſsly ſaid, that David did invade the Amalekites, and other people Infidels, although that Achiſh perſwaded himſelf, that he would do the like to the Iſraelites, after he had been ſo evilly uſed by his own Nation. But he uſed diſſimulation herein, for to maintain himſelf in good favour with the King, as the Doctour Toſtatus hath very well noted: And this was the cauſe that the great ones of the Kingdom, which perceived this diſſembling of David, would never ſuffer him to be in the Army-Royal, in the day that the battel joyned againſt the people of Iſrael, ſaying openly to the King, that he would betray the party, and would reconcile himſelf with his own men by the price of the lives of the Philiſtims, unto the great diſadvantage of the whole Realm; which was the cauſe that Achiſh gave him leave to depart fairly, excuſing it upon the ſuſpicions which the Noble-men had taken of him.

Saul being in great perplexity conſults with the ſoul of Samuel.

At the laſt, the fatal day of Saul drew near, and he ſaw the Philiſtims which came thick & threefold upon him with the chieſeſt forces of their Empire, he felt the remorſe of conſcience; and the bloud of ſo many Innocents undeſervedly ſhed, ceaſed not to leap up againſt his faulty head. In theſe confuſions of a troubled ſpirit, by the repreſentation of his crimes, he ſought unto the Divine Oracles, to learn what he ſhould do in ſo preſſing a neceſsity. But this unhappy Prince, that had uſed Samuel ſo unworthily in his life, and driven away as far as he could all honeſt men from his councils, for to let looſe the reines of his fury, ſought after the dead in vain, having trod under feet the admonitions of the living.

I have declared in the Maxim concerning the Immortality of the ſoul, the whole diſcourſe about his conſulting with the Witch at Endor, and it is not my purpoſe here to trouble again any Reader with the rehearſal of thoſe things. We may only note, that the ſoul of Samuel, having appeared before that the Sorcereſs could employ the charms of her profeſſion, rebuked Saul for having diſquieted it, and foretold him the routing of his Army, his Death, with that of his Children; at which he was ſo affrighted, that he fell down in a ſwound, having eaten nothing all that day. Whereat the Sorcereſs having pity, and having prepared ſomewhat to eat, was urgent with him to take ſome little refreſhment, which he did, and condeſcended to her intreaties, and thoſe of his ſervants.

He marches againſt the Philiſtims in battel and is overthrown.

After he went from her table, he marched all night, that he might come to the Army, whether it were that he did not firmly believe that his laſt miſhap, or whether he would willingly ſacrifice himſelf, without any contrarying Gods appointment. The next morning he perceived the Army of the Philiſtims wonderfully increaſed, and with full reſolution to fight, and on the contrary the Iſraelites exceedingly weakned, and which ſeemed already to carry the picture of their diſaſter printed in their faces. The enemies gave the onſet with very great violence, & overthrew the van-gard, in which Jonathan was with his two brethren, all which ſealed the laſt proofs of their valour with their bloud and death. The miſerable father ſaw carried away before he died, all that might have obliged him to live, and preſently perceived that the whole body of the Army of the Philiſtims was faln upon him, and yet for all that he had no deſire to retire, not willing to overlive thoſe his misfortunes. He was ill handled by thoſe of the forlorn hope, which ceaſed not to let fly their arrows very thick upon the Troops where he was, and which fell with ſuch violence & multitude, that they ſeemed to imitate the hail in a great tempeſt, which furiouſly beats down the hopes of a poor husbandman. He ſaw his braveſt Captains dy before his eyes, which ſacrificed themſelves with deſpair of better fortune, and although he were wounded with many wounds, and that he had loſt almoſt all his bloud, yet he ſtoutly upheld himſelf, deſiring nothing ſo much as to dy in the bed of honour. But as forces failed him, &

the violence of his adversaries redoubled, fearing lest they had a purpose to take him alive, he commanded his Target-bearer to make an end of him, and to give him his deaths-blow, before he should fall into the hands of the Philistims. The other excused himself wisely, saying, That he would never undertake that against his Majesty, and upon so sacred a person; and that one ought to expect the destiny, and not to prevent it. Then Saul seeing that he could not dye so soon as he desired, neither by the hands of his friends nor of his enemies, suffered himself to fall upon his sword, and made it enter into him, vomiting forth both his soul and bloud, with ragings and griefs unspeakable. The Philistims having found his body amongst the dead corps, took off his armour, and cut off his head, which they carried through the Towns of Palestina, for a pittifull spectacle, making many thanksgivings in the Temple of their Idol for this victory. And not content herewith, they took the body of the King, with those of his three children, and hung them upon the walls of Bethshan, where they were seen, untill the time that certain valiant men of his party took them away by night, and gave them burial. Such was the end of this unhappy Prince, whom impiety, disobedience, love of himself, and the jealousie of State accompanied with his ordinary ragings, threw head-long into a gulf of calamities.

David receives the news thereof.

At the same time that this unhappy battel was fought, David was pursuing the Amalekites, which in his absence had sacked the Town of Ziklag, which was the place of his retireing, that Achish the King of the Philistims had bestowed upon him. He was so happy that he overtook those robbers loaden with their prey, and took out of their hands his two wives Abinoam and Abigail, whom they had taken away. As he came from this battel, a young Amalekite presents himself, and brings him the news of the death of Saul, of Jonathan, and of his other sons; affirming that he himself had stood by at the death of the King, and had helped him to dye, by order which he had received from him, cutting off the thread of his life, and delivering him from those deadly pains that caused him to languish: and for a proof hereof he shewed him his Crown and bracelet, which he presented to David, hoping for a great reward from him.

But this virtuous and wise Prince, as well for conscience sake, as his reputation, took great heed of receiving or manifesting any joy at this accident, but on the contrary, being moved with extream grief, he tore his garments, & put all his Court in mourning, he wept, he fasted, he made funeral Orations for the honour of Saul and Jonathan, and set forth lamentations which caused as great esteem of his virtue, as they moved pitty to his Country. Not content herewith, he caused the Amalekite that brought him the news of the death of Saul, to dye by Justice, which he himself had helped to confirm (according as he had avouched) by obedience and compassion, not enduring that he should lay hands upon a King, for to take away his life from him, by any pretence whatsoever that he could alledge.

It seemed that after the death of this unhappy Prince, David should forthwith have taken possession of all his estates, but wisdom hindred him from proceeding herein so hastily: They knew that he had not assisted at the battel for to help his people, that he had retired himself into the hands of the capital enemies of Israel, and many might very justly think, that he had borne arms for Achish, which might diminish much the great opinion that they had of his virtue. Further also, although that Saul was not so much loved in his life-time, yet his death might very well have defaced that blemish of hatred that many had conceived against him. They considered that he had sacrificed himself with his three sons for the publick safety, and had spared nothing for his Country. They had pity on the evil usage that the Philistims had done unto his body; his former good actions in time past, the dignity of a King, his laborious life, and tragical death, did quell all the envy that any could have at his fortunes.

Hence it was that Abner his chief Captain, who was a man sufficiently upright, would not lose any time, but seeing there remained yet a son of Saul named Ishbosheth, aged forty years, although he was but of little courage, and as little understanding, he made him presently to come into the Camp, and caused him to be declared the true and lawfull Successour of the estates of Saul, not so much for the esteem that he had of his sufficiency, or for the love that he bore him, as intending to reign by him, and over him. All the people gave unto him the oath of Allegiance, except the kindred of Juda, from which David was sprung, which gathered together in favour of him, and crowned him King in Hebron, where he reigned about seven years, before he possessed the whole power of the Empire.

The Kingdom of Judah was then one body with two heads, the house of Saul and David clashing against each other, not so much by the inclination of the Masters, as by the ambition of the Favourites and Servants which would reign at their costs. The Kingdom divided by the ambition of the favourites.

Abner was high and courageous; Joab also the chief Captain of David, stern and violent, which would gain the favour of his Master by devouring him, in the which he did not succeed well, for that the spirit of David was not so feeble as to comply with such behaviour; and it was nothing but necessity which caused him to pass by many things. Joab and Abner do seek for the government.

These two chief Captains full of jealousie, the one over the other, meeting together at the Fish-pond of Gibeon with the chief of the Nobility, Abner began first and demanded a combat under pretence of play; unto whom Joab which had no need of a spur, easily consented. Presently one might see the young men of each side nimbly to bestir themselves, whose fingers did itch to be at it, and did not fail quickly to surprise one another. The sport growing hot, by little and little came to a full combat, and at last to a battel where many remained dead upon the place. Their combat.

Joab's party was the stronger, and that for twenty which he lost, he killed 360. of Abners men who was constrained to retire himself.

But Azael the brother of Joab a nimble runner followed him lively with his sword at every turn ready to wound him, the other which had no desire to slay him, being not ignorant that if it should come to that, it would prove the seed of an irreconcileable enmity between him and Joab his brother, prayed him twice to depart from him, and to content himself with the spoil of some other, without being ambitious of his. Azael would not hearken unto him, but desired to make himself famous by getting the better of the Captain of the Army. At last he seeing him insolent unto that extremity, turned back and struck him through with his Launce. Joab and Abishai his two brethren incensed with that his slaughter, followed Abner with all their force, who saved himself upon a hill, where a great squadron of the family of Benjamin encompassed him, and cryed with a loud voice unto Joab, saying, Shall the sword devour for ever? and would he make of a sport so The death of Azael by his rashness.

deadly a tragedy, as if he were ignorant that it was dangerous to drive them to despair? Joab caused a retreat to be sounded, making a shew to do that for courtesie, which he agreed to for necessity.

The disagreeing of Abner and Ishbosheth.

Abner laying aside his warlike humour, fell in love with a Concubine of Saul named Rispah, which was a woman well bred and of good courage. Ishbosheth was offended thereat, for that he had done this without telling him of it. But Abner for one poor word spoken to in a very mild manner, entred into a rage against his King, and said that it was to use him like a dog, to quarrel with him for a woman, after so great services as he had done for the Crown, reproaching his Master, for that he held both his life and his Kingdom of him. But seeing that he used him in this manner, he would take a course with him, and would translate the government from the house of Saul to that of David.

The insolence of Abner.

Masters should not give too much authority to their subjects.

The poor Prince held his peace, and durst not answer one word only to this bold fellow, which was a pitiful thing to see him thus devoured by his own servant. The houses of Great ones are very often filled with such servants, who having been honoured with an especial confidence of their Master in the administration of their affairs, whether they be their Receivers or Stewards of their families, take upon them authority, & not contenting themselves to govern the goods, enter upon the right of their Lords, leaving them nothing, but a name and shadow of the Power, which is due unto them.

He treateth with David.

Abner grew so hot with anger, that he dispatched his Messengers to David to desire his friendship, and promiseth him to bring the whole Kingdom of Ishbosheth into his hands. David answered, that he was content to make peace with him, so that he would cause his wife Michol to be restored him, who they had married to another after his departure, which was readily agreed to him, for they took her away from the hands of her husband that followed her weeping, this woman with her lofty spirit had some pleasing behaviour, wherewith Davids affection was taken.

In the mean while Abner powerfully sollicits the people of Israel to betake themselves on Davids side, shewing them that God had committed their safety and rest into his hands, and that it was he wch should unite together all the families under his obedience, for to compose a Monarchy, which should become happy to his people, helpful to his friends, and terrible to his enemies. This discourse did very much shake the principal ones of the Nation, which were not ignorant of the final hopes that were in the person of Ishbosheth, which was disparaged both by nature and fortune. This stout Captain following the business, came to meet with David in Hebron, who made him a feast hearkened unto his propositions, and conducted him back with honour.

Joab's jealousie over Abner.

Joab who was at that time absent, at his return quickly understood of the coming of Abner, whereat he entred into a furious jealousie, fearing lest David should be of the humour of those, wch delight more in making of friends, then keeping of those that are made, and that the friendship of a man which seemed to draw a whole Kingdom after him, might much prejudice his fortunes. He enters roughly into his Kings chamber, telling him that this was but a deceiver, which came but to spy out his secrets, and to do him some ill turn, that he should lay hold of him, seeing he was come under his power. And for that David answered him nothing, seeing him in a hot anger, he went out furiously, and without authority sent a message to the chief Captain Abner, to entreat him to return to Hebron, under colour of treating more fully with David. He lightly believed it, and came back the same way, when as Joab that lay in wait for him, took him treasonably and killed him at the gate of the City.

The death of Abner.

David was indeed very much perplexed hereat, & uttered grievous curses against Joab, and his whole race: nevertheless, as the wisest did judge, that there was a great interest in this death, and that his chief Captain had become the executor thereof, this made some to think, that there was some design, & though that suspition was false, David did all that he could to deface the blemish thereof, assisting at the funerals of Abner, very near to the corps, protesting against the cruelty of those that had taken his life from him, and highly setting forth the praises of the dead: yet he caused not process to be made against Joab, conceiving that he was not able to destroy him, in such a time, when it was dangerous to provoke him. Nevertheless, he kept the resolution to punish him even to his death, but Joab contemned al upon the confidence that he had that none could go beyond him, and measured his own greatness by the impunity of his great offences.

David tolerates Joab in his fault upon necessity.

David cannot be excused upon the treaty made with Abner, if one have not recourse to the secret and over-ruling will of God.

It is hard to excuse David upon this treaty that he projected with Abner, traytour to his Master, if one have not recourse to the secret and over-ruling will of God, or to the right that he pretended to have to the Crown, in consideration of his first anointment made by Samuel. He knew that the Edicts of his royal dignity were written in heaven, and for this cause without endeavouring by any criminal way, he expected the work of Providence, and applyed himself to the events, for without any thought of his, Ishbosheth King of Israel was slain by two murtherers Rechab and Baana, which kill'd him as he slept upon his bed at noon-day, and brought his head to him, at which this great King was so highly incensed, abhorring this barbarous act, that he condemned them presently to death, and after he had caused their heads and feet to be cut off, he made them to be hanged at the fish-pond of Hebron.

David absolute by the death of Ishbosheth son of Saul.

The death of Ishbosheth the son of Saul, ended the difference which was between the two Royal houses; and the other families yielded themselves to David, by an universal consentment. It was then that he began to reign absolutely, and to make to appear, as in a glorious light, the admirable qualities, and Royal virtues, wherewith he was adorned. And it is certain that of all the Kings of Juda, there was none hath equalled him in all kind of perfections. He was one that feared God without superstition, religious without hypocrisie, valiant without any sternness, liberal without reproaching it to any one, a good husband without covetousness, stout without insolency, vigilant without unquietnesse, wise without subtlety, courteous without looseness, hũble without cowardliness, chearful without too much familiarity, grave without fierceness, and kinde without any complement.

The Royal qualities of David.

His zeal to religion.

He united all those things together which ordinarily make Princes great, & proved in each of them so advantageous, as if he had been endowed with that only quality. Above all, he shewed himself all his life very zealous for religion, and wonderfully affected towards divine things. He removeth the Ark of the Covenant with great & stately Ceremonies, he prepared infinite treasure to build the house of God, he cõposeth Hymns for his people, which have astonished all ages, and which serve for perpetuall springs of devotion in the Church. He ordained the Quires of Musick & singers, wch have prescribed the law of praiſes in conſort for all Nations. He perfectly honoured the Prophets and Prieſts, mainteining a very great intelligence with and amongſt them.

His valour and his wars.

All theſe exerciſes no ways diminiſhed in him actions of valour, he overthrew the Philiſtims in two great battels: he made war on every ſide; in the Eaſt againſt the Moabites and Ammonites; in the Weſt againſt the Phœnicians; on the South againſt the Amalekites, the Arabians, and Idumeans; in the North againſt the Syrians, the Sabeans, and Meſopotamians, and was happy in all his enterprizes. Beſides this he made leagues with the Kings his neighbours for the benefit of commerce, gaining them all either by friendſhip or ſubduing them by force.

His juſtice and good husbandry.

He rendred Juſtice exactly to his Subjects, he favoured Arts, he enriched and fortified the Towns, he made himſelf ſtately Palaces, and drew the Kingdom of Juda out of ſervility, which had not yet known what magnificence was; he was honoured by the great ones, beloved by the Prieſts, admired by the wiſeſt, and as it were adored by all his people.

His vices. The love of Bathſheba.

But as all light in mortal things hath its ſhadow; God ſuffered him to fall into a great offence, which ſerved to humble him, and cauſed verymuch trouble in his houſe. His mind being looſed from the cares of war, and buſineſſes, had too much inclination to the fleſh, more then it uſed. He was ſleeping upon his bed, and being awaked in the afternoon, he walked on the top of his houſe upon the covering made in platform, and delighted in the fair proſpects that he had from his Palace, from whence de deſcried a woman that bathed her ſelf in her garden, he enquired of her name, her kindred, and her qualities, and became in love thereby, ſends for her to his houſe, and had company with her.

How dear did this unhappy caſt of his eye coſt him! and how many damned are there, that ſhal one day bewail with eyes of fire the concupiſcence of their fleſhly eyes! This fountain where Bathſheba waſht her ſelf, ran with flames and poyſon, which entring by the ſenſes of a Prophet, empoyſoned his heart, blinded his reaſon, infected his thoughts, and overthrew his whole ſoul. This creature was neither Bear, nor Lion, nor Goliah, nor Philiſtim, and yet ſhe overthrew in a moment, him that made but a ſport of Bears, which conquered Lyons, ſubdued Goliahs, and marched over the heads of Philiſtims. All conſpired unto the miſhap of poor David, the ſeaſon, the hour, the ſleep, the ſolitarineſs, the proſpect, the object, a woman very fair; and ſmoothly compoſed; for it ſeemed that this unlucky one did ly in ambuſh and made it her glory to triumph over a Saint and one of the valianteſt men that was at that time upon the earth. Perhaps ſhe would only have given an occaſion of love, but not have taken; had ſhe been like the Sun, that ſcorches all here below, and yet remains unto ucht in the midſt of his flames. When one doth more then he ought in this blind paſſion, he goes further then he thought.

Paulus Oroſius l. 1. Cecidit regnum ab Alexandro redemit.

It is a great temptation to a woman to be beloved of a King. Cleophis by this means gained a Kingdom in a night. Bathſheba looked more upon the greatneſs, then the pleaſure. When love & ambition blow at the ſame time in the head of a woman, ſhe hath two great Devils to fight with. She might honeſtly have refuſed this viſit, ſhe might have deferred it, have gained time, and turned aſide the occaſion. There is no need ſometimes but of a ſpiders web, to beat back the darts of love, that at other times the Ramparts of Semiramis are not ſtrong enough againſt it. But ſhe was ready to ſell, and to yield, that had already laid aſide her honour, with her attire. She failed not ſpeedily to ſend news to David that ſhe had conceived; and that her husband having not ſeen her, might very well conceive that that was none of his doing.

The death of Uriah.

The honour of this loſt creature muſt now have a cover: the King ſends for her husband, under ſome other pretence; he comes from the Army; he is very kindly entertained; they are earneſt with him to go take his eaſe at his houſe, and to go to ſee his wife: But the good man refuſes it, ſaying that it was not fitting for him to ly in a bed, when the Ark of God and his Captain Joab were under Tents. He lyes upon the ground before the door of Davids chamber, and ſo paſſeth the night, having no other deſire then to return ſpeedily to the army.

The blindneſs of David.

Alas poor Uriah! a harmleſs ſacrifice; thou waſt but too faithful to faithleſneſs, & therefore thou muſt water with thy bloud the loves of thy maſter! David takes the pen, and love dictates to him a bloudy letter, by wch he ſends to Joab, that he ſhould place Uriah amongſt the forlorn-hope, that they might ſo fairly be rid of him, for ſuch was his pleaſure. Uriah carrieth this deadly packet, Joab without enquiring any further, obeys, the innocent is maſſacred; and the falſe liberty of theſe two lovers thinks it is now in ſurety enough. David remains nine months covered with this filth, and this bloud, without coming to the knowledge of himſelf, until that Nathan takes away the veil that thus blinded him.

The carriage of truth coſts dear at the Court

Truth is one of the excelleneſt cõmodities that is in all nature, but the carriage thereof caſts dear, wch makes that many will not take it up to bear, eſpecially when there is any queſtion about carrying it into a Kings Palace; one ſaith that it is not yet time; another, that it will not be uſeful; others, that it is of no great force obliging. One will daub over buſineſſes, another ſeemes to make a conſcience, one ſtudies for reaſons, where little is to be found, for to pleaſe the humours of great ones, but there is danger, that thoſe that would preſerve themſelves by fair-ſpeaking, do not ruin themſelves by flattery.

The Prophet Nathan ſheweth himſelf courageous in this point; for although he was not ignorant, that it was a thing dangerous enough to ſpeak freely to a King, and to a lover, of that which he leaſt did love to hear: yet he reſolved to ſhew David his ſin, and took a very right courſe therein, preventing him with a Parable of a rich man having great ſtore of ſheep, that had violently taken one only Ewe from a poor man, which David finding very ſtrange, judged him worthy to dy.

The other hits him home, and tells him that it was himſelf, that had cauſed poor Uriah to be ſlain, after he had taken his Bathſheba frõ him. He brought to his memory the good things that he had received from the Divine Bounty, even from his infancy, and how by this action he had ill rewarded them, with ſo great ingratitude. Whereupon he declared to him the miſchances that ſhould happen to him, to his houſe and poſterity. David awaking, as it were, out of a dead ſleep, acknowledged his ſin, with a true humility, and ſubmitted himſelf to all the chaſtiſements which it would pleaſe that great Judg to draw forth for his unfaithfulneſſe.

David's repentance.

He entred at that very preſent into great grief for the fault cõmitted, not ſo much for the puniſhment that he ſhould receive therefore, as for the love of his ſo good maſter, accounting it the greateſt puniſhment of ſins, to have offended. He was preſently chãged into another man, he was no more that amorous David, but a penitent exceedingly humbled, a heart bleeding, eyes weeping, a ſad and disfigured face a

a body made thin, ſighings redoubled one upon another, joints pined away with faſtings & auſterene-ſs, a continual avoiding of all Society, of the light and day which reproached him with his offence, and a fixed love of Solitarineſs and Tears: His Harp hanging up knew no more what ſongs of Triumphs meant, and was wholly imployed in expreſſing his griefs. This heart dying to all mortall things of the earth, was upon the coaſts of the ſea of Repentance, which he made to eccho with his groanings, & ſwell continually with his weepings: whereby he fell into a great ſickneſſe, and God beginning the puniſhments of a ſin pardoned, cauſed the child conceived in adultery to dye, and ſuffered him not to bring up any young one of Bathſheba, before he had eſpouſed her by lawfull Marriage.

Puniſhment upon the houſe of David.

A year after, thoſe pitifull Tragedies of his houſe began, which covered it with horrour, and filled his heart with terrours. Amnon the eldeſt ſon of David fell in love with his ſiſter Thamar, a very fair Princeſs, and which was of the mother's ſide as well as of the father's, of the bloud Royal. The more hinderances that he ſaw in that his love, both by his quality, and virginity, and kindred, and the inclination of the maid: the more was his concupiſcence inflamed. This kind of paſſion ordinarily covets that which it ſhould leaſt of all deſire, and that which is can leaſt bring to paſſe. This was a ſubtle poyſon breathed forth by the contagion of the fathers example, which had poſſeſſed the brains of this miſerable one. His burning luſt was that which tormented him moſt. The King his Father goes to ſee him, to take order for his health. There is but one medicine, ſaith he, that could heal him, which is, that his ſiſter Thamar, who hath the skill of making excellent broth, may prepare ſome with her own hand, for to cauſe him to have an appetite. This is very readily granted to him. The poor maid which ſuſpected nothing, is ready to give him content; for the better recovery of his perſon he cauſes all others to avoid the place, and prayes her to ſtay in the chamber for to give him to eat, but without any other counterfeits he takes away the Maſk and declares to her his deteſtable paſſion, at which Thamar, who was a Maid of Honour, conceived as great horrour as could be, alledging unto him, that this was a deed unheard of amongſt the people of God.

But this barbarous one proceeded on to force her, and deflowred her body, without getting the conſent of her minde. The paſſion was no ſooner evaporated, but that he entred into as furious a repentance, not enduring to behold her with his eyes, which cauſed him to remember his heinous crime. He drives her out of his houſe with reproach, where ſhe would have left her life with her honour: her mourning attire, and head covered with aſhes, teſtified the funeral of her virginity.

At laſt ſhe caſt her ſelf under the protection of her brother Abſolon, who was born of the ſame Mother, and rehearſed to him the diſaſtre that had happened unto her. Her brother comforts her, and injoins her ſilence, having in the mean while no vein in his body that did not ſwell to revenge this diſhonour. The report thereof came to the knowledge of the Father, who, remembring his own offence, durſt not cenſure that of his Son; beſides that, he loved him with too tender an indulgency, and feared to grieve him, the which made him ſeem to wink at all that had paſſed, wherein he cannot be excuſed from having committed a great fault, which proceeded from a vicious mildneſſe.

Abſolon ſeeing that David ſaid nothing, continued in great diſſmulation, never complaining of Amnon, but reſolved to do himſelf juſtice with his own hands. And having kept two years his deſign faſt-lock'd up in his breaſt, to avoid all ſuſpicion thereof, he prepares a Royal Feaſt, to which he invites the King his Father and all his brethren: David excuſes himſelf, and the other earneſtly intreats, that his eldeſt brother Amnon might ſupply his place, unto which the Father conſents.

The brethren enter joyfully into the Hall where the banquet was, where the Furies had prepared a bloudy Spectacle, and horrible Sacrifice. Abſolon gives the word to his Servants to take the time, wherein his brother Amnon had already drank plentifully, and to kill him in the middle of the Feaſt, without any fail, ſaying that it was ſufficient, that it was he that had ſo appointed it, and that he would provide for their ſafety. The Wine, the good Chear, and heat did let looſe their tongues to merryment, when as Swords drawn out of the ſcabbards glittered before the eyes of the Gueſts: fear came upon all, but the danger was onely to Amnon, who was ſuddenly maſſacred, his bloud leaping on his brothers table for a juſt revenge of his ſhameſull luſt.

The brethren affrighted get up upon their Mules, and get to the Town, the report mixing falſe with true, brings ſad news to David, and gives him to underſtand that Abſolon had ſlain all his brethren. The poor King caſts himſelf on his face upon the ground, weeping, & all the Court tear their cloaths, and put on mourning. Jonadab in the mean while certifies, that there was none but Amnon that remained upon the place, in revenge of the offence committed againſt Thamar. David returns a little to himſelf, and his other children preſent themſelves before him, affrighted and weeping for that which had paſſed. Abſolon ſaves himſelf in the houſe of his Grand-father by the Mother, the King of Geſſher; where he remains three years, without dareing to ſee the King his Father, who would no wayes pardon that his enteprize.

Abſolon out of favour.

Joab labours very adviſedly to reconcile the Son to the Father, by the mediation of a very diſcreet woman of Tecoah, which came with a counterfeit preſence, and complained to the King, that ſhe being Mother of two ſons, the one in a hot quarrell had ſlain his brother, and that they would conſtrain her to deliver up the other to juſtice, that proceſs might be made againſt him, to the end to extinguiſh all her race. And therefore ſhe intreated his Majeſty to be gracious to ſave her ſon that remained, and not wholly deprive her of all comfort in the world. The which David having agreed to, ſhe declared to him, that he ought to practice the ſame towards his own ſon, which he would have done for one of his ſubjects: that we were all mortall, and that we paſſe away here below as the current of a ſtream, that we ſhould imitate the goodneſs of God, which loves our ſouls, and would not that they ſhould periſh.

His reconciliation by the means of Joab.

As this woman ſpoke with ſo much diſcretion, David was in doubt that Joab had inſtructed her, & made her underhand to act this fine play, the which ſhe affirmed, & ſo much gained the heart of David, that he gave full permiſſion to Joab, to fetch back the baniſhed to his houſe, although it was for the ſpace of 2 years without ſeeing him. Abſolon grew ſo melancholick, by his being ſo far from the Court, without ſeeing the King his Father, that having oftentimes ſent to Joab to put an end to his buſineſs, ſeeing that he would not come to him for friendſhip, he cauſed his corn to be ſet on fire, to make him come for anger, for the wch he excuſed himſelf & entreated him him to ask of David in his behalfe, either that he might dye, or that he might have leave to see him.

Absalom's revolt.

This good father could no longer dissemble the movings of nature, but having sent for him, he embraced him, and gave the kiss of peace, and re-establishes him in the court. The spirit of this Prince was lofty, tempestuous, movable, which could not contain it self any longer within the bounds of obedience. For the space of the five years of his removall from the Court he had leisure enough to bite the bridle; and as it is credible, he had projected already the design of reigning, his ambition seemed to him sufficiently well founded: Amnon his eldest brother was dead, Celeab the son of Abigail, the second of his brethren, made no great noise, he saw himself under-propt on his mothers side, by the King of Gesher his grand-father: This was a Prince well made, upright, pleasing, courteous, liberal, secret, courageous, and capable of great undertakings. He saw his father upon the declining of his age, who had lost very much of that vigour testified so many times in his battels. Adonija was too much a fondling, and Solomon yet a childe and not able to oppose him. He conceived that the Empire could not slip out of his hands: And indeed there was great hopes for him, if he had had so much patience to stay for it, as desire to command.

His designs.

He made too soon to appear what was in his mind, causing himself to be encompassed when he marched forth with souldiers, and a guard, which was a sign of Royalty. Further also, he ceased not to gain the hearts, and secretly to get the good will of all his fathers subjects. He was up betimes in the morning, and set himself at the entrance of the Palace to take notice of all those that had any business to propound to the King. One never saw Prince more prodigal in courtesies, he called them to him, he embraced them, he kissed them, he enquired of their countrey, of their condition, of their suit, and of that their negotiation. He did justice to all the world, and said, that there was no other mishap, but that the King was old and tyred with businesses, and had not a man to hear the complaints of his subjects, and to render them justice, and that if one day he had the charge which his birth deserved, he would give full satisfaction to every one.

By this means he made himself conquerour of hearts, and traced out great intelligence throughout the Provinces, guiding himself by the counsels of Achitophel, who was the most refined spirit, the best dissembler, and most pernicious that was in the whole Kingdom: David did not sufficiently watch over the actions of his son, and the secret workings of this evill Counsellour; the evil increased, and their party was already framed: Absolon asketh leave of the King his father to go to Hebron under pretence of performing a vow, but with an intent to proclaim himself King. That which he desired was granted to him, he marches under this coverture with a train and splendour, carrying many people with him, and sacrifices to offer. He gives order in the mean while to all his confederates, that at the first sound of the Trumpet, they should march forth into the field to go to meet him, and to bring him all the Troops that they could gather together.

Absolon caused himself to be proclaimed King.

All this was readily performed, and without further dissimulation he declared himself, and caused himself to be crowned in Hebron: the news came quickly to David, which brought him word that his son Absolon was revolted against him, and had got possession of Hebron, and that all the forces of the Kingdom run to him.

A great example of the weakness of mans spirit, when it is left by God.

Here one may see a great example of the judgment of God, of the weakness of a man left to himself, as also, the beams of an high and profound humility. To speak according to man, all that David did in this encounter of affairs, was low and feeble. He might have taken the field with the Regiments which he had, which amounted at least to 6, or 7000 men, and have unwoven this web of conspiracy, at its springing forth. And if he had not perceived himself strong enough, he had sufficient means to maintain himself in Jerusalem, to entrench and fortifie himself there, and to tire out those spirits of his Rebels. He might have entertained him with good hopes, promises, and treaties, and have cooled this first heat, by rallying by little and little the affections of his subjects to his own party. And if he had conceived his affairs to be in ill plight, he should have been the last that had taken notice of it, after the manner of those great Captains, which carry hope in their faces, even then, whe they have despair in their heart, to keep together their troops in their duty.

But this poor Prince at the news of this Rebellion, talked of nothing but flying, & leaving his chief City, and saving himself in the by-paths of the wildernesses: he is the first that goes forth without a horse to ride on, on his bare feet, his head uncovered, with tears in his eyes, affrighting all the world, & left ten Concubines to keep his palace, which was very ill advice according to the world, for what could these women do being forsaken by men and strength, but only to prostitute themselves to the soldiers, & yield up all the honour they had left, as a prey to them?

Whence this small courage came, when David proceeded.

Further also, he sent back the Ark of the Covenant which Zadock and Abiathar had brought into his camp, which might have put very much courage into his army, & obliged it to defend a thing so honourable & so precious to this nation. Whence do we think then, that this ordring himself, in a king, to whom neither valour was wanting, nor wisdom, nor experience but only that he saw clearly that this calamity was an ordinance of God, wch had been foretold by the Prophet Nathan? and in pursuit whereof, this virtuous Prince had no other thought then to suffer the work of providence, and to submit his whole heart, in the ful extention thereof, to the chastisement of his judg, and to kiss the rods which beat him. He marched like a penitent and not like a captain, he adored the judgments of God upon him, he enlarged his pains going a foot, & that bare-foot, to exalt the justice of his sovereign Master: He esteemed himself unworthy to look upon the Ark of the Covenant, & used himself with all kind of rigour, to honour the design of Heaven for his abasement. This is the cause that he endured all, & complains of nothing, bearing with a deep patience the enraged tongue of Shemei, who seeing him in this estate, in which the most barbarous would have pitied him, persecuted him with bloody injuries, and went about to have stoned him: Abishai offered himself to have cut him in pieces at the present, but David sharply reproved him for it, & would that they should suffer him to exercise his rage at his pleasure, not being ignorant that all which happened to him was designed from above. He contented himself with saying. If God will be merciful to me, he will call me back, & make me to see again his Ark and his Tabernacle. But if he cause me to know that I am not fitting any more to please him, nor to serve in the estate of a King. I am ready to obey all his pleasure, seeing it belongs to him to do whatsoever he will with me. These words alone were more worth then all crowns, and brought him again into the favour of God, by bearing that his affliction with so great humility.

The patience of David towards Shimei.

His great humility and humble words.

In

The pernicious counsel of Achitophel.

In the mean while Absolon entred into Jerusalem without resistance, with his pestilent Council of State; Achitophel, which, the surer to engage him in the war, and an irreconcileable hatred against his Father, gave him most detestable counsel, and which could not have been inspired but from the blackest of the bottomless pits; he perswades him to abuse all the Concubines that his Father had left in the Palace, the which this disloyal Son would execute, most erroneously causing a pavillion to be set up in the sight of all the people, & going publickly thereinto to accomplish all his incests. Behold the politick wisdom of this mischievous servant, whom they esteemed as a God in counsels: who is there that saw not; that this action, besides that it drew upon Absolon the wrath & vengeance of God, made him odious & abominable to all his people, & to all those which had any feeling of Religion or publick honesty.

The wisdom of Chushi the servant of David in the council of Absolon.

After he had begun so villanously, he assembled his Council, for to give order for the affairs of the warr. Achitophel counselled him to take twelve thousand men of the best exercised, to pursue his Father the same night, and to take him in that disorder and wearinesse, and to make him away, assuring him, that if that one man alone were down, all the Kingdom would be for him. In this private council there was by good chance one wise man named Chushi, a secret friend of David, and his confident, which was come to join himself in appearance to Absolon's party, closely to counterpoise the counsels and authority of Achitophel. He saw well that if God had permitted the execution of this first advice, that David had been lost without any recovery: this was the reason, that after he had insinuated himself into the heart and friendship of Absolon, testifying that from henceforth he would serve him with the same fidelity that he had done to his Predecessour; he declared unto him, That they should do nothing hastily, for that his Father was an old Captain which knew all policy in warr, and that he had still in his Army men full of counsell and valour, that he should not rouze up the Bear in her wood after he had robbed her of her young ones, and that despair is a valiant piece in warr, that it stood not with his honour to give battel, unless he were assured of the victory; for that, If at his first encounter he should have the worst, yet disadvantage would be of dangerous consequence, able to abate the courages, and put the whole Army to a rout. But if he would stay awhile, the people would gather together about him in a great number, as the sand on the Sea-shore, and that he being in the midst of so mighty an Army might overthrow the Cedars, and pull up Towns by the roots, without any body being able to resist him.

This Counsel was rellished and preferred before the first, whereat Achitophel entred into such a rage, that he suddenly went forth of the Chamber, and retired himself to his house, where, after he had disposed of the estate of his family affairs, he took unto himself an unlucky cord and strangled himself, by the most manifest justice of God.

After which, Absolon seeing himself sufficiently well accompanied, passes ouer Jordan, takes Amasa for his chief Captain, and intends to give battel to his Father. David which had had a little leisure to recollect and fortifie himself, takes courage again, divides his Army into thre parts, names Lieutenants and Captains, and appoints three for Chief, Joab, Abishai, and Ittai. He would also, have been himself in the Encounter, but his Council beseeched him to retire, which he did after he had encouraged his people to do their duty well: but above all, that in case they should gain the Victory, that they should guard his Son Absolon without doing him any hurt.

Absolon gives battel to his Father where he is overthrown & killed.

This being done; the Trumpets sound, and the Armies approach. David's people enter into the field of the Battel, as Lions, their Masters good cause gave them such confidence. It seemed that the victory that day had taken a pledge to follow their Colours, and that it was enough if they did but shew themselves to conquer. The Rebels tormented with the affrightments of their conscience, and which had not such entertainment as they were promised, first were put into disorder, after to flight, and then to a rout. It seemed that on the one part, there were men that came to kill, and on the other, sheep that came to be slain. As soon as they were mingled the one amongst the other; the sword on the one side made great Massacres, on the other, the falls & tumblings headlong carried them away, in such manner, that there remained twenty thousand upon the place.

The death of Absolon.

Absolon taken with a great astonishment, is left by all the world, and betaking himself to flight, gets up upon a Mule. It happened that passing through a Forest, his head was catched, and wreathed within the branches of a Tree, insomuch that his carryer having left him, he remained hanging between heaven & earth, where he made a very fitting amends both to the justice of God, and the goodness of his Father: Joab had notice thereof, who nevertheless although David had forbidden, stroke him through with three Darts, and when as yet he seemed to have life, ten young Souldiers of the Troups of Joab ran to make an end of him; he feared so much that if he should return into favour and authority, lest he should take vengeance upon him, because he would not follow his party. The body was interred in a pit under a great heap of stones, for to convince the vanity of him, which had caused a stately Monument to be built for himself, which he called Absolon's hand. Behold an horrible end of an evil Son and a rebellious Subject, which is sufficient to make posterity afraid throughout the revolution of all ages.

While all this was doing, David enclosed in a little Town, expected the event of the battel, and and when as the Posts brought him the news of the Victory, he shewed not so much rejoycing as fear: asking every moment in what estate his Son Absolon was, which caused that diverse durst not bring him the news of his death, seeing the trouble of his mind. At last Chushi uttered the word, and said, That they should desire Absolon's end to all the King's enemies. He understood well what he would say, and was pierced with so violent a grief, that he could not be comforted, losing all courage, and crying every moment, Absolon my Son, my Son Absolon, Oh that this favour had been done for me, that I might have dyed for thee! Every one cast down his eyes for pitty, and the whole victory was turned into sorrow, the Palms and Laurels were changed into Cypress.

Joab's insolency.

Joab alwayes bold and insolent towards his Master, instead of receiving reproaches for his fault, casts them upon David, and thinks that the means to justifie himself, was to speak the more stoutly. He enters into the Chamber of his King, and reproves him sharply, saying to him, That he would put to confusion all his good Servants that had that day saved his life, his house, and all his estate; That he was of a strange nature, and seemed to have been made for nothing but to hate those that loued him and to love those that hated him: That it was very clear, that he bore no good affection to his his Captains, and good Souldiers, and if they all had perished to save the life of one rebellious son, he would have been very well satisfied. Further, he swore to him by the living God, that if he did not rise and go forth to see and entertain those that returned from the battel, that there should not remain one man only with him before the morning, which would prove a greater displeasure to him, then ever he received in all his life. He presseth him so vehemently, that the King without daring to answer him one word, rose up, and did all that he would have him.

This great grief diminished by little and little, & the rejoycings of those that came on every side to carry him back to Jerusalem in triumph, gave him no leisure to think upon his loss. He endeavoured to drave to him again all those that had separated thēselves, pardoning all the world with an unspeakable meekness, being ready even to give Joab's place to Amasa that was chief Captain for Absolon.

David's mildness very great.

But Joab quickly hindred this, and kild with his own hand, him that they had purposed for his successour. After that he began to pursue one Sheba a Captain of the Rebels, who was retired into Abela with some remainder of the mutinous, and as he was about to besiege it, and destroy the City for to take him, a woman of discretion and great in credit amongst her people, which had made composition with Joab, caused him to be slain, and threw his head over the walls, to put an end to this whole bloudy war.

The last acts of Davids life.

After this re-establishment of his Estate, David reigned about eleven years in ful peace in continual exercises of Piety, of Devotion, of Justice, and caused a general Assembly of the States of his Realm, where he made his son Solomon which he had chosen, to be confirmed; and encouraged him to build that great Temple, which shōuld be the marvel of the World, whereof he shewed him the platform, the beautyfying and the orders, in the idea.

Two things do a little astonish those which do seek an exact sanctity in this Prince: the first, that he dyed, having unto the last hour a maid of rare beauty by him; and the other, that he recommended to his son Solomon punishments and deaths by his Testament.

But there are that answer to those that may be offended with these actions: That God hath permitted this to make us the better to relish and admire the perfections of his Evangelical law, whereof the Word incarnate was made the Law-giver, and bringer, above all the excellencies of the presents and virtues of the Mosaical law. And that one ought not to expect from David the chastity of a Saint Lewis, nor of a Casimire; but that one ought to measure things according to the manner of the time, according to the law and custom. Nevertheless I should rather say, that the plurality of women was not an offence, seeing that it was approved of God: so that it caused not a weakning of the vigour of the spirits and mortifying their divine functions by too much commerce with the flesh. David sinned not in causing the Shunamite to ly besides him, seeing that she was in the place of a spouse, and approached unto him not for the pleasure which his great age had totally extinguished: but for the entertainment of his Royal person. Lastly, there are other actions that do set forth his virtue, besides this which is more worthy of excuse then blame.

And forasmuch as he ordained by his testament, the death of Joab & of Shimei, this doth something trouble those spirits which have an inclination to mildness; they say that Joab was his kinsmā, his faithful servant, the best of his Captains, the chief Commander that had followed him from his youth, accompanied him through infinite dangers, and upheld the Crown a thousand times shaking upon his head. He never medled in the factions that were raised against the King; he was always the first that dissipated them by the vigour of his spirit, resolution, counsel, of his Arms, and of his Sword. If he slew Abner, it was in revenge of his Brother which the other had slain. If he stabbed Amasa, it was the chief Captain of the Rebel Absolon, whom they would have put in his place, for to lay then great faults of the State upon him. if he spoke freely to David, it was always for his good, and for his glory; in the mean time at his Death he recommended him to be punished, after that in effect he had pardoned him all his life.

But to all this I say, that the last actions of so great a King, are more worthy of honour then censure. The punishment of Joab proceeded, not from a passion, but from a Justice inspired by God, which would satisfie the voice of bloud, the which cryed still against the murders cōmitted by this Captain. Further also there was a secret of State, as saith Theodoret, wch is, that this Joab shewed himself against the re-election of Solomon, and was ready to trouble the peace of the Realm.

And as concerning Shimei to whom he had sworn that he would not cause him to dy, he kept his promise to him faithfully, abstaining from doing him any evil while he lived, although he was in absolute power for to hurt him: but as his oath was personal, he would not extend it upon his son, and ty his hands, contenting himself to recommend unto him that he should do justice, according as his wisedom and discretion should direct him. It is very fitting that we should think highly of this Prophet; and that we should rather search out the reason of many of his actions, from the secret inspiration of God, then from the weakness of humane judgement.

He lived near upon threescore and twelve years, reigned fourty, and dyed a thousand and thirty two years before the birth of our Saviour, leaving infinite treasures for the building of the Temple, and eternal monuments of his devotion and understanding. It was a special favour to him, that the Saviour would be born of his bloud, and that his birth was revealed to him so many days before it was known to the world. He hath often set it down upon the title of his Psalms, and was in an extasie, in this contemplation, by the fore-tast of that his happiness. Men are accustomed to take their nobility, and their names, from their Ancestours that go before them. But David drew it from a Son which is the Father of Glory, and Authour of Eternity. The industrious hands of men have taken pains in vain, to carve him out a Tomb. Death hath no power over him, seeing that he is the Primogenitour of life. All things are great in his person; but the heighth of all his greatness is, that he hath given us a Jesus.

SOLO-

SOLOMON.

Solomon's entry into the Realm, full of troubles.

Solomon was he that ordered the holiness of the Temple, and yet he can hardly finde place in the holy Court. The love which gave him the Crown by the means of his mother Bathsheba, hath taken from him his innocency. The Gentiles might have made him one of their Gods, if Women had not made him less then a man. His entrance into the Throne of his father was bloudy, his Reign peaceable, his Life variable, and his end uncertain. One may observe great weaknesses at the Court at his coming to the Crown, confused designs, desperate hopes, a Prophet upright at the Court, a woman full of invention, an old Courtier overthrown, and little brotherhood, where there is dispute of Royalty.

David was upon the fading of his Age, and his Throne looked at by his Children, which expected the dissolution of their father. He had taken the authority upon him to decide this question by his commands, not willing to be ruled therein by nature, nor to prefer him whom she had first brought into the world, but him which should be appointed by God, and best fitted thereto by his favours.

Bathsheba fitly insinuates her selfe, and procures the Crown for her son Solomon.

Bathsheba, a subtle woman, that had carried him away by violence of a great affection, and kept her self in her possession, and had more power over the mind of the King, then all his other associates. Amidst the kindnesses of an affectionate husband, which is not willing to deny any thing to her whom he loves; she drew this promise from David, that he would take her son Solomon to be successour in his Estates.

Solomon's infancy pleasing.

This was a little miracle of Nature in his Infancy; and it seemed that all the Graces had strove together to make a work so curiously polisht. His mother loved him with infinite tenderness, and his father could not look upon him without amazedness. He was married at the age of nineteen years: and David, before he departed from the world, saw himself multiplied by his son in a second, which was Roboam.

Aristotle hath observed well, that children which are married so young, do seldom bring forth great men; and this observation was verified in Roboam, who made as many confusions in his life, as he had made rejoycings at his birth. This strengthned Solomon at the beginning, in his own and his mothers pretences.

But Adonijah his brother, which immediately followed Absolon, was before him in the right of Eldership, and promised himself to have a good part of the Empire.

Adonijah competitor of the Crown, and his faction.

The example of that unfortunate brother, which had expired his life in the despair of his fortune, was not strong enough for to stay him, which treading (as it were) in the same steps, went on infallibly unto his last mischance. David endured too long for him; and it seems to him that the greatest kindness that a rich father could do for his son, when he came to die, is to suffer himself to die.

He had sufficiently well knitted his party together, binding himself closely to the chief Priest Abiathar, and to Joab; It seemed to him, that having on his side the Altars and Arms, he was invincible.

The fault of Adonijah in his Council of State.

But in that burning desire that he had to reign, he committed very great faults, which put an end to his life by an event very tragical. He did not sufficiently consider the power of his father, who governed himself by the orders of them in the disposition of their Royalty; and saw not, that to undertake to succeed him without his good will, was to desire to climb to the top of the house without going up by the stairs. His experience might have made him weigh, what the jealousie of an old man may do; who desires the more honour and life, the nearer he sees them to their setting. His reason might have taught him to judge, what the artifices were of a woman beloved, how imperious over a husband. He thought of nothing but climbing, without endeavouring to take away the hinderances which he had about his feet.

Other wayes also he contented himself to have the favour of some without seeking that of others, which it may be, had no great desire to set him forward, but were of a real power to hinder him. There are some which hold themselves offended, because they are not intreated, and which endeavour to hinder a business without having any other reason, but that they were not employed in it. Adonijah contented himself to have Abiathar and Joab for him; but he considered not, that Nathan the Prophet, and Zadock the Priest, and Benaiah the Captain, whom he contemned, were mighty, and able to trouble his pretensions.

Further, for fear lest he should fail in the business, he made too much haste of it, taking into his company, souldiers and a guard, in imitation of Absolon. And when as he should have kept himself, retired and recollected within himself, he opened himself too much, and published his designs, which were like to those pearls, that in stead of a good substance, had nothing but an outward rind.

He made a great feast, to which he invited all his brethren without speaking of Solomon; he called Abiathar and Joab, without making mention of Nathan and Zadock. The one made great chear, and created a King amongst their pots and glasses, whilst that Nathan and Zadock vented all their secrets, and countermined all their designs.

Nathan and Bathsheba's advice.

Amongst these excessive joyes of Adonijah, Nathan plotted together with Bathsheba, declared to her the news of the pretensions of the imaginary King; exhorted her strongly to oppose him, and shewed her the means thereto. They take their counsels together, with a resolution to make the proceedings of Adonijah to sound aloud in the ears of David. It is agreed that Bathsheba should enter into the chamber of the King first; and that Nathan, without understanding any thing of their conference, should winde in, as it were, upon a sudden, and as it were to strike up the business, when as she already had well proceeded in the discourse.

All this was artificially executed, Bathsheba; with many honied words causeth David to remember his promise, represented to him the enterprize of his son Adonijah, and sets forth before him the pitifull handling that she with her dear son must expect, in case that the design of the Rebel should take effect.

Nathan, an eloquent speaker comes in, as if he were amazed, and without shewing that he bore any affection to any party, he laid chiefe hold on the authority and pleasure of the King, which he comes to understand, as the true oracle of the Realm, to conform himselfe thereto, and without falling into passion against Adonijah, he caused him to send his secret intelligences and carriages, avouching, that if he had undertaken

that,

that, without communicating it to him, he makes his proceedings very ſtrange.

This was to intereſt David in the buſineſs, in ſuch a manner, as he failed not preſently to command Nathan and Zadock, to ſet Solomon upon his mule, to cauſe his guard and his old Regiments to accompany him unto Gibeon, and there, without any delay to conſecrate him King, and to give the people to underſtand, that he had choſen him for his lawfull ſucceſſour.

Solomon is declared King.

All this was executed with vigorouſneſs incredible, when as a woman ſo ardent had taken it in hand. And while Adonijah was yet drinking with his confidents, the Trumpet ſounded through the Town, with great out-cries of joy, and unſpeakable clapping of hands. He had thought that all this had been done for him, but Jonathan, the ſon of the High Prieſt Abiathar, put them all beſide this belief, and told them with lamentation, together for their overthrow, what that was which was done, and that Solomon was coming preſently to be conſecrated.

All their hearts failed upon the news of this chance, and they ſeparated themſelves as much as they could from each other, to take away the ſuſpicion of a conſpiracy, which was but too manifeſt. Solomon is brought back to the Palace with ſtrong acclamations, and all the officers and ſervants entring into the chamber of David, gave him a thouſand benedictions for the choice that he had made, wiſhing to the new King all the greatneſs and all the proſperity of his father.

Adonijah ſaw well that he was gone too far, and fearing leaſt Solomon might make the firſt trial of his power at the coſt of his life, he fled unto the ordinary refuge, taking hold of the horns of the Altar, and entreating Solomon for his life, who gave it him upon ſuch condition, that he ſhould keep himſelf within his duty, and would not ſpot a day ſo glorious for him by ſhedding the blood of his miſerable brother. Joab and Abiathar diſſembling their intelligence with Adonijah, ran to worſhip as well as others, him, whom willingly they would have devoured, ſeeing that their ſafety conſiſted at that time in hiding their intention.

The death of David, and the bloudy entrance of Solomon. Adonijah deſired the Shunamite which completed his misfortune.

But after that David had his eyes cloſed up, and that Solomon ſaw himſelf confirmed by the general conſentment of all orders; thoſe waves at the Court, which as yet had made but little frizlings, began to raiſe a great tempeſt.

Adonijah, after he had loſt a Kingdom, endeavoured to get a woman, and goes directly to Bathſheba the Queen-mother, to uphold his requeſt. She was not unwilling to ſee him, fearing that he had ſtill retained ſome bitterneſs in his heart, upon the things that had paſſed: behold wherefore, ſhe preſently asked him whether he came as a friend; to which he anſwered, that all was quiet, but that he had one requeſt to make to her, knowing well the credit in which ſhe was with the King her ſon. The Queen having ſhewed him a good countenance, and a free willingneſs to ſerve him, he opens the matter to her, and ſaith, That ſhe was not ignorant that the Kingdom did appertain to him by the right of Elderſhip, but ſeeing that God had otherwiſe diſpoſed of it, that he did willingly acquieſce, and deſired nothing of the King, but that it would pleaſe his Majeſty, to give him Abiſhag in marriage, that maid which ſerved David his father in his old age.

It is clear that this Prince was good, and of an eaſie nature, that could content himſelf with ſo ſmal a thing, and his requeſt was not uncivil, ſeeing ſhe was but a ſervant, & never the wife of his father, which had no other commerce with her, then to receive the ſervice and aſſiſtance neceſſary for his health.

Bathſheba was very glad that his ambition did here bound it ſelf, and promiſed to ſpeak to the King thereof very willingly, which ſhe did, going expreſly to viſit him. Solomon went forth to meet her, made her very great reverence, received her with moſt courteous entertainment, and having aſcended his Throne, he cauſed another to be ſet at his right hand for his mother, which ſaid to him, That ſhe came to make a very little requeſt unto him, upon which it would be a diſpleaſure to her to receive any denial.

The ſon aſſured her, and ſaid, That ſhe might boldly demand, and that he was no wayes intended to give her any diſcontent. As ſoon as ſhe had opened the buſineſs, and named Abiſhag's name, Solomon entred into great anger, and ſaid, ſhe might have added thereto the Kingdom, ſeeing that he was his eldeſt brother, and that he had Joab and Abiathar on his ſide; and without giving any other anſwer, he ſwore, he would make Adonijah die before it was night: whereupon, he preſently gave order to Benaiah, who ſupplied the office of Captain of the Guard, which failed not to ſlay this young Prince.

Solomon's rigour.

Thoſe that think that Solomon might do this in conſcience, and that one may conjecture that God had revealed it unto him, take very ſmall reaſons to excuſe great crimes, and ſee not that whoſoever would have recourſe to imaginary Revelations, might juſtifie all the moſt wicked actions of Princes. There is not one word alone in the Scripture, that witneſſes, that after the eſtabliſhment of Solomon, this poor Prince did make the leaſt trouble in the State, he acknowledged Solomon for King, he lived peaceable, he was contented with the order that God permitted: for the comfort of the loſs of a Kingdom, which according to the Law of Nations did belong to him, he deſired but a maid ſervant in marriage, and he is put to death for it.

He cannot well be juſtified for the murder of his brother.

Who could excuſe this? I am of opinion of the D. Cajetan, who ſaith, that this command was not only ſevere, but unjuſt; & I believe that hence came the misfortune of Solomon, for that having ſhewed himſelf ſo little courteous towards his mother, & ſo cruel towards his brother, for the love of a woman; God to puniſh him, hath ſuffered, that he ſhould be loſt by all that which he loved moſt. After this murder, he ſent for Abiathar the chief Prieſt, and gave him to underſtand, that he was worthy to die, but foraſmuch as he had carried the Ark of the living God, and had done infinite ſervices for the King his father, even from his youth, he gave him his life, upon ſuch condition, that he ſhould be deprived of his dignity of the high Prieſt, and ſhould retire himſelf to his houſe. The Scripture ſaith, that this was to fulfill the word of the Lord, which had been pronounced againſt the houſe of Ely; but yet it follows not for all that, that this depriving was very juſt on Solomon's ſide, being done without mature conſideration. And although God ordains ſometimes temporal afflictions upon children for the puniſhment of the fathers; yet one cannot nevertheleſs infer from this, that thoſe which torment and perſecute them, without any other reaſon then their own ſatisfaction, ſhould not any wayes be faulty: for otherwiſe one might avouch, that the death of our Lord having come to paſs by the ordinance of God, Pilate and Caiaphas that did co-operate unto this order without any knowledge thereof, ſhould be without offence. As for thoſe that think that the Levites were accuſers in thoſe proceedings, it is a conjecture of their own invention: and if indeed it were ſo, one might yet further reaſon, by what law could the Levites bring accuſation againſt their chief Prieſt? This jealouſie of government is a marvellous beaſt, and thoſe that would excuſe it, find, for the moſt part, that there is no ſtronger reaſons, then ſwords, and priſons, and baniſhments.

Levites

In the mean time the news comes to Joab, that he was in great danger for having followed the party of Adonijah; and as he ſaw himſelf on the ſudden forſaken and fallen from the great credit that he had in the Militia, he had recourſe to the Tabernacle, which was the common refuge, and taking hold of the Altar, he asked mercy and his life. Benaiah the executour of the murther, goes to him by Solomon's order, and commands him to come forth, for which he excuſes himſelf, proteſting that he would rather die then forſake his refuge, which was related to King Solomon; who, without regard to the holy place, cauſed him to be maſſacred at the foot of the Altar, to mingle his blood with that of the Sacrifices. Behold what he got from the Court, after fourty years ſervices; and one may affirm, that if it had been ſometimes a good mother to him, now it acted a cruel ſtep-mother at the laſt period of his life.

The death of Joab.

There remained no more but Shimei to make up the laſt act of the Tragedy; and although David had given commandment for his death, Solomon ſeemed yet to make ſome ſcruple upon the promiſe of impunity that was made to him: and this was the cauſe that he appointed him the City of Jeruſalem for a priſon, with threatning, that if he ſhould go forth thence, and only go over the Brook of Cedron, he would put him to death. The other that expected nothing but a bloody death, willingly received the condition, and kept it three years; until the time that on a day having received news of his ſervants that were fled to the Philiſtims, it came into his mind to follow them, without taking heed to that which was commanded him, which cauſed that at his return, he was murthered by the commandment of Solomon, by the hand of Benaiah.

Behold the beginning of a Reign tempeſtuous; and one muſt not think to find Saints ſo eaſily at the Court, eſpecially in thoſe which have liberty to do what they pleaſe: many things ſlip from them, which may better be juſtified by repentance, then by any other apology. That which follows in this hiſtory of Solomon, is all peaceable and pleaſing, even unto his fall, which may give cauſe of affrightment.

A wonderful Dream of Solomon.

The third year of his Reign, he had an admirable Dream, after the manner of thoſe that are called Oracles. It ſeemed to him that God appeared to him, and ſpoke to him: at the which he was in an extaſie. And ſeeing himſelf ſo neer to him that could do all, he deſired of him with incredible ardency, the gift of Wiſdom to govern his people; the which pleaſed ſo much the Sovereign Majeſty, that not only he gave him a very great underſtanding above all the men of the world, but further alſo added thereto, Riches and Glory in ſo high an eminence, that none ſhould equal him.

His knowledge.

There are thoſe that diſpute here, though beyond their ſight, concerning the learning of Solomon, and would prove that he compoſed Comedies & Satyrs. But although we cannot deny that he was filled with abundance of learning: yet we muſt affirm, that his Political Science had the chiefeſt place, and that all his knowledge of Natural things tended but to that intent, ſeeing that he ſpecified it in his Prayer, that the deſire of Wiſdom that he profeſſed was only for the government of his Kingdom.

Whether learning be profitable for Princes.

And hence we may gather, that Learning is an Inſtrument very neceſſary for the accompliſhment of great Princes, although that the ignorant may conceive otherwiſe. They ſay, that this makes them too lofty, curious, and ſelf-conceited, and that hence they take the boldneſs to reſt upon their own belief, and deifie all their opinions; a great Authority being ſufficiently able to raiſe up a little ſufficiency. They bring the examples of Nero, and Julian the Apoſtate, both which, having ſo well ſtudied, they govern ill, and came to an unhappy end.

But I ſhall avouch to them, that knowledge and judgment without piety is an unprofitable commodity, and ſometimes pernicious to Kings. Hence it is that they take occaſion to move extravagant queſtions, to undertake dangerous buſineſſes, to authorize their faults by apparant reaſons, and to be pricked forward with a conceit which cauſes them to deſpiſe all counſels. Nevertheleſs it is an inſupportable abuſe to blame good things in thoſe, which either have but the counterfeit thereof, or which make an evil uſe of them. I eſteem not Nero nor Julian to have been very learned men, becauſe they had skill in Poetry and Rhetorick, without ever well attaining the knowledge of their principal profeſſion: and if they having learned good precepts among humane Writers, have abuſed them, ſhall one ſay for that, that they are naught, and dangerous for a Prince?

The learning of a Prince defended.

By the ſame reaſon we might condemn the Sun, becauſe that Phaëton burnt himſelf in thoſe heats: and take away the water from amongſt the Elements, becauſe that Ariſtotle, as they ſay, was drowned therein.

Laſtly, we might bring an accuſation againſt Nature in general, and ſo find nothing to be good of all that God made, becauſe it may be corrupted by the wickedneſs of men. But for two or three Princes ſomewhat learned, which have uſed their skill evilly; how many ignorant ones ſhall we find which have done far more cruel and barbarous things then theſe: as, Diocleſian, Licinius, Maximian, Bajazet, and Selim?

Nature hath placed all the Senſes, which are the principles of our knowledge, in the Head, to give us to underſtand, that all the lights ought to be in a Prince, which is the Head of his Realm. The Soul is not more neceſſary for the body, then Underſtanding for a King. He is (as Philo reports) to his people, that which God is to the creature.

And what doth God, but only ſhed forth his clearneſs throughout the whole world, viſible, and inviſible? and what ought a Monarch to do, but to make himſelf the fountain of good counſels that ſhould maintain his eſtate?

What can a Prince do which ſees not but with others eies; which ſpeaks not but by the mouth of another; which hears not, but with borrowed ears; but only loſe his eſtimation in the minds of his Subjects, and yield up his Authority as a prey unto thoſe, that knowing his inſufficiency, take the boldneſs to enterprize any thing without puniſhment?

I confeſs there are thoſe, which having not ſtudied, have a very good underſtanding, which they have poliſhed by the experience of things in the world, and by converſing with great perſonages: but how can we ſay that thoſe are ignorant which know as much as the books, and might ſerve for examples to Philoſophers? their modeſty doth yet make them affirm and acknowledge, that if they had received a deeper tincture of good learning, they ſhould have drawn therefrom the more grace and advantage.

I would in no wiſe that a Prince ſhould be like to Knowledg ought to be moderate.

the Emperour Michael Paripanatius, which had always Table-books in his hand, and a pen, compoſing of Verſes, or making Periods to run ſmooth.

I do not ſo much eſteem ſuch petty ſhews of ſuperfluous knowledg, and ill ordered, in a great one; but to ſee a man at the government of people, which hath laid a deep foundation of true piety, knows the ſecrets of Philoſophy, the beſt purified, is no ways ignorant of Divine and Humane Laws, is skilful in the Hiſtories of all Nations, with very diligent Obſervations and particular applications to his own government. A man that can judge, ſpeak, and act, that can expreſs himſelf with clearneſs and majeſty of words, fitting to his eſtate; this is it which makes him appear as a God amongſt men; which gives him authority amongſt his people, which makes him eſteemed by his equals, feared by his inferiours, terrible to his enemies, and honoured by all the world. It is by theſe means that Auguſtus Cæſar, Trajan, Veſpaſian, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, and ſo many others, whereof Tiraquel reckons up eight and thirty very famous in his Book of Nobility, have attained to that heighth of reverence which hath made them honoured throughout all ages.

The judgment of Solomon on the contention of the two women.

For a proof of this, we ſee the great reputation that Solomon got in judging of the two women, which diſputed whoſe the little infant ſhould be. Both of them ſaid equally, that ſhe was the true mother; the one acted it cunningly, the other proceeded therein with truth. It was needful to know which ſpoke from the heart, and which from the tongue only. Theſe are counterfeits ſo well ſtuft out and neatly coloured, that many able men cannot know, nor are able to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe. Parmeno counterfeited ſo perfectly the cry of a young chicken, that one would have thought that nature could not have ſet out any better compariſon of him. So many skilful men, ſo many gray heads were at that time in the Court of Solomon, which loſt themſelves in this counterfeit, without being able to diſcover it; and when he commanded a ſword to be brought, and to divide the little infant, all the world was amazed: ſome thought his judgment was groſs, that it was cruel and bloudy; but Solomon had ſtudied in the boſome of nature the affections of a true mother. When he underſtood that the one approved of this command, and was urgent that the infant ſhould be divided in two, he drove her away as an impudent one; but when he ſaw that the other was moved and wounded deeply at her heart, and that ſhe cried with a pitiful voice, that they ſhould rather give the infant all whole to that wicked one, then to make two pieces of it; when he conſidered the affrightment on her face, and all the veins of her body ſwelling at this deſign, he pronounced with the voice of an Oracle, that ſhe was the true mother, which was avouched and acknowledged publickly. All the aſſiſtants were ſo taken with this expedient that their King had invented, that they extolled him to heaven, and promiſed themſelves all, ſuch a diſcerning, and equity ſemblable, in their differences. Who doth not ſee then that Underſtanding is the Eye of a Prince, and the light of his people? This reputation of underſtanding, and lofty knowledge of Solomon, was ſpread abroad amongſt ſtrange Nations, and drew the Queen of Sheba unto Jeruſalem. This is a ſtory which hath afforded recreation to divers, that have exerciſed their pens thereupon, and curioſity, throughout the whole world. Every one would baptize her and give her a name; one calls her name Nicaula, another Nitocriſſe, another Maſſeda, and others will have her name to be Candaeſſe. There is nothing more certain in all this then uncertainty, and it is very hard to give her a name without making a lie thereby.

The Queen of Sheba.

And yet can one leſs know that of her husband, nor whether ſhe were a maid or a widow, or a married woman. There is ſome appearance that if ſhe were within the bonds of marriage, ſhe was like unto thoſe Dames that bare rule over their Husbands, and do all that pleaſe them in their own houſe. Her husband was very patient, if it be true which Pineda ſaith, that ſhe ſtayed a whole year at Jeruſalem in Paſtimes, and to propound Riddles. But Claudian that aſſures us, that the Sabeans are governed by women, will make us rather believe that ſhe was free, and without ſubjection. She came from the country of the Sabeans, which make a part of Arabia, and are very rich in gold and perfumes. This is the reaſon that ſhe entred into Jeruſalem with a great train, and ſpared not the riches of her country for Solomon. She propounded many queſtions, whereof the Scripture doth not touch one, which hath given occaſion to many to invent at their pleaſure; & divers have ſet down ſo ridiculous ones, that if the Queen of Sheba ſhould have come ſo far to have learned ſo little, there might be an appearance, that coming loaden with ſo great riches, ſhe had forgot to put in a little Judgment amongſt them.

Her qualities.

Claudian in Eutrop. Leviuſque Sabæis imperat his ſexus.

Women amongſt the Sabeans command over men.

The queſtion of the Queen of Sheba.

That which Baronius ſaith is ſomewhat more credible; that ſhe was of a country where ſhe might learn the Prophecy of Balaam touching the birth of the Meſſias, and that underſtanding afterwards the greatneſs of Solomon, ſhe had a deſire to know if this were not he, whom that prediction looked at. And it is very true that ſhe found the ſhadow of him in Solomon, but not the body; yet ſhe was ſo much amazed beholding only his figure, and viewing the temple of God which was now built after five and twenty years; in conſidering the Palace, the Officers, and the order of the whole houſe of Solomon, that ſhe thought to leave her whole ſpirit behind her in Jeruſalem, having nothing elſewhere able to content her.

Thoſe which do judge of the inclinations of Solomon, do conceive, that all theſe great diſcourſes with a woman, could not paſs without ſtrains of love, and produced him a child by the Queen of Sheba named David, from whom Preſter John is deſcended; but they ſhould have conſidered that Solomon was not yet ſo inclined to women, and it was not likely that he ſhould begin with her, cauſing her to return as one forlorn, which came thither with honeſt behaviour, and of whom the Goſpel ſpeaks honourably.

There are many things in which the Scripture would not content our curioſity, thoſe which would learn more from thence then it hath taught them, are like to thoſe Painters, which account themſelves very brave men, when they have the skill to go beyond nature.

His zeal to the building of the Temple.

And ſo much for that concerns the Wiſdome of Solomon, which cauſed a great part of his miracles. But one cannot ſufficiently commend the Zeal which he bore, from the firſt year of his reign, to the building of the houſe of God. Herein it is that he hath teſtified a ſingular Piety, and a great Wiſdome of a States-man; for to ſay the truth, and to ſpeak according unto the mind of Ariſtotle, it doth much import that a Prince be religious, for that he is thereby the more loved and feared by his people, which do not ſo eaſily offend him, whom they think to be under Gods protection.

Further alſo, he was to content a Nation more religious religious then any other, and greatly ceremonious, which he could not better do, then in causing them to behold so beautifull a Temple, which should be the marvel of the whole Universe.

All men are naturally stirred up with a resentment of a Divinity, and they think that the means to testify their affection and service thereto, is to erect Temples, and offer Sacrifice unto it.

Emulation doth often mingle it self with Religion, and great ones do find their glory, in lifting up that of the Divinity. Pliny makes mention of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, whose length was 425. foot, and the bredth 220. with 137. Pillars made by as many Kings; and saith, that all Asia joyned together to build it, and spent thereupon the space of two hundred and twenty years before it was fully finished. Whatsoever he saith of this Temple, we are obliged to believe that it was not of value with this of Solomon's, which is recommended to us by him to whom it was dedicated, The living God; which had not then upon earth any house but this where he was acknowledged. Further also it is to be prised, by reason of its founders, which were two great Princes: for, its greatness, (which is compared in the Scripture to a City, the number of offices was so great; Allies, Porches, Houses and Divisions) was very great there; and above all, the number of the attendants, which did amount sometimes between seven and eight hundred ministers. Add hereunto the heighth, which was upon the top of two high mountains, the beauty, and the riches which was found there, you will avouch, that it was greater then it is reported. It is a prodigious thing which David saith of himself, in the first of the Chronicles, that he offer'd for this design out of his poverty, a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, which make in all, according to the supputation of our Villalpand, two thousand one hundred twenty and three millions of gold, without comprehending therein that which the people offered freely of their own, which amounte d to seventy one millions of gold, eight hundred and fourscore thousand crowns; and the two sums taken together, make one thousand one hundred ninety four millions of gold, eight hundred fourscore thousand crowns, and all this but to serve for that which should be wrought in gold and silver for the use of the Temple.

Villalp. in Ezekiel. 3. apparat. Paral. 1. 22. Tyrinus bis mille quingentos & 50 aureorum ex eodem Villalpando.

Josephus also in the eighth Book of his Antiquities saith, That there was numbred there fourscore thousand cups, and as many plates of gold, twenty thousand censers of the same material, two hundred thousand trumpets of silver, and forty thousand instruments of musick, fashioned of gold and silver; garments of linnen and surplesses, to the number of ten thousand. Lastly, the whole Temple, from the top to the bottome, and the pavement it self, was covered with plates of gold, fastned together with nails of gold which weighed every one five and twenty ounces.

Josep. l. 8. cap. 3.

To say the truth, some Interpreters of the Scripture have taken that very high, making the value of their monies according as they will, in this great obscurity of those that have written of the diversity of their values, according to the diversity of their Ages and Nations: but one may not doubt of the truth of the Scripture, which raises this Temple to a beighth of magnificence, which exceeds all other works.

After that the House of God was established, Solomon made a solemne Dedication thereof, for the which he sacrificed 22000. oxen, and 200000. sheep. He prayed to God aloud before all the people with a wisdom and zeal unparallel'd. He blessed all his Subjects with an incredible joy; so that the face of Jerusalem that day seemed an anticipated Paradise. He busied himself after in building for himself; he made himself a palace, wherein he spared no thing for gloriousness, with the most sumptuous Kings of the earth. When as the Scripture relates this with a plainness of its style, it ceaseth not to fill our spirits with amazement: and if we had not recourse to the sovereign power of God, which doth all which pleaseth him; we should scarce be able to believe, that the Kingdom of Judea having begun but in Saul, by so miserable beginnings that there was hardly found any iron to make swords of, and that at sometimes there was but two to be found in a whole Army, that it should on a sudden rise to so great an increase, that silver was there as common as stones.

This gives a large entry to all sorts of delights and pleasures of stately Princes of the earth, which Solomon soon caused to enter into his palace; and which ruined him by a far greater disaster, then ever the armies of the Philistims, Ammonites, and Moabites could have done. And as Juvenal said, That luxury had taken room, and had reserved unto it self the vengeance for all the evil usage wherewith the Romans had handled so many Kings and People of the habitable world: So we may say, That the Licentiousness of Solomon did revenge all the injuries of the Nations stirred up against the people of the Jews.

The fall of Solomon.

He which should see a star fall from heaven into the dirt, for to be trodden upon by the feet of men and beasts, after it had shined amongst the celestial globes; would he be more affrighted and amazed, then in considering Solomon thrown down from the beautiful firmament of glory where the hand of God had placed him, into those opprobrious passions, labirynths of errours, and unexplicable confusions?

Solomon that was as high lifted up above other Kings, as Kings are above common men, this man of wonders and miracles, the well-beloved of God, which had wisdom for his spouse, virtue for his delight, happiness for his companion, and glory for the assistant of his throne; to disgrace, by a detestable old age, all the comelineſs of his life, to deface all the rare inventions of his mind, to eclipse all the weak lights of his understanding.

O women, alwayes fatal to the ruine of great men! who will hereafter think it strange that you have changed the Gods of the heathens into beasts, seeing that you have transported Solomon into a monster? It is not almost imaginable into what a gulf of destruction Love plunged this miserable Prince: and that Philosopher Antisthenes said true, that if there were such a Venus as the Poets have made, he would be her hang-man: If there were such a Cupid as they have painted out, he would pull off his wings, and throw him down from the Heaven of heavens, where they had placed him, into the deepest of the bottomless pits, for that this is the frenzy of the understanding, the poison of the heart, the corruption of the manners, and the desolation of our life. O true God! how ought all good understandings, and all persons that make profession of knowledge, of honour and virtue, look upon Solomon, as a mast broken on the top of a mountain, which God hath placed there above to make them take heed of the shipwracks of Love!

The beginning of his debauchedness.

One doth seldome begin wickednesses at the top: vices have their degrees as wel as virtues, Solomon at first began to grow cool in the worship of the true

God, his converſations with him, were not ſo often nor ſo pleaſing, the pleaſures of the world invited him, the delights of the Court charmed him; actions that are too free, ſoon become evil, and evil ones turn themſelves into cuſtom, and cuſtom into an habit. This child of God ſaw the daughters of men, theſe ſtrange beauties which pricked him by their novelty: he became man, and made of them his goddeſſes. The Daughters of the Amorites, and of the Moabites, thoſe of Egypt, of Sidon, of Idumea, and ſo many others, whereof God had forbidden him any alliance, were the Idols of his heart, after they had been the plague and poyſon of his underſtanding.

He which had pronounced ſo many excellent parables againſt love, which had ſo many times advertiſed youth, that the lips of an unchaſte woman diſtilled honey at the beginning, but at the end they gave a potion of wormwood, was taken by the eies, enchained with infinite affections. His love was pompous; his luxury ſumptuous: he loved as much for glory, as for concupiſcence: he would act the King in his unchaſtneſs, as ſtately as in the furniture of his Temple. He had about ſeven hundred women, which were as his Queens; and with that three hundred Concubines, which is according to the account of the Scripture, a thouſand Wives, which he had ſhut up in a Seraglio, for the pleaſures of his eies and of his fleſh: and of ſo many loves, there is but one Son to be found, Rehoboam, void of wiſdom and underſtanding.

What could a Prince do amongſt ſo many delights, ſo many allurements, ſo many charms, and ſo many bewitchings! A man is oft-times much hindred by the troubleſom brain of one woman only: what ſerious buſineſs then could he ſet himſelf to, that had them multiplied by hundreds!

Their Artifice. Theſe ſtrangers came each of them with all the inventions of their Nation, for to ſurprize him: there was one that would gain him to her; another that would keep him; another that would draw him from one ſin to another, even unto the bottom of Hell. It is far more eaſie to become a fool with a woman, then to make her wiſe: he had endeavoured perhaps, to convert them to his Religion, but they perverted him, and drew him to theirs. He took their loves, and afterward their behaviour, and at laſt their Superſtition.

He is perverted in Religion.

Every one of theſe women would bring her god into eſteem; and thought not her ſelf to have any credit in her love, if ſhe did not make her falſe Deity to partake thereof: they made ſuch gods as had no honeſter title then the ſins of debauched women. As ſoon as he had made an Idol for one, he muſt do the like for another: all there went by the Emulation of their brains, weak in reaſon, and ardent in their paſſions. They reckon about ſix Temples built round about Jeruſalem, to the gods of ſix principal Nations. But it was not ſufficient to make theſe gods; they muſt be adored, and preſented with Sacrifices and Incenſe, to content his Loves. And he did not all this in ſhews only, nor diſſimulation; but his heart (as the Scripture ſaith) was wholly turned aſide from the true God; and fell (as Saint Auguſtine ſaith) into the depth of the gulf of Idolatry. What might the admirers of his great Temple have ſaid; or rather the true Worſhippers of the great God? What diſcourſe might ſo many Kings and Queens have held, that had had in ſo high eſteem the wiſdom of Solomon? The report of his Loves and his Superſtitions ran throughout all Kingdoms, as a ſtory unheard of, which cauſed laughter enough to wicked ones, as tears to good people, and aſtoniſhment to the whole World.

The diſſipation of his eſtate. How art thou fallen from Heaven, O fair Star of the morning! Thou faithful fore-runner of the King of Lamps, which wert adorned with the pureſt and moſt innocent flames of the firmament: who hath made thee to become a coal? And who could bury thy lights in a dung-hill?

This lamentable King loſt that great wiſdom that made him eſteemed over the whole world, and became ſtupid, leaving the care of all the affairs of his Kingdom. All thoſe great riches were exhauſted, and caſt, as it were, into the gulf of Luxury. He began to over-charge his people, to maintain his infamous pleaſures, which made all their minds revolt againſt him. The Prophets and Prieſts could not reliſh with him, by reaſon of his changing Religion. All the underſtanding Nobility did abhor him, ſeeing him ſo plunged in his filth. The Commons deſired nothing but to ſhake off the yoak that they could no longer bear. God raiſed him up Rebellions on every ſide, which prepared themſelves to overthrow his Empire. But no man took it ſo much to heart, as Jeroboam, an able and ſubtle man, whom he had advanced, and employed in gathering his Tributes for him. It was he to whom the Prophet Ahijah gave ten pieces of his Garment, fore-telling him, that he ſhould reign over ten Tribes of Iſrael: and that was the cauſe that the King would have put him to death, but he fled into Egypt, and returned under weak Rehoboam the Succeſſour of Solomon: who, deſpiſing the counſels of the Antients, that exhorted him to give his people content, truſted to that of the young ones without brains, which perſwaded him to hold his own, and that the people would not be brought under but by rigour. Which made him to be forſaken by ten Tribes at once, which caſt themſelves into the arms of Jeroboam, who made a change of Religion and State in Samaria, without ever being able, either himſelf, or his ſucceſſours, to bring them unto obedience again. See here how Kingdoms change their Maſters for the ſins of laſciviouſneſs, impiety, and oppreſſions of the people, which are then greatly to be feared, when deſpair hath brought them to fear nothing.

The eſtate of Solomon in the other world. One may ask, for a concluſion, what became of this wiſe Solomon? Whether he died in his ſin? or whether he repented? Whether he were ſaved, or damned? This is a common place that hath exerciſed many excellent pens which have handled this ſubject curiouſly and eloquently. I love not to do things done already: I ſhall ſay only, that we may alwaies take the moſt favourable opinions, which can with any likelyhood defend themſelves in favour of the ſafety of great perſons. There are ſome number of the holy Fathers which ſpeak very openly thereof, and perſwade themſelves that he repented. S. Jerom upon the Prophet Ezekiel ſaith; That although the founder of this great Temple ſinned, yet he was converted to God by a true repentance; and for proof hereof, he alledges the Book of the Proverbs, in the four and twentieth Chapter, that ſaith, Noviſſimè ego egi pœnitentiam & reſpexi, ut eligerem diſciplinam: that is, At the laſt I repented and looked back, that I might chooſe inſtruction.

Although

Although these words are not found in our Bible; as he also draws them from the Septuagint. And to uphold his opinion, he will have Solomon to have written the Book of the Proverbs after his fall, which is very hard to verifie.

And elsewhere also, the same Authour upon the first Chapter of Ecclesiastes saith, That this Book is the repentance of Solomon, according to the Hebrews. S. Ambrose in the second book of the Apology of David, Chap. 3. puts Samson, David, and Solomon, in the number of sinners converted: Erraverunt tamen ut homines, sed peccata sua, tanquam justi agnoverunt. Behold here that which is most formal, without collecting many ambiguous passages. S. Gregory the Great, in the second book of his Morals, Chap. 2. S. Prosper, S. Eucherius, and amongst the Modern, Tostat. Bellarmine, and Maldonat condemn him. Tertullian, Augustine, Cyril of Alexandria, Gregory Nyssen, Isidore, Bernard, Chrysostome, and Rupert, leave this question doubtful and undecided. And to say truly, this is all which can be said modestly and humanely; and also the truest in a matter where there is nothing more certain then incertainty.

Prosp. lib. 2. de praedict. cap. 27. Solomon elatus in senio, fornicatus animo & corpore, Domino ipsum deserente, malè obiit.

For to say that he hath composed the Book of Ecclesiastes after that he was deprived of his Kingdom, and of all the Vanities, is a story of the Rabbins which are little to be believed; further also, this Book is properly a Dialogue of divers men that dispute one against the other, and bring forth good and bad sentences, although the Authour of the Book doth take the good part. To say that which Bonaventure saith, that not one of the sacred Authours was damned; if it be true, the reason is, because they lived well, and not because they have written well. For the kingdome of God (saith Saint Paul) doth not consist in words. To build upon the Promises which were made to David concerning Solomon, if there be some favourable, there are also others that say, that if he leave God, he shall be cast away by God for ever. To alledge that he was buried in the Sepulchre of his father, how many of the damned have had a quiet death, and a stately burial? To bring forth all the kindnesses and favours of God towards him, are but so many reproaches of his unthankfulness.

1 Par. 2. 9.

The argument which is drawn from the negative which they esteem ordinarily very weak, is here too strong for his condemnation. For whence comes it that Nathan his Master and Partizan, who wrote the Books of the Kings, or caused them to be continued by Aziah and Haddo his disciples; whence comes it, I say, that Authours so affectionate to Solomon, so zealous for the honour of their Nation, having undertaken to give us his story, and having forgotten nothing of the least things, even to the numbering of Solomons horses, after they have so expressly spoken of his sin, have not added his repentance? This thing was too much important for the glory of God, for the reputation of their Master, for the edification of their people, for the example of other Kings, to pass it over in silence. Surely we might well accuse them either of great malice, or of gross stupidity, a thing which cannot happen to Prophets which write by the inspiration of God.

Further, who knows not, that repentance ought to be followed by outward actions, and conformable to the movings of the heart? Who will not avouch that it ought to be testified by a renouncing of sins, and all things that have drawn us to offend? Where is it then spoken that Solomon had dismissed one only of his thousand women, which were those nets of his destruction? Where is it written that he destroyed the Temples, and beat down the Images which he had erected at the solicitations of his Mistresses? We know all the contrary, that these Abominations remained standing until King Josiah who caused them to be overthrown. That which causes the more fear, is, that by how much the more a man comes near the great understanding which they attribute to the devils, by so much also he takes the greater part in their punishment, when he falls into any grievous sin. The great lights of these rare Spirits, turned themselves into the flames of their punishments, and their knowledge serves for nothing but to nourish the more the worm of Conscience.

Now as Solomon was advantaged by understanding and wisdom above other men, and that he fell into the sin of Apostacy, and turning from God; there is great danger lest God turned from him his Mercy, which is used more ordinarily towards those that sin by ignorance, although culpable.

Add unto all this, that those which in their old age continue in the sins of unthankfulness which they have contracted by long habits, are very hard to cure, because that old men become more hardned in evil, more despising all admonitions which are made to them, by presuming on the authority which they think is due to their age. Further also, their luxury is not only a sin of the flesh, which then less feels the violence of great temptations; but a spiritual sin, which proceeds from a spiritual and enraged concupiscence, which makes them offend professedly rather then by frailty. He that shall well weigh this, shall find, that it is better to leave to the secret mercy of God, that which one cannot attain by reason; and to fear every thing in this life, even to the gifts of heaven and ones own sureness thereby.

The conclusion touching Solomon's salvation.

JUSTINIAN. CHARLEMAGNE. Or, CHARLES the Great.

PRovidence is an excellent work-woman, which renews yet every day in the world that which God did in the terrestrial Paradise. He took clay to make man the most excellent piece of all the Creatures, and she takes some men of the earth to make them Sovereigns and Demigods in the Universe.

This Emperour that hath filled the world with his brave Deeds, and the Ages with his memory, was of a very base extraction, which served to him as a cloud of glory, & caused a marvellous day to spring out of the deep of his obscurity. The beginning of his Nobility came from his Uncle Justine, who having been born a Cow-herd, mounted by the stairs of Virtue and of Valour even to the Throne of the Emperours of Constantinople. Nature had furnished him with a good understanding, with a body well made and robustuous; and God had inspired into him from his most tender years a particular grace of Devotion, which rendered him good, officious, and charitable, towards all the world. As he was keeping the Cows, he saw passing by some men of war, who were going in an expedition against the Infidels: he perswaded himself that he was very fit for that employment, and stout enough to give good strokes to the enemies of God and his Religion. Upon this thought, he sold a Cow that was his own, buyes a sword, and the rest of the small equipage of a Souldier; bids adieu to his kindred, goes and lists himself, and suddenly (of a Peasant becomes a man of war. Yet Procopius makes him so poor, that he gives him nothing but a little bread in a scrip when he entred into Constantinople. He passed through all the proofs of a long and laborious warfare, in which he behaved himself with an exact discipline, a great dexterity, a courage invincible, and above all, with a discretion that made him lovely, and gained the hearts of all the world. He came to the office of an Ensign, of a Lievtenant, of a Captain of the Guard, of a Colonel, of a General, and in the end was put amongst the Counts of the Court that were the greatest Lords of the Imperial house.

Anastasius at that time was Emperour; happening to die, Amantius his high Chamberlain, who was a very rich, and a great monied man, had a very earnest desire to make himself Emperour. But he was disfavoured by nature, having not been born a perfect man; he thought therefore that he should never be liked by the Militia, in so high a dignity, and would needs make it fall upon Theocritus who was his creature, that he might reign in him, and by him, with a full satisfaction of his whole desires. To this end he opened his treasures, and resolved to make great distributions of mony to the souldiers, committing the managery of the horse-men to the Earl Justin. who he knew was well affected by all the world, and very capable to favour his canvasing. But the men of war looking upon the hand that gave the gold, and not upon the coffer from whence it came, nor the design of him that did it, unexpectedly proclaimed Justin. Emperour; whereto, the Senate and the People shewed a strong inclination, forasmuch as he was most Catholick, & that they feared, lest the Chamberlain and his favorite held yet some of the leaven of Anastasius that was an Heretick.

The Cow-herd being then set upon the Throne of Constantine, Amantius, that had merchandized the Empire, seeing himself so shamefully faln from his pretensions, plotted a mischievous conspiracy against the new Emperour; but he succeeded in it so ill, that his design being discovered, he lost his life together with his complices, after he had lost his honour and his mony. Justin. that was endowed with a great goodness, did not grow proud and scornfull when he was arrived to the top of honours, but having married a woman very mean in her first condition, he caused her suddenly to be crowned Empress, changing her salvage name of Lupicia into Euphenica. He consecrated the beginning of his reign by the return of the Bishops, and of all the honest men which he caus'd to be call'd back from the exile to which the Heretick Emperour had condemn'd them. He caus'd Religion to flourish again on all sides, and expres'd a most ardent zeal to render justice to his people, without sparing himself in the toyls of war, though he was already very aged. He enjoyed the Empire eight or nine years, and being a man extremely humble, he loved his kindred though of base condition; and seeing he had no children of his own, he chose his sisters son to make him his Successour, and gave him even the Crown, before he quitted the Sceptre and the world, after a reign of nine years.

Behold the original of our Justinian, of whom Histories speak very diversly; seeing that the admirers of his actions give him high commendations, and the enviers of his great fortune (who might perhaps have experimented the effects of his severity) have scattered imputations on him in their reviling Histories, that have passed even to this age. But the most understanding men having well examined every thing, put him in the rank of the most illustrious Monarchs of all Christendome.

And indeed, it is a wonder how a spirit extracted from the life and condition of a Shepherds, took so high a flight in the Temple of glory, that having taken in hand all the great designs that may fall into the spirit of a Monarch, he prospered in all with a marvellous success. He maintained his dignity against the most horrible conspiracies that ever set upon an Empire in the revolution of so many kingdoms. He made wars in Asia, in Europe, and in Africa, which he ended by most eminent victories. He recovered Africa out of the hands of the Vandals, he powerfully plucked the Capital City of the World out of the tyranny of the Gothes, he published eternal Books, he erected buildings that remain yet, after they have passed more then ten ages. He encountred the greatest Captains, and the most able States-men that have been ever in the world, in the person of Belisarius and Trebonian. And although that when he took the government of the Empire, he was five and fourty years of age, yet he reigned thirty nine years, God crowning all his good actions with a long continuance, which serves infinitely for the accomplishment of all great designes.

I will tell you in few words his Nature and his Manners, before I come to his deeds of valour, according to the most true relation that I have been able to extract out of Histories, without passion, and not according to the Idea's of Procopius, who hath horribly disfigured him, by a manifest hatred, in his railing History.

This Prince was a man that feared God, and firm in the faith of Christianity; and although he was at certain times surprized with some errours by the artifices of his wife the Empress: yet the Learned men of the West, and Pastours of the East, that have so highly praised him, after his death testifie sufficiently that his spirit was purged of all the wicked beliefs that his Doctours had endeavoured to infuse into his soul, and which he had approved by an excess of a too credulous zeal. Hereticks and Libertines were the object of his hatred and his choler; but good Church-men caused in his soul a certain veneration, and he studied by all ways to assist and protect the Churches and the Hospitals: his Liberalities were extended every where in works of piety by great buildings, and magnificent alms.

He was most chast, contenting himself all his life with her that God had given him for a companion: and his most violent enemies have not been able to tell us one only womans name that hath possessed his heart to the prejudice of his Bed. He could not endure wantonness, and especially that, that brings a shame to nature, which he chastised with most rigorous punishments. He detested and punished by his laws, all those that laid snares to the modesty of Virgins and of Women, to corrupt them.

His manner of life was extreme austere, and Procopius himself, the most cruel of his revilers, acknowledges, that he was most sober, and that he would cause the table to be taken away when he had scarce touched the victuals, seeking nothing exquisite therein, but denying oftentimes to nature even her necessities. He hath seen him, he saies, fast the Lents with such an austerity, that the devoutest of all his people could not reach it, for he would be eight and fourty hours without eating or drinking, and at the end of that he drank nothing but water, contenting himself with a little bread and a sallade; yet he was endowed with a body so well composed, and so happily tempered, that after his long abstinencies, he appeared yet ruddy; from whence it came, that that Calumniatour instead of acknowledging the blessing that God gives in this extraordinarily to some of his servants, said, that he was a Devil and not a Man.

Further yet, he slept very little; and the same man adds, that often an hours repose sufficed him, and that he bewailed the time that he allowed his body. He made long prayers night and day, and employed the rest of his time in his affairs, without admitting any other recreation. Those that have published that he could neither write nor reade, have abused the belief of men, taking the name of Justinian for that of his Uncle Justine; for the Historian his persecutour confesses, that he wrote his Breviats and all his dispatches, without troubling his Secretaries. He was of a most easie access to all the world, and was not offended at the importunities, no nor at the incivilities, that those that were ignorant of the fashions of the Court committed in his presence. He heard willingly the differences of his people, and he himself pronounced the sentence to determine them: his patience was extreme, he never was moved in handling any businesses, and decreed even the most rigorous punishments with a cold visage, and a tone of a moderated voice.

He was a true observer of order, who managed in his closet with incomparable justice, what ere should be produced in the whole universe. When he undertook any business of importance, he fasted and prayed extraordinarily, and caused it to be recommended to the devotions of the good servants of God, when he had a good issue of it, his thanksgivings were seen in all places on all occasions. He neglected nothing, and when men thought him overwhelmed with the greatest businesses of war, they were astonished that amidst them he took his time for some petty Ordinance of Policy.

He loved Learning, especially Divinity and Law. This was it that made him conceive a magnificent design to leave monuments of it to posterity, that should last longer then the Temples and the Pyramids of Egypt. And for this purpose, being a man very judicious, he made choice of the most able men in the whole Empire, to collect all the Laws of the Emperours his Predecessours, which he augmented and enriched with his own, so that this Book was called Justinian's Code. Afterward, he gave a charge to Trebonian, who was accomplished in that profession, to compile all the Resolves of the antient Lawyers, which he did with a most exact diligence, & at length composed those famous Pandects or digests divided into fifty Books. He caused also the Institutions which contain the Principles of Law and are as it were the elements of that excellent doctrine, to be added to them. And for what concerns Divinity, he publiſhed a certain work of the Incarnation, and abundance of Ordinances for the government of Eccleſiaſticall perſons, wherein Baronius finds fault, that he entred ſometimes a little too far into the Sanctuary.

He was not much advanc'd in the years of his reign, when an horrible conſpiracy was raiſed againſt him, which was on the point to ruine all his affairs; and although I have already touch'd it in my firſt volume in the Hiſtory of Eulogius, yet I will decipher here more particularly the reaſons and the remedies of it.

Many have attributed the total cauſe of it to the new Subſidies, that the Emperour impoſed upon the people to maintain the war that he had already enterpriſed, but there was yet more poiſon, and which ſprang from an higher ſource, which was, that the houſe of the Emperour Anaſtaſius (which had preceded Juſtine the Unkle of our Juſtinian, and which cheriſhed alwayes the moſt violent paſſion to continue themſelves in that Empire) was not quite extinct, but had two principal Chieftains, Pompey and Hypatius, who thought they had heads well enough made to wear a Diadem. Theſe men when they ſaw that the affairs of State were diſpoſed to a commotion, and that the Malignant Vapours were gathered together on all ſides to make up clouds, did as the Sorcerers do, who mix the work of the Devil to aſſiſt the effects of nature. They knew that the Emperour began to be ill-beloved, both for the impoſts, and for the rigid and inflexible ſeverity that he uſed in the government of his Empire; which ſeemed inſupportable to the ſpirits of ſo many Libertines, who would live according to their own diſcretion in the permiſſion of all crimes. They fail'd not to lay hold on this opportunity, and under-hand to ſowe in the ſpirits of men the ſeeds of Diviſion. There was then in Conſtantinople two popular factions of men belonging to the Theatre which were called the Green and the Blew, by reaſon of the Liveries by which they were diſtinguiſhed. State-Policy ſuffer'd them, and choſe rather to foment the one againſt the other, then to extinguiſh them. But the conſpiratours for that time united them by artifices and by mony to bandy them againſt Juſtinian. The Chieftains ceas'd not to ſcatter venomous ſpeeches amongſt the people, and to ſay,

What? are we then made to ſuffer eternally the Empire of theſe Cow-keepers? the Unkle is dead, and the Nephew hath ſucceeded him, which is a Crow hatch'd of an evil Egg. Was it not enough that he learned in governing beaſts, to handle us as a Sheepherd, but he muſt become a Butcher, and be pleas'd with nothing, but with the fleaing and the maſſacring of his people? What have we any more to hope for under him, ſince he hath put us in a condition of fearing every thing? Do we expect that the Empreſs, which is the worſt of Furies, ſhould give him counſels of mildneſs for us; or that Beliſarius which is the fatal inſtrument of his cruelty ſhould deliver us out of his hands? All our ſafety is in our ſelves, all our good is in our reſiſtance. Shall we doubt to obey neceſſity which conſtrains us, and the juſtice of our cauſe which is our guide? We ought to ſet upon this goodly Emperour while his ſtate is yet tottering and ill-ſettled, without ſtaying till he fortifie himſelf to our ruine. We have amongſt us the bloud of the true Ceſars, Pompey and Hypatius, the Protectours of the people, and the moſt accompliſh'd of all Princes; it is thoſe that we ought to reverence, and that we ought to carry upon our ſhoulders to the Empire.

Theſe words at length inflamed the ſedition which began by a ſmal handfull of Mutineers, which a Provoſt of the City endeavoured to ſuppreſs, and apprehended three that were the ring-leaders of the Rebellion, but the people ran ſuddenly in an huddle and plucked them out of his hands by violence. The Alarm was given to the Palace, and the Emperour diſpatch'd inſtantly ſome ſouldiers to quell the Mutineers, but they were beaten back; for the number of the ſeditious grew greater every moment, as a ball of ſnow that rouls from the top of a Mountain. Behold in a little time the whole City in arms, with a rage ſo violent, and a fight ſo hideous, that it ſeemed that Hell had opened it ſelf that day to vomit out all its Furies upon the earth. The men ran to fire and ſword, the women with their hair about their ears, and howling like ſo many Megara's, made themſelves arms of what ere they met with. There was not any, even to the children that did not ſeem to be little devils flying athwart the flames. The Regiments of the Herules, (which the King a little before had converted to Chriſtianity) were at that time quartered in the City of Conſtantinople who failed not, according to the orders of the Emperour, to oppoſe themſelves againſt the fury of the people. Theſe having been barbarous ſouldiers, without all compaſſion made at firſt a greater maſſacre. The incenſed Citizens fall upon them on all parts to beat them out; their courts of Guard are burned by the hands of the ſeditious, and their companies much worſted, ſome were run through with Partiſans, others knock'd on the head with Leavers: the affrighted women from the tops of the houſes, make themſelves parties in the quarrel, and ceaſe not to throw down boyling water, and ſtones upon them. Theſe wild-Boars thus chaffed, ſeeing the bloud of their companions run in rivers through the ſtreets, rally all their forces, and take Torches to fire the Churches and houſes, which they performed with ſo much violence, that one might ſee in an inſtant the whole City in flames. The Temples were burned with the moſt ſumptuous ſtructures, the pictures, the ſtatues, and the moſt beautifull works of the Antient Maſters crackled in the fiery coals, which none extinguiſhed but by humane bloud. The moſt religious of the Clergy being come forth to appeaſe the tumult, in ſhewing them the books of the Goſpels, the images of the Saints, and the Shrines of their reliques, although they marched at that time in a Proceſſion, were trod under foot, and in part murdered by the Herules. This redoubled the fury of the people, who had yet ſome good ſenſe of their Religion, and could not endure the contempt of ſacred things. The Maſſacres began afreſh on both ſides, and the images of death fly up and down on all parts.

The Emperour was for that time ſhut up within his Palace with his wife the Empreſs, accompanied with Beliſarius, who was newly returned from Africa, with Narſes, and with Mundus, and the Regiments of his Guards. His heart bled within him to ſee thoſe horrours; and he was ſo courageous, as to be willing to go forth and preſent himſelf to make an Oration to his people, and to pacifie the ſedition. But the Empreſs throwing her ſelf at his feet laid hold on him, and conjured him by all that he had moſt dear, not to commit himſelf to an evident Butchery, which cauſed him to be contented to ſound the Ford, and to ſend Meſſengers to the people to promiſe them all ſatisfaction, if they would aſſemble themſelves peaceably in the Theatre to hear their Prince. The factious began to cry, that it was a ſnare to intrap them, and that they had no reason to hearken to a Tyrant that had sold their skins to the Barbarians, that there was, no more safety now remaining for them but in desperateness. Thereupon they take Hypatius, & having lifted him upon a great Buckler carry him a cross the multitude, place him upon a Throne in the midst of the great Market-place, and proclaim him Emperour. He was as it were altogether astonish'd between hope and fear, when he spake these words with a feeble voyce.

Friends, I am your work, I come to live and dy with you. I know well what ye have made me be, but I know not what I shall be, if you bring not as much force to preserve me, as ye have testified affection to elect me. In a word, the life of Justinian is incompatible with mine, and your arms must decide this day wch of the two you will keep, either the Prince that ye have chosen, or the Tyrant that ye have sworn to destroy. The Assembly answered confusedly with great clamours, Let Hypatius live, Let Justinian dy; and the stoutest men amongst them take a resolution to assail him in his Palace. But this Prince after he had call'd upon the name of God, the Protectour of Kings, took this perillous business into deliberation. Narses was of opinion, that it was best to fortifie the Royal Palace, to damm up the entrances, to prepare themselves for assaults within, and not to trust themselves without. That all rebellions, were strong and invincible in their first heat, and that time ought to be given to some to think upon their fault, and to others to declare their good affection.

Belisarius liked not this opinion, and desired nothing but to march and to fall upon the Rebels. The Empress Theodora who held the upper end in all the counsels of Justinian, intermeddled very far in this business as Histo rians observe, and spake with a loud voice.

What seek security in dishonour? Endure a siege of our subjects and of the dreggs of the people without taking other arms then those of walls? It is a counsel that will give boldness to Hypatius, and fear to all those that are yet for us. I assu e my self, that the Tyrant wholly trembling in this n velty, and that there is not a more sovereign remedy then to prevent him. Let us rather dy then leave a blot upon our reputation. The name of Emperour and of Empress sound well in an epitaph, and ought never to be quitted, but with life.

She animated the whole company by her discourses: The Emperour himself had a mind to go out amongst them, but it was concluded that he should suffer Belisarius to advance with the most resolute Regiments which he did very courageously, and removed himself into the place where was the hottest of the combat. The Herules, that had puissantly sustained the first furies of the enemies, took new forces and joyned themselves to the Emperour's Court of Guard. They began altogether to charge the Rebels with such an Impetuousness, that they seemed Lions and not Men. The Faction was no longer equal, the heart of the Revolted failed them, & they let themselves be killed as Sheep; whilst the fury of the Souldiers fleshed in bloud, slackened nothing of its vehemence.

Justinian touched with pity, commanded that they should spare the rest; and to perswade them more efficaciously to their good and safety, endeavoured to gain the faction of the Blew-coats, and to divide it from the Green by force of Courtesie and of Money.

This being done, Hypatius found himself much astonished, and wished then, that he had rather put his hand on Thorns, then on the Pearls of a Diadem. He fights now no more for honour, but for his life, he seeks out holes to hide himself; but those that knew that their security consisted in nothing, but in producing him, seize upon his person, and deliver him into the hands of the Emperour, who caused suddenly the law to proceed against him, together with Pompey and other great Lords that were their Complices, who were all put to death. After which the Emperour endeavoured with all his might to Rally his people, and to declare to them the pernicious effects of sedition, which were but too visible. The City being all wasted by the fire, and fourty thousand men (as Zonaras tells us) dead upon the place.

Behold one of the most hideous Histories that I find in all Antiquity, and which ought to teach people, to adhere firmly to their Soverein, and never to lend an ear to wicked counsels that cause so lamentable Tragedies. It admonishes also great men to enterprize nothing against their lawful Princes, and to place their Principal Honour in Obedience.

This Monarch seeing himself settled in his Kingdom by so sensible a protection, gave all the thanks of it to God, and bent the vigour of his cares to the advancement of his glory. An hundred years had already passed, since the Vandals, a barbarous people, and Heretick Arians had possessed themselves of Africa, after they had torn it from the Roman Empire. Three Kings were already dead, and the fourth that then reigned was a Tyrant named Gilimer, revolted from the true King Hilderic his Lord and Kinsman, whom he left in a close prison, after he had put himself into possession of his Sceptre. Justinian that was a friend and Protectour of him that had been Deposed, Demands an account of that action, and resolved to re-establish the true King in his right; because that, besides that justice would have it so, he was much more favourable to the Catholicks. The other answered that he had dispossessed a Sit-still, and a Traitour to the Religion of the Arians; and that the Greek ought to look to his own business without intermedling with the Kingdoms of another.

This Arrogance netled more the Emperour, who now saw himself perswaded by all reasons to enterprise a War against an Heretick for Religion, against a Tyrant for Justice, against an Adversary for his Goods. He ordered all this business with a marvellous prudence; for he sowed first division in Gilimer's Kingdom, interessing as much as possible, every man to his party; the Catholicks for his protection; the Kinsmen of Hilderic for Revenge, the Zealous men for Piety, the Understanding for Reason, the Souldiers for the Booty, and all the world for the sweetness of the tranquillity under his Government.

He chose Belisarius General, to whom he gave an Army more Valiant then numerous, of Souldiers well tried; and charged him to use the Africans as his own people, and as his children. One cannot believe the effect that this moderation wrought: The people began to look upon the Armies of that brave Captain, not as upon those of an enemy, but rather of a Liberatour. Tripolis rendred it self quickly to him, and the Isle of Sardinia revolted against the Tyrant. He dismantled all the strong Holds that might defend him from the Enemy, as if he had been assured to live in perpetual peace; which caused that Belisarius in a short time marched even to the gates of Carthage. The Usurper as fearful in War, as he was bold in wickedneſs, was aſtoniſhed and ſurpriſed, having not had ſo much leiſure as to fortifie the place of his abode. He ſuddenly diſpatches his brother Amaras to cut off all the Avenues from the Greeks, but he was encountred by John the Armenian who led the Van-guard of the Imperialiſts, and who hotly gave him battel, in which the African loſt the Victory and his life.

The Tyrant, whether out of rage or out of fear, cauſed Hilderic his Maſter, which he kept in priſon, to be murther'd, and went out with his beſt Troops to meet Beliſarius, all dipp'd as he yet was in innocent blood, and troubled with the image of his crimes. He met with the Grecian General a little ſcattered from the reſt of his Army; and might have defeated him, if art and activeneſs, or rather happineſs had accompanied his deſigns. But while he ranges his ill-trained ſouldiers, Beliſarius ſurpriſes him, kills his beſt troops, and conſtrains him to put himſelf in flight. He ſeeing his army much leſſened, ſends for his Brother Zaron who led ſome troops near the coaſts of Sardinia, to come and joyn with him, which he did readily; but in the mean time, Beliſarius following the paths that good fortune trod out for him, enters Carthage, which cries for quarter to him without reſiſtance. The two brothers rallyed together, made as though they would retake it; but ſeeing themſelves vigorouſly repulſed by the Imperialiſts, they more thought of a Retreat then an Aſſault. This cauſed all the people to deſpair of their party; ſeeing they themſelves had forſaken the ſeat of Empire. They withdrew themſelves to a place called Tricamerum about eight Leagues from Carthage, whether Beliſarius after he had taken order for the ſecurity of the conquered Countrey, ſoon followed them, and commanded John the Armenian to paſs the River, for whoſe advantage they were encamped there, and to charge them. He obeyed and executed very courageouſly his General's commands; But Zaron, Gilimer's brother ſuſtains his onſet, and twice beat him back, till ſuch time as Beliſarius re-enforced his Van-guard with new Troops, who defeated the enemy, and killed the chief Commander in the Combat. His head was cut off, and ſhewed the Affricans, who fell into a great deſpair of their affairs. Ah, my brother, ſayes Gilimer, the moſt valiant man on earth, could I not be miſerable without loſing you, and without ſacrificing you to my fortune? It is now that I perceive the diſaſter of my Nation; It is now that the bloud of Hilderic rebounds againſt me. In the mean time Beliſarius, who lead up the battalio, paſſed alſo the River which was fordable, and aſſaults Gilimer who made but a ſmal reſiſtance, but taking with him his domeſticks ſaved himſelf by abandoning his Camp, where nothing was heard but the cries and ſighs of the Captives that lamented their Misfortune. The unhappy King ſaved himſelf in Rocks ſituated upon high mountains, where there was a Fortreſs almoſt inacceſſible, but unfurniſhed of Victuals and Munition, whither Pharas had order to follow him, in the place of John the Armenian who was unhappily killed by accident by a Captain that ſhot at a Bird. Gilimer that now thought that there was no greater enemy in the world then Hunger, was quickly weary of the place to which he was retired; and ſeeing himſelf ſollicited every day by his friends to render up himſelf, he ſends to Pharas to demand three things for the capitulation of the Treaty, which were, ſome Bread, a Sponge, and a Lute; ſome Bread, becauſe he now knew not what it was to Eat; a Sponge, to wipe off the tears that he continually powred out upon the Tombs of his brothers and the Funerals of the Conntrey; a Lute, to give ſome truce to his anguiſh by its Muſick. This diſaſtrous man, which had never well played the King, would now play the Philoſopher at the end of his days, and expreſs a contempt of all things. Pharas eaſily granted him what he demanded, and having taken him, conducted him to Beliſarius who was retired to Carthage.

This General contemplated the Principal object of his Conqueſt with delight, and had a great curioſity to entertain him, but he did nothing but laugh with a forced and unpleaſing laughter. All his treaſures fell into the hands of the Conquerour, who ſuddenly carryed him to Conſtantinople.

A Triumph after the manner of the Ancients was ordained in honour of Beliſarius, who entred in great pomp into the City with all the ſouldiery, cauſing the proud ſpoiles of Africa to be borne before him, and dragging after him the priſoners, among wᶜʰ was Gilimer in chains, who was brought before the Emperour and the Empreſs ſeated upon their Thrones on an high Theatre with an unparalel'd magnificence.

Gilimer, as ſoon as he ſaw a far off this pompous ſplendour, cried out, Vanity of Vanities, and every thing is Vanity; afterward began again his laughings, which he did, in my opinion, that he might paſs for a Fool, and ſo have his life. He did obeyſance to Juſtinian with moſt humble ſubmiſſions, who uſed him with much clemency, giving him a Place in the Lands of the Empire, to finiſh there the reſt of his days.

The Booty was divided with much equity; and the rich Veſſels of the Temple of Jeruſalem that the Vandals had heretofore found, and pillaged in Rome, were ſent back again to the Place from whence they had been tranſported by Titus Veſpaſian.

This war was finiſhed in three months with an Army of ſix thouſand men; ſo eaſie it is to row when God conducts the veſſel.

But that of the Weſt was very long in its continuance, Obſtinate in its Reſiſtance, Malignant in its Deſignes, and Lamentable in its effects. Theodoric King of the Goths (as I have ſaid in the life of Boetius) had made himſelf Maſter of Rome, and of all Italy, where he reigned with great authority. He left for ſucceſſour Athanaric, ſon of his daughter Amalazunta (at that time but nine years old) under the Protection of his mother. She was the moſt accompliſhed Princeſs of her age, and moſt worthy to govern an Empire. Nevertheleſs ſince ſhe ſaw her ſelf environed with thoſe Goth Princes that were of an humour ſufficiently cruel, and that did not eaſily brook her domination; She honoured with her confidence Theodate one of the principal of them, becauſe he was of the bloud Royal, and appeared the moſt moderate of all the reſt, playing rather the Philoſopher then the Captain. This ungrateful man, after the death of the little Athanaric who was not of a long life, was moved with ſo furious a State-jealouſie, that by the baſeſt of Treaſons he cauſed that poor Princeſs to be ſtrangled in a Bath; fearing leſt ſhe (as being far more able then he in the managing of affairs, and he holding the Sceptre onely by her favour) might take too great a ſhare in the Government. But this unnatural man that thought to ſettle his Crown by the the death of that innocent Queen totally ruined his affairs, and could not avoid the vengeance of God that purſues Traitours even to the gates of hell.

The Emperour Juſtinian, that had already projected to recover his City of Rome and all Italy out of the hands of the Goths, hearing the rehearſal of that horrible baſeneſſe committed againſt the perſon of Amalazunta, that had ſought Alliance with him, failed not to take the occaſion, and to declare a warr againſt Theodate, thinking that it was then a good time to ſet upon an Empire, when he that governs it begins to be forſaken of God for the enormity of his Crimes.

This cowardly King was ſo much aſtoniſhed at this news, that at firſt he humbled himſelf by very great ſubmiſſions, offering the Sovereignty to the Emperour of the Eaſt, and contenting himſelf to reign under him.

But the other ſeeing him ſo wicked and ſo weak, deſpiſed him, and cauſed Beliſarius to advance with his Army into his Territories, who ſuddenly poſſeſſed himſelf of Sicily.

Theodate although an Arrian Heretick, had recourſe to the Pope, and invited him, as well by Intreaties as by Menaces, to make a Voyage to Conſtantinople, to Treat a Peace between the two Crowns. Agapetus, who was then ſeated on Saint Peter's Chair, was ſo Poor and Indigent, that he had not wherewith to furniſh himſelf with Proviſion for the Journey, that he was fain to pawn the Sacred Veſſels of Saint Peter's Church to bear his Charges by the way; He failed not to tranſport himſelf into the Eaſt, and was received by Juſtinian with all the reſpects due to ſo high a Dignity; but when he came to touch upon the point of Peace, the Emperour told him, That the buſineſſe was already too farr advanced, That that Warr was an Holy Warr againſt the Enemies of God and his Church, which ought not to be hindred by the Counſels of a Pope, and that he need fear nothing that Theodate could do, who was more able to threaten then to hurt.

The Pope ſuffered himſelf eaſily to be perſwaded; and quitting the Intereſts of that King, buſied himſelf about the Government of his Church. It is a wonder, that he had ſo much Authority, as to depoſe Anthimus Patriarch of Conſtantinople, who had been brought in by Faction, and to ſubſtitute Menas in his Place, in ſpight of the Empreſs Theodora who had not at that time all the power that is attributed to her over the ſpirit of her Huſband.

The Good Shepheard, after he had courageouſly done the duty of his Charge, dyed in Conſtantinople, where he left a moſt ſweet odour of his ſanctity.

In the mean while, Beliſarius purſues the Conqueſt, enters into Pou, and takes Naples by night, uſing a Stratagem of Warr, that made him put on three hundred men through ſubterraneous places, where there paſſed nothing but water. The taking of ſo flouriſhing a City gave aſtoniſhment and rage to the Goths, who conſpired againſt their King Theodate, and ſubſtituted by Election Vitiges in his place, who was not of ſo Noble a Family, but who ſeemed to them Bold and Generous to repair the Ruines of the State.

As ſoon as he was choſen, he ſuddenly cauſed Theodate to be ſlain, who was ſurpriſed in his flight, and waſhed away by his bloud the Murther of Amalazunta.

This Prince was agitated with two contrary paſſions, with the deſire of ſolitude, and with the motion of his ambition; the one counſelled him to quit the Empire, the other to retain it; while that he would content them both, he contents no body, and was ſurprized in his irreſolution.

In this conjuncture of affairs, the Grecian General advances and marches ſtreight to Rome, which receives him with open Arms, ſome through love, and others through impotence.

Vitiges deſirous to make his Crown renowned by ſome illuſtrious Act, and to confirm by his Valour the judgement of thoſe that had choſen him, aſſembles from all parts the Goths, ſpurring them on, both with the Glory of their Nation, and the neceſſity of their affairs, in ſuch manner, that in a ſmall time he lay ſiege to Rome, with an Army of an hundred and fifty thouſand men.

It is in this occaſion that the Valour of Beliſarius was made viſible in all its advantages; for with an Army of ſix thouſand men, he ſuſtained that prodigious number of Barbarians, amidſt ſickneſſe, hunger, and a thouſand other incommodities. And when the Romans wanted Arms and Ammunitions of Warr, he made Arrows of the Statues of the Gods and of the Caſars, to throw at the head of his enemies.

In the end having ſollicited with diligence, and expected with conſtancy the ſuccours that came to him from the Eaſt, he raiſed the ſiege, and ſcattered all that thick Cloud of Armies that environed him.

Vitiges is conſtrained to retire into Ravenna, where he beſieges him, and preſſes him ſo ſtrictly, that he forces him to deliver to him his City, and even his own Perſon.

He was carried away Priſoner, with his Wife, and abundance of Lords to Conſtantinople, preſented to Juſtinian, and ſerved for a Pompous object in the Triumph of Belliſarius, who was received with the full ſatisfaction of all the Nobles, with the admiration of the wiſeſt, and with the generall acclamation of all the World: The Emperour alone began to be pricked with jealouſie, and to entertain him with coldneſſe.

In the mean ſpace, the Goths make Elections of two Kings, one after the other, who lived but awhile, and did nothing; but the third, named Totilas, was endowed with ſo eminent and lovely qualities, that he raiſed up all their hopes: and his coming to the Crown of the Goths was as the infuſion of a new ſoul into a dead body.

He puts himſelf ſuddenly into the field, with all that he could rally of the wrack of Vitiges, and at firſt he was ſo happy that he defeated Beſſa, and Vitalius, The two Generals of Juſtinian, left by Beliſarius for the Guard of all the Country of Italy.

After that he took Spoletum, diſmantled Beneventum, planted a Siege before Naples, and won it by valour and by patience.

But beſides, he ſhewed ſo many proofs of his Moderation, and of his Goodneſſe toward the conquered, that with all their hearts they wiſhed for nothing more then his Government. He gave great order for the comfort of the people, that were at that time oppreſſed with a cruel famine, he provided for the ſecurity of the Goods of his Subjects, chaſtiſing rigorouſly the thieveries of the Souldiers, he preſerved the modeſty of Women and Maids with ſo much ſeverity, that he cauſed his Generall to be beheaded for having violated a Gentlewoman.

By these so commendable wayes he rendred himself Master of all Pon, and from thence transported himself to Rome, which he held a long time besieged, and which was at last delivered to him, by the treachery of a Court of Guard of Isaurian and Cilician Souldiers.

He used his Victory with so much clemency, that he caused to be proclaimed that the Churches should serve for a Sanctuary, forbidding expressly to touch those that should retire themselves thither: He used the Pope Pelagius, and all the sacred persons with great respect, the Ladies with Honour, the Citizens with Courtesie, contenting himself onely to demolish the walls of Rome, without hurting any thing within. He rendred himself so absolute a Master of the City, and peoples hearts, that every one confessed they had never seen the like, and published him worthy of the Empire of the World.

The Emperour Justinian fortifies his Courage against this ebb of bad successes, and withdraws Belisarius from the war with the Persians, to send him back to Italy, believing that all the happiness of his Arms subsisted wholly in his hands.

But it seems that Felicity was weary to follow alwayes the Standards of that valorous Captain; the affairs of War quite changed their face; all good Successes now are onely for the Goths, and misfortune seemed to be fastned to all the enterprises of the Romans.

Belisarius was as a man forlorn in the hands of an evil destiny, that darkned his Prudence, froze his Courage, weakned the strength of his Arms, and made him unprofitable to all things, so that he seemed to have passed back into Italy for nothing, but to be the spectatour of his own disasters. At last he was called home again, and Narses the Eunuch was sent in his place, who mended the business, and defeated Totilas in a pitched Battel, who dyed suddenly of his wounds.

Providence, (if it be permitted here to lift up the veil, and to enter into your secrets) whence could this change proceed? We know that Belisarius was the most accomplished of all the Generals of Armies that were at that time under Heaven; He was endowed with a lively and luminous spirit, with an inventive understanding, with a profound judgment, that had nothing like it, but his Courage. Providence for the future, and Activeness for the present, contended in him which should carry away the Palm; his Valour was incomparable, and his Experience compleat in all sorts of business, his Prosperity without Insolence, and his Adversity without Discouragement. He was Prudent, Sober, Chaste, even to a wonder; Affable, Gracious, Liberal, Charitable, Just, Merciful, Happy. Not onely the Souldiers respected him, but even the Labourers looked upon him as their Protectour, and the Father of their Quiet. From whence then came it, that he made a wrack at the end of his Life, and that he saw all the eminent lustre of his Glory bleaked even in his hands?

Here may Great ones learn a wise Instruction for the Governance of their Actions, and have cause to admire the Judgments of God. And for that purpose, I shall enlarge my self upon the causes of the miseries that happened to the fortunes of the highest Lords of the earth, and the more curiously search into this History in its source.

I confess that this Secret one of Procopius, is too rayling in many places, where it speaks things incredible: but it is not deceived when it tells us, that two women, Theodora the Empress, and Antonina the wife of Belisarius, were the two Helen's of the Empire, and the Torches that consumed mankind by their flames.

Behold (saith he) from whence began the Misery of Belisarius, that ruined his bravest enterprises, and plunged him deep into great displeasures.

He had in his house a young Gentleman named Theodosius, whom he loved with a sincere affection, having converted him from Heresie, and procured him to be Baptized at Constantinople, whose God-father he himself would be. He put him so far in the good esteem of his wife, that they having no children of their Marriage, resolved both of them to Adopt him. Theodosius conquered by so great a courtesie, rendred himself obedient to Belisarius, and above all observant to the humours of Antonina. She loved him at first with a tender affection, but honest enough, which gave occasion to the more curious sort of people to think, but permitted not the wiser sort to speak.

At last, as the best Wine degenerates into Vinegar, so the chastest Love of the spirit (if heed be not taken) changes it self to flesh.

The conversation of the young Theodosius in the African voyage, the graces that smiled upon his face, the sweetness of his speech, the wittiness of his discourses, his good offices, his observances, his confidence, and the secrecy of the place, kindled so great a fire in the heart of Antonina, that she cherished no more that object as a Mother, but loved him as a frontless woman, that sells her prostitution.

Happy are the women that reject the first thoughts of such miserable designs, as the sparkles of the fire of Hell.

She gave at first too much command to her passion, and too much overture to her unhappiness. Her Caresses seemed already too soft to the young man that strived to pay them with respect, feigning himself not to understand that language of Love, for fear he should make her faulty in his thoughts. But she ceased not to pursue him, and kindled continually her flames by the liberty of her life. Conscience, Honour, the fear of an Husband, contended for a time in her heart: but in the end quitted the place. She forgot all Divine and Humane Laws, and abandoned her selfe to her passion, and openly sollicited Theodosius to sin.

She acted the part of Potiphar's wife, but she met not with a Joseph. He was not yet wicked, but capable to become so; he went not to seek sin, but sin sought him, and he wanted strength to resist it; the respect of a woman took from him that of God; he consented to evill that he might not offend her, and betrayed his soul to content the heart of a woman past all regard of her honour and salvation.

A man ows not obedience in this case to the most qualified and the most beneficial personages; he ought to fly from them; he ought to break off with them; he must not think upon pleasing them, in a thing that may displease God.

Both of them at last habituated themselves in their crime, and at first acted it secretly enough: but the impudence of Antonina, and the great confidence she had of her husbands love, took from her her shame, and discovered her dishonour.

Belisarius began to be doubtful of it, but he feared his own thoughts, & that he might not render his wife criminal, he made himself stupid. Behold! at length a poor maid-servant, a Macedonian by Nation tion comes to him and tells him, My Maſter, I put my life into your hands, I have great things to tell you, but I am a dead woman if you ever open your mouth of them: promiſe me upon your oath to keep my counſell, and I will tell you that which concerns the honour of your houſe. The Maſter ſwears, the ſervant ſpeaks, and accuſes her Miſtriſſe of an infamous converſation with Theodoſius.

Beliſarius, that would not believe his ſhame and miſery, asked her if there were any other witneſſes, ſhe produces two Grooms of the houſe that depoſe the ſame.

It is too much (ſayes he) Ah Theodoſius, unfaithfull Theodoſius, Have I then made thee my Son, to become now my Torturer? Have I put thee into my houſe to defile my Bed? Have I given thee Life to take away my Honour? Deceitfull Man! Where is that Modeſty that was painted upon thy Countenance? Where are thoſe Artificial words that thou haſt ſo oft employed to ſeduce my Goodneſſe? Thou ſhalt now receive a Reward worthy of thy Wickedneſſe. What do I ſay? Kill my Son of Adoption? It is to condemn mine own Judgement, and to tear out my heart. But it is his Crimes that deſtroyes him, and not I; He muſt dy, and there is no pardon for him.

Conſtantine his intimate friend perceived his ſadneſſe, knew the cauſe of it, and counſelled him rather to rid himſelf of his Wife, that had ſeduced Theodoſius, and which was the Plague and Fury of his Houſe; but he loved her paſſionately, and would by no means hearken to it. He called inſtantly a Souldier of thoſe that were moſt engaged, and having greatly obliged him to ſecrecy, commanded him to kill Theodoſius. He knowing how well he was beloved of the Lady, asked counſel of the buſineſſe of a friend of his, that told him that Beliſarius was mutable in that matter, and that Antonina was the Miſtriſſe, that it might happen that ſhe might regain the ſpirit of her husband, and might be a very bad enemy to him that ſhould undertake to kill her Minion. The Souldier was afraid, and inſtead of doing the Act, gave ſecret notice of it to Theodoſius, who fled to the City of Epheſus.

Troubles are in the Houſe; the Husband ſad and penſive, believing that the buſineſſe commanded was already executed: the Wife in fears, and paſſions impoſſible to be related: yet her pain was ſomewhat mitigated when ſhe knew that Theodoſius was yet alive.

But Beliſarius that thought him dead, and knew no way to content his Wife, endured a torment unſpeakable. Where is then your Son? (ſaith ſhe) Where is mine? Whence comes it that he is ſo long without appearing? They are your ſuſpicions that have deſtroyed him. Is it This then that I have merited of you, for having loved you more then my own ſelf? He trembled every joynt, and durſt not come to the point of the command that he had given: To deny it appeared to him impoſſible, and to confeſſe it ſeemed to him worſe then Death. The Lady takes up the diſcourſe again: Tell me, What is become of him? If you have cauſed him to be murthered, let me cauſe his Body to be ſought for, to give it Burial. The poor Innocent is no longer in the World, you have ſacrificed him to your jealouſie, well knowing, that the ſword that paſſed through his Body, hath brought a mortal wound into my Heart. What advantage have I got by being faithfull to you, if I have not been able to eſcape your ſuſpicions which you have ſprinkled with the bloud of your dear Adopted? But I will pardon you all, on condition, that you will tell me thoſe that have brought this unhappineſſe upon you, either by their falſe reports, or by their damnable counſells.

This wicked woman gave the Rack without ceaſing to the ſpirit of her husband, who, with all Sampſon's ſtrength, could not keep in a ſecret, no more then he. He named the Macedonian wench, and the two Grooms: Whereupon ſhe had ſport enough, by reaſon of the perſons, ſaying, That it was an horrible thing to put her honour to an arbitration upon the report of Slaves, and uſed recrimination ſo cunningly, that ſhe made all their accuſation paſs for a calumny.

She ſeized inſtantly upon the poor Maid and the two men, which ſhe delivered up to her Hangman, and after ſhe had cauſed their tongues to be cut off, ſhe commanded that they ſhould be thrown in a ſack into the water, where they finiſhed their life by the deteſtable hatred of that Megara. She found out alſo the Counſel that Conſtantine had given, and ſtreightway cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated; ſo great a deſire had ſhe and ſo much power to purſue her vengeance.

Soon thereupon after it was publiſhed every where abroad, that Theodoſius was alive, and he was ſuddenly called back to Court, but he ſeemed to be cold in it, making the wicked deſigns that ſome had undertaken to deſtroy him, his excuſe, and ſeigning himſelf ignorant of the ſecret command that Beliſarius had given of his death, he layes all upon the head of Photius, He was the Son of Antonina, born of her firſt bed, a brave man and very accompliſhed, who was in the chiefeſt offices of the Empire, and had conceived an extream diſpleaſure at the debaucheries of his Mother, not being able to endure that Amoretto, to whom ſhe made a profeſſion of her goods and honour.

This unnatural woman forgetting both her bloud and duty, ceaſed not to raiſe calumnies and troubles againſt her own Son in the favour of her Adulterer, and to make uſe even of the moſt deteſtable inventions, to take him out of the World, in ſuch a manner, as that he, not thinking his life ſafe enough againſt the ſword and poyſon, was conſtrained to chuſe a voluntary exile, to give place to Theodoſius. Beliſarius, by a moſt infamous obſervance that he rendred to his wife, employed his credit and his Letters to compaſs his return. He comes now to ſeek his Miſtriſſe in Italy, where ſhe was with her Huſband, and from thence they all returned to Conſtantinople, where this crafty artificious woman had the leiſure to ſatiate her ſelf with the ſimplicity of the one, and the love of the other.

But it is a ſtrange thing, yet true, that That kind of Love is nouriſhed with Oppoſition, whereas the full enjoyment renders the ſeeds of Iniquity leſſe Active and more Languiſhing.

Theodoſius now began to feel a great remorſe of Conſcience for his infamous Life. He was fully perſwaded that he could not eſcape the diſaſter of ſome violent death, if he continued that debauchery, that the patience of an Husband ſo many times provoked would break out at length in ſome evil end, and that, happen what would, he could not eſcape the judgements of God neither alive nor dead. Upon theſe thoughts, he ſteals away ſecretly from the Court, tranſports himſelf to Epheſus, enters into a Monaſtery, and makes himſelf a Monk, cauſing thoſe handſome locks to be ſhaven off, that were the ſtrings that tied Antonina's affection.

This

This unhappy woman hearing the news of it, put on mourning as for a publick disastre, deprived her self of all cópany, persecuted her own life by a horrour of eating and drinking, and not contenting her self with weeping for her Beloved, she howled and sent out cryes that affrighted the whole World.

It is a thing sufficiently remarkable, that Love encamped in that Fryars Cowle, darted more subtle fires, and sharpened his Arrows with the Ashes of Repentance, Imitating the Sorcerers that employ the Mass and Bible to fortifie their Enchantments.

The Passion of Antonina was so desperate, that Belisarius pitied her, and so wrought, that by the Authority of the Empress, Theodosius was fetched back again from the Monastery, and brought unto her house. It is true, that he made a great resistance before he would come forth, whether it was feignedly, or really, it is doubtful, but he yielded to the violent pursutes that were made for him, & quitting the Altar of Jesus, made himself again of a Monk an Adonis to sacrifice himself to his Venus.

One would have thought that the flames of that cursed passion would have been totally extinguished, & that there had been no danger to be feared in such a conversation. But, O God, who knows not that the presence of Lovers, especially after a long absence makes love arise again out of its own ashes, & extracts sparks of fire even out of ice and snow? Belisarius marches in an expedition towards the coasts of Persia, where Photius his son in law comes to seek him, who resenting in his heart the bitter displeasures that the persecution of his mother caused him, was resolved to pluck out her Minion from between her arms, or to dy in the attempt. He disposes his Spyes at Constantinople, to observe diligently what should pass in their Conversation. He hath news sent him from all parts that the fire is again kindled, and that Triclareses continue to the scandal of the whole City. He causes a very understanding man and most faithful to the service of Belisarius to go to him, and tell him from point to point that which he least desired to hear.

His displeasure was so greatly kindled that the very same moment, he goes to seek out Photius, and sayes to him, My son, it is now that you must succour your miserable father, if you would not have grief send him to the grave; you are not my son by nature, but you are by love and by election. I have given you goods and honour, I have not ceased to oblige you all my life-time; yet I desire to pass by whatever I have done hitherto, on condition that you will revenge me upon that disloyal Theodosius who hath placed again dishonour in my bed. Photius, who desired nothing more then that discourse, comforts him, and promises quickly to dispatch him of his enemy. They both of them swear upon the Gospels, mutually to keep close the secret. The other to acquit himself of his promise takes his time, learns by his Spyes the day wherein Theodosius was to make a Voyage to Ephesus, and transport himself thither with a company of resolute souldiers. The Adulterer doubting that all that commotion was against him, saved himself in Saint John's Church, as in a secure Sanctuary. But he was drawn out from thence by a Trick, and delivered by the Bishop himself of the place, into the hands of Photius, who being of a very sweet nature would not kill him, but contented himself to send him away into Cilicia, to the utmost bounds of the Empire, and to keep him in close prison, under the guard of men, very much engaged to him, in such a manner as he should be never heard of any more,

He was seasoned a sufficient time in this Prison-hole, which worked an enraged sadness in his Antonina, who found no better remedy then to implore the assistance of the Empresse, with whom she was so familiar, that she deposed even her loves, and immodesties in her bosome. She makes an horrible perquisition of Theodosius's business, and by misfortune it happened that one Caligonius (who was the Confident of Belisarius his wife, having been taken and ill used by Photius, to make him disclose to him all the secrets of his Mistris) made an escape and came secretly to Constantinople, where he charged the Son of having attempted something upon the friend of the Mother. Theodora suffers him to come to Court privately, and when he dreamed not of it, causes him to be apprehended, confines him into a secret place, and unknown to all the World, where he was put to the Rack without having any regard to his Great Quality or even to the infirmities of his Body. He kept Belisarius his counsell in his sharpest torments, but he told them the place where Theodosius was deteined, from whence the Empress caused him secretly to be fetched, and commanded that he should be brought to Constantinople, without noyse, to drown in a sudden and unhoped for joy the spirit of her Confident. She kept him some dayes in her Palace to put him in better liking, and told her dear Antonina (who was very curious in her pearls) that she had a rare Jewel to shew her, which made her hast to the Palace with a great desire to see what it was.

The Empresse, after she had a long time suspended her hopes, causes Theodosius to come forth out of the chamber of one of her Eunuches, and casts the whole Sun into her eyes. She fell down in a swoune at that sight, and was like to dy, but at length when she had been succoured, and was come to her self again, she had so much stayedness, as not to cast her self hastily upon her friends neck, before she had kissed Theodora's feet, to whom she said with transports of an unparall'd joy; Madame, You have been hitherto my Empress and my Mistris, but I shall now in time to come esteem you as the Goddesse of my safety, seeing you have withdrawn my Son out of the bottomeless pit of Hell, whither his enemy had precipitated him. There were nothing then but Caresses, but Dalliances and discourses upon the adventures of Theodosius.

But God, whose just anger follows always sinners at the heels, waited till the Offering was fat to sacrifice in.

He permitted them to make so many Banquets, so many Dancings, and so many youthful debaucheries for the return of that Minion, that he suffering himself to be carryed to excesses above the ability of his Body, fell sick of the bloudy-flux, by which he was carryed within few days into the other World, to render an account to the Sovereign Judge, of his Unfaithfullness and Dissolute life.

Antonina remained near the Corps, as the Ghost of the Body, but a Damned Ghost and deprived eternally of all she loved most. God gave her a life long enough, and prolonged her Hell among the living, to anticipate that of the other life, seeing that we know her crimes, and know nothing of her Repentance.

In the mean while poor Photius was three years in a black Dungeon, out of which having twice escaped and saved himself in Churches which served for

for a Sanctuary, he was taken again & shut up close, without being ever able to get forth but by a Miracle, which discovered to him in a Vision the Prophet Zachary, who drew him out of that deep pit wherein he was, and conducted him to Jerusalem, whether indeed he went, and made himself a perfect Votary to accomplish the Vow that he had made, if ever he did obtain his dear liberty.

Behold here the springs of Belisarius his misery, which Procopius hath observed in his secret History.

It is believed, that it is but a Fable to say, that he had his eyes put out by the command of Justinian, and was reduced to beggery: but it is true that the Emperour had a jealousie of him, as if he had aspired to the Empire, and that Theodora who had a minde to persecute him to favour his wives wicked humour, who yet cherished in her heart some poison against him for the business of Theodosius, made him to be disgraced, his offices were taken from him, his goods confiscate; the souldiers that he had trained up given to other Captains; his friends interdicted with a prohibition to speak to him. This brave General, who before, drew the whole world in throngs after him, was forsaken, and walked through the streets of Constantinople with two or three poor servants, as a man that had out-lived his Funerals, to serve for a spectacle of Pity.

One day as he went to do his Courtship at the Palace, the Empress shewed him a bad countenance, whereat he was so affrighted, that at his coming forth, he expected nothing every hour but murderers to assassinate him. He returns into his lodging, being dismayed above all that can be imagined of so generous a man. He presently throws himself upon his bed trembling and sweating with fear. One comes to tell him, that a Gentleman is at the gate with a message from Theodora; he prepared himself already for death, when the man gave him a Billet from the Empress which imported thus: Belisarius, thy conscience tells thee that thou hast offended me, and that thou deservest to be punished, but I give thee to thy wife, to whom I am obliged. It is from her that in time to come thou shalt hold thy life, thy goods and thy honour. I shall know how thou shalt behave thy self towards her, and with what submissions thou shalt acknowledge and thank her for her benefits. He instantly kisses the Letter, and in the presence of him that brought it to him, enters into his wives chamber, throws himself down at her feet, kisses sometimes one, sometimes the other; professes that he ows to her his life, and that he will no longer hold the rank of an husband, but of a slave. The Lady receives him into favour, and goes and thanks the Empress.

But is it possible, that Belisarius, that thunderbolt of war, that had made the East, and the West, and the South to tremble; that had led two Kings in triumph; that shaked not before armies of an hundred and fifty thousand men, having but a little handfull; Belisarius, before whom the mighty Powers of the earth crawled along in dust, was so basely subjugated by women? Procopius assures us that it was a Charm that caused that perturbation of his minde, and stole him from himself, and needs must it be a work of the Devil, that could quite change upside down, and besot so great a personage.

Yet may we affirm, that it was not onely the wicked spirit of Antonina that made that Tragedy, but that the person of the Popes violated by that General, who was too basely obedient to the Empress, brought on him an infinite number of miseries, that broke out at last upon Justinian, and upon the whole Empire.

Here is a great Theater of Providence, where Princes may learn, that it is very dangerous to be observant to womens wicked humours, and to seize even on sacred persons to satisfie their Revenge.

Behold then the Prime and most capital fury of the Empire, Theodora, who made her husband fall into Heresie, who made the Popes be plucked out of their Sees to put therein her servants, that turned topsie turvie all Divine and Humane Laws to content her Passion.

Procopius speaks shamefully of the original of this woman, and saith, that she was the daughter of a Bear-keeper, a Comedian by her trade, a Prostitute by her Publick profession, and abandoned even to the little boys of the Theatre from their infancy. He adds also, that she had a very good grace in puffing up her cheeks to receive boxes on them, and to gain money by that pastime; and that in her little youth, she was debauched by one Ecebolus who kept her for a time, and afterward was weary of her; which made her, having now nothing whereon to live, run from place to place through the whole East in that shameful prostitution; and afterward returning to Constantinople, Justinian made love to her as to a famous Courtisan, and finding her to his liking, married her, in the life time of the Emperour his Uncle.

It appears clearly, that this Authour enraged against the memory of Justinian, invented execrable lies that pass in the approbation of those that nourish themselves willingly with poison, and that think, that one cannot speak too much ill of great ones, and that those are the best Historians that relate their most abominable vices.

But we ought to consider that this wicked man (who appeared more a Pagan in his Writings then a Christian) after he had highly praised his Master in publick, when he had not the recompence he expected, and was perhaps punished for his looseness and his demerits, sets himself to write a secret History wherein he speaks fearful things which never came into the thought of so many other Historians that wrote after him, and in a time when they had a full liberty, who would not have omitted so many remarkable things, if they had had any foundation in truth.

That man must be of a belief either simple or malicious, that can perswade himself that Justinian who was a cold Prince, considerate in all his actions, extremely ambitious of glory, and careful of his reputation, who never was tainted with the vices of youth, should marry a caytiff-wench, cried out upon by the whole world, when he reigned already with his Uncle, and governed the whole business of the Empire. It was he that before his marriage published a Law, by which it was forbidden to the Senatours to ally themselves with mean and dishonest women. Who can believe that he should teach the transgression of his ordinances by his own example, without fearing the severe honesty of the Emperour his uncle, the reproaches of the Senate, the advantage that he might give to his competitours by so ill an action?

All that can be said most truly, is, that Theodora was the daughter of the great Huntsman of the Emperours, whose office was to cause wild beasts to be taken and kept for the spectacles of the Amphitheatre, which was not a mean or dishonourable employment. It is not read in all other Historians, that she had had any ſtain of immodeſty in her converſation, but quite contrary, that ſhe was ſuch a capitall enemy to women and maids of an ill life, that at one time ſhe cauſed five hundred of them to be ſhut up, to take from them the occaſion of doing ill, and to be trained up in the exerciſes of honeſty: which is a thing that Procopius himſelf could not conceal, not conſidering, that if ſhe had been in former time ſtained with the ſame vice, ſhe ſhould have expoſed herſelf to the laughter of all the world; ſome blaming her cares, and others her rigours, which would have renewed the memory of her infamy, whereas ſhe ſhould have endeavoured to have buried it in ſilence.

She was certainly too ſtately to be a Proſtitute; thoſe that have ſeen her, ſay, That ſhe was a little woman, that had a face full of Majeſty, eyes burning, and caſting out lightning in their anger, a lively and piercing wit, a ſolid judgement, an expediteneſs in buſineſs, and the activity of fire. She was ſo diſcreet, that ſeeing that Juſtinian could not be gained by the fleſh, ſhe took him by the ſpirit, which ſhe adorned carefully with excellent and ſublime knowledges; cauſing her ſelf ſecretly to be inſtructed in State-affairs, which gave her a facility to ſuggeſt advices to the Emperour her husband, which he reliſhed wonderfully, and did nothing in all the buſineſs of the Empire without communicating it to her, calling her, even in ſome ordinances, his Venerable Spouſe, the aſſiſtant and companion of all his Counſels.

It is then the poiſon of the Serpent that ſerves for inck to Procopius's pen, when he writes extravagant fables of the birth of Theodora, and when he ſayes that Juſtinian was the Son of an Incubus, a true Devil in an humane ſhape; that the Servants of his Chamber have ſeen him often in the figure of a Devil; that ſometimes his head hath been perceived ſeparated from his body with mounting it ſelf up to the ſieling of his Chamber, and the ſame body walking on another place without an head; and that a certain Frier coming to ſalute him, was altogether aſtoniſhed, for that he ſaw Lucifer in his Throne. After this, he makes him the Murderer of a great number of millions of men; he attributes to him the Comets, the Conflagrations, the Deluges, the Plagues, and the Sterilities of the earth. He complains that he would have reduced all ſorts of ſpirits to the union of the Catholick Belief; that he tormented Hereticks and Jews; that he cauſed ſumptuous Churches to be built; that he took too much care for the protection of Biſhops, Prieſts, and Monks.

This Authour ſpitting out his gall, even againſt the Light it ſelf, with ſo much impudence, and inſerting in his writings ſuch enormous tales, ſhews ſufficiently, that he was altogether filled with the curſed fury of Revenge: a man without Faith, and without Religion, a bloudy ſcoffer, which was more fit to write a Romance of the Cyclops, then the life of our Juſtinian. He is ſo contrary to himſelf, that having made him the moſt ſubtle, and the craftieſt of all men, he ſayes in another place, that there was nothing ſo eaſie to be deceived, and abundance of other contradictions that deſtroy his credit. We need not then wonder, if a famous Hiſtorian of theſe times, who takes many pieces out of Evagrius, who hath tranſcribed a part of this Calumniatour, deals ſometimes ſeverely with the memory of this Monarch, without regarding the great virtues that might counterpoiſe his faults.

That which Procopius ſpeaks moſt probably of Juſtinian's imperfections, is, that he was an extreme diſſembler, crafty in his actions, cloſe in his hatred, the Maſter of his countenance, and even of his tears; inconſtant to his friends, inexorable to his enemies (had not Chriſtian Piety made him flexible) covetous of money, and more inclining to rigour then to clemency; obſtinate in his reſolutions, and not conſtant enough in his promiſes when there intervened reaſons of State. Theſe are ſpots ordinary enough to Great ones, which, it is good to correct by the counterpoiſe of God's Law. As for Theodora, it cannot be denied, but that ſhe was ſcornfull, proud, revengefull, an intermedler, ſevere, even to the exceſſe and flitting in matters of Religion, which cauſed much trouble to the conſcience of them both.

I have ſaid before, that Pope Agapetus, after he had depoſed Anthimus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, died in the ſame City. The news of it being carried to Rome, an Aſſembly was made to proceed to the Election of a new high Prieſt. Theodate King of the Goths, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats, cauſed Sylverius to be choſen, that was the Son of Pope Hormiſdas by a lawfull Marriage before his Prieſthood. As ſoon as he was choſen, the Empreſſe Theodora commanded him by an expreſſe letter to re-eſtabliſh Anthimus, and to put Menas out of his Chair that had been ſubſtituted in his place. As ſoon as the Pope had opened that letter, he ſaid ſighing, that it was the fore-runner of his death, and anſwered that the depoſition of Anthimus, having been made Canonically by his Predeceſſour, he could not in conſcience change any thing in that buſineſſe. Theodora was furiouſly provoked at his refuſal, and gave charge to Beliſarius, who was then in Rome with his Wife Antonina, to ſeize upon the Pope, and to ſend him to the Eaſt. Beliſarius was very ſcrupulous at firſt, but being encouraged by that wicked woman, he reſolved himſelf, ſaying, That it was their duty that commanded, to render an account of their actions to God, and as for him, he pretended to no other thing but to the glory of Obedience.

There was at that time at Rome a Deacon named Vigilius, an ambitious and factious man, who knowing that the Popedom of Sylverius was tottering, and no way ſettled, offered himſelf to that wicked Antonina, deſiring to be introduced into the favour of the Empreſſe, promiſing that he would do nothing in the exerciſe of his charge but by her orders; that he would put Anthimus again into his Chair; and beſides all this, would make a preſent to Theodora and to Antonina of a good ſum of money. The Lady, paſt all reſpect of Conſcience or Honour, cauſes his offers to be accepted, and urges her husband (as much as ſhe could) to the execution of that attempt. Vigilius keeps the buſineſſe warm as much as poſſible, and produces two witneſſes, the one a Lawyer, and the other a Souldier, that accuſe Sylverius of having endeavoured to betray the City of Rome, and to deliver a Gate to the Goths. Beliſarius was very doubtfull, that there was ſome calumny in all thoſe Proceedings; nevertheleſſe, fearing that if he ſhould uphold the lawfull Pope, he might be involved in a crime of State, as having been a favourer of the party of the Goths, he ſends for him to his Palace to hear him, with promiſe to ſend him back unto his houſe, which was performed after he had been pleaſed with his Defence.

But he was called for the ſecond time, and brought into the chamber of Antonina, who was ſeated on her Pallat, and Beliſarius at her feet. The proud woman uſing this holy man as a Groom, ſayes to him with with a disdain, and the guise of a Prostitute, Ha, Sylverius, what have we done that we should be sold to the enemy? It is time that you should be punished for your treason. Thereupon she makes him pass into another chamber, where she commands that he should be stript of his habit, and cloathed with a Monk's Gown, and sent to the East, from whence he was banished to Patara. The Bishop of the place knowing the innocence of this Pope, went out to meet him, and received him with all the submissions due to his dignity. Furthermore being lamed, with a great zeal, he had the boldness to transport himself to Constantinople, and stoutly to tell the Emperour of the oppression of the head of the Church, which would pull down the vengeance of God upon him, if he did not remedy it. Justinian was much astonished at this discourse, and gave command, that the Pope should be carried back again to Italy, and preserved in his dignity, with this reservation, that if he should be convicted of having intelligence with the Goths, he should not live in Rome, but should choose some other dwelling; which sufficiently testified the moderation of the Emperour in that business, when he acted according to the justice of his own thought.

But Theodora, who would not stop there, knowing that the Pope was re-conducted into the West, writes to her confident that he should not do a business by halfs. On the other side, Vigilius ardently solicites, saying, that he could not perform his promise if he did not mount up to S. Peter's Throne. He presses so violently, that the Pope was delivered into his hands, whom he instantly caused to be carried away into the Isle of Palmes, which was an Augury of his Martyrdom. This sacred high Priest had so much vigour in the extremity of miseries, that having assembled as many Bishops that lived thereabout, as he could get together, he excommunicated Vigilius and all his adherents. He having a mind to revenge himself upon him, and to make sure his Chair, made an end of him with hunger, with vexations, and with torments in that desart Island, where he quickly gave up his victorious spirit to God, gaining the Crown of Martyrdom.

Vigilius his persecutour, who had entred into S. Peter's Chair like a Lion, transformed himself into a Lamb, changing totally his wicked manners; so that he was confirmed by the Romans, and held for lawful Pope. God, that would not destroy him, gave him for a punishment, the accomplishment of his desires, and caused that all that he had most passionately sought for, was the source of all his torments. Theodora the Empress failed not to challenge him of his promise for the re-establishment of the false Patriarch Anthimus: but he answered, that he had committed a sin in promising; and that he should commit two if he should perform what he had promised. This furious woman provoked with that answer, declares him an usurper of the Apostolick See, and follows the law against him, accusing him of the murther of Sylverius: whereupon, she causes him to be seized on by the violences of one Anthimus, and to be brought in chains to Constantinople, where she presses again very earnestly the restitution of Anthimus. Vigilius was so generous and constant, that he protested, that he would rather suffer a thousand deaths, then do it: and when he was violated with injurious words and armed commands, he spake aloud; I thought I had been come to Justinian's Court, but I well perceive that I am in Diocletian's.

That speech cost him full dear; for Theodora's Ministers, who held him not for lawful Pope, beat him so cruelly, that he was almost dead upon the place: yet he scaped out of their hands, and saved himself in S. Euphemia's Church, from whence he was suddenly plucked out, and led through the streets of Constantinople, with an halter about his neck as a thief, then put in prison, and entertained with bread and water, forsaken of all his Clergy, some of which were banished, and others constrained to labour in the Mines. All this was done by a just judgment of God to expiate the stain of Sylverius his blood: but yet the Empress that ordained these violences (in part) to content her passion, should have clearly informed her self upon the point of his character before she should have proceeded to such indignities.

The Romans that at his departure from their City, when he was carried away prisoner, loaded him with injuries, so far, as even to throw stones & sticks at him, were touched with repentance, after they had heard of all the usage that he had at Constantinople, with the admirable patience that he expressed in his pains, sought for him again, avowing him for the true Pastour of the Universal Church: which coming to the knowledge of Justinian, he suddenly commanded that he should be delivered, and the spirit of Theodora her self was appeased and reconciled with him. All the Priests and Deacons that had followed him, were rallied together, and so he was sent back to Italy with honour. But the poor Pope, after he had surmounted a million of torments and inconveniences, died of the stone in Sicily, before he arrived at Rome. O phantasms of honour, how painful are ye to those that sue for you! How traiterous are ye to those that possess you, and dolorous to those that leave you! Unhappy are those that prize you through errour, that Court you through vain glory, and obtain you by iniquity. It were better to put one's hand in flames, then to lay it upon Tiara's, or on Crowns covered with injustice and with blood.

Theodora died about the same time, carrying into the other World a great account to give to God, for having embroiled the estate of the Church; for having behaved her self impetiously: and for having alway sought with ardency the satisfaction of her Revenge. It is probable that she passed out of this life in the Catholick Belief, and in Repentance. But as concerning the death of Antonina her confident, it is buried in a great obscurity, and it is to be feared, that her life extremely dissolute even to her old age, and her damnable practises, have cast her headlong into an eternal misery.

Justinian languished a long time after Theodora's death: having seen all his designs of War, of Law, and of buildings perfected, bestowed his whole time afterwards in serving God, and expired the rest of his life in Devotion, to which he ever had a very strong inclination.

It is held, that about the end of his daies, he fell into two errours, the former whereof was, That he should not die, and indeed it seemed to all the world, that death had passed him, since he had already attained to the age of fourscore and four years, which is very rare in an Emperour, and not conformable to the Scripture, which saies, That the life of Mighty men is ordinarily short enough: nevertheless, it is not probable, that in the solidity of his judgment, which endured even to his end, he should suffer himself to be perswaded with such a vanity. The other fault which he committed, is more true, which is, That by a zeal not discreet enough, that he had conceived for the humanity of our Lord, he would believe that it was not subject to our miseries, but impassible and incorruptible, even before his Resurrection. He was near of publishing this opinion, and authorising it by his ordinances, but yet he never did it, and repented of it at his last hour; calling back in his Will the Patriarch Eutychius that he had driven away for opposing this his errour. So Nicephorus writes manifestly; and every equitable judgment will conclude with him for the salvation of this Emperour. We have very considerable proofs of it; first, his name hath never been blotted out of the Ecclesiastical Tables, out of which it was a custome to deface the memory of Heretick Emperours. Secondly, S. Gregory the Great, who speaks always very correctly, calls him Emperour of pious Memory. In the third place, Pope Agathon, writing after his death, saith, that he was an Emulatour of the sincere and Apostolick faith. Finally, he was commended in the sixth universal Council with an Elogy worthy of a most Catholick Prince. Even some Patriarchs of Constantinople have caused his memory to be yearly celebrated with acclamations of happiness, and publick Orations in his praise. His great Austerities, his magnificent Alms, his Churches, his Devotions, his Laws, his indefatigable pains for the Publick, have defaced the spots that so easily slide into the lives of great ones. Let us not rashly condemn that which we may excuse with Justice, and let us not be evil with Ours, if God will be good with His.

I confess, that this end somewhat troubles me, seeing my self constrained to follow an opinion different from that of a great modern Historian which handles this Emperour with much severity. It is true that I have alwayes had a venerable esteem of that Authour, knowing well, that by the rayes of his virtues, and of his learning, he hath surpassed the lustre of the most glorious purples. Yet the respect which I bear to Truth, and the honour which I ow to the memory of great men that have so much obliged the Publick, give me permission to say here, that Justinian hath never been so black as he hath painted him; being ill informed by the writings of Procopius and of Evagrius his enemies, or following opinions that by a false intention and manifest equivocation are insinuated into the spirits of men many Ages since. Fables easily surprise us, and when they are authorised by a long time, and by the belief of many persons, they pass oftentimes for truths.

That which I say is manifest in that which Baronius himself writes touching the opinion which he had of the gross ignorance of Justinian, whom he reproaches often in his History, that he could neither write nor read; and yet it is now more then visible, that it is an errour crept in by an equivocation of Names, and a fault in Printing, which hath caused the name of Justinian in the text of Suidas, to be taken for that of Justine, as I have already said. This is so clear, that the Commentatour of Procopius (an enemy to Justinian as well as the Authour) hath not been able to dissemble it, but confesses that he hath observed in History, that oftentimes the name of Justinian hath passed for that of Justine; and that by this means, the ignorance that agreed to his uncle Justine, hath been attributed to this Monarch; and farther yet, the accident of the troubles of mind that befel his nephew Justin. That which I say is proved after an excellent manner by the great Cassiodore (who might have seen Justinian when being young he came into Italy) who calls him aloud The learned Prince, and most wise Emperour. And that grave Authour Agapetus, who dedicated to him the Treatise of Reigning well, which Baronius highly commends, says openly, that he was created Emperour Philosophizing, and that in the Empire he ceased not from Philosophy. And Procopius his calumniatour avouches, that he spent ordinarily a good part of the night in his closet, to study upon the sublimest Sciences; and that he could discourse of them pertinently with the ablest Scholars of his age. After this, judge if there be any reason to set him forth as a Peasant, without Learning, and without Letters. Now, as this illustrious Authour was overtaken in that which he spake concerning the wit and the capacity of Justinian: so (as being a man) might he be mistaken in that which he hath written of his manners, following some pieces of the slanderous History of Procopius, which he had read in Evagrius, and in others like him.

But I intreat my Reader yet once more to see and consider, whether it be reasonable to believe that obscure Libel of an Authour enraged against the memory of that Prince, to the prejudice of so many grave and judicious persons that have quite contrary opinions of him. It is evident, that this Procopius, was a Libertine, and a true Atheist, who hath spoken and written in his first book of the History of the Gothes, that it is a folly to trouble ones self about the belief of Divine things, and that it should be left to every one, whether Priest or Lay, to believe all that shall seem good to him, rather then disturb the Common-wealth, being extreme angry that Justinian tormented the Pagans, the Jews, the Samaritans, and endeavoured to reduce the whole world to the Christian and Catholick Belief. Judge (my Reader) hereupon what faith a man deserves to have, that making a shew to be a Christian, acknowledges not their God. Further yet, being a Philistim by Nation, a Sophister by Profession, an Impostour by Artifice, he hath been able easily to make some of the pranks of his trade, slip into his History. Add to this, that being but a mean fellow, he was advanced first by Justine, and afterwards by Justinian to great offices, yet being a man extremely jealous and ambitious, he thought himself not high enough, and bore a mortal hatred to John the superintendent of Justice; to Trebonian the great favourite of Justinian; and not content with tearing them in his History, he falls upon the Emperour that had honoured them with his favours.

Every one that hath the common sense of a reasonable man, sees plainly that it's a most unworthy thing, that a servant, a domestick, taken from the dust of the earth, raised even to the great Offices of the Empire, should leave a Railing History to posterity, written in an hole, and by a singular treason, against his Lord and Master, of whom he held his life and honour. And beyond all this, that he should speak things in his Book, that must needs have been very publick and visible to all the world, that so many other Historians who were near that time, and might speak with all freedom, do not so much as mention.

To this it will be answered, that it is not only a Procopius that condemns Justinian, but that he himself hath blacked himself eternally by the ill usage which he shewed the Pope Vigilius, and by the heresie which he fomented and authorised about the period of his life. To speak truth, there being nothing to be preferred before the fidelity which we owe to our our Religion, the honour which we ought to render to the common Father of all Christendome, and to the Apostolick See; if this Emperour were directly convinced of these two crimes, and dyed without Repentance, I should be the first man that would subscribe to his condemnation: But there is a notable difference between that which escapes by errour and by surprize, and that which is practised by design and obstinacy.

It is true that the Pope Vigilius was at first hardly used at Constantinople by the Empress Theodora, but his Election being not held at the beginning for Canonical, he being one whom the Romans had chased away with stones, and whom he himself had deposed and banished from the usurpation which he had made upon Sylverius his Predecessour by a bold attempt, causing himself afterward to be Canonically chosen; it is no wonder, if in this doubt of his dignity, and certainty of his crime committed against the person of a lawfull Pope, he was not honoured as high Priest, but accused as guilty. It suffices, that as soon as Justinian knew that he had been afterward declared the sovereign Pastour of the Church by the ordinary Forms, he rendred to him the respects due to his Character, and permitted him to exercise his Functions with all liberty in Constantinople. It is true that he had also some difference with him about the condemnation of three Articles, or rather of three persons, Theodore, Ibas, and Theodoret; but in the end the Emperour yeilded, and permitted all to the discretion of the Pope.

As for the Heresie which is objected to him; it hath rather been an errour of surprize, then a resolute opinion with obstinacy against the decisions of the Church, without which it cannot be a formal Heresie. There arose in his time an Opinion that held, That the body of our Saviour was incorruptible even before the Resurrection, and that he was not subject to the natural and irreprehensible passions of other men. Many Bishops, many great learned Friars, and abundance of illustrious persons profess that Belief; and Justinian, deceived by a zeal not well regulated, which he had to the person of our Lord, fell into it, not that he doubted but the two Natures were in Jesus Christ, and that his body was consubstantial with ours, but he could not endure the word Corruptible, when the flesh of our Lord was spoken of. If he had onely meant an exemption from the corruption and rottennesse to which our bodies are reduced, his opinion had been but commendable, but to intend to take away from the Son of God the natural passions of hunger, thirst, wearinesse, and other like, is to be far wide from the Catholick Faith. Yet since that that opinion had not been yet by name, and expressly decided by the preceding Councils, and that many Bishops had the same thought, and that the Pope very much busied by the wars of the Goths, had not yet interposed thereon, it is not credible that it was an Heresie framed in the spirit of the Emperour, but rather an errour. And since that he abstained from promulgating it as he had projected; and ordained by Will that the Patriarch Eutychus that had been banished for opposing this Opinion, should be called back by Justin his Successour; It is evident that he repented at the last period of his life, and that Evagrius who had a strong tincture of the venom of Procopius did him wrong to condemn him to hell: for I leave it to every judicious man to weigh, which we ought rather to believe, a mean Historian angered, or the voyce of a general Council assembled after Justinian's death. No man certainly can call it into doubt, but that the authority of a Council infinitely passes the opinion of one onely man. Now it is so, that besides the testimonies of S. Gregory, and Pope Agathon heretofore alleadged; The sixth Council speaking of the Emperour Justinian, calls him alwayes Most Christian Prince, Emperour of pious Memory, And in the end, Holy Monarch, and who is in the number of the Blessed. The German that hath Commented upon the railing History of Procopius, is constrained to confesse that he hath read even in the best Copies of that Council, Ἰουστινιανὸς ὁ ἐν ἁγίοις, Justinian that is among the Saints. But he being an enemy of his memory eludes that Epithete, and sayes that it hath been attributed to most wicked Emperours, pretending by this means to diminish the lustre of Justinian. I acknowledg that the word ἅγιος, Holy, or Sacred, sometimes signifies that which is Inviolable; and that in this manner it was given to all the Emperours. But I defie him to find one sole Text that saies of a dead Emperour, ὁ ἐν ἁγίοις, He that is in the company of the Saints who is not reckoned amongst the Blessed that live in heaven.

This onely is enough to stop the mouth of all those that are of a contrary opinion, and to maintain this great Monarch in the possession of an high and happy renown, which he hath so justly purchased.

It is he that above all the Emperours hath expressed a most ardent Zeal towards the person of our Lord, to whom he dedicated the stateliest Church which was at that time in the whol Universe. It is he that consecrated an Altar to him composed of all the most glittering stones, and of all the most magnificent rich materials that were then to be found in all the world. It is he that had a most tender care of all the Churches of his Empire. He that every where enriched the house of God. The Purveyour for the Hospitals; the refuge of all necessitous persons, and the Sanctuary of the afflicted. It is he that governed the whole world by most holy Laws; who hath revenged, persecuted, and punished those crimes that tended to the infection of the Publick. It is he that warred all his life time against Hereticks, and that upheld the Glory of the Roman Empire, which since Constantine was faln into an horrible decay. It is he that displayed his Ensigns, in Asia, Europe, and Africa, under the name of Jesus Christ with a force incomparable, and successes that could not but come from heaven. It is he that banished from Christian society, Sorcerers, Immodest, and Infamous persons; and that planted every where good manners. It is he that made Learning flourish, that rewarded men of Merit, that eternized Laws, that bore Arms to the heighth of Reputation. It is he, that alwayes shewed himself a most ardent administratour of the Justice of God, giving audience very often in person to parties with an indefatigable toil. It is he that pardon'd injuries, and received even into Grace those that had attempted upon his life. He, that God preserved from a thousand dangers, and a thousand ambushes. He, whom God crowned with great age, and an infinite number of blessings.

CHARLEMAGNE,

OR,

CHARLES the GREAT.

IT is not flattery that hath given to our Charles the name of Great, since that truth it self may attribute to him the title of three-times-thrice Great, for his Piety, for his Arms, and for his Laws. All that Persia respected in Cyrus, all that Greece vaunted in Alexander, all that Rome honoured in Augustus and in Trajan, all that Christians have commended in the persons of Constantine and Theodosius, is found included in our Charlemagne.

Ptolemy said, that great Personages are never born into the world without a conspiration of the heavens which collect their best Constellations and most favourable influences to salute them, as soon as they salute the day. We cannot know the quality of the stars that ruled over this happy birth; but we know that Providence which infinitely out-passes the effects of all the celestial Globes, hath taken the care of forming this incomparable Prince, and of making him a Master-piece of her hands to shew him to all Ages. Nature was employed to build him a Body capable to sustain the impressions of that Divine Spirit that God would lodge therein. She made him a stature so advantageous, limbs so well composed, so handsom, and so strong; she engraved so much Majesty upon his countenance; she sowed so much lightning and attraction in his eies, that they triumphed over hearts, before his valour had laid hand upon the Empire. It is not alwaies, that felicity is so prodigal of her benefits, she contets her self in some to adorn the house without troubling herself for the inhabitant: and if there be a fair appearance on the out-side, there is little Sense within. But in our Charles, every thing was Great, and his soul never belyed the beautiful spectacle of his Body. His understanding was quick and piercing, his memory most happy, his judgment clean and solid, that discerned exactly good from evil, and truth from falshood. He that saw him in Letters, thought that they were made for none but him: and he that contemplated him in Arms, perceived that he would be one day the chief of Conquerours. He studied Grammar, Rhetorick, Poetry, Philosophy, Law, Astrology, and the rest of the Mathematicks. He learned the Latine, the Greek, the Hebrew, the Syriack. He had some tast even of Divinity it self, and succeeded in all Sciences so advantageously, that he might have held the Empire of Letters, if God had not destined to him that of the world. He respected his Tutours all his life-time, as the Fathers of his Soul: he made his Master of Peter the Deacon, when the Law of Arms might have made him his slave. He drew Alcuin out of England, to learn of him the secret of the Arts, honoured him with great benefits, and at last, founded by his counsel the University of Paris. His meals were seasoned with the reading of some good book, or with the conference of the ablest men of his whole Kingdom; loving to refresh himself from busines in their discourses, without taking any other directions in his pains, then the change of one labour into another.

That which spoils many great ones, is, that they cannot endure any serious thing for a long time, and yet this King made his Recreations even of that whereof others might have made an hard study: and the grace of it was, that he did all this without pain, and that his spirit was no more disquieted with Sciences, then the eie with the most delightful colours. This occupation that he took in Letters by the orders of the King his Father, served extremely to the fashioning of his manners; because he saw in books, & especially in History, as in a true mirrour, all the stains that flattery dissembles unto Princes that heed not to be in a resolution to washthem off, since they are not in a condition to know them.

It is a marvellous thing to see how Nature seemed to sport her self in reproducing Martel and Pepin in the person of Charles; she moderated the fierce valour of the Grandsire by the sweetness of the father, and made in him an heavenly temper by the happiest of mixtures. His Devotion was not soft nor feminine; neither was it large or lukewarm: but it gently spread its Divine Lights in the soul of this Monarch, without deading the fire of his courage.

He had most sublime knowledges of God and apprehensions very Religious. He offered to him his duties both in publick and in private, with a very sincere piety. He burnt with a great zeal to carry his name into all places whither he could extend his Arms. He was ardently affectionate to the holy See, to which he gave respects and incomparable protections. He honoured the Prelates, and filled the Church with Benefits.

He held, that Justice was the Rampart of Kingdoms, the peace of the people, the policy of manners, the joy of hearts; and that neither the gentle temperature of the air, nor the serenity of the Sea, nor the fruitfulness of the Earth, were any way equal to its sweetness. He made a manifest profession of it in the inviolable verity of his words, in the sincerity of his proceedings, in the duties which he rendred to God, to the authours of his birth, to his kindered, to his Country, and universally to all the world. He gave audience often in person to the differences of his people, and even at his rising out of his bed, he caused the Provost of his house to enter into his chamber with the parties that pleaded, to terminate their Law-suits by his Verdict. His principal care was to commit Justice unto innocent hands; but the horrour of his thoughts were perpetually against the unjust, and against the violent: thinking that his Authority and his Arms could have no better employment then in the destruction of tyrants.

But on the contrary, he had goodnesses of heart inexhaustible for honest men, and a wonderful care of the quiet and commodity of his people: his access was easie, his words gracious, his caresses full of attractions, his command sweet, his answers judicious, his orders so just, that they seemed all consorted in heaven. He denied with sweetness, and gave with measure; although his hands were seas of Liberality and Magnificence that were never dry. He had all his life-time the possession of his soul by a singular moderation that retained his mouth, his tongue, and his anger: but it could not pluck back Love by the wings, which caused some spots to be seen in this Sun, although they were afterward washed away again by a strong Repentance.

That which was most resplendent in all the parts of his life, was an high generosity that never forsook his heart, heart, and that found exerciſe continually in all his actions. He contented not himſelf with middle Virtues, but he carried them all even up to the altitude of their Glory. He had a Spirit inceſſantly bent to great deſigns, and a ſoul always filled with a ſtrong confidence, which he had ſeated totally in God, of whom he thought himſelf to be beloved. He never was kept back by any obſtacles from generous enterpriſes; he expoſed himſelf to all dangers, even to the moſt terrible, for the glory of his ſovereign Maſter. Proſperity had no charms upon him, and adverſity found not any darts that were able to abate his reſolution.

All theſe virtues marched in him under the conduct of a great Reaſon, and failed not to be followed with an happineſs that had no equal but his Prudence. God having ennobled him with ſo eminent qualities, ceaſed not to furniſh him with Objects to put them in practiſe, as well by the condition of his Birth, as by the divers occurrences of Affairs.

It ſeems that Providence made him be born on purpoſe at Ingelheim upon the river of Rhine, and on the Borders of France and Germany, as the man that ſhould unite thoſe 2 eſtates under one Sceptre. He found a Monarchy at his birth, which his Grandfather touched upon, and which his father openly poſſeſſed, that had much need of being ſettled by his power, and husbanded by his cares. He enterpriſed for this purpoſe divers wars, but he never waged any one that he was not led to by ſtrong reaſons of Piety and Juſtice. His firſt Arms were imployed againſt the Saxons, who were at that time Infidels and Pagans; and who, beſides, rebelled againſt the lawful Power that ruled them. One may ſay truly, that that Nation was the Hydra of our Hercules; whoſe heads continually were born again, and whoſe bloud ſo often ſhed, was but the ſeed of a new War, even to infinite. Never did the Arms of the Romans dare to attempt any thing upon this people which they deſired rather not to know then fight with. Their Standards had never reſolution enough to ſee, that which Charlemaigne had power enough to beat. They were warlike even to a wonder, and obſtinate even to all extremity. The buſineſs was not only to conquer the Lands, and to gain the men: but to overcome their ſuperſtition, and to diſarm the furies of deſpair. This is that which our Charles performed in nine Wars, as cruel as poſſible, and in the ſpace of three and thirty years; ſo much Conſtancy had he againſt ſtubborneſs, and ſo much Power againſt madneſs. He defeated them in many battels; he ſubdued their Cities, and took their principal Fortreſſes; he demoliſhed the Altars of the pernicious Irminſul, ſo many times beſprinkled with humane bloud; he plucked all the other Idols alſo out of their demoliſhed Temples; and at laſt, conſtrained the brave Vitiginde their King to yield to the happineſs of France, which made him find the kingdom of God in Baptiſm, by the loſs of that of the Barbarians.

But it is true that this magnificent Conquerour found not any where a Theatre of his deeds more famous then that of Italy, whither, the Church groaning under the chains of the Lombards, called for him inceſſantly. Above all, Pope Adrian the firſt, whom Charlemagne loved afterwards as his brother, conjured him to help him ſpeedily, and to recover the Patrimony of Jeſus out of the hands of ſo many unjuſt uſurpers. He tranſported over into Italy with an Eagles wings and a Lions ſtrength, marching upon his fathers ſteps that exhaled yet the odour of his generous piety. He took at firſt the City of Verona, then that of Pavia after a long tedious ſiege, and appeared victorious with an Army of fire in the champains of his enemies. Didier King of the Lombards, that was more ready to do an injury to a diſarmed power, then to ward the blows of an adverſary, was ſeen, conquered, and taken priſoner, rendring the Church her liberty by his captivity.

It was a ſight filled with Magnificence and Piety, to ſee him arrive at Rome, where the heavens ſeemed to be all in bleſſings over his head, and the earth all in reſpect under his feet. He would have marched with a little noiſe, and prevented the Pope, not deſiring to make his entrance with great pomp. But Adrian that watched over his march, perceived it, & ſent out very far to meet him abundance of the Nobility and Officers for a Convoy; and when he was near enough to Rome, the Souldiery, with all the Citizens appeared in Arms. But that which was moſt delightful was a Proceſſion of little Children, well choſen out, that carried boughs and ſang, Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini: Bleſſed be he that comes in the name of God. The Pope deſiring to honour the lively image of the Saviour by ſome kind of honours that had been heretofore rendred to the original. When the King ſaw the Croſſes of the Senatours, and that came alſo out to meet him, he alighted off his horſe, and walked afoot as far as S. Peter's Church, where the holy Father was at the door to receive him, with his Cardinals, and all his Chair. Charlemagne by a Ceremonious devotion, and great reſpect that he bare to S. Peter and his ſucceſſour, would kiſs every ſtair of the aſcent of the Portal, before he would cloſe with Adrian that received and embraced him with extaſies of joys, and the King kiſſed his hand amongſt a thouſand acclamations of cheerfulneſs and happineſs which the people ceaſed not to redouble. They went both of them into the Church to render thanks for the favours that God had done them on that great day, which was on holy Saturday; and which gave not place for that time, to the triumphs of the Reſurrection. The Feaſts of the Paſſeover were ſpent amidſt powerful Devotions pretty Ceremonies, and infinite merriments. The King not contenting himſelf with having broken the chains of the capital City of the World, made great preſents to her Church; and after he had been crowned King of Lombardy by the hands of that great Pope, who offered him alſo the dignity of a Senatour, the fore-runner of the Imperial, he returned to France, leaving to all Italy an approbation of his deeds, and a great deſire of his Domination.

On the other ſide, the Chriſtians of Spain that ſuffered an Age ſince, inſupportable outrages under the tyranny of the Saracens, had alſo recourſe to this invincible Monarch; who, as one always ready to exalt the Standard of the Faith, and to ſuccour the afflicted, paſſes happily over the Pyrenean mountains, takes the City of Pampelona, croſſes the river Ebro, ſeizes himſelf of Sarragoſſa, and afterwards of Barcelona, plucks the Mahumetans out of the fortreſſes that they poſſeſſed, and re-eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian Faith in all the places from whence the fury of that Barbarian had baniſhed it. His zeal alwayes burning carried him by the ſame means to the Converſion of the Infidels, of which he cauſed innumerable multitudes to be baptized; ſo true it is, that every thing gave way to the Arms and to the perſwaſions of that incomparable Prince, whom God ſeemed to lead by the hand to the Poſſeſſion of the Roman Empire.

Here

Here is the great work of the Providence of God upon his well-beloved Charles, that he did him this favour to wear the first of all, the Diadem of the Cæsars in the house of France, and to have transmitted it to a sufficient long posterity.

I pray you, Reader, to observe here the sacred traces of that wise Governess of Empires, and to consider how she insensibly collected all dispositions necessary to set this great King upon the Throne of the Emperours. The Conquest of Kingdomes resemble often that golden bough of Virgil, which one could not pluck off from its tree by main force: but might be easily taken off by an hand that had good fortune on his side. There are many Princes that to take Cities and Provinces by violence, have covered the earth with Arms, and the sea with Vessels, with a noise that astonished the whole world, without ever compassing their designs; whereas others have come to Crowns with as much haste as easinesse, without troubling themselves, and almost without stirring, because the hand of God was in the mingling of their affairs.

This is the proceeding which we visibly discover in the advancement of our Charles, whilst he dream'd of nothing but on the means of exalting the Glory of God, and succouring afflicted Nations. Heaven labours for him in the East, in the West, and raises him occasions, which without his thinking of it, set the Diadem upon his head.

It was already a long time since the Eagle of the Roman Emperours clapt but with one wing; Italy having been so many times pillaged by the Goths, the Huns, the Vandals, and the Lombards. The courageous wisdome of Justinian, that thought he had freed it from oppression, did but charge, not break its chains. The East had enough to do to defend it self against the incursions of the Barbarians, and could no more contribute any thing to the West but unprofitable compassions and griefs, to lose that which it could no longer keep. It happened, that to aggravate the evils of the successours of Constantine, there sprang up an Heresie of the Iconoclasts, or Image-breakers, which was worse then a plague of Egypt, and which being fomented even by those that were upon the Throne, caused innumerable disasters, and shook the Pillars of the State.

The beginning of this unhappiness came from Leo the Isauric, who being of a very base extraction, took in hand the Scepter of Constantinople, which he soil'd much more by his furious deportments, then by his shamefull original. He had in his Privy Council a pernicious Jew that perswaded him to abolish the holy Images, promising him the Empire when he was yet but a private man, as the recompence of that Sacriledge; and for this reason, he afterward employed himself about it with fury, and cast out the roarings of a Lion which were heard from East to West. The Patriarch S. Germain opposed his Edicts, who was for that business deprived of his Dignity; and many great Personages horribly persecuted for the same cause, sealed with their bloud the Belief of the Church.

Gregory the Second thundred from S. Peter's Chair against that Lion, although he was under the Captivity of the Lombards, and declared him not onely Excommunicated, but had also forfeited his Imperial Dignity, and all the Demesnes he pretended to in Italy. The rage of his Revenge caused a Fleet to be prepared to go down to Italy, and to put this generous Pope in chains; but it was cast away, and death strangled his designs, so that he could never root out of the hearts of men the worshipping of Images.

Constantine, Copronymus his son, that defiled in the day of his Baptisme the waters that purifie all the world, continued Leo's furies, and made himself the most abominable of all men, a professed enemy of the most holy Virgin the mother of God, and of all the Saints, till such time as he was consumed by the leprosie. He left an heir of his Scepter and Impiety, which was called by his Grandfathers name Leo; a prophane and unhappy Prince, who being much in love with pearls and precious stones, took away from the treasures of the Church a magnificent Crown that the Emperour Maurice had dedicated to God: but his crime was followed suddenly with vengeance; for scarce had he set it upon his head but it was covered with impostums and sores, accompanied with a violent fever that took him away in few dayes, after a reign of four years and a half.

He had a son named Constantine who began his Reign at the age of ten years, under the protection of his Mother Irene who was declared Regent of the Empire by her condition, and because she was a woman of great discretion and courage, the daughter of a King, skilfull in holy learning, endowed with a perfect beauty, and accomplished in many graces and virtues that rendred her Government pleasing to all the world. She gave the direction of her affairs to Stauratius, a man of sublime capacity, and an equal reputation, that seconded all her good intentions, so that she governed ten years with her son in great peace, and in the approbation of all honest men. Her Regency was greatly remarkable for the Zeal which she testified to the Catholick Faith, following the good counsels of Pope Adrian, and of Tarasius Patriarch of Constantinople, who perswaded her to cause a general Council to be held at Nice, where the memory of the proceeding Emperours that had authorized the Heresie of the Iconoclasts was condemned, the Images re-established, and the Devotions of the people inflamed to their veneration. The Council gave a thousand benedictions to the Empresse, even so far as to name her, The Revengeresse of the Cause of God; the Conquereresse of Impiety; and the Protectresse of the Catholick Faith. All businesses took a very happy course, and the State prospered visibly in the hands of that great Princesse.

But it seems, that disorder is fatal to the Courts of great Ones, and that virtue can never reign there without contradiction. The ambition that every one hath to promote his fortune, the impatience of good, the desire of novelty, the envy that alwayes follows the happy, cease not secretly to contrive wicked plots which are hatched at last into pernicious effects. The passages to the spirit of the Emperour could not be so well stopped up, but that he had about his person some young men, the most venomous pestilences of the Court, who by giving him suspicions of the Empresse his mother, involved his Dignity and his Life in a misery that causes horrour to my thoughts. They cease not to insinuate into his heart by cursed flatteries that gave him the taste of sin, and the love of a faulty liberty, that would no longer measure his Powers but by the impunity of all vices. They call'd him the perpetual Pupil, the shadow of Stauratius, and told him that the age of twenty years might have made him proceed Master of his affairs, and of himself; that it was an insufferable shame to him to indure servitude in a birth that gave him the Empire of the World;

World; that his mother loved his Sceptre and not his Person, and that she was so much used to Reign, that she would never quit the Sovereign Authority, if he did not express Vigour and Resolution to be that which God was pleased he should be born, without dependence on any one; that the Pedagogy of Stauratius was infamous to a Monarch that had thrice seven years over his head, and that he ought no more to play the child in a time wherein so many other Princes had plaied the Conquerours.

They talk to him of it so much, that he resolved to take away all Authority from the State-Officer, and to put his Mother out of the Government, and direction of his affairs, which he began to manage after a strange fashion, favouring the heresie of the Iconoclasts and all disorders, following the advice of that pernicious counsel of the youth that had began his ruine. Irene had an intention at first to marry him to the Princess Rotrude daughter of our Charlemagne; but some Greeks diverted that resolution, telling her, that that alliance would give too great a prop to his natural disposition that seemed already bad enough, and that if the French began to set a foot in the Empire, they would one day carry the Crown upon their head. This caused his mother to marry him to Mary the Armenian, who wanted not good qualities, but whether it was that the Emperour found her not to his liking, or whether it was to spite the Empress his mother that had given her to him, he made a very scandalous divorce from that Princess after he had lawfully wedded her, and married with a Chamber-maid of his Mothers, through the irregularness of his sensuality.

The Patriarch Tarasius had a good mind to oppose himself against it, but seeing that this Prince enraged with love and choler threatned to open the Temples of the idols, if one crossed the phrensie of his passion, he held his peace, and let a business shameful to Christianity, pass by dissimulation. But Plato and Theodore who were then the two greatest lights of Greece in holiness and learning, much blamed his proceedings, and separated themselves from his communion, which made a great rent in the Eastern Church.

Constantine sullying also his Loves with humane bloud, caused the eyes to be put out of his Uncle Nicephorus, and of the General Alexius greatly renowned by his prowess, which drew much hatred upon the person and government of this Prince, yet he left not off for all that to continue, even so far as to take pleasure in cutting off the tongues of many that disapproved of the insolency of his manners.

Eight years were already passed in these disorders, and his mother retired into her private condition, was secretly solicited by many to take again the managing of the affairs to stop the Riots of her son. She hearkned to it, and with the assistance of Stauratius plotted an horrible conspiracy against the Emperour, whom she caused to be apprehended, imprisoned, and made blind, whereat he conceived so much despight and sadness, that in few days he quitted the Sceptre with his life. The wicked deportments of Constantine, and the good reputation in which Irene had lived till then, caused many even amongst the Church men, to find out reasons not only to excuse, but also to approve this bold attempt: yet I find it so enormous, so contrary to the law of nature, so injurious to the inviolable Majesty of Kings, that my pen passes over it with horrour and cannot choose but condemn it, not only with the Law of God that detests it, but with the heavens themselves which hid the Sun seventeen days together, veiled themselves with darkness; and wept for the inhumanity of that crime. Yet I rather believe that which Cardinal Baronius hath written, that his mother never consented to the making of him blind, although she had given command to seize upon him; but that those who feared the danger of that Commission, wished rather the death of him then the imprisonment.

But howsoever it came to pass, the Empress took again the Government in hand, and seeing that in that great confusion of affairs she had need of a strong prop, she sought for, by an express embassage, alliance and a marriage with Charlemagne, which was not any way disrelished, seeing all that had passed failed not to be coloured with fair pretences; and for that purpose sent back Embassadours to her to end the business; but when they arrived at Constantinople, they found that Nicephorus one of the Grandees of the East, an hypocrite and a traytour to the miserable Irene, had already seized upon the Empire, and banished her into the Isle of Lesbos, where she died soon after with the testimonies of a strong repentance, and a perfect disengagement from all worldly things. Yet this new Usurper knowing that our Charles had already been proclaimed Emperour in the West, treated him with great submissions, not for the love of his person, but for the fear of his credit, and of his Arms.

Behold how Providence disposed businesses in the East to make him mount upon the Throne of the Cæsars, she permitted also in the West strange revolutions, and abominable accidents, out of which by her extreme wisdom and goodness she extracted good for the advancement of this Monarch. After the death of Adrian the Pope, Leo the Third was set in Saint Peter's chair, but his Predecessours Nephews, that saw that the Pontificate had taken another visage since the City of Rome had been delivered from the chains of the Lombard, and that it began to be protected, and courted even by Kings themselves, were very liquorous after it, so that bearing an enraged envy to the promotion of Leo, they did in the heart of Christianity that which one would have horrour to commit in the salvage desarts of the Scythians and Tartarians. The arms of the City being in their hands, they take an infamous band of murtherous Souldiers, set upon the Pope in Rome, in full day, in the middest of a Procession, they seize themselves of his person, in an astonishment that put all the world to flight, and after they had laden him with wounds, and covered him with bloud, they put out his eys, and cut off his tongue, shutting him up in close prison.

But God having heard him by miracle, inspired also a generous resolution into some brave Cavaliers to pluck him out of that Captivity, which they did by an happy and magnanimous attempt, so that Leo got him to the City of Spoletum, and in time recovered France the ordinary refuge of the afflicted Popes. The King with all his Kingdom bearing as much compassion to his misery, as veneration to his Dignity, caused him every where to be received with great honours, and when he was arrived near his person, he rendred him all respects and favours posible so far as to enterprise an expedition to Rome to re-establish him in his seat. The Parricides that had so ill used him, failed not to colour with Reason, that which they had done with fury, & accused the Pope Leo of divers crimes upon which they desired that one should hear a Council. But the Bishops assembled spake aloud, that the highest throne could not be judged by any one, and that this this buſineſs of neceſſity ought to be left to the judgment of God alone.

Whereupon the Pope mounting into an high and eminent place, to be perceived of the King that was preſent, & of the whole aſſembly, ſaid, that of his own good will, without any obligation, and without prejudice to his dignity, he was come to juſtifie himſelf, & therupon called the living God with his holy Angels, and all the Hoſt of heaven for witneſſes of his innocence which he confirmed by a ſolemn oath, terrible even to the moſt ſhameleſs of perjured men. Every one ſaw that ſincerity & innocence ſpake by his mouth, & all the ſtanders by threw themſelves down and proſtrated themſelves before him, with cries of joy and incomparable approbations of his Holineſs, avouching him for the true and lawful ſucceſſor of S. Peter. There was nothing now remaining as it ſhould ſeem, but to cut in pieces the Homicides that had ſo outrageouſly dealt with him; but he inſtantly begged their pardon of the King, which was the cauſe that men were contented with their baniſhment that they might not trouble any more the publick quiet.

The Pope inſpired powerfully by God, and being not ignorant of the conſent of the Eaſt and Weſt for the Imperial Dignity, which had been to our Charlemagne many years ſince, cauſed ſecretly a magnificent Diadem to be made, and taking the occaſion of a ſolemn day of Chriſtmas, and of a great Ceremony, put it upon the head of the King, who was praying upon his knees, when he dream't not of it, and before a great aſſembly of all the parts of Chriſtendom proclaimed him Emperour. This action was approved with an univerſal conſent, and followed with ſo ſtrong acclamations of the people, that it ſeemed that the letters of that Election had been ſent from heaven. Nicephorus who reigned in the Eaſt, oppoſed not himſelf againſt it, but being contented to poſſeſs that which he had uſurped, abandoned willingly to Charles's pleaſure the Empire of the Weſt. And there was no doubt but that if Charles his moderation had not at that time planted limits to his happineſs, he might with one hand have held the Weſt, and extended the other over the Eaſt, it being moſt eaſie for him to put by an Uſurper, fearful and ſhaking, and yet troubled with the image of his crime.

In fine, our Charles entred into ſo high a point of veneration, that he ſeemed to be amongſt Kings that which Kings are amongſt private men. There was none amongſt the Sovereign Powers on earth that did not deſire his friendſhip or his Protection. Aaron King of Perſia ſent him his Ambaſſadors, & rich preſents, offering him the keys of the City of Jeruſalem, and of the holy Sepulcher, to diſpoſe of them according to his will. Amirat King of the Saracens of Fez in Africa, & Iubibala King of Sarragoſſa in Spain, ſought in like manner the honour of his favour; Cagan King of the Avares put himſelf under his protection. Ardulph King of the Northumbrians was re-eſtabliſhed by him in his Dominion Hemingue King of Denmark rendred to him his homages. Achaie King of Scots ſubmitted himſelf unto him, All Nations repoſed themſelves under the ſhadow of his Scepter, whileſt this great Monarch was as the Compaſs, which keeps one foot firm in the Center, and with the other runs the round of the Circumference. He watched perpetually at home over his Empire, and provided abroad that nothing ſhould ariſe to trouble his repoſe.

He was not ſo attentive to the affairs of war as not to give continual order to that which concerned the government of the State, and as not to make divers Rules for the good of Eccleſiaſtical and Secular buſineſſes. He cauſed five Councils to be held in the Cities of Mayence, of Reims, of Chalons, of Tours, and of Arles. He cauſed the Hereſie of Felix Biſhop of Urgel in Spain to be condēned. He wrote himſelf in the Latine tongue moſt excellent Ordinances, which he intituled the Capitularies. He cauſed great care and induſtry to be had in the correction of the Holy Writ, that had been altered by ignorance, or by Hereſie.

He ceaſed not to ſet times apart for pious works, giving great alms in all places, and keeping a ſecond Table for twelve poor people near his own, which he entertained with the victuals as his own perſon. He founded many Monaſteries, and built as many Churches as there are letters in the Alphabet.

God that would accompliſh in all points the happineſs of this Monarch, gave him a great age in a ſtrong body, and a ſound health, bleſſed him alſo with a numerous poſterity, and let him ſee his children in a maturity that rendred them already capable of the government of Empires. So he cauſed his ſon Lewis to be crowned after a general conſent of his Eſtates, and appeared on that day like a Phœnix, which is ſaid to receive a new life from his own aſhes. He walked to the Church in an high Equipage, held up by his ſon, and followed by all the Aſſembly, and having prepared upon the high Altar a Crown, after he had made a long and fervent prayer, proſtrated before God with his dear Lewis, he put the Crown upon his head, and ſaid to him;

My dear ſon, it is to day that I die to the Empires of the World, and that Heaven makes me born again in your perſon. If you will reign happily, fear God, which is the ſource of Empires, and the ſovereign Father of all Dominions: keep his Commandments, and cauſe them to be obſerved with an inviolable fidelity. Take the care and the protection of his Church. Love your young brothers and your ſiſters, rendring your ſelf good and officious to your kindred. Honour the Churchmen as your Fathers; cheriſh tenderly your Subjects, as your children; and be all your life-time the comforter and the Protectour of the poor. Chaſtiſe the vicious, and recompenſe the men of merit. Eſtabliſh not Governmēts, Judges, and Officers, which are not capable and without reproach, and when you have eſtabliſhed them, deprive them not of their charges without a moſt juſt cauſe. Serve firſt of all for an example to all the world, and lead before God and man a life irreproachable.

After this action he ſtaied about a year longer in the world, purifying continually his ſpirit by repentance, by good works, and by the contemplation of heavenly things. And when he ſaw himſelf infected with an extraordinary ſickneſs, he cauſed immediately the Sacraments to be adminiſtred to him, and died with a moſt pious and moſt exemplary death, at the age of ſeventy two years, the fourty ſeventh of his reign, and the fourteenth of his Empire. His Corps were expoſed in publick, cloathed after the manner of a King, with a Sword and the Goſpel, which he had ſo glorioufly defended. Then he was interred with a ſtately Magnificence in the Church of Aix, the Chappel which he had built.

He was univerſally lamented by all the world, as the Father of the Univerſe, and the ſingular ornament of Chriſtianity. The Pagans themſelves wept for him abundance of tears, ſo true it is, that the goodneſs and ſweetneſs of a King towards his Subjects, is a ray of God that renders him lovely in his life, and gives ſplendour even to his aſhes after his death. He was afterward Canonized by Paſchal that was not a lawful Pope; but foraſmuch as the true ſucceſſours of S. Peter never retracted that action, he is held for a Saint, and honoured publickly in the Church, with the approbation of all ages.

Saint

Saint LEWIS.

Lewis the 4th King of France.

I Do not forget that I have already spoken of Saint Lewis in the first Tome; but because that was by accident, and by the way, I will here extend my thoughts somewhat more largely, and give you a more compleat Elogium of him.

It is very true that an Antient saith, That great Goodness is seldom joined with great Power; and that well-accomplished Kings are so few in number, that their names might be comprehended all together within the circumference of a Ring. But I may add, that if God did take delight to carry this Ring in very deed, as the Scripture doth attribute it to him in an Allegory, and if he would engrave there the names of all the good Kings; that of great Saint Lewis would possesse the first place.

This Monarch was so like unto virtue, that if it should have shewed it self on the one side incarnate to mortall eyes, and Saint Lewis on the other, one should hardly have been able to judge, which had been the Copy, and which the Original.

It is not my intention to write of his life here, upon which so many excellent pens have laboured very fortunately, but to make a reflexion upon some principal points of his Government. Great things do not alwayes cause themselves to be known by a multitude, or great variety of discourse, but oftentimes by draughts abbreviated. And no man in my opinion ought to conceive amiss of this, seeing that we measure every day the greatness of the Sun by the shadow of the earth, & his goings, in the Dyals by a little thread. I know that heretofore three lines only represented upon a Table, did set forth an Idea of the perfection of the excellentest Painter in the world, in the understanding of the skilfull; and I will draw here three little draughts for to set before your eyes the beauty and bigness of the virtues of S. Lewis.

In one word, he hath done three marvellous things, whereof the first is, that he found out the means to joyn the wisdom of State with that of the Cross.

The second, that he hath planted humility upon Sceptres, where it hath ordinarily very slippery footing, and hath likewise placed it amongst the Rubies and Diamonds of the Crown, where its lustre is often darkened by the too stately glittering of the World.

The third is, that he hath joined the devotion of one consecrated to Religion to the courage of the Alexanders and Cæsars.

As for that which concerns the first conjunction, it is so rare; that Tertullian, who flourished 200 years after the Nativity of our Lord, when as yet there had no speech bin of any Emperour that had imbraced Christianity, said, That if the Cæsars should become Christians, they would cease to be Cæsars; and if the Christians should become Cæsars, they would cease to be Christians. He conceived, that poorness of spirit could not agree with so high & stately riches, nor humility with a sovereign Empire, or the tears of Repentance with the delights of the Court; that the hungring and thirsting after righteousness could not stand with the desire of Conquerours, nor pitifulness with arms, nor pureness of heart with the conversing with most pleasing beauties, nor peace would consist with the licentiousness of warr, and suffering persecutions with an absolute power to revenge ones self: And nevertheless S. Lewis alone hath found means to joyn things together, which seem so contrary, in the highest degree that ever they were found to be in so kingly an estate. Amidst the riches of a Kingdom so abundant; he was not rich but onely towards the poor, & if God had permitted him he would have as willingly covered himself with the habit of S. Francis, as with his Royal Purple. He did never consider himself otherwise amongst all the goods that he possessed, but as the Steward of Jesus Christ: he left unto God willingly the glory of having given them him, to needy persons the benefit of receiving them, and kept nothing to himself but the pains of distributing them. He assayed a thousand times to enter into Religious orders, and yet still answer was made him, that God would have him to be King: he wore the Crown by way of obedience, he used riches only for necessity, & had no other thing in his desire then spiritual nakedness, and a perfect unloosing himself from all worldly things. In the midst of an Absolute power he was so meek that his heart seemed a Sea, where a calm perpetually reigned. The Scarlet of his attire did never colour his face with the heat of anger. Arrogance did never puff up his words, he made it his glory to communicate himself to the miserablest; & although he was higher then all the Cedars: yet he humbled his eyes even to the smallest worms of the earth. If he appeared in publick with a splendour agreeable to his Dignity; in his retiring, he made his life a continual Repentance, which equalled the strictnes of the severest Religious ones. The zeal of justice was so perfect in him, that he would not usurp a fingers breadth of Land upon his neighbours to the prejudice of his conscience, and his generousnes caused him also to refuse the Empire, which the Pope and all the Princes of Christendom offered him with a general consent, after the deposing of the Emperour Frederick. The exercises of War did never stop up in his heart the pitiful bounties that were there towards the poor, not contenting himself to give them most liberally all that they could expect from his condition, but very often being ready at their hand to provide them with necessaries for their life. Amidst the great tumults of war he was alwayes peaceable, never making any war but for necessity, or for zeal of the glory of God, but carrying throughout all places peace with an exceeding meekness. His chastity amidst all the delights of so great a Realm was alwayes impenetrable by the darts of love; and his heart was like the bed of the Phœnix, which takes no fire but from the beams of the Sun. He was persecuted by the tongues of slanderers, by the arms of his kindred, by the chains and prisons of Infidels, by the ingratitude of those upon whom he had heaped good turnes, without having one least motion to revenge; rendring alwayes good for evil: and if justice did require of him reasonable punishment of the wicked, he paid the Tribute that Kings owe to the Sovereign Power, without ever altering the quietnes of his minde, in such manner, as if you will judge rightly of that which I have said, you will finde that S. Lewis hath brought the eight Beatitudes to the Court, and hath happily joined the highest Maxims of the Gospel, to the Policy of a great Kingdom.

Nevertheless, some one may make himself believe, that he was not sufficiently refined in the Tenets of a great States-man, but that the excessiveness of his devotion must needs mollifie somewhat the vigour of his understanding, and that the tenderness of his conscience was incompatible with the Principles of those Politicians that are compleat in the managing of affairs. I intreat my Reader to consider here the great errour of the Politick ones of the world, that will be wise without God, and believe that the Empires and Kingdoms of Christendom being founded in Piety & Justice can maintain themselves happily, and increase by the subtleties and Maxims that are common amongst the Pagans and Mahometans. Let any one compare the Fredericks (Emperours) that flourished in the same age with Saint Lewis the King, let one weigh the Principles of the one and of the other, let him examine their proceedings, and look upon the successe, and they shall finde, that the honest wisdom of our King hath surpassed all the subtleties of those great brains, and that these lights have as far excelled those their false glances, as the eyes of the Eagles are far above those of the Owls.

The Fredericks aim was to look at themselves, to bring all to their own ends, to complain against the Pope, to contest with the Princes, to regard nothing but their own greatnes, to have nothing in esteem but their own interest, to measure the true and the false by their own profit, to keep Religion under the State, to think that a good conscience was an hinderance to great designs, and that there was nothing unjust, of all that was profitable and glorious in appearance for so high a Monarchy, to employ all the subtleties and all rigour that might obtain their purposes, to beat down all that they might raise themselves, and to ruine all to make themselves great. S. Lewis on the contrary caused the glory and interest of God to march at the head of his actions, esteemed himself little, prized the benefit of the publick above all things, honoured the Pope with a singular reverence, entertained as much as he could Peace with the Princes of Christendom, never undertook any thing to the prejudice of his conscience, would not buy a Kingdom with the smallest lye, made every thing serve for Religion, valued nothing great that was not just, nothing glorious that agreed not with equity, and measured all by the Law of God, and the benefit of his Subjects.

If it be true, which our Saviour saith, That we should judge of men by their deeds and by the fruits of their actions; who sees not, that those men with their refined politick Maxims did very ill govern themselves, seeing that after so general a dissipation of bloud, of men and of wealth, they buried their fortunes in the ruines of the publick? And this man with his honesty, which others do take for simplicity, did free himself happily from civil warrs, frustrated the subtleties of the craftiest, brought to the ground the strength of the mightiest, securing his Crown and Scepter in the hands of a woman against the enterprises of men subtle and interessed. He made forein warrs for the pure glory of God without oppressing his people. He governed his Kingdom in Peace, in Piety, in Justice, and in the abundance of all things, leaving a large posterity, which sits even yet upon the chief Thrones of Christendom.

May we not well affirm that this Prince was indued with marvellous wisdom; seeing that he knew God the fountain of all Essences, and judged of all things according to the Rules of the eternal truth? From this Fountain there ran down in his soul two Rivulets, which were, the great contempt that he had of the world, and the perfect union which he had with God, which poured forth a vigorous influence upon all his undertakings. From hence came that good choice that he took for the ordering of his life, mingling contemplation with action, which were as two sisters mutually helping each other. It happens sometimes to men, that some are carryed away with the world, and others flying from it, carry it along with them, The one let themselves run with the torrent of corruptions, the other retiring themselves to solitarines, carry with them all their worldly affections which do but sleep, and cast forth still sparkles under the ashes. But S. Lewis being within the world, was nothing less then of the world; seeing that amidst the meeting with so many people, which encompassed him every day, he built himself a desart in his heart; and in the midst of a great Sea of affairs, he lived as the fishes that are silent in the roarings of the waves, and keep themselves fresh amidst the briny waters.

The sweet familiarity that he had with his Redeemer, did not steal from him the care of his employments, and Government of his Kingdom; seeing that alwayes like the beams of the Sun, he touched the earth without leaving heaven.

The second marvel of S. Lewis, is, to have lodged humility upon the glittering splendor of his Diadem, & to have preserved this place for it, amongst all the occasions which might invite him to make use of his greatnes. One may avouch that this virtue in what place soever it is found, is alwayes great, and S. Paul justly justly calls it, the virtue of Jesus Christ by excellency: but when it mingles it self with the estate of Great ones, it carryes away the admiration of mankind. We are all born with the desire of honour, and this appetite deviated from its proper excellence is found even in the lowest persons. In the age past, there was found in India a people called the Verrais, of so gross an understanding, and uncomely in body, which lived so basely that they eat nothing but roasted Ants and Crocodiles tails, and nevertheless they were so proud, that when they spake to them of baptizing them, they asked if they should be baptized in the same water with other people, and if they would have no respect to their quality. If presumption doth take such hold on such base souls, I leave it to you to consider what effect it might have on those that are lifted up in all qualities above the common sort. There is no doubt that ambition ruleth over all our actions; and that to see a Prince humble amidst the flatteries of the Court, modest with an absolute power, victorious over vanity in the midst of the great mortifying of truth, which comes into the cabinet of Kings, like money into their coffers, with very much disguising and diminution, is a wonder almost as rare as if one should see the stars to walk on the earth.

And nevertheless S. Lewis, as he had very great wisdom and a perfect knowledge of the life of man, was a soul the most humble, the most meek and most amiable that ever conversed amongst men in the like estate. Princes have had at all times an high ambition to carry in their titles great names. There are some which have caused themselves to be called the brethren of the Sun, & cosins to the Stars, others would be the Arms, the Eyes, the Rubies of the world, and some the Saviours and the Gods: but our Monarch named himself Lewis of Poyssy the humble servant of Jesus, accounting it, that the highest greatness of a Scepter was to serve God. Hence he desired nothing so ardently, in all his behaviour, as to humble himself before God, by a perfect examination, without retaining any thing more of himself then this high point of humility. When he entred into Damiata, the first town that he conquered in his voyage to Egypt, he caused not himself to be carried in a chariot drawn with Lions or Elephants as the Roman Captains use to do, but he caused the Cross to march before him, and followed it with a bare head and naked feet. And when at the Council of Lyons they spoke of giving him the name and quality of an Emperour, he avoided that honour like a tempest, and chose rather the extremity of sufferings amongst the Saracens, then to ascend into the throne of the Cæsars. He carryed his Royalty, as it were a mountain on his back; and there was no greater servitude in the world to him, then his greatness. When he could free himself of the necessary ceremonies in publick for a person of his quality, and that he had full liberty to converse with inferiour ones, he was as a fish in his water. This wise humility caused that he entertained the whole world, every one according to his degree with great consideration. He honoured the Queen his Mother all his life time with a respect which approached near to reverence. He was wonderfully kind to all his kindred, & courteous to all those that came to him, which he did without ceremonies, without constraint, but with an unparalleld cordialness; for that his humility was rooted in a deep charity which gave all the motions to his soul. He walked oftentimes in publick in a plain garment of chamlet; and if he had seen the riot that now reigns in our behaviour, he would have taken our conversation for some Mascorade. He conversed not only with the plainest, but abased himself continually even to the feet of the poor, & that the most ill favour'd. He was seen to bow himself, & to make clean the ulcers of the leprous, so horrible that people cast bread to them afar off, not any one daring to come near them. He was seen in the champians of Asia and Africa, to seek out the bodies of his poor Subjects all stinking with corruption, to bury them with his Royal hand. O what a triumph of humility is here! O what ardency of charity! and where is it that God can place the condemnation of our pride and hardness of our hearts more high, then upon the person of this great King?

The third marvel his devotion and courage.

Lastly, the third miracle that we observe in the life of S. Lewis, is, that he hath joined the devotion of the most perfect religious ones, with the courage of the most invincible conquerours. Here it is that I do challenge all those brave ones in appearance, all those Phantasms of valour, for to testifie unto them that S. Lewis was one of the most valiant & most courageous Princes that ever bore Scepter in Christendom. For where is valiantness placed, according to Aristotle, if it be not conceived in the understanding? & if it tend not to virtuous actions, would you that I should account it an action of courage & ability to hew men in pieces, & to fill the world with massacres, for to cõtent the rage, for to nourish an ambition, or satisfy a revenge? God forbid that we should judge so basely of a virtue that makes thẽ demigods. If the intentions thereof be not right, if the actions thereof be not justifiable, if its effects be not cõmendable, its is a spirit that seduces us, and not a perfection that rectifies us.

The valour of S. Lewis was the effect of a lively faith, of an incomparable wisdom, of a strong and puissant charity; faith filled him with confidence, wisdom with moderation, & charity with boldness. This valour was enlivened by three loves, which the Divines do observe, which are, the love incomparable, the love ardent, and the love indefatigable. The love incomparable, caused him to forsake a great and flourishing Kingdom, (filled with peace, contentments, and delights, where he might have lived under the shadow of his Palm-trees in all happiness,) to transport himself into the Land of the Saracens, & there to suffer all the inconveniencies of nature. The same love caused him to carry the Queen his wife, young and tender, amongst so many foaming rocks, so many seas, so many monsters, and so many tempests. The same love perswaded him to embark the Princes his children in their tender age in this voyage, conceiving that he ought not to spare any thing which the service of God might require. The ardent love caused him to expose his Royal person, not onely to weariness, but to the most dangerous blows of battels. There is a certain jealous strictness of judgment, in the understanding of men, which would not that any one person should be excellent in the degree of Sovereignty in too illustrious qualities. The reputation of Arms took away the high title of eloquence from Julius Cæsar; and we may see that S. Lewis contented himself with his rare devotion, without taking that high part that he deserved in valour. But this is the truth, that he was courageous, heroical, and valiant above all those brave ones whom the opinion of men do often deifie without very much desert. Together with all his devotion, he seemed to have obliged himself to take up arms against his enemies, even from his tendereſt infancy. He made wars both by Sea & Land in Europe, Asia, & Africa. He was set upon in his minority by the neighbouring Princes, & by the greatest Lords of his State, from which he freed himself, both by wisdom and valour, marching forth into the field, with the assistance of God, and good counsel of his Mother. He disarmed Philip his Uncle by courtesie, the English by force; he vanquished the inconstancy of Theobald by his stedfastness, & the self-conceitedness of Peter de Drues by his patience. After he had pacified his Kingdom, he undertook the Holy War, by a pious generousness of heart, in the which he shewed marvellous valiantness of his person.

Joinville that was present saith, that he stoutly ventured himself into the hottest conflicts of the battalions, & fought fiercely with his own hand, scattering and overthrowing the Saracens that opposed his enterprizes. They speak much of the valour of Attila, that visiting a certain place, was set upon by two souldiers, that had a purpose to kill him, & escaped both the one and the other by his valour and mention. But S. Lewis on a day having gone aside from the Army, was set upon by six whom he put to flight by a victorious resistance. When they were in some doubt about going a shore in his first voyage to Africa, he was the first that threw himself upon the Coast of the Enemies with his sword in his hand without any amazement, although he was up to the neck in water. When he was seen at the beginning of the battel arrayed in his Royal Arms, he appeared like a Sun to the whole Army; but as soon as he began to enter into the fight, he was like a lightning that made a wonderfull flashing upon the Infidels; together with all the misfortune of the time, wherewith he was overborne: he took the great and famous City of Damiata in his first voyage, he discomfited the Saracens in two battels, he fortified four great places in Syria, he compelled the Emmiers of Egypt to restore him his prisoners, he provided for the safety of all the Christians that were remaining in Palestine. In his second voyage, he vanquished at the first onset the Africans which had anciently made Italy, Greece, and Spain to tremble, and had so long time disputed for the Empire of the world with the Romans; and if he had not been hindred by sickness, he had forthwith made himself Master of Tunis and Carthage.

Behold what this ardent love did by his hands. But the love indefatigable, the true and faithful character of a great stoutness of courage, caused him not to be amazed at any thing & that he continued with an invincible magnanimity, under the most burthensome accidents that contraried his enterprizes. This love caused him to make tryal of another voyage, after the sad accidents of the first: this love caused that the seas filled with terrours, the Lands with Ant-heaps of Saracens formed into Battalions, the air that seemed from every part to let fly arrows of pestilence, the wayes which were full of toils, the wars of terrours and massacres, the encounters of evil success, and the champions of a million of divers kinds of death, never altered the constancy of his invincible heart. The very day of his captivity, after he had lost a great battel which overthrew all his affairs, when as he saw the wayes covered with the dead bodies of his servants, when he saw the river Nilus smoaking and bubling up the French bloud, when as the arrows of the Saracens did fly round about his head, like the hail on a Winters day, when as he was taken and carried to the Aunt of the Sultan, & that he heard the clamours of those outrageous mouths, that he saw so many infernal faces that might shake a soul of the stoutest temper, he remained still in a great tranquillity of mind, and asked his Page for his book of prayers, which being ready, he began to perform the duty of his Orazons, which he presented every day to God, with as quiet a spirit as if he had been returned from taking a walk in his gardens. The very day that he was seized upon by the pestilence, he beheld death coming upon him, with a settled countenance, he disposed of the affairs of his Kingdom and of his house, with a great judgement; gave very excellent instructions to the Prince's children, comforted all his good servants, strengthened himself with the Sacraments, entred into extasies of divine love, which drove out of his heart all the cares of this present life. The poor Prince sooner failed of his life then he could fail of his constancy and faithfulness to his high virtue.

It is here, O Providence, that you cover with a canopy of the night & darkness the great events of the affairs of the world, it is here that we acknowledge your government. This Prince so wise, so humble, so holy, which deserved that the world should bend under his Laws, & to have constrained good fortune to fly no where but about his colours; in the mean while was handled by you, as it seems to many, not like to an indulgent Mother; but as by a step-mother, severe & rigorous. Alas! the Lands haue often undertaken the yoke, and the seas have spread their back with coverlids by a pleasing calmness under the arms & vessels of Pirats. Was there none but this Monarch to whom all creatures ought to have serv'd as a defence, that could deserve to be so evil handled at your hands? In the first of his expeditions he lost his liberty, and in the second his life. What is the meaning of this, O Providence? draw the curtain a little, uncover your secrets, and unseal our eyes to behold them.

She answereth that the general truth hath revealed to us in the Gospel his judgment on this point, when he said to the Jews, which were come to take him, behold your hour & the power of darkness. It is true, that by a certain order of God, & for causes very reasonable, well known to his Providence, the evil spirits have their reign & their time, wch good men are not able to hinder, no more then the winter & the night; and that the sovereign Creatour & Governour of all things hath limited their powers and their endurings by certain celestial periods, wch being not yet come to an end, do make all the endeavours which can be used to destroy them unprofitable. This is the cause why there is not taken in hand with such eagerness as might be, Wars in the East and Africa, nor that we should undertake great designs against the powers of darkness, if we cānot see by very evident conjectures that God directs us as by the hand. Nevertheless, as he reveals not alwayes to the Saints, the times & seasons of Empires, it happens, that those that with great zeal, and very rational prudence, do embark themselves in generous designs to advance the glory of God, should not justly alwayes be commended even in the default of good success. And I may very well say, that the most glorious actions of S. Lewis was his prison and his death: For to kill the Saracens, to make mountains of dead bodies, rivers of bloud, to overthrow Cities all in a smoak; this is that which Chamgy & Tamerlan have done. But to do that wch S. Lewis hath done, it is it which hath no compare it is that which the Angels would do willingly, if they could merit it by a mortal Body. God which had drawn him from his Kingdom with the faith of Abraham, which had led him through so many dangers with the guiding of Moses, gave him in the end, to seal up his great actions, the patience of Job. And to counterballance that, which the world esteems mishap, he would have him to govern a great Kingdom a long time, with an high wisdom, & profound peace, an exact justice for the good & repose of his people, & an uncredible sweetness of spirit, wh h hath made him the most amiable of all Kings on the earth, and a great Saint in Paradise, by the consent of all mortals, and the Universal approbation of the Church.

JUDITH.

JUDITH. HESTER.

EXpect nothing Feminine in this Woman, all in her is Male, all in her is Generous, all in her is full of Prodigies. Nature hath put nothing in her but the Sex, ſhe hath left to Virtue to make up the reſt, who after ſhe had laboured a long time in this her Maſter-piece, incorporated her ſelf in her work. Never was beauty better placed then upon this face, which bears a mixture of Terrour and of Love: Lovely in its Graces, Terrible in its valour. What a Court-Lady is this, that came thither for nothing but to draw the ſword? Her hand did much by deſtroying an 100000 men in one onely head; but her eye did much more then her hand: it was that, that firſt triumphed over Holophernes, and with a little ray of its flames burnt up a whole army. O what a magnificent employment had Love in this act of hers! and to ſay truth, he conſecrated his arrows; never was he innocent in his Combats, never was he ſo glorious in his Triumphs.

Repreſent to your ſelves a Nabuchadnezzar in the flower of his age, in the vigour of his Conqueſts holding a ſecret Council wherein he makes a reſolution to ſubdue the World. After a ſhort concluſion of an affair ſo great, he calls Holophernes, and commands him to march towards the Weſt with an Army of 100000 Foot, and 12000 Horſe. All the Captains aſſemble themſelves together, and in all places ſouldiers ſwarm. It ſeems that that brave General did nothing but give a ſtamp with his foot to procreate armed men. Behold him already environed with Legions all glittering with fire and flames; his Army is on foot with an horrible Artillery of military Engines, and a great preparation of Victual and Ammunition. It ſeemed that heaven looked upon this Hoſt with affrightment, and that the earth ecchoed at every ſtep under the clattering of its Arms. The motions of it give terrour to the ſtouteſt ſort, and confuſion to the weaker; before it marches Noyſes, Affrights, and Threats; after it, Weepings, Ruins, and Deſolations.

Holophernes is in the middle as a Giant with an hundred arms, which promiſes to himſelf to demoliſh ſmoaking Cities, to overthrow Mountains, and to beat all Arms to powder with the lightning of his eyes. Ambaſſadours of all Nations are ſeen waiting at his gate, who preſent unto him Crowns, who offer Tapers and Incenſe, deſire peace and mercy of him, and beſeech him to grant them ſervitude. But this ſupercilious General would march upon the heads of men, and make himſelf a river of Bloud to water therewith his Palms.

Fame that publiſhing with an hundred mouths the waſts that that Army made on all ſides, failed not to fly unto Jeruſalem, and to carry that ſad news unto the people of God. Nothing was then heard but the ſighs and groans of a ſcared people, who beholding that furious Tempeſt coming afar off had neither heart nor arms to oppoſe themſelves againſt it. Their courages were diſmaied, their hands weak, their tongues mute; they had no other defence but their tears which they powred out in abundance to begin the funerals of their Countrey.

Manaſſeh reigned at that time in Jeruſalem, ſeven hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord, who ſeeing no expedient to divert this miſery, abandoned himſelf to ſilence, and to darkneſs. But Joachim the High Prieſt, executing a Captains office together with a Prieſts, encouraged his poor people, & wiped off their tears to make them ſee the firſt ray of hope which they conceived of their dear Liberty.

He diſpatches Poſts to all parts, and commands the cities that were menaced with the marches of that army to contribute all that they were able, of Mony Iron, Men, and Victuals, to beat back the common Enemy; and above all to prepoſſeſs themſelves of the ſtreights of the mountains, to ſtop up the paſſages, where a few men would be able to do much, rather then to expect them in the champian, where ſo great forces would ſwallow up all that could be oppoſed againſt them.

After this he commands publick prayers to be made, where the Altar of God was covered with ſackcloth, and the Prieſts with hair-cloth, all the people were at their ſupplications, tears, and faſtings, even the children proſtrated themſelves on the earth and cryed to implore the mercy of God.

This excellent High-Prieſt not being ignorant that that with Piety we ought to move the hand, contented not himself onely to weep before the Altar, but visited in person the Cities and Burghs, comforting the afflicted, stirring up the slack, strengthning the weak, and doing that which the infusion of the soul doth in the Body, in giving life and vigour to all the members of the State.

The news comes to Holophernes, that the Jews prepared themselves to make resistance to his Army whereat he entred into great fits of choler, and called the Princes of the Ammonites and of the Moabites that were in his army with him, to know what forces that people might have that were disposed to make an opposition. Then Achior Prince of the Ammonites rose up, and made him a long narration of the original and qualities of the Jews, telling him by piece-meal how that Nation came from the Chaldeans, and separated themselves from them by reason of Religion, despising all the Gods of the Gentiles, and believing but one God the Maker of Heaven and earth. He added how they went into Egypt when there was a great famine, and that they were there so exceedingly multiplyed, that they began to give terrour to the Egyptians, who ceased not to torment them. But that God revenged their injuries by horrible plagues from Heaven, that made havock of all Egypt, so that their Land-Lords were constrained to let them go whithersoever it seemed good unto them.

But Pharaoh the King having made a resolution to pursue them, and to destroy them utterly, was buried with all his Army in the red-Sea, through which that people had passed on dry-foot. From thence they journeyed through the barren deserts of Arabia, where their God miraculously nourished them, giving them food from heaven, and commanding the Rocks to open to them springs and fountains. Furthermore he advertised Holophernes that when things were well between their Master and them, they were invincible, which visibly appeared by the victories they obtained over the Amorites, the Jebusites, and the Pereszites, and other, Nations which they had devoured as fire would do the chaff, possessing themseves of their Lands, and estates. But if it happened that they were defiled with some iniquity, there was nothing more weak then they, by reason that they were then forsaken of heaven, and left to their own selves: and therefore he advised him not to hazard any thing against them, before he knew the condition wherein they were at present, because that if they were well united to the Deity, wch they worshipped, he should carry away nothing but confusion.

Holophernes's Captains hearing Achior's discourse, loaded him with reproaches; for that he had so much as a thought that so small an handful of people, and ill trained, should be able to resist a Royal Army of Nabuchadnezzars. The General holds him for a mad man, and commands him to be delivered to the Jews since he was a Jew in heart & affection. And indeed, the souldiers having taken him and bound him to a tree, left him to the discretion of those of the City of Bethulia, who carryed him away, and having presented him to the Priests that governed, and to all the Assembly of the City, enquired of him of all that had passed about him. He straightway made them a long discourse, and exalted the Testimonies that he had given to the Majesty of their God, whereat all betook themselves to weep for joy, and praised the Divine Goodness, prostrating themselves on the ground, and promising all favour to their Prisoner.

In the mean while Holophernes causes his Troops to advance to surprise the little Bethulia, but he saw himself combated by men invisible, hidden in the mountains, that much gauled his Army, being cooped up in very narrow passages. His captains counselled him not to torment his souldiers unprofitably, but to seize onely upon the Channels of the fountains that carryed the water to the City, and that would be a means to take it without putting himself to much trouble. This was performed, and it proved very effectual; for the people seeing themselves deprived of the commodities of those fair sources that gave them drink, begin to murmur aloud against the Priests, who by their rashness had resisted so prodigious a power, against the example of so many Nations, and cry out that they were better render themselves to the Assyrians, then see their wives & children buried in the same tomb. Ozias in the absence of Joachim appeased them by his tears, & caused them to resolve on a patience of five days.

This City of Bethulia had within the circuit of its walls a great Treasure, whose merit it was not yet sufficiently acquainted with. It was the valorous Judith, in whom heaven had put rare qualities, & God had chosen her to give safety to her Countrey. She was of an high extraction, of the Tribe of Reuben three years and an half a Widow, beautiful even to perfection, of a chastity and reputation inviolable, extream rich, but above all, devout and virtuous. She had built on the top of her house a little Solitude whither she with her maids retired themselves to be vacant to things Divine; there was her Oratory, there her intercourses with God, and from thence mounted to Heaven her prayers that carried up the groans of her people even to the throne of the most High.

The holy Lady had her innocent flesh loaden with a rough hair-cloth, fasted every day, except the Saturdayes, and the solemn feasts that were amongst the Jews, her heart was inflamed with an incredible zeal of the glory of God, and touched to the quick with the miseries of her people.

When she understood what had been resolved on at the Assembly, and that the City was to be yielded in five days, if it had no other relief; she spake to Ozias the Prince of the people, and to the Priests that governed, and made them a most excellent advertisement upon what had passed at their last convention. She told them; That it was to tempt God, to prescribe to him the time of his mercies, and not to expect it of his Providence; that it did not belong to men to dispose of heaven, who are reserved to the disposal of their Sovereign Master; that they ought onely to think upon the performance of an exact repentance for the sins of their life past, and imploring the divine clemency with the effusion of tears, which well knew how to find a remedy to so great necessities. She made them understand that good men are necessarily proved by divers Tribulations, & that those that bear them with patience are at last glorious before God; But those that disquiet themselves and murmur, have no profit by their afflictions, & provoke wrath from on high that redoubles scourge upon scourge to punish their rebellion.

In the end she perswaded them, that seeing they were the Heads of the People, and that so many souls breathe not but by their breath, they would not fail to exhort them to a further patience. The principal men of the City were ravished with a mouth that spake so divinely; and the words that issued from so fair a source, had a grace incomparable to subdue the most obdurate hearts. They all avowed that she was a woman according to the heart of

God

God, that had ſpoken worthily, & there was nothing deficient in her diſcourſe. But ſhe ſubmitted her ſelf by a great humility to their judgments, and beſeeched them to leave one of the city gates free for her to go out at that very night, accompanied with her ſervant, for ſhe had ſome good work in her heart for the ſafety of her Countrey; and intreated, that it might be recommended to the prayers of the whole Aſſembly without curiouſly inquiring what it was that God would do by her means. Ozias anſwered her that ſhe might go in peace; and that he prayed that her action might ſucceed to the good of the univerſal people.

Here perhaps may ſome men be aſtoniſhed, that a woman ſhould take the boldneſs to go and adviſe the Magiſtrates, and the Prieſts; and the ſeverer ſort of cenſurers will ſay, that by right Judith ſhould have been ſent home to her diſtaff. They will alledge, that the Jews give every day thanks to God in their prayers for that he had not made them be born Women. Antienly, they were placed in the Churches on the North-ſide, from whence the Scripture makes all the evil of the world to come. Chryſologus hath alſo ſaid, that woman was the Way of Death, the Title of the ſepulcher, & the gate of Hell.

But this ought to be underſtood of thoſe that follow the ſteps of the firſt of Women, & not the wayes of the chief of Virgins. Thoſe who abandon themſelves to luxury, to vanity, and to diſſolute pleaſures are no way fit for great affairs, being too delicate for labour, and too ambitious of honour. But many others that have taken pains in the regulating of their paſſions, have rendred great ſervices to Kingdoms and Common-wealths. Rome had never been Rome without the Sabine women. The people of the North, by the report of Tacitus, have been governed in their Wars and in their Polities by women; profeſſing that they perceived in them a certain prophetick and divine ſpirit. Plato in his Common-wealth hath judged them capable of Offices, their ſouls being of the ſame ſpecies or kind as men's. Wherefore then ſhould we think it ſtrange that God made uſe of a virtuous woman to counſel men and to deliver her Countrey?

Before ſhe undertook that great work, ſhe was a long time proſtrated before God in her Oratory, with ſackcloth upon her back, and aſhes upon her head, ſaying, with an amorous heart.

My God, the God of my Fathers, to whom nothing is impoſſible, look down now upon the camp of the Aſſyrians with that eye of lightnings and of thunders that thou heretofore didſt caſt upon the army of Egyptians when they were buried in the bottom of the Sea. Let the ſame happen to thoſe here that truſt in their chariots of war, in their ſpears, and in their ſwords, and know not that thou art the God of heaven that breakeſt in pieces the mighty powers of the earth with one ſole look of thine eyes: lift up that ſame arm that hath made it ſelf renown'd from all antiquity by ſo many wonders: and tread under-foot all their ſtrength by thine for ever dreadful forces. Suffer them not to violate thy Temple, and to ſack the Houſe where thy Name is from all time invoked. Cauſe this barbarous Colonel, who promiſes himſelf our ſpoils, to be taken by me through the ſnares of his eyes, that his own Courtel-ax may divide his ſoul and body. Strike him with the grace that thy bleſſing ſhall make to flow upon my lips, and with the eloquence that it ſhall give to my ſpeeches; animate my heart, and ſtiffen my arm to make that great blow that ſhall be thine, and carry away an eternal honour for having pulled down that Coloſſus by a womans hand. Thy ſtrength is not in the multitude of ſouldiers, nor in the valour of Cavaliers. It is not thoſe proud warriours that ought to expect the ſuccour of thy arm: but it is the Prayer of the humble that gains thy heart, and draws thy forces to their protection. God of the heavens, creatour of the waters, and the God of all nature, hear thy poor ſervant that preſumes nothing but from thy mercy. Remember thy Covenant, give counſel to my heart, words to my mouth, and ſtrength to my hands, for the defence of thy Houſe; and that all the Nations of the habitable world may know, that there is not any other God but thee.

Such were the Arms and Engines of this excellent woman; ſuch was the confidence ſhe had in the God of hoſts. After this prayer, ſhe riſes from her Oratory, comes down from her chamber, & calls her maid to dreſs her. She puts off the ſackcloth, ſhe waſhes her ſelf, ſhe perfumes her ſelf, & quitting the mourning habit which ſhe wore in her widow-hood, ſhe puts on her gayeſt cloathing. The treſſes of her long hairs are combed out with a delicate hand, and her head covered with a ſtately tyre; her handſome body appeared a little taller by the favour of her patins; ſhe hangs on her pendants at her ears; ſhe puts on her bracelets, her chain of pearls, her rings, certain jewels made in form of flower-de-Luce's, and all her richeſt ornaments. It ſeemed that God took a pleaſure that day to render her fairer then ever ſhe had been, and that all the graces ſmiled in her countenance; becauſe ſhe had adorned her ſelf through virtue and not through wantonneſs.

She cauſed her meat & drink to be carryed by her maid, fearing to pollute her body with the viands of the Infidels; and inſtantly ſhe went out of her houſe, and betook her ſelf to the city gate, where ſhe found Ozias the Prince, together with the Prieſts, that were raviſhed with the luſtre of her heavenly beauty. Yet no body curiouſly inquired whither ſhe was going, but were contented to wiſh that God would make her deſigns ſucceſful, that ſhe might be one day the honour of Jeruſalem, and that her name might be put in the rank of thoſe great & holy ſouls that had rendred to God moſt renouned ſervices. She departs out of the city, calling again upon the name of God, and reciting ſome prayers with her ſervant.

As ſhe went down the mountain upon the break of day, the ſouldiers having perceived her, failed not to run to her, and ſeeing her ſo excellently beautiful, were at firſt dazled in their eyes more by the ſplendour of her viſage then by the firſt rays of the day that then was upon its birth. They inform themſelves of her country, of her journey, & of her intentions; whereto ſhe anſwered, that ſhe was of Bethulia and that ſhe had that day forſaken that miſerable city, that was obſtinate in its miſery, & that, for having reſiſted the triumphant legions of the Aſſyrians deſerved to be deſtroyed by the thunder-bolts of heaven and earth. That ſhe would have no ſhare in their crime, no more then in their diſaſters; and that her deſire was to preſent her ſelf to Holopharnes to reveal to him the ſecrets of the city, and to teach him the means how to take it without looſing any of his men.

Theſe men were raviſhed at the hearing of theſe diſcourſes, and aſſured her that ſhe had taken an excellent courſe to live in quiet, and in honour, & that ſhe would be very welcome to their maſter of whom ſhe ſhould receive all poſſible courteſies.

Some men will marvel at all this proceeding of Judith: A woman ſo handſome & ſo capable to tempt men, to go into the midſt of Souldiers without fearing to expose her modesty that was so dear to her, not considering that she kindled love, and that she was yet in the fair season of her years capable to admit that which she moved in others: Who had told her that the Assyrians would let her freely pass without attempting any thing upon her honour? What security could there be in a dissolute Militia, that propound to themselves the ravishing of women for a recompense of their toils? And suppose she had promised her self, that in case she should be forced, her soul should remain incorruptible in the corruption of her body; yet sure an honest woman would hardly ever expose her body to the lest affront, although it were to save a City.

If we consider all this according to man, it cannot be defended: but who should dare so to condemn that which was done by a manifest inspiration of God, and of her good Angel that led her, as by the hand, and made her walk securely upon the tops of precipices, and kept her always green as the Ivie in the ruines of old decayed walls?

With all this she was skilful in the art of dissembling, and deceived those souldiers that took a singular pleasure to hear her talk. And who would make a scruple to speak words with two meanings to deceive an enemy in war, and to save his life, seeing that some Divines and the Lawyers agree that there are deceits that are good and commendable, being done to a good end, and by lawful means?

She was then conducted to the General Holophernes, whom she found seated, on his Throne under a pavillion of gold and purple, all bestudded with Emralds, proud as a peacock that spreads in the sun the mirrours of his tail, for which alone he seems to have been created. She suddenly prostrates her self on the earth, and makes him a reverence of civility, and not of adoration. He failed not to be taken with her at first sight, just as she had plotted, and to make of his eyes the snares of his soul.

Those that were about him began to say with admiration, that the land that bore so handsome women, deserved to have no labour spared in its conquest. Holophernes caused her instantly to be raised up again, and because she feigned that she had some fear, and that she was seized with a profound reverence at the aspect of that great General of an Army, knowing well that he was vain, and that it would conduce much to surprise him. He speaks to her with an incomparable sweetness, assuring her that he was not so terrible as men would make him, and that since that he had had the arms of that great Monarchy in his hands, he never did hurt to any one that rendred himself to the obedience of his Master, that he bore no ill will to her Nation, but that if they had reduced themselves to their duty, he would not have permitted so much as that a sword should have been lifted up against them. And therefore he desired to know from whence it came that she had forsaken her City and was come to his Camp.

Then that Lady holily-deceitful began to speak to him after such a winning manner, that an hundred Holophernes's would have had work enough to defend themselves against such batteries of Love. She beseeched him to hear with attention, and to take her speeches in good part, by which God would accomplish a great affair.

That she knew well that Nebuchadnezzar had been chosen of God to be King of the whole world, and that all the puissance of his Monarchy was included in Holophernes, where it lived and triumphed magnificently for the safety of the good, & the chastisement of the wicked. That she was not so ignorant of humane things, as not to have heard of the Prudence & valour of an Holophernes, who hath the honour to be the only man in the Kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar that is arrived to so high a degree of Power, as that it cannot be equalled by any thing in the world, but by the goodness of his disposition: for he desires to be powerful for nothing but to do good, & all the Provinces well know the good order that he hath put to all the businesses of the Realm. She declared to him, that she had heard of what had passed in Achior's person, and told him, that he truly discovered the weak spirit of her Nation, and that he might do good upon it at the present, now God was provoked against it & had threatned by his Prophets to destroy it. And therefore they were all seized with an unspeakable affright, besides that hunger & thirst conspired together to their ruine, & they had taken a resolution to kill all the cattel to drink their blood and not to spare even the things consecrated to the divine Majesty, wch is a sign of a manifest reprobation. And this was the reason that she had left that abominable city, and was come as a messenger from God, to give him this advice. She added, that the God which she adored was very great, and that she would not fail to pray him to make known his will, and to tell her the time that he hath determined for the utmost misery of that unfortunate City, with intention to inform him of the news, that at last she might lead him even to the gates of Jerusalem, delivering up to him all that people as sheep without a shepherd, and that there should not be so much as a dog that should bark against him; it being very reasonable that men and beasts should submit themselves under a power so formidable, conducted by the hand of the most High, and by the orders of his Providence.

Holophernes that had already been taken by the Eyes, was now chained by the Ears with the sweetness and profit of that discourse. His heart was no more his own; he courts her, and promises her that her God shall be his God, and that he will make her great in the house of Nebuchadnezzar, & renowned through all the earth. At the same instant he causes her to enter into the chamber where his treasures were, to shew her his Magnificence, and ordered what should be given her day, by day, from his own table for her diet. Whereto she answered, that it was not yet permitted her according to her Law to enter into a community of table with those that are of any other Religion but her own, and that providing for it, she had caused what was necessary for her to be brought with her. But when your provision comes to fail (sayes Holophernes) what shall we do with you? She replyed that she hoped to accomplish the business that had brought her thither, before that her ordinary food should be spent. Thereupon, he commanded that she should be conducted into a fair chamber to repose her self, but before she entred into it, she desired a courtesie, which was, that she might go out before day to address her Prayers to the God she worshipped, according to her custome, and passe up and down in his Camp with all freedom, which was granted to her.

She went therefore in the silence of the night to wash her self in a secret fountain, that she might purifie her self from the commerce of those Infidels, and prayed God incessantly, that it would please him to prosper her design for the deliverance of her Countrey.

She had now passed four days in the Army watching ing an opportunity to execute that which she had projected, when Holophernes would needs entertain himself with mirth, and make a magnificent feast, to which he resolved to invite his guest, thinking good cheer and jollity would dispose her to that which he had a mind to have of her. But because the Assyrians hold it a great dishonour for a man to make love to a woman, and not to win her, he would not hazard himself so much as to make an overture to her of such a discourse himself, but gave the Commission of it to a Vagoa, the chief Gentleman of his Chamber, who used to serve him in such a business. He failed not to make her know that she was very far in the favour of his Master, and that, that very day he made a Banquet, and desired to see her in particular, and that she should take heed of making a scruple of obeying; for it was one of the greatest honours that she could receive in her whole life: He added, that she ought a little to be merry, and pass away her time without engendring melancholy: she understood well what he meant to say, and answered, that she was wholly disposed to obey his Lords commands, and would have no other will but his, and straight-way adorns and dresses her self the most pleasingly she could, to wound him in the eies, and so passes into her Chamber.

As soon as he saw her alone and near him, his heart was totally overthrown; and it seemed that the lightning that issued out of the eies of that beauty, had crushed it to powder. His passion permitted him not to speak much, he was so much moved: he contented himself only with inviting her to be merry, and assuring her that she had gained his heart. The holy woman prayed him, that it might seem good in his eies, that she might entertain her self after her own fashion, and that she might eat of that which her servant had prepared for her, which he consented to, being willing to leave her in a full liberty, that he might not scare nor trouble her.

Now behold him the happiest man in the whole World. He drinks with large draughts, make himself exceeding merry and wonderfully pleasant, whereat Judith expressed that she had great content to see him in so good an humour, and said, That she had cause to reckon in time to come that day for the happiest of all her life. The other to please her, drank so much the more, so that he made himself drunk with a dead drunkenness. It appears plainly, that this man was an honest hog, and took not the way to bring about his design, depriving himself of reason when he had most need of it. Vagoa that had the word, does his office, brings his Master to bed, gets him gone, shutting the door to leave him alone with Judith. All the servants had so well liquoured themselves, that they desired nothing but repose. Judith alone was well awake, and made a sign to her servant to stay for her before the door, and not to leave her.

She contemplates this brave General who was now in a dead sleep; she stands still for a certain time by his bed-side, praying God ardently in her silence that it would please him to accomplish by her hand that great stroke that she had destined. From thence she goes to the Pillar where Holophernes's Cimetre was hanged, and draws it boldly out of the Scabbard, then laies hold of her man by his long hair, saying only in her heart, My God, it is now, strengthen my arm: and instantly having turned him for her best advantage, she strikes with a masculine hand, and cuts off his head at two strokes, carries away his Pavillion, and tumbled down his body as a log. She gives suddenly his head to her waiting-woman, who puts it up in the same bag that she had brought her victuals in, and both of them pass through the midst of the Army without being staied by any one, by reason of the permission that they had from the General Holophernes.

They come by night to the Gate of the City, and cry afar off to the Centinels; Open, God is with us that hath done Wonders in Israel. They run to advertise Ozias and the Priests, who come in hast to receive her. All the City from the highest to the lowest assemble themselves about her, thinking that she had been lost, and looked upon her as a woman come from the other World. She causes instantly Torches to be lighted, and gets her up into an high place, from whence they were wont to make Orations to the people, and after she had made a silence, she thus spake. Sirs:

Praise God our Lord, who never forsakes his own, and hath through his grace accomplished this day by me his most humble servant, the promise which he hath made to his chosen people; for this night he hath slain by my hands the common enemy of our Nation.

And as she was saying this, she drew out of the bag that horrible head of Holophernes, pale and bloody, and shewed it to the whole Assembly, adding; Behold the head of Holophernes the General of the Army of the Assyrians. And then she spread abroad the Pavillion, saying; Behold the Pavillion under which he reposed himself in his drunkenness, and where God struck him by the hand of a woman. I call that living God to witness, that by the protection of his holy Angel, he hath preserved me pure, going and coming, and in the abode which I made in the Camp, without permitting any one to attempt any thing upon my honour: And now he hath brought me back glad of his Victory, of my own safety, and of your deliverance. It is to him that we ought to give all the praise, because his goodnesses and mercies are inexhaustible.

The people felt transports of joyes, and seeing that head by the help of torches in the silence of the night, thought that it was a Dream: but the multitude of those that beheld all one and the same thing, present and real, made them plainly see that it was a truth. They prostrate themselves all on the earth, adoring the living God that was the worker of those great wonders, and then turning themselves to Judith, gave her a thousand blessings with triumphal Acclamations, protesting that she was their Mother and their Deliverer.

Then Ozias the Prince of the people of Israel in Bethulia, said to her; You are this day blessed my Daughter, and glorious above all women that are in the habitable World. Praised be the Creatour of Heaven and Earth, who hath so well guided your victorious hand to the ruine of the Capital of our Enemies, and who by the same means hath so glorified your name, that he hath rendred your praise immortal in the mouth of men that shall have any sense of the wonderful works of God. Every one will remember how you have not spared your life to draw your people out of the ruines wherein they were almost buried.

Thereupon Achior was called, and Judith ſhewing him the head of Holophernes, ſays to him, You have loſt nothing by the teſtimonies you give to the power of our God, for behold the head of the Collonel of the Unbelievers which God hath cut off this night by this hand of mine. Behold him that threatned to make you dy when he had taken Bethulia, but ſure now he will let you live in great quiet. This man was in ſuch an extaſie at this news that he fell down in a ſwoon, and when he was come to himſelf again, he caſt himſelf at the feet of Judith, and gave her a reverence that was near to adoration. And by her means was converted to the true Religion, and rendred all glory to the God of Jeruſalem.

Judith purſuing this her conqueſt, counſelled her people to make a ſhew of ſallying out of the City in arms at the break of day as if they would give battel, which would make the Aſſyrians haſten to the Pavillion of Holophernes to awake him, and ſo ſeeing what had paſſed, would be ſeized with ſo great a fear that they would ſell their lives at a cheap rate. This was executed, and the Captains failed not to repair unto the General to receive orders. It was already forward days, and he was yet aſleep with the ſleep of death, from whence there is no waking, unleſs by an extraordinary power. Every one was aſtoniſhed that he appeared not, but no body durſt take the boldneſs to awake him, ſo greatly was he feared. They preſs Vagoa to enter into the chamber, who refuſes at firſt to trouble the pleaſures of his Maſter: but when the time was drawn out in length, he entred, and made a noiſe, not as by deſign, but accident; and ſeeing that no body ſtirred, he went near the bed, thinking that he was yet with Judith. At laſt, when one told him that the enemy appeared in arms, he drew the curtain very gently, and ſaw the body of his Maſter weltering in his own bloud.

He therefore became ſo furious, that he rent ſuddenly his cloaths, and ran to Judith's chamber to make her ſuffer a thouſand deaths; but when he could not find her, he ſent out frightful cries, and ſpake aloud, that that ſtranger-woman had filled the houſe of Nebuchadnezzar with confuſion, and that ſhe had aſſaſſinated their General, who was now nothing but a trunk without a head, plunged in his own bloud. All ran to this ſpectacle, and the whole Camp was filled with aſtoniſhment, with fears, with deſpair, with tears, and with howlings. At the ſame time appeared the head of Holophernes hanged up upon the walls of Bethulia; and all the Army of the Aſſyrians ſurprized with a panick fear, and, as it were ſtruck with a ſcourge from heaven, began to ſcatter themſelves, every one ſeeking his ſafety in his flight.

The Iſraelites purſued them, making a great noiſe, as if they had drawn forth numerous troops, and as if their ſquadrons had marched compacted, and in good order. It was eaſie for them to vanquiſh run-aways, who had already delivered up to fear all the hope of their life and fortune. All the neighbouring Cities came out to take a ſhare of this glory, and caſt themſelves into the fields on all parts to entrap their routed enemies, of whom they made moſt horrible maſſacre.

All the Camp of Holophernes was pillaged, where was found ſo great a quantity of booty, that it was a thing prodigious. The noiſe of this victory was ſpread unto Jeruſalem, the high Prieſt came to Bethulia with his other Prieſts to ſee Judith, to whom every one gave a thouſand bleſſings. One could hear nothing but ſhouts of joy and acclamations, that publiſhed her, The Glory of Jeruſalem, the Joy of Iſrael, the Honour of her People, the gallant Woman, the Chaſte and Valiant Princeſs, the incomparable Lady, whoſe Reputation ſhould live as long as Eternity it ſelf.

A moneth paſſed wherein there was nothing heard but joys, but conſorts of muſick, but trophies amongſt the people. They gathered every day ſome new ſpoils, whereof the moſt precious in gold, in ſilver, in purple, in pearls and jewels, were preſented to the victorious Judith. She compoſed a ſong of Triumph, which was ſung ſolemnly with the admiration of the whole world. After all, they went (as it behoved them) to Jeruſalem, to render to God the Vows of the whole people, and to make great Offerings, where three moneths more were ſpent in an incomparable chearfulneſs. There was not a day that was not Feſtival, nor a face that did not wear the lineaments of the joys of Paradiſe.

Judith offered in the Temple the Pavillion of Holophernes, that the memory of it might never be defaced by oblivion. At laſt, all returned home to their own houſes, and the holy woman remained in her little City of Bethulia, always in her widowhood, honoured of all the world as the moſt glorious ſoul on earth. She made her ſervant free, and lived even to the age of 105. years amongſt her people in a profound peace. She appeared abroad the Feſtival days in a magnificent glory, ſpending the other days in her ſolitude, and living with great examples of Virtues and Devotion. The day of that happineſs was marked with white, and reckoned in the number of the greateſt Feaſts of the Jews to all poſterity. God, who is the worker of ſo many wonders hath taken a care alſo of this Hiſtory.

It is an eternal monument of the virtue of his arm, that ſhakes the mountains, that cleaves the rocks, and overthrows in a moment thoſe ſons of the Titans, who make war againſt heaven it ſelf, and would walk upon the wings of the winds. A General of an Army that vaunted himſelf in the midſt of an hundred thouſand ſouldiers environed all about with ſteel, with fires and lightnings; who ſaid, I will go, I will do, I will level with the ground; who held a fatal council, where he decreed the firing of Cities, the ſacking of Provinces, where ſo many dragons drank up the tears of Nations without being touched with any ſenſe of pity. A Giant, that heaped mountain upon mountain to aſcend through fire and ſword, even to the throne of the moſt high; behold, now conquered, ſlain, maſſacred, tumbled in his bloud by a woman that makes a play-game of his head; and an Army that cut their paſſage through the Rocks, that drank up Rivers, that ſhadowed the Sun by the multitude of their flying arrows, overthrown, ſcattered, torn into a thouſand pieces by the enterpriſe of a Jeweſs. Judith gives not her ſelf the praiſe of this work; it was God that acted in her, who was the direction of her hand, the ſtrength of her arm, the ſpirit of her prudence, the ardour of her courage, and the ſoul of her ſoul. O how great is this God of gods! O how terrible is this Lord of hoſts! and who is there that fears not God, but he that hath none at all? What Coloſſus's of pride have faln, and ſhall yet fall under his hands! What giants beaten down and plunged even into hell, for kindling fiery coals of concupiſcence, ſhall ſmoak in flames by an eternal ſacrifice which their pains ſhall render to the Divine Juſtice!

HESTER.

THE holy Scripture ſets before our eyes in this Hiſtory, Greatneſſe falling into an eclipſe, and the lowneſſe of the earth elevated to the Stars; Humility on the Throne, and Ambition on the Gallows; Might overthrown by Beauty; Love ſanctified, and Revenge ſtrangled by its own hands. It teaches Kings to govern, and people to obey, great Ones not to rely on a fortune of ice, Ladies to cheriſh Piety and Honour, the Happy to fear every thing, and the Miſerable to deſpair of nothing.

All that we have to diſcourſe of here, happened in the Kingdom of Perſia, during the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon, about fourhundred and ſixty years before the Nativity of our Lord, and under the Reign of Ahaſuerus. But it is a great Riddle to divine who this Prince was to whom Heſter was married, and which is called here by a name that is not found in the Hiſtory of the Perſian Kings, and which indeed may agree to all thoſe high Monarchs, ſignifying no other thing but The great Lord. Mercator ſayes, that it was Aſtyages Grandfather of Cyrus; and Cedrenus, that it was Darius the Mede. Genebrard is for Cambyſes; Scaliger for Xerxes; Serrarius for Ochus; Joſephus and Sailan for Artaxerxes with the long hand. The wiſe Heſter, that was ſo much in love with Chaſtity, is found to have had fourteen husbands by the conteſtation of Authours, every one would give her one of his own making; ſhe is married to all the Kings of Perſia, ſhe is courſed up and down through all the Empire, and her Eſpouſals made to laſt above two hundred years. But as it is eaſie enough to confute the Opinions of all thoſe that ſpeak of her; ſo is it very hard to ſettle the truth of the Chronology amidſt ſo great obſcurities. The Scripture ſayes, that Mordecai with Heſter was carried away out of Judea into Babylon, under the reign of Nebuchadnezzar; and if we are of the opinion that marries her to Artaxerxes, if we reckon well all the years that were between thoſe two Kings, we ſhall find that this yong and raviſhing beauty of Heſter, which caught ſo great a Monarch by the eyes, was already an hundred and fifty years old, which is an age too ripe for a maid that one would give for a wife to a King. It is impoſſible to get out of this labyrinth, if we do not ſay that Mordecai and Heſter were not tranſported in their own, but in the perſons of their Anceſtors; and that that paſſage means nothing elſe, but that they iſſued from the race of thoſe that were lead captives with King Jechonias, deſtroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: ſo we will take Artaxerxes, and not divide that amiable concord of Authours united in this point.

Repreſent then to your ſelves, that from the time that the Jews were diſperſed into Babylon, into Perſia, into Media, and through all the States of thoſe great Kings, they ceaſed not to multiply in Captivity; and that ſervitude which is wont to ſtifle great ſpirits, produced ſometimes amongſt them gallant men. Amongſt others appeared upon the Theater the excellent Mordecai, a man of a good underſtanding and of a great courage, who by his dexterity and valour delivered all his Nation from death and total ruine. He then dwelt in Shuſhan, the capital City of all the Kingdome, and bred up in his houſe a little Niece, the daughter of his brother, an orphan both by father and mother, which was named in her firſt child-hood Ediſſa, and after called Heſter.

Now as thoſe great ſpirits that are particularly governed by God have ſome tincture of Prophecie, he had a wonderfull Dream, and ſaw in his ſleep a great tempeſt, with thunderings and lightnings, and an earth-quake, which was followed with a combat of two Dragons who were fighting one againſt the other, and ſent forth horrible hiſſings, whiles divers Nations aſſembled together, ſtood and looked upon them, expecting the iſſue of the combat; thereupon he perceived a little fountain which became ſuddenly a great River which was changed into a Light, and of a Light, transformed it ſelf into a Sun, that both watered and illuminated the earth.

He knew not what his Dream did mean, but he learned the Interpretation of it in the great combats he had with Haman, and in the exaltation of his little Niece that was promoted to ſo high a ſplendour, as to give both evidence and refreſhment to all the people of her Nation.

This Mordecai being a man of good behaviour and quality, found means to advance himſelf to Court, and to make his beginnings there in ſome inferiour office, expecting ſome good occaſion to make himſelf be known. He had an eye always open to diſcover all that paſſed without any bragging of it. He conſidered the approaches of divers Nations that lived in that Court; the humours, the capacities, the buſineſſes, the obligations, the intricacies, the credit, the induſtry of every one; omitting nothing of all that might advance the benefit of his Country-men.

He quickly diſcovered the ſpirit of Haman, who was at that time a mean Cavalier of fortune, but ambitious, cloſe, crafty, revengefull, bloudy, and capable to embroil a State. He had an averſation from him, although he had not yet been offended by him; and began to diſtruſt him, fearing leſt he be one day fatal to his people. Nevertheleſs, Haman with the times took an high aſcendant, and Mordecai feared his greatneſſe as one would do the apparition of a Comet.

It happen'd that two perfidious Subjects, Tereſh and Bigthan, uſhers of the door made an abominable conſpiracy againſt King Artaxerxes, which Mordecai, who was not a drowſie ſpirit, ſoon perceived, and began carefully to watch them, obſerving their goings out and comings in, their words and their countenances, their plottings and their practiſes. He gaue notice of it very opportunely, ſo that being taken, arreſted, and put to the rack, they acknowledged the crime, and were led away to puniſhment. The King gave hearty thanks to Mordecai, commanded him to live in his Palace in a certain office which he beſtowed upon him, and cauſed the day to be ſet down in writing, wherein he had been preſerved from the conſpiracy of thoſe unhappy ſervants, to recompenſe, as opportunity ſhould be offered, the good ſervices of his Deliverer.

It is credible that Haman had an hand in that execrable deſign, ſeeing that he gave ſo little thanks to Mordecai for having been the diſcoverer of it; but the diſſimulation that he brought to cover his fact, and his mighty power that rendered him ſo terrible, ſuffered him not to be involved in the ruine of thoſe wretched men. Theſe two Courtiers had an eye to one another, and ſought nothing but each others ruine: the power of the one being alwaies ſuſpected by the other; when God, without Mordecai's thinking of it, ſent him a great ſuccour by the choice which was made of his Niece to be the King's wife.

The Hiſtory ſaies, that Ahaſuerus would ſhew his Magnificence, and make great feaſts for the ſpace of an hundred and fourſcore daies, in which he entertained the Princes, the Governours of Provinces, and all the Nobles of the Realm. He would have the people too to have their ſhare; and for that purpoſe he cauſed to be ſet up at the entrance of his Gardens (which he was wont to dreſs with his own hands) abundance of great Pavillions of Sky-colour, born up with marble pillars, and tied together with ribands of red ſilk, and rings of Ivory. He cauſed alſo certain beds of gold and ſilver to be ſet up upon a pavement of Emerald and other precious ſtones, ranged by a proportion made, after the Moſaical faſhion which had a very fine grace. Thither he invited all the people of that great City of Shuſhan, and cauſed them to be ſerved in veſſels of gold and ſilver, with moſt exquiſite Viands, and delicious Wine, and left every one to drink according to his ability, without conſtraining any one.

Vaſthi the Queen, on the other ſide made a Banquet for the women in the Royal Palace, wherein ſhe forgot nothing to equal the ſtately Grandeurs of the King her husband. This merry life laſted the ſpace of ſeven daies, in the laſt of which the King being very jolly and inflamed with Wine, commanded the Eunuchs that were about him to cauſe the Queen to come with the Crown upon her head in her moſt gorgeous attire, to make a ſhew of her beauty in the preſence of all the people. The Queen took no pleaſure in this command, and refuſed to go: in which, ſaies Sulpicius, the wife was wiſer then the husband, in that ſhe was not willing to make a ſpectacle of the beauty of her body to men full of meats and wine, and deſerved ſo much the more commendation, as ſhe was more conſtant to keep the Laws of modeſty and comelineſs.

But this was not taken that way as that ſacred Hiſtorian preſents it: they imagined that ſhe had ſome of the diſpoſition of beautiful women, that ſhe was a little proud and ſcornful, which cauſed that ſhe was not ſo well beloved of the Grandees of the Court, who, as it is credible, having long ſince a deſire to do her ſome ill office, laid hold on this occaſion. They cauſed that refuſal to be reported very harſhly by the Eunuchs to the King, when it might have been ſweetned and moderated; they made uſe of his wine, as of an inſtrument of their iniquity, and exaſperated him alſo by the diminution of his Authority, whereof Princes are very jealous if they have not much ſtupidity.

As ſoon as the Anſwer of the Queen was publiſhed, the King turned himſelf about to the ſeven principal Counſellours of his State who were alwaies by his ſide, and governed the Kingdom; and demanded their advice, what he ſhould do to repreſs his Wife's pride. Memuchan, which was the laſt and the raſheſt, made of this denial a crime of State, and ſaid, That it tended to the diſorder of all the other women, becauſe that other women, every one in her condition, framed themſelves after the example of the Queen, and would draw a licentious advantage over their husbands, founded upon that affront done to his Royal Majeſty, and that every where they would domineer, which would over-throw the order of Nature, and cauſe great troubles in all houſes: and therefore he was of that opinion, that the Queen ſhould be divorced by the King her husband, and that an Edict ſhould be made to be ſent through all his Kingdoms, touching the obedience that women owe to thoſe that are their heads.

The man perhaps was ill dealt with in his lodging by his wife, and under ſhadow of policy would revenge his wrongs. It is very true that the Law of God ſtrictly recommends the ſubmiſſion of the Wife towards the Husband: but it ought to be underſtood in things good and reaſonable: for if a Wife were bound to render a blind obedience to all the extravagancies of a Huſband that hath but little wit and much paſſion, ſhe ſhould be the moſt miſerable of all ſlaves. There were many reaſons that might make Vaſthi's action be excuſed: but becauſe they ſaw that Memuchan had pleaſed the King by his diſcourſe, all the reſt of the Counſellours of State ran to ſervitude and condemned her to a long torment by a ſhort ſentence.

She was degraded and divorced, which was a thing ordinary enough to thoſe Kings who made no great account of loſing a Wife, ſeeing that they had ſo great a number of them in their Seraglio. The Edict was alſo made in the terms that the other had required it, and the name of that poor Queen went up and down the whole Kingdom as a ſad ſtory, and a true portraiture of an abaſed greatneſs.

God permitted all this to make way for Heſter, whom he had deſtined to Ahaſuerus his Bed, not for her ſelf, but for the ſafety of her people. After the divorce and the diſaſter of poor Vaſthi, a new Queen muſt be ſought out, and the King comforted about his loſs. A great culling is made through all the Provinces of the Kingdom of the handſomeſt Virgins to be brought to Court. This little Heſter is found very delightful, being endowed with a perfect beauty, and a natural grace that ſurpaſſed all things. She is carried amongſt abundance of others, and as ſoon as the King caſt his eies upon her, he liked her, and commanded Hegai the Eunuch that had the ſuperintendency of his Seraglio, to have a great care of that young Damſel, to ſpare nothing on her, and to give her ſeven waiting Maids with all neceſſary Equipage. Thoſe Virgins that were thus choſen for the Prince's Bed made a Novitiate of twelve months, in which time they had all leiſure to fit themſelves, and to learn the Civilities of the Court. After this, they were preſented to the King, who took thoſe that pleaſed him moſt, and when any one had paſſed a night in his Chamber, ſhe was ſent in the morning into a new Seraglio, unto the charge of another Eunuch, and returned no more to the King, if ſhe was not asked for, and that by name.

Heſter ſpent but ten months in her preparation, and was incontinently conducted to the King, who liked her above all the Maids that he had ever ſeen, and declared her Queen in Vaſthi's place, putting the Crown upon her head. Mordecai was raviſhed at this choice, and walked every day from the firſt beginning that ſhe was brought to Court, before the Seraglio to heare newes of her, having recommended her to a certain Eunuch his Confident, that that had of her a very particular care. He ſent her very opportunely neceſſary advice, to teach her how to behave her ſelf; and above all, he was ſo wiſe, as to recommend to her not to declare the Nation whereof ſhe was, and to make no diſcovery that ſhe had any relation to him, which he judged to be to the purpoſe, for fear leſt Haman, who was in ſo great favour, and who hated naturally the Jews, ſhould ruine her before ſhe had taken rooting in the Kings heart.

Behold a wonderful ſport of Providence, which took a little ſtone with an intention to beat down a great Coloſſus, and makes in one inſtant of an earthen pot a veſſel of gold. Men ſtand now amazed to think what wind drave this poor Jeweſs to the Crown of the chief Monarchy, that was at that time in the whole world. They think that ſure it was a great chance, but God knew that it was a great counſel digeſted from all eternity in his thoughts. For if command is due (according to Ariſtotle) to perſons that are moſt accompliſhed, there was ſome foundation in the excellent qualities of Heſter on which to ſet a Crown: for beſide the beauty of her body, and the ingeniouſneſs of her mind, ſhe had great gifts of virtues that rendred her lovely to all the world, and might ſerve for models to all Ladies.

She was not a lump of fleſh, or a body without a ſoul, nor a worldly woman that had no other Idol but her Beauty, nor other Deities but Pleaſure and Ambition, as it happens ordinarily to moſt women, who ſeeing themſelves elevated to the top of the grandeurs of the age, ſtrangely corrupt their manners and diſhonour their condition. Heſter's chief and principal virtue that made a moſt pure ſource of pleaſures flow into the reſt of her life, was, that ſhe was devout, and that being young of age, frail of ſex, high of condition, in a Court of an Infidel King, amongſt ſo many other Pagan women, ſhe never forgat God, but obſerved punctually, as far as it was lawful and poſſible for her, the exerciſe of her Religion, making her prayers with an incredible ardour, and retaining a faith inviolable in the midſt of the Empire of impiety. She brought the King her husband to the worſhip of God, and to the love of her people, as far as ſhe could perceive any diſpoſition in him. She erected a Temple in her heart, having not yet the power to build one in her Kingdom, and directed all her Devotions to the ſacrificing of her ſelf.

She was alſo greatly to be commended for the little care ſhe had of her Body, againſt the nature of that ſex, which often prefers their fleſh before God and all Paradiſe. This appeared evidently at that ſeaſon when ſhe was to preſent her ſelf to the King the ſecond time, ſince that in an occaſion ſo important wherein all other women would have had an infinite care of their habit and attire, ſhe contented her ſelf with ſo ſmall a thing: and yet in her natural grace, juſt as a roſe adorned with its own leaves, ſhe obſcured all other beauties, even the moſt tricked and pranked. Her art was to have no art at all; to take what nature had given her, and to render all to God.

Furthermore, ſhe brought to Court a great Humility and a perfect ſubmiſſion, which ſhe never quitted, being as obedient to her Uncle when ſhe had the Crown upon her head as in her loweſt age; ſhe hearkned to his advice, ſhe put it in execution, ſhe deſpiſed no body but her own ſelf. The habit of a Queen was to her a burthen almoſt inſupportable, and ſhe never found more joy then in her ſolitude. There are few women that are born without ſelf-wilfulneſs, and without opinions that augment themſelves with age, and increaſe exceſſively in high conditions, which makes us admire this woman in contemplating nearer her deportments, and ſeeing how little ſhe relied upon her own ſelf; but although ſhe was endowed with a rare wit, yet ſhe hearkned to reaſon, and without much ado yielded to good counſel, which rendred her demeanour very happy, and all her negotiations moſt advantageous.

Beſides all this, as God had choſen her for great things, ſo he gave her the prudence of the Saints, accompanied with a good judgment, with docility, with providence, with diſcretion, with circumſpection, and with expediteneſs in the execution of affairs.

To this prudence was joyned a courage, and an incomparable generoſity, even to enterpriſe by a motive of virtue, actions ſo dangerous, that ſhe could expect nothing from them that was leſs then death. And for to crown all theſe virtues, ſhe poſſeſſed (farther) an illuſtrious patience, taking every thing from the hand of God, and ſuiting her ſelf to his will in all the ſucceſſes and events of the buſineſſes of the world.

Behold the principal qualities that adorned this Princeſs, and that may be ſeen in thoſe women that God hath gratified with his favours. In the ſequel of this ſtory he makes us ſee the brave employment that he gave her in that Court of Ahaſuerus, to bruiſe the head of a great Serpent, and to deliver her Nation from a gulf of great and horrible calamities.

Princes and great men would be happy, if without dying by procuration, they might live in perſon. They are born often enough with moſt excellent qualities; they are calm ſeas, and killed with riches that might do good to all the world, if the winds would but let them run according to their own nature. But as the Beauties of women are courted by many Lovers; ſo high conditions have their flatterers, that under a ſhadow of themſelves Adorers, make themſelves Maſters; and under colour of Service, exerciſe an Empire even over thoſe that think they command the whole Univerſe. Their name by this means ſerves for a paſſport to all miſchiefs; their Authority for a ſanctuary to crimes; their Taxes for tinder to concupiſcenſe; their Power for an inſtrument to revenge, and for a ſcourge to mankind.

This may be manifeſtly ſeen in the ſequel of this Hiſtory, where it is ſaid, that Ahaſuerus exalted Haman above all the Princes and Nobles of his Kingdom, and took the wickedſt man of the earth to make of him the moſt puiſſant; that Crimes might have as much aſſiſtance, as this Monarch had power and riches. His goodneſs was ſeduced in this point, and his too eaſie ſpirit was gained by great appearances that ſtole him from himſelf, and left him nothing but a meer apparition of Dignity.

This Haman which he thought at firſt to be a Perſian, an honeſt man, an able, and affectionate to his ſervice, was partly an Amalekite, and partly alſo a Macedonian, a ſon of the earth, that had neither God nor conſcience, a ſpirit full of labyrinths, captious, ſuſpitious, great in appearance and little in reality; a Lion in proſperity, and an Ape in adverſity, whoſe life was a perpetual crime, whoſe avarice was a gulf, ambition an abyſs, and fortune a ſcandal, and an injury to Providence.

Yet for all this he entred ſo far into the friendſhip of the King, that he ſaw not, but by his eyes, heard heard not, but by his ears; walked not, but by his steps; and governed not, but by his counsels. He called him his father, and believed him the most excellent, and the wisest man in his whole Kingdome, commanding every one to acknowledge him for the second person of the Empire, and to give him the greatest reverence. This Court, that was full of slaves, carried many candles to this Idol; some through fear, as to a mischievous Devil, and others through hope and expectation to be preferred.

The poor Mordecai felt a most bitter grief to see over the heads of men, him, that would bring the whole world under his feet; and in that slavery so general to all men, he chose rather the loss of his life then of his liberty. He would never bow the knee before that Baal; and although his enemy persecuted him in that businesse by fury, and his friends by importunities, he remained unmoveable, resolved to suffer much rather then to do any thing that was base. Haman that was at the beginning giddy-headed by the fumigations of the incense that was presented to him on all sides, and that regarded men but as the little gnats, took no heed to it at first; but when he was advertised by his flatterers that there was but one onely man at Court that refused to be an adorer of his fortune, he was inflamed with choler, and esteeming it but a small game for him to cause one man to die, he made a resolution horrible and bloudy to root out a whole Nation.

He goes and tells the King that the Jews dispersed through all the Provinces of his Kingdom, were divided by Religion and by Laws from the rest of all the world, and by affection, from his Person and his State. That they were a people most pernicious to an Empire, that alwayes sate a brood upon some poison, and that if they seemed moderate, it was not but through impotence, being disposed at the first occasion to cast themselves into Rebellion and Insolence. He added also, that the great care which he had of the good of the State, put these words into his mouth, that would cause the universal quiet of all his Monarchy, and that after consideration had of the great perils wherewith his Crowns and Life were menaced by that faction, he hath found nothing better then to prevent them, and to cut them off in time, before they had fortified themselves to the prejudice of the publick. That if the Treasurers of the Exchequer feared by this a diminution of the Tributes he would give with all his heart ten thousand talents of his proper goods to recompense the Levies, so much he took to heart that business that concerned the safety of his King, and the benefit of his people.

This Serpent plaid his game with so much artifice, that he perswaded whatsoever he had a mind to in such a manner, as that poor Ahasuerus, who was of a mean and credulous spirit, without examining any thing, plucks his ring from off his finger, puts it into Haman's hands, with a full power to do as he in his discretion should think fit. Behold the great confusion of the State, of the Spirit, and of the Conscience of Kings, when they suffer themselves so easily to be led away by evil counsels, and will not so much as know what passes in the government of their people.

It is an horrible thing that in the turn of an hand this miserable Prince should abandon to the vengeance of a pernicious man, so many millions of lives, without making one sole reflexion upon what he sayes, or what he grants. He had no imagination whither that did tend, and his ordinary idleness suffered him not to take any further cognizance of it which rendred him doubly culpable, to permit so many murders, and to be ignorant of it. Seneca sayes, that when Claudius was in the other world, some men reproached him with abundance of murders done under his name, and yet he knew not what they meant; then Augustus rose up and said, Thou miscreant, we talk not here of the slaughters thou hast committed, but of those thou hast not known; for it is a more shamefull thing to a King to be ignorant of the evil that passeth in his Kingdome, then to act it. Turpius ignoratis quàm occidisti. Sen. in Ludo de morte Claudii.

The sister of one of the Ptolomy's, King of Egypt, seeing that her brother as he was playing at dice, caused some criminal Processes to be read to him to decide them in the last Appeal, snatched the papers out of the Clerk of the Assize's hand, and said to her brother, that a dye fell otherwise then the head of a man. One cannot bring too much consideration when there is a question of shedding a mans bloud, be it in peace or war.

Yet Ahasuerus trusts this proud Haman, as one that would trust the wolf with the lives of the sheep. He triumphs with joy for having obtained the King's ring; he relishes and digests his vengeance with ceremony. He causes a great vessel to be brought him, into which he throws twelve little billets which bore the name of every month, and causes the month to be drawn out by lot in which he should execute his pernicious design. The lot fell upon the last, although it was cast in the first, and he would not change it, whether through an old superstition of his Country, or through the great confidence he had, that what time soever he took to make the projected Massacre, the Jews could not possibly escape him, so impotent they were; and he thought to keep them as beasts shut up which one chases when one will.

It was a pleasure to him to shew them the glittering steel a year before they should die, and to make them perish a thousand times by fear, before their life should be once taken away by sword. He assembles all the King's Secretaries, and dictates to them a bloudy letter, whereof he causes a great many copies to be drawn to send into all the Provinces, and the tenour of them was, That the thirteenth day of the last month, which was that of February, the Jews should be massacred in all the Cities and Provinces that were within the utmost limits of the Empire; and that from the least even to the greatest, without sparing either man, woman, or child, all should be put to the sword without remission, and that their goods should be confiscated and exposed to pillage. The Letters marked with the Seal and arms of the King, flew as ill-boding Birds through all the extents of the seven and twenty Provinces of that great Kingdome. It was an Edict of Death, not of the death and of the ruine of one man, or of one City, or of one Province, but of a whole nation. The evil was universal, and carried on all parts, Menaces, Bloud, Slaughters, Fears, and Affrights, from Euphrates even to Nile. The terrour began at the capital City Shushan, where the Edict was seen and read by all the world, hanged upon the pillars and on the walls of Publick places, bearing these words.

Artaxerxes the Sovereign Lord and King of all the Nations, that are from India as farre as Ethiopia, to the Princes and Governours of the seven and twenty Provinces of our Empire, Greeting:

Since

Since the time that I subdued the universe under my Laws, it was never my will to abase the greatness of my Power, but I have desired to govern my good Subjects with all clemency and sweetness, making them enjoy a peace and tranquillity to be wished for by all mortals; and for this purpose, inquiring of the means that I might use for the effecting of this design, Our most dear Haman, the second person of our Kingdom, which exceeds all the men of the world in capacity and fidelity, hath represented to me, that the Jewish people dispersed through all the Provinces of my Empire, being separated both by Religion and Laws from all the other Nations, despise our Edicts, and cease not to render themselves troublers of the publick Quiet. Which having been well and duly considered, we have ordained and do ordain, that they be punished, according to the orders of our most dear Haman, who is the Superintendent of all our Provinces, and whom we honour as our true father. Furthermore we will and intend that this Edict shall be put in execution, the thirteenth day of the Moneth Adar, the last of the year, to the end that all the wicked descending into Hell in one and the same day, may render peace and quietness to our good Subjects, which they have troubled by their Factions. Such is our good pleasure.

Given at Shushan the first of the Month Nisan,

Behold how Haman and his Complices, workers of Iniquity, cut their Furies Quills, and dipped them in Bloud, to make the King of the Persians say what ever pleased them, having his Seal and Authority in their hands. Poor Mordecai seeing the great Tempest that was ready to fall upon the heads of all his people, having read that Edict, and knowing that Haman was at the Table with the King, who was not seen by any, endeavoured to move the whole world to pity, cloathing himself with Sack-cloth, and covering himself with Ashes, together with all his people that wept and howled about him.

This sad squadron marched even to the Walls of the Palace, without entring in; for it was not permitted not so much as to Mordecai, to be seen at Court in so deplorable a Condition, which would have offended the eyes of the delicater sort. Bad news hath Wings to fly, and abundance of Voyces to make it self be heard. The frighted Maids and Eunuches fail not to tell Queen Hester of what ever had passed, whereat she was much amazed, and hearing that her Uncle was at the Gate, covered over with Ashes, with Sack-cloth upon his back, she sent him secretly a Sute of Cloaths, which he refused, judging it not futable to his fortune, which made her dispatch another Messenger, which was Athac the Eunuch that waited on her, who went out of the Castle, and inquired of Mordecai of all the state of so sad a business. The other made him a short Narration of it, and gave him a Copy of the Edict to present unto the Queen, praying him to tell her, that she must necessarily go and see the King, and act powerfully with his Majesty for the deliverance of his people.

Athac returns readily to his Mistriss, and faithfully relates to her what he had heard of Mordecai. The poor Princess was in an equal ballance greatly racked in mind; She durst not go to the King without being sent for; and to reject the intreaty of her Uncle in an accident so pressing, it was another death to her. She sends Athac back again to represent again to the good Mordecai the danger of that Negotiation, and to tell him that there is a Law established by the Prince, that ordains, that whosoever shall present himself before his eyes, without being called for, shall be punished with Death, unless that by his mercy he holds out his Sceptre to him in sign of safety, and that thereupon she had not seen his Majesty these thirty Dayes, not knowing in what posture she is at present in his heart; that if she should find him in some ill humour, there were an end of that Life, which she seeks not to preserve but for the safety of her People.

Notwithstanding all these Remonstrances, her Uncle sends to her to go; tells her, that if she neglected to negotiate in so important an occasion, God would find other means to save his people. But she should had need to take great heed, left her Fathers house, and her self also should perish, by too great a care of their Preservation; and that she ought to think that perhaps the Divine Providence had placed her where she was, it may be for that only reason.

Here one knows not what one ought to admire most, whether the Authority that Mordecai took over the Queen, or the Obedience that the Queen rendred to him. She had no sooner heard that Reply of his, but she said, it is concluded; I will go, and sacrifice my self to Death with all my heart, to obey my Uncle, and save, if I can, my Nation. Go to him, Athac, and bid him assemble all the Jews that are in Shushan, let them keep a Fast of three dayes for the success of this Attempt, with continual Prayers. I will do the same on my side with my servants here, and afterward we will adventure upon the business.

Behold how we ought to proceed in great Negotiations, making God alwayes to march in the head of them, who is the source of all good Successes. There was then an admirable Consort of Devotions, both within and without the Palace; Mordecai was in the midst of his People, lifting up his hands to Heaven, and saying;

Great God, whose Empire hath no limits, and whose absolute will suffers no contradiction, Your hands have formed both Heaven and Earth, with all the beauties that are included in their bosome, and there is nothing that can resist the puissance of your Arm. My God you know every thing, and are not ignorant that the refusal that I have made to reverence the proud Haman, proceeds not of Pride or Vanity that is in me; for from this present time I would kiss the ground whereon he treads for the safety of my people. But I have been afraid to transfer the honour of the Creatour to the Creature, and to give a companion to your Majesty; and therefore I beseech you, O the God of our Fathers, to cause one ray of your mercies to shine upon those poor afflicted ones. You see the rage of our Enemies, who have all sworn our Ruine. Despise not your Inheritance, that you have Redeemed from Egypt. Shew your self propicious to your People, that is, as it were, the Lot of your Empire; Change our Mourning into Joy, and shut not the Mouthes of those that sing your Praises. This Prayer was followed unanimously by all the people.

But the Divine Hester on the other side, shut up in her secret Closet, layes aside her precious habits, and all the attires of the glory that environed her, taking a mourning sute, and covering her self with Ashes. She was in prayer day and night, and mortified her body with Fastings and Austerities. Care made those Roses of her beautiful face to wither, and the places that had been the complices of her joys, were for that time watered with her tears. She said to God with an amorous heart:

with

My God, You know the necessity that oppresses me, and you are not ignorant that I detest with all mine heart, that proud Diadem that glitters upon my head, when by constraint I must appear at Court. I have never worn it in the Holy-days of my silence, and of my dear solitude which I prize above all the Empires of the earth. You are not ignorant, O my Lord, that since that I was transported to this Palace, my heart hath never joyed in any thing, but the consideration of your blessings. I am here alone, and forsaken of all friends and kindred, expecting no other succour but that of your Arm. Lo, I hold my life and my soul now in my hands, to lose it for you, or to save it for you. Those that have resolved to pull down your Altars, and to destroy the glory of your Temple, are the men that have sworn our death. But give not, O Lord, your Scepter and your Power to those that have no name amongst your faithful people: Make their own Arrows return upon their own faces, and keep us alwaies under the protection of your Divine Hands. Seeing that I must be the Prolocutress for the good of all your Nation, and of mine, Inspire me with the discourses that I ought to make in the presence of that Lion. Soften for us his heart, and make him turn his gall on the side of our Enemies, that we may render to you our Thanksgivings, and offer to you immortal praises.

The third Day being expired, she puts off her Mourning, and adorns her self with her richest Dresses, to sharpen the Arrows of her Beauty which she had so worthily consecrated to the great Business of the preservation of her Nation. And although she had an heart filled with cares about the event of an Embassage of so great importance, yet she appeared with a Countenance as flourishing, as the fair dawning of the Day; calming the tempest of her heart by the force of an invincible spirit. After she had once more invoked the Authour and Finisher of wonders, she went accompanied with two Maids, one of which held her up, managing exactly the delicacy of her body, and the other carried the train of her Gown largely spread abroad. She passes from door to door, from chamber to chamber, and at last arrived at the King's, who was seated on a Throne, in a Sute all laid with Diamonds, and a pomp unparalell'd. He was ruddy of face, and had eys very sparkling, and it seemed that he took a kind of pleasure in rowling them up and down, to dazle those that looked upon him, by the lightnings of his Majesty. At first, his look appeared a little terrible to this new Wife, whether he did it by an amorous Caress, or whether he was moved with some choler to see her enter, without calling for. The wise Hester knew also well enough how to play her game, and to surprize where he was weak, in which he thought himself most strong. She used a mute Eloquence, and a fear wherein there was much quaintness and gentleness of the Sex. The Carnation of her cheeks instantly took a pretious paleness, that came so opportunely as if one had called for it; and as if she had been Thunder-struck with the eys of that mighty Monarch, she let her self fall down in a swoun into the bosom of the Maid that held her up.

This wonderful King that desired so much to terrifie, took for himself what he would give to others, and felt his own heart assaulted, by the fear he had left his Countenance had wounded the heart of his dearest Spouse. He quits the dreadfulness of a King, and takes the servitude of a Lover: he comes down from his Throne faster then a pace, runs as well as others to ease her of her swoun, and cries aloud, Hester, my Sister, what ails you? The Law that I have made, is not for you, but for the rest only of my Kingdom: And when she yet gave no answer to that Speech he takes his golden Scepter, gives it her to touch and handle, and kisses her with a great affection, conjuring her to take courage, and to come again to her self.

Then as if she had returned from the Country of the Dead, she spake with a languishing voice, and interrupted words, saying to the King that he need not be astonished at that fear of hers; for she had seen his face as the face of an Angel, that he was truly terrible: but withal lovely above all the Princes of the World, so many Graces he had and beauties upon his Visage. This was to take him where he was easiest to be conquered: and to better colour yet that speech, she let her self fall again upon the bosom of her servant. All the Court had work enough about her, and the King above all did what he could to settle her. At last she came fully to her self, and Ahasuerus told her, That if she came to make any Request unto him, she should ask boldly, yea, though it were even the Moity of his Kingdom, for he was now on terms to deny her nothing.

It was a large promise, and one would think that now was the time for her to discover her self. Yet she had so much reservedness, and so great a power over her self, that she advanced not yet her Business, but waited for the hour of his Repast, wherein she knew that the King Ahasuerus was ordinarily more free and merry. She told him only that she came to make a small Request unto his Majesty, and most humbly to beseech him to be pleased to honour her with his Presence, together with Haman, at a little Banquet which she had prepared for them. The King was very joyful at it, and caused Haman to be called, whom he commanded to do whatsoever Hester should desire, which was most pleasing to him, being one that loved nothing so much as that which flattered his vainglory.

They failed not to be both of them at Dinner with the Queen, who entertained them very handsomly, and with great Magnificence, & this Entertainment pleased so much her husband, that he summoned her again to ask what ever seemed good unto her, for there was no request but should be granted, that proceeded from her mouth. The Queen that would give her self leisure to consult with her Uncle first, that she might effectually disclose that great affair, put off the offer till the morrow after, and said to the King, That since his Majesty had expressed so great a satisfaction for her little Dinner, and that the cheerfulness of his heart redounded to the benefit of his health, she would present to him again with all humility the very same Petition, and convince him by his friendship, which she prized above all things in the World, to eat again the following day of the Viands that she should make ready for him, and with the same Company.

This was fully granted her, and after she had prepared the spirit of the King by these dispositions, she resolved to open her whole mind, with the counsel and art of Mordecai. Haman went out of the Palace gloriously triumphing and accompanied with a great train: but when he perceived Mordecai at the Gate, who made as though he did not see him, when all others killed themselves to make him Reverences, he felt himself moved with fury, and went suddenly to his house, to conclude upon the Death of that innocent man.

Good (say the Philosophers) is never Good, if it be not intire and perfect; which is the cause that there are few felicities in the World, where all Light hath its Shadow, all Fruit its Worm, and every Beauty fails not to have its embasement and Allay. And this is it, that proud Haman experiments in the highest glory of his Fortune. He makes a consultation with his Wife and Friends, and tells them; that he is this day, according to the World's esteem, one of the happiest men upon the Earth. If he looks upon his Riches, they are welnigh infinite; If he casts his eys upon his House, he sees it under-propped with a good company of children; If he consider the favour of the Prince, never man was in a like degree. His Counsels are the Felicities of the State, his Words are Oracles, and his Altitudes are Ravishments that dazle the whole Earth from Euphrates even as far as Nilus. Yet he confesses to them ingeniously, that in this high heap of Honours, and of Blessings that environ him, he hath no content at all, as long as he sees himself out-braved by that beggarly Rascal Mordecai, who vouchsafes not so much as to do him any Reverence. All the Joys that he hath in his House, and all the Applauses that he receives every day in publick, gives him not so much Pleasure, as that sole Affront pours bitterness into his heart, which he cannot digest. And therefore he prays them to advise him on some means that he should use, to rid himself of that Villain, and sacrifice him to his vengeance. He added, that he had Dined with the King and Queen, and that he was to go thither again the morrow after, which was a favour that none could hope for after him; yet he lost all the sense of it when it entred into his imagination, that he must see a Mordecai at the Palace-gate, to reproach to him his impotence: and that there was no more life for him, as long as that cursed fellow, that was to him as an ill-boding Bird, remained at Court.

The Wife that was of the same humour with her Husband, pronounced a short sentence, and said, that if there were not Gallows enough at Shushan to hang a Rascal, he shall cause one to be set up of fifty Cubits high, and should desire the King, that Mordecai should be suddenly fastned to it, and that this being done, he might go with a purified spirit to the Banquet of the Queen. This counsel pleased him very much, and he resolved to forward it; but Providence prepared for him far other business to dispatch, to make him know, that no body thinks upon the ruine of another, without hastning of his own.

The Angel of God that governs Kings, gives them thoughts not fore-seen, and raises to them occasions of Virtues and great Actions, sometimes even when they least dream of it. The King was laid upon his Bed to repose himself, and could not shut his eys the whole night, without having the least appearance of care or trouble in his spirit. He calls for his Reader, and bids him read to him some book or other to entertain him. He reads in his presence the Annals of the kingdom, and particularly, that which happened in his time: he comes without not thinking on it, to the year that made mention of Teresh and Bigthan's Conspiracy, discovered by Mordecai. The Kings heart that was in the hand of God, changed in an instant; the remembrance of that good servant begins to enter into his mind with some tenderness and compassion: that ardent and inconsiderate love that he had had to his friend Haman, grows cold again insensibly, without having any reason for it. It seemed as if there had been a charm raised suddenly by an heavenly hand. He resumes thoughts of consideration, of justice, and affection towards honest men.

He asked what recompense Mordecai hath had for so great and notable a Service that he did his Person and all his Estate. It was found that he had gained nothing by it, but promises and hopes. The King demands of the Gentlemen of his Chamber, who was in the Ante-chamber? they answered Haman, that was come according to his custom, to discourse with him while he was rising, and to presently Mordecai's ruine. He commands them to bid him enter; he enters with a boldness that promised it self all things, and sets himself to his Complements and his ordinary merriments: yet all that had pleased the King heretofore, in the conversation of that man even to a Rapture, begins to displease him now, and he seeks nothing more then the means to humble him.

He frames to himself in Idea's, a man of Fortune rising from nothing, that hath prevailed over the simplicity of his spirit, that hath made great Magazines of gold and silver out of his Levies; that disposes of all the Offices of his kingdom; that makes himself adored of great and small; that is followed as himself, and more then himself; that hath his Privy-Seal and all his Authority in his hands; that hath so much money to lay out, as to offer ten thousand Talents to satiate his Revenge, and that authorizes all wickedness, by the Name, and avouching of his Master, if at least he hath one on this top of glory whither he is mounted. He hath now a mind to undo him, and feels a powerful motion pushing him forward to it; and which permits him not to deliberate of it any more; nor to consider with what security he might execute so great a business.

He knew that he was hated of all the World, by reason of his pride; and that his Adorers themselves would have eaten him up with a very good will, if they might have had but the permission given them: he saw that he subsisted not, but by his favour which he abused so basely. He resolved to pick a quarrel with him, and asked him instantly, What might a great King do, that would honour a Favourite to the highest point? Haman thinking that that Question was not made but in favour, and consideration of him, answers with an immeasurable impudence; That to honour worthily a Favourite, and to shew in his person what a great Master can do that loves with passion, he must cloath him with his Royal Cloak, put the King's Diadem upon his head, set him upon his own Horse, and command the greatest Prince of the Court to hold his Stirrop and his Bridle, and lead him through all places of the City, and to cause an Herald to proclaim before him; That it is thus that Ahasuerus honoureth his favourites.

The Prince was astonished at this insolence, and to make him burst with spite, said to him, that his Opinion was very good, and therefore he commanded him to render all those honours presently to Mordecai the Jew that was at the Palace-gate. This Devil of Pride was seized with so great an amazement at that Speech, that he had not so much as one word in his mouth to reply; and as he was Vainglorious and Insupportable in his Prosperity, so there was nothing more Amated or more Base in Adversity. He extremely racks his spirit to dissemble his discontent; The fear of death and punishments due to his Crimes, if he did resist the Pleasure of the King, made him swallow all the bitterness of that Cup.

A strange thing! Poor Mordecai that was all nasty, covered with Sack-cloath and Ashes, is fetched, is washed, is trimmed up, and clad after the fashion of a King. Haman presents himself to hold the Stirrop of the Horse, and to lead him by the Bridle, while his Enemy was shewed in Triumph to the eys of the whole City of Shushan. How much Resistance do we think he made, not to accept this Honour? What thoughts came into his head, whether it was not a trick of Haman, that would give him a short Joy to deliver him to a long Punishment. He could not believe his Eys nor his Reason; he thought that all this had been a Dream. In the mean while the whole City of Shushan beheld that great Spectacle, and could not be sufficiently amazed at so extraordinary a Change.

Haman, after the Ceremony was over, returns very sad unto his House, deploring with his Wife and Friends the sad sport of Fortune. The Confusion of their troubled spirits suggests nothing to them but Counsels of despair, and they say, that since Mordecai hath begun, sure he will make an end, He was very loath to go to that Feast of the Queens, he feared that it would prove a sacrifice; and that he should be the offering.

Hester that saw that her sport was spoiled if he was not present, caused him secretly to be engaged, and pressed by the Eunuchs of the King, who under colour of Civility, conduct him to his final Misery.

He enters into the Chamber of the Feast: The King dissembles all that had been done; there was nothing talked of at the first, but of passing merrily the time away; Every thing flourished, every thing Laughed; but Poyson was hid under the Laughter, and Venome under the Flowers.

At the end of their Repast; the King Conjures the Queen to tell him at last what it was that she desired of him; because he was fully resolved to divide his Crown and Sceptre with her. Then sending forth a great sigh, she cried, Alas Sir, I do not sue to your Majesty for any of all the Honours, or the Riches of your Empire; but I desire of you only my own and my poor peoples lives, which some would overthrow, destroy, and massacre by an horrible and bloudy butchery. Sir, I ought no longer to disguise any thing to your Majesty; God hath made me be born of that Nation, which is given for a Prey under your Authority, and destined to the Shambels. It is me that they aim at; If they had gone about only to make me and my People Slaves, I would have held my peace, and stifled my groans. But Sir, what have I done, that my throat should be cut, after I shall have seen the bloud of my neareſt kindred shed before mine Eys, to be thrown as the last Sacrifice, upon a great heap of dead bodies, and buried in the Ruines of my dear Country? Alas, Sir, shew us Mercy, You that are the Mildest of all Princes, restore me my soul, and the lives of my whole Nation.

The King entred into an Admiration of Extasie upon these Words, and said to the Queen,

I know not to what this Discourse tends, or where the Man or the Authority is, that dares do this without my command.

Then she replyes, He, to whom your Majesty hath given your Seal, that Traytour, and perfidious Haman, It is he that hath caused bloudy Letters to be written through all the Provinces, to deliver me and my People up to Death; and know Sir, that his cruelty redounds upon your head.

Haman quickly perceived that he was a lost man; and the paleness of Death came at the same instant into his Face. The King rises from the Table, and walks into the Garden, that was hard by, to chew upon his Choler.

The Queen that had put her self into a Melancholy, casts her self down upon the Bed. Haman throws himself at her feet; and as a man that is drowning, lays hold on what ere he meets with, He beseeches her, he urges her, he conjures her to shew him Mercy; and in saying so, bowed himself down upon the Bed, and approached very near unto her.

The King entring at the same time into the Chamber, and finding him in that Posture; How (says he) will he also violate the Queen, my Wife, in my Presence, and in my House? Let some body take him away. Instantly they come, and cover his Face, as they were wont to do to those that were carried away to Punishment, and one of the Eunuchs thought of, saying, that he had prepared a pair of Gallows of fifty Cubits high, for Mordecai the Preserver of the Kings Life.

It is that which is his Due, (answered Ahasuerus) and let him be hanged suddenly upon the Gibbet that he hath set up.

This was executed without delay, there being no body that was not extreme joyful of his ruine. Mordecai was called to the Palace, to take his Place, and to Govern all the Houshold of the Queen, that now acknowledged him in the presence of the King her Husband, for her Uncle.

Hester afterwards beseeched the King, to command Dispatches to be sent through all the Provinces, to countermand and to make void the Letters of Death which cruel Haman had caused already to be spread through all the kingdom. This was found very reasonable, and they were forthwith Expedited in these termes.

Artaxerxes the Sovereign Lord and King of all the Nations that are from India to Ethiopia, To the Princes and Governours of the seven and twenty Provinces of our Empire, Greeting.

Many abusing through their Pride, the Goodness of Princes, and the Honours that have been given them, do not only endeavour to oppress People, but also by a detestable Felony, to attempt upon the Life of their Benefactours, not being able to bear the Weight of the Glory, to which they are Exalted.

They are not contented to be Ingrateful for Benefits, and to violate the Laws of Humanity, but perswade themselves, that, though they run out into so great Crimes, they shall escape the Judgments of that great God, from whom nothing is concealed. Their Fury is so irregulated, that though they be defiled with all sorts of Vices, they accuse those that are Innocent, and observe punctually all the Justness of their Duty, endeavouring to ruine them by the Artifices and Juglings of their Lies. And for this they surprise the Ear of Kings, who have an Heart full of Goodness and Sincerity, measuring those those that are near their Persons by their own Dispositions.

The proof of this may be found in Antient Stories, and even in those of our Dayes too, which shew sufficiently how the good Intentions of Kings are Corrupted by the wicked Counsels of their Ministers and Servants.

For this Reason, we ought to give order for the Peace of our Provinces, and if we are Constrained to make you a Counter-mand, know, that it proceeds rather from the necessity of the Times, then from the inconstancy of our Resolutions.

It is necessary, that you should understand, that Haman the Son of Amadatha a Macedonian by Nation and Affection, after he had been promoted by our Goodnesse to the second place of our Kingdom, hath defiled by his Cruelty the effects of our Piety, and hath puffed himself up with so great an Arrogance, as to have dared to attempt to deprive us of our Sceptre, and of our Life. For he resolved to cause Mordecai to dye, to whose Fidelity I owe my preservation; and to destroy with him Hester the Companion of our Bed, and of our Scepter with her whole Nation, by Inventions pernicious, and till this time unheard of.

He hoped by this means, that having taken away our Conservatours, he might surprize us in a Dereliction, and translate the Kingdome of the Persians to the Macedonians.

But we have discovered, that the Jews destined to death by this wicked Villain, are without fault; That they use good Laws; and that they are the true Children of the most High, most Great, and Everliving God, by whom the Empire is given and preserved to us.

And for this Reason, we make void and disannul the Letters that he hath directed to you in our Name, to cause them to be Murthered, making you to know that the Authour of the Lye hath been hanged upon the Gallows at the Gate of Shushan, God rendring to him that which he hath deserved.

Furthermore, we Will and Ordain that the Jews live in all our Provinces according to their Law and Ceremonies; and that you assist them in bringing their Enemies to Punishment the same day that they had determined to destroy them, seeing that the God Almighty hath turned to them into Joy, that day of Tears and Grief.

And since that that is important even for our Life and Preservation, We Command that that Day be put in the number of the Feasts, that Posterity may know the Recompense of our Faithfull Servants, and the Punishment of the Traitors oppose our Will, and make attempt upon our Estate.

And if there be any Province or City that refuses to solemnize that very Day with Joyes and Chearfulness befitting it, we Will that it be destroyed with Fire and Sword, and that it be made inaccessible to Men and Beasts to perpetuity, to give an Example to others by the punishment of their contempt and Disobedience.

The Commands of the King were diligently executed, and the Jews Dreaded and Honoured in all places by reason of the great Credit that Mordecai had with the King his Master.

It seemed that the Sun was risen a new for these people heretofore afflicted, and that Heaven poured down upon them blessings in abundance. There was nothing every where but Joyes, but Dances, but Feasts, in Testimony of so publick an alacrity. But it is clear that Hester held yet somewhat of the Old Testament in the searching out of the enemies of her Nation, and in the Revenge that she caused to be exercised every where upon them that had sworne her Ruine.

Haman's House was given her, and ten of his Sons hanged to accompany the punishment of their Father. Five hundred men were slain in Shushan for having adhered to that miserable man, and through all the rest of the Cities of the Kingdome, much bloud was shed on the same day that had been assigned for the Massacres of the Hebrews.

We must avow that this History is wonderfully Tragicall, and one of the most wonderfull Revolutions of Fortune that ever arrived to Great ones, to make Posterity fear the Judgments of a God whose Hand is as weighty in the Chastisement of Crimes, as his Eye quick-sighted in the discerning of hearts.

JOSHUA. JUDAS MACCABEUS.

HE must be ignorant of the chief and most visible of beauties that knows not Joshua. One cannot see the Sun without remembring the great commerce that this valorous Captain had with the King of Stars. All the World lift their eys up to it, but none hath ever lifted his voice as far as it, to make himself be heard, and to make himself to be obeyed. The Stars knew Joshua, because he bore the Name of him that formed them: It is he that first gave us the fore-tastes of the name of Jesus, at which the Heaven, the Earth, and Hell, do bend the knee.

What lovely thing had not this generous Joshua, seeing one cannot name him without mentioning Salvation, which is the wish and content of all men? Who would think that such a spirit had been born and bred in servitude? And yet he was Pharaoh's slave, he was as the rest in the chain, that was at that time common to all his people. Those were very patient that could endure it, but he was far more valiant that found a means to break it.

When in his little infancy he played upon the banks of the River of Nile with the other prisoners, he then strook terrour into all its flotes, and the Angels of Ægypt, knew that he should tread under his feet the pride of Pharaoh, & carry away the spoils of that proud kingdom, so many times cemented with the blood of his brethren. He did every thing by Moses's orders, and Moses did nothing without him. If one was the eye of his people, the other was the arm; if one was the Conductour of them, the other was the Protectour. If one had the Providence, the other reserved to himself the execution which is ordinarily the most difficult piece of Prudence.

Moses lifted up his hands to Heaven, and Joshua his Arms upon the head of the enemies of God; the one combated with the lips, and the other with the sword: the one poured out oyl and wine upon the Altars, the other shed the blood of the wicked to make a sacrifice to the justice of the Sovereign Monarch.

He was inclined to war by the disposition of God himself, he received the sword as from his hands, and wore it fifty seven years always in assaults, always in defences, always in various encounters, and in bloody battels, for the safety and the glory of his Nation.

He hath reaped more Palms, then heaven hath stars, he made as many combats as journeys, and gained as many victories as he gave battels. Happiness never deliberated whether she should follow his undertakings. She was under him as a Souldier in pay, and whither one carried his Standards, the other incontinently displaied her wings to cover them. They never brake asunder; and hazard that hath often a foot so slippery, found firm ground when it was covered with the arms of Joshuah.

He affronted Giants that seemed to have been born only for the terrour of mankind. He tumbled down towers of flesh, and trod under feet Monsters that the most valiant durst not so much as look on. He took Cities whose Walls and Citadels were so high that they seemed to be lost in heaven.

The Plains of Makkedah, of Libnah, of Lachish, of Debir, of Hebron, of Gilgal, of Gezer, and of Jericho, bear yet the seeds of his Lawrels. Eglon and Ai preserve his Tropheys which are yet standing after they have seen the ruines of the Pyramids of Egypt. But Gibeon carries away the price of his victories, seeing it was it that saw the Sun stand still upon his Conquest.

Plato and Aristotle that hold the heavens and the stars, animated; Julius Firmicus that believes them filled with sence and with prudence, would not have failed to tell us here, that it was the love and the admiration of the valour of that great Captain, that tied the Sun by insensible chains in the midst of his firmament, and that he could not endure to set before he had seen the end of that famous battel: he could see nothing amongst our Antipodes that came near this spectacle; he esteemed his Light more noble and more precious for that it had shone that very day even upon the Valour of the most rare Man of the whole Earth.

But

But the Scripture teaches us, that the chiefe of the Luminaries of heaven ſtood for that time immovable, not by any underſtanding that it had, but by obedience that it rendred to its Creatour; ſeeing the Creatour himſelf would obey the voice of a man. All the Militia of heaven deſired to be of the Party, the Moon and the Stars waited upon their King, and would not move one ſtep that was not troden according to his meaſures.

After this do we think it ſtrange that the Rivers turned about their Paſſages to favour Joſhua's, and that the ſacred Jordan was ſenſible of the foot-ſteps of a mortal man, to whom the heavens themſelves gave ſome veneration?

Millions of men grew pale with fear when they ſaw one ſingle man with his ſword in hand; The walls of Cities fell to the ground, though he did not touch them but with his eys.

The only preſence of one Joſhua was worth an hundred Regiments; The ſouldiers thought nothing impoſſible under him, and by him the enemies eſteem'd themſelves vanquiſh'd as ſoon as ſeen.

What may one ſay of a General that ſubdued thirty and one Kings, that brake ſo many Sceptres, that ſaw ſo many Crowns and Diadems at his feet? One ſole Victory carried away upon a Monarch, cauſed the Roman Captains to be ſeen in a Chariot of Ivory drawn by white Horſes, and ſometimes by Elephants and Lions: Seſoſtres King of the Egyptians, four Kings to be tied to his Coach, for that he had conquered them in battel. But our Joſhua, a ſubduer of pride as well as men, deſires no exteriour pomp to honour his deeds of valour. It ſufficed him that God triumphed in him, and would not have any other glory, but to be under the feet of him that marches upon the wings of the winds, and upon the head of Cherubins.

He was not only a valiant Souldier, and wiſe General, but at laſt the Judge and Prince of his people. Great in Arms and in Laws, and accompliſhed in all ſorts of virtues. The Iſraelites thinking one day that Moſes their Conductour had been loſt in the Wilderneſs, deſired the High-Prieſt Aaron to make them a God to ſupply his default. But after that Moſes was dead, and that they beheld Joſhua ſeated in his place, they deſired no more any other Deity, becauſe they perceived in him the livelieſt impreſſion that man can have of God upon the earth.

Virtues that ſeemed moſt contrary were reconciled in him, and made but one ſole viſage of perfection. Piety made nothing ſoft in his Courage, nor Courage any thing fierce in his Piety. Height of Spirit found that ſhe was compatible with Meekneſs. Activeneſs went the ſame pace with Providence, and the moſt Illuſtrious of glories repoſed in him under the ſhadow of Humility. Juſtice in him did not offend Clemency; He imitated the living God that is merciful even as far as Hell. He puniſhed Crimes with a zeal mixt with ardour and compaſſion; and when he cauſed Achan that ſacrilegious man to dy, at the time that his hand was ſtiff to hold the ballance of Juſtice in an equality, he felt in his heart a tenderneſs that made him give death to the culpable as a benefit, though others took it for a puniſhment.

But let us remember while we ſpeak of Joſhua that God hath covered him with the rays of glory; to teach us, that we are conſtrained to cover his brave acts in ſilence.

To conclude, He to whom nothing was wanting but immortality, died as a ſetting Sun, animating his people with the ſpirit that went out of his body: and ſome hold that the Hebrews put upon his Tomb the figure of a Sun, as if they would ſay that he was amongſt men that which the Sun is amongſt the Stars, and that there is nothing even as far as the ſhadow of death, that hath not kindled for him lights of Immortality.

JUDAS MACCABEUS.

WHatſoever Virtue hath of Great, whatſoever Valour hath of Generous, met in the perſon of Judas Maccabeus to make a marvell of his life, and an Immortal memory of his Name.

God cauſed him to be born in a deplorable age, in the time that King Antiochus ſurnam'd the Illuſtrious, raiſed that horrible perſecution againſt the Jews, that made the heavens to weep, and the earth to bluſh with bloud. It was a ſport to that barbarous man to prophane holy things, and a continual exerciſe to flea and roaſt men, or to throw them into boyling Caldrons, without having any other crime, but dying for the true Religion. The cruelty of the torments overcomes the weak, and ſhakes even the ſtrongeſt; The Altars overturned upon the bleeding Prieſts, the children ſtrangled in the boſom of their ſighing Mothers; the flames that without diſtinction devoured the ſacred and prophane, the Houſes that ſeemed now but dens of Beaſts, preſented to the world an hideous ſpectacle that gave more deſire to dy, then courage to live.

Amidſt theſe deſolations was found a gallant old man named Mattathias, the father of many ſons all men of valour, who went out of Jeruſalem to retire himſelf in the City of Modin. There be aſſembled all thoſe of his Family, who were followed of whatſoever remained yet of moſt courageous to oppoſe themſelves againſt the fury of the Tyrant, and to retain the remnants of the true Piety. As ſoon as the Infidels had heard that a little handful of men aſſay'd to ſubſtract themſelves from their puiſſance, and refuſed to make open profeſſion of the Religion of the Pagans, they failed not haſtily to ſend unto them a Lievtenant of the Kings, that ſummoned Mattathias to render up himſelf with all his men, and to offer Incenſe to the Idols. But this virtuous man aſſembling his ſons and his allies, ſaid thus unto them,

It would be, to be too much in love with Life, to be willing to ſpare and keep it in the loſs of the true Religion. I am ſorry that I ever entred into the world, when I conſider the time to which God hath reſerv'd my age to ſee the diſaſters of my people, & the deſolation of holy Jeruſalem, abandoned to the pillage of rapinous hands, and to the prophanation of the impious. Her Temple hath been handled as the object of all reproaches, and thoſe Veſſels of Glory that ſerved for the Miniſtery of the Living God, hath been taken away by violence. We have ſeen her ſtreets covered with dead bodies, and the little children having their throats cut upon the Carcaſes of their Fathers. And what Nation hath not poſſeſſed our heritages, and is not enriched with our ſpoils? The holineſſe of the Temple hath not ſtayed ſacrilegious hands, and ſo many ſlaves of that proud City, have not been able to preſerve themſelves from flames. After this, what intereſt can we have in life, unleſs it be to revenge the quarrel of God? I am promiſed all the honours, and all the goods that I can reaſonably hope for, If I will obey the King Antiochus, and range my ſelf on the party of thoſe that have ſo baſely betrayed their faith. But God forbid, that I ſhould ever fall into ſuch a proſtitution of Judgment or of courage. When all thoſe of my Nation ſhall have conſpired to forſake their Law, to obey the time, and to accommodate themſelves to the Prince's will, I can anſwer for my ſelf, and for my children, and for my brothers, aſſuring my ſelf of their Generoſity that they will never do any thing that is baſe. Let all thoſe that ſhall have a zeal to the true Religion joyn themſelves to us, and know that amongſt ſo many miſeries there is nothing better, then to mark with their bloud the way of Safety and of Glory, to give example to Poſterity.

In the mean time the Kings Commiſſioners preſſed every one to declare himſelf, and to ſacrifice; whereupon a man of the people of the Jewes, whether he was frighted by the terrour of the puniſhments, or allured by the promiſe of rewards, ſtepped forth to ſacrifice upon an Altar ſet up in publick, and dedicated to the falſe Deities. But Mattathias having looked ſteddily upon him, felt his heart inflamed with a violent heat of the zeal that poſſeſſed him, and running to that Apoſtate, killed him with his own hand, and laid him dead upon the Altar, making him ſerve for an offering in the place to which he came to be a Prieſt. He added to him alſo that Lievtenant of the King that commanded them to offer thoſe ſacrifices of abominations, and declared open war to all the Infidels that would conſtrain them to forſake their Law.

It is a wonderfull thing to conſider the power of a man in zeal that contemns his life, and is ambitious of death. This holy old man began an army with five ſons that he had, and a few kinſmen. He quitted the City of Modin, where he could not be the ſtronger, to entrench himſelf upon a Mountain, whither thoſe that were zealous for the defence of the antient piety arrived from all ſides with their wives, their children, and their flocks; all reſolved to live, or to dye with the Illuſtrious Maccabeans. Mattathias ſeeing his army every day increaſe, did brave exploits of war; ſo that he was not contented to beat back the Infidels: but aſſaulted them even in their trenches, and chaſed them away, which gave him all liberty to demolliſh the prophane Altars that they had erected in many places, to cauſe circumciſion to be adminiſtred to little Infants, and to recover the ſacred books out of the hands of the enemies.

In fine, this valorous Captain, after many combats, ſeeing his laſt day approach, made a long oration to his children, inflaming them to the zeal of their Religion againſt the Tyranny of King Antiochus; and after he had given them Judas Maccabeus for their Chief, and Simeon for their Counſel, bleſſed them, and ſhut up his life by a moſt glorious end.

Judas, that had been a good Souldier under his Father, became a great Commander amongſt his brethren, and continued the deſign that had been traced out unto him by the virtue of their Anceſtours, employing all his power to raiſe again the Trophies of the God of Hoſts that had been thrown down by the fury of the Infidels.

I find that this great Cavalier founded his whole life upon Conſcience, and Honour, which he always eſteemed above all that is precious in Nature, and recommendable to Greece. He believed even in perfection a God Sovereignly Almighty, that hath an eye alwayes open upon the actions of men, that is the diſtributer of Glory, and the Revenger of Iniquities; and held firmly that he was to be acknowledged and adored by the worſhip, and the Ceremonies ordained in the law of his Fathers; and therfore embraced with an Incomparable ardour the true Religion, uſing his uttermoſt endeavour to practice, defend, and maintain it, to the prejudice of goods, life, honour, and of all that is eſteemed dearеſt in the world. He yeilded himſelf to be totally conducted by Providence, which he held to preſide in all Battels; ſo that he meaſured not victories by the multitudes of ſouldiers, by arms, by fortreſſes, by ammunitions of war: but aſſured himſelf that there was a ſecret Providence from above, that made all the happineſs and miſery of men.

From thence it came that he had a wonderful confidence in the Divine Protection, believing himſelf to be beloved of God, whom he loved reciprocally more by ſincerity of affection, then by exteriour Pomp; He never went to fight but he fore-armed himſelf with ſtrong and ardent prayers; he never undertook to give battel, but he exhorted his men to implore the aſſiſtance of God upon their Arms.

He alſo ſhewed himſelf very ſenſible of the favours of Heaven, and deſired that God ſhould firſt of all triumph in all the good ſucceſſes that accompanied his Standards; which he expreſſed viſibly, when, having defeated the Generals of King Antiochus in manifold aſſaults, and gotten a little reſt to his dear country, he took a preſſing care to cauſe the Temple to be repaired and cleanſed, that had been horribly prophaned by the Infidels.

It was an incomparable joy to all the people when after ſo many deſolations that had preceded, he celebrated a Triumphant Dedication, by which he cauſed the hopes of his Nation to reflouriſh. His cares extended even beyond the World wherein we live, and one may well affirm, that he was the firſt of the Antient Fathers of the Old Teſtament, that expreſſed more openly the charitable offices that ought to be rendred to the ſouls of the Deceaſed. This manifeſtly appears in an encounter which he had with Gorgias General of the Army of the Enemy, in which he loſt ſome Souldiers; and when he came to viſit the field of battel to view the Dead, and to cauſe them to be carried to the Sepulcher of their Fathers, he found that ſome amongſt them had in their cloathes certain pieces of the offerings preſented to the Idols, thinking perhaps that it was lawfull for them to accommodate themſelves with it for their uſe, though in effect the Law forbad it. This gave a ſhock at firſt unto his conſcience that was very delicate, and he deplored the unhappineſs of thoſe forſaken people, that had loaded themſelves with prophane Booties; yet when he thought that that befell them more for want of conſideration, and by the hope of ſome little gain, then by any conſent that they had given to Idolatry, he ſent twelve thouſand Drachmes into Jeruſalem, to cauſe Sacrifices to be offered for the reſt of their Souls.

This made him to be honoured with very particular favours of heaven; for he hath been ſometimes ſeen in a combat environed with celeſtial virtues that watched for his protection, and filled his enemies with terror. His very dreams were not without a myſtery, witneſs that which ſhewed him the Prophet Jeremy, and the high Prieſt Onias, who prayed before the face of God for the ſafety of the People; the former of which two put into his hand a gilded ſword, telling him that it was that wherewith he ſhould bring down to the earth the enemies of his Religion.

The great love that he had for God, reflected it ſelf continually towards his neighbour, on whom he contemplated the image of the firſt beauty. He bore in his heart all that were afflicted, and burned with a moſt ardent love for the good of his dear country. The zeal of Juſtice poſſeſſed his ſoul, and he had no greater delights in the world, then to ſuccour widows, orphans, and all neceſſitous perſons. They ran to him as to their true Father; they ranged themſelves under the ſhadow of his virtue, and found there a refreſhment in their moſt parching heats. His converſation was ſweet, his ſpeech affable, his manners without avarice. He never ſold his Protection, nor made any Traffick of his Valour. He knew not what it was to buy his neighbours lands, to build palaces, to plant orchards, to make gardens, and to heap up treaſures. He was rich for the poor, and poor for himſelf, living as a man untyed from all things elſe, and faſtned to virtue alone by an indiſſoluble knot of duty.

His Temperance paſſed even to admiration, ſo greatly did he contemn thoſe pleaſures and delights that others regard as their chief felicity. He never dreamed of cauſing the beautifull women priſoners to be preſerved for himſelf; becauſe he was skilful in the trade of defending Ladies honours rather then aſſaulting them. He never had any Miſtriſs, being perpetually Maſter of himſelf; and one ſhall have work enough to find out his wives name: it is not read that he had any other children but Virtues and Victories. He lived as an Eſſen eſtranged from all the pleaſures of the fleſh, and taſted no other contentment in the world, then to do great actions. He never enterprized the war againſt King Antiochus to make himſelf great, and to reign but for the pure love of his Religion and dear Country.

Traytours and corrupted ſpirits blame him for having taken up arms, ſaying, That it behoved them rather to ſuffer the Deſtinies then to make them. That it behoved them to obey the Powers that God had ſet over their heads. That it was a great raſhneſs to think to reſiſt the forces of all Aſia with a little handfull of ſouldiers; that it could not chuſe but provoke the conquerours, and draw upon the vanquiſhed a deluge of calamities.

The world hath been full in all times of certain condeſcending Philoſophers, who accommodate themſelves to every thing, that they may not diſaccommodate themſelves for virtue. They care not what viſage is given to Piety, ſo that they find there in their own advantages. By how much the more mens ſpirits are refined to ſearch out reaſons to colour the toleration of vices, by ſo much the more their courages are weakned, and neglect to maintain themſelves in duty. There are ſome that had rather lie ſtil in the dirt, then take the pains to riſe out of it.

Judas conſider'd that King Antiochus was not contented with having brought the Jews to a common ſervitude, but would overthrow all their Laws, and aboliſh entirely their Religion. He did not believe that it was lawfull for him to abandon cowardly the intereſts of God. He thought that there are times wherein one ought rather deſtroy ones ſelf with courage, then preſerve ones ſelf with ſluggiſhneſs. He looked not ſo much upon his ſtrength, as upon his duty. He perſwaded himſelf that a good Cauſe cannot be forſaken of God, and that we ought to eſſay to ſerve him, applying our wills to his orders, and leaving all the ſucceſs of our works to his diſpoſal.

This great zeal that he had of Juſtice was accompanied with a well tempered prudence. As he never let looſe himſelf in that which was abſolutely of the Law, ſo did he never uſe to rack himſelf by unprofitable ſcruples, that are ordinary enough to thoſe that are zealous through indiſcretion. Some of his Nation ſhewed themſelves ſo ſuperſtitious, that being aſſaulted by their enemies on the Saturday, they let their throats be cut, as ſheep, without the leaſt reſiſtance, for fear of violating the Sabbath, if they ſhould put themſelves upon a defence. Judas following the example of his father Mattathias took away that errour, which tended to the general deſolation of his Country, and ſhewed by lively reaſons, that God who hath obliged us to the preſervation of our ſelves by the Law of Nature, had never ſuch an intention as to give us for a prey to our enemies by an indiſcreet ſuperſtition. That it was a good work to defend the Altars and ones Country againſt the Infidels, and that it was not to break the Sabbath, but rather to ſanctifie it.

Following theſe paths, he was the firſt of all the Jews that made a League with the Romans, which hath ſeemed a little harſh to Rupertus, and ſome other Divines. But we muſt conſider what Saint Paul ſaith, That if all commerce with the Gentiles had been forbidden to the Jews, and to the firſt Chriſtians, they ſhould have been conſtrained rather to go out of the world, then converſe in it. Never did this great Captain in his moſt preſſing neceſſities cauſe the Roman ſouldiers to come into Paleſtine, fearing leſt their approach might bring ſome damage and prophanation to an Holy Land. But foraſmuch as he ſaw himſelf environed all round with Kings that bowed under the puiſſance of the Roman Empire, he thought that it would be convenient to endeavour to gain their friendſhip to obtain more eaſily Juſtice againſt the oppreſſions of his neighbours. He employed the power of the Infidels not to torment the faithfull, but to ruine infidelity. He ſought to thoſe into whoſe hands God had put the Power, to have the exerciſe of it to the glory of him that had communicated it to them; this was not a crime, but a moſt exquiſite piece of prudence.

The falſe high Prieſt Alcimus, Judas's adverſary, did not uſe the matter ſo, who cauſed the Armies of Antiochus to come to the deſtruction of the Altars, and to the maſſacre of his brethren, which cauſed him to be ſmitten with a ſtroak from Heaven, and rendred him execrable to the memory of men.

But we muſt acknowledg, that of all the great qualities that hath ſhined in this ſo famous man, Valour hath alwayes held one of the upper ranks. He was made for Military virtue, and furniſhed with all the neceſſary conditions that make Generals of Armies and Conquerours. An elevated birth, an happy beginning that he made under his father, ſcience of War, Authority, Happineſs, Vigilancy, Activeneſs, Boldneſs, Government, and whatſoever is beſt in the profeſſion of Arms, had contributed to make of him the wonder of his age. He was a Lion's heart, that found ſecurity in dangers, and would not have even Crowns themſelves, if he did not pluck them out of the midſt of thorns. One cannot read without admiration the two books of the Maccabees, in conſidering the great progreſſes that he made in ſo little time, and ſo many various encounters. In the ſpace of ſix years he ſuſtained the great and prodigious forces of three Kings of Asia, opposing himself with a little flying Camp against Armies of fourty, sixty, an hundred thousand men, which he put into disorder and confusion. He defeated in ranged battels and in divers combats, nine Generals of the Infidels, killing some with his own hand, and carrying away their spoils.

The first amongst them was Apollonius, who was of an high repute in Antiochus his Reign; because that he had been employed in the principal businesses of the Realm, treating with the Romans and the Egyptians for his Master. It is the very same that entred into Jerusalem with an Army of two and twenty thousand men, and under pretence of Peace made there an horrible spoil. Assoon as he heard that Judas Maccabeus had put himself into the field with a strength very little considerable, he thought that being Governour of Syria and of Phenicia, and at that time upon the place, the business concerned him above all others: and therefore he collects together great troops to stop the progress of the Jews, and to succeed with all security. But the valorous Maccabeus prevented him so vigorously, that he had not the leisure well to bethink himself: he gave him battel, wherein his men, seeing the assaults of the faithful people that seemed the assaults of Giants, began to stagger. Whatsoever pains he took to rally them, fear had so far gained upon them, that they destroy'd themselves for fear of being destroyed. Judas, by Joseph Gorion's report, made that day the heads of his enemies to fal under his courtle-ax, as fast as the ears of corn fall under the hook of the Reaper. He chose Apollonius out of the middle of his best souldiers and ran to him, challenging him to a Duel, in which the other was overcom in the sight of a trembling Army, and Judas took away his sword, which he used the rest of his days in so many glorious Combats.

Seron that was Lievtenant under Apollonius, pushed on with vengeance, and with glory that made him long since seek out an occasion to make himself renowned, thinking that Apollonius his defeat was but a stroke of Fortune, and that he should quickly bring Judas into good order, rallied all his forces, increasing his Army as much as possibly he could; which gave at first a great terrour to the Hebrews, seeing that the heads of that Hydra which they thought had been cut off pushed forth so suddenly. They had journied and fasted the very day of the combat, and seem'd all discourag'd; but Judas exhorted them with an ardent speech that put fire and spirit into all his Army. It fell so opportunely upon the enemy, that Seron thought he had to do rather with hungry wolves then men; and although he came with a great deal of bravery to the encounter, he quickly perceived that he had sung the Triumph before the Victory, and had very much ado to retire with a whole skin, contenting himself to run away after he had had the hope of conquering.

Lysias, that was the Almighty under King Antiochus, grew mad to see himself out-braved by so small an Army of men contemptible, and knew not what account to give the King his Master, to whom he had promised to root out the remainders of the Jewish people, so that there should not be any memory of them left behind. He chose on divers occasions three of the best Generals of all the Armies, which were Ptolomy, Gorgias, and Nicanor. Ptolomy made not any great brags; Gorgias was vain enough to promise himself the victory, and perswaded himself that he was very dreadful. But Judas, though he had then but three thousand men badly armed, defeated him, and took his camp which was filled with great riches, which gave a great temptation to the Jewish Army that desired nothing but readily to throw themselves upon the booty. Yet their Conductour that knew the art of War, and that many busying themselves about the spoils had lost their honour and their life, gave a strict command that they should not touch that pray of the Infidels before the defeat was perfected; and thereupon set himself to pursue his enemies that were in a disorder, and after he had killed a good number of them, put the rest to flight.

Nicanor that was the third of those Generals, after he had experimented the valour of Judas with the loss of his men, resolved not to commit his reputation to the incertainty of combats, but put off the Lions skin to take the Foxes, endeavouring to surprise Judas by treachery, seeing that he was impregnable by force. He made as though he sued to him for Peace, and under colour of friendship to draw him to a parly, wherein he had a design to seize upon him, thinking that it was the shortest way to end the War. But Judas took good order for the security of his person, and diverted that wicked design that the other had upon him. The Agreement, that was esteemed a meer dissembling, failed not to succeed: the two Generals saw each other, and having promised faithfulness to one another, Nicanor entred into Jerusalem, and expressed much cordialness to the Maccabean, whether he was taken with the admiration of his virtues, and the charms of his conversation, or that he employed all those caresses to deceive him; Yet they were so visible, that they gave a jealousie to the King by the reports of some ill tongues, that rendred the familiarity of Judas and Nicanor suspected to the State. He was constrained to take a journy to the Court to justifie himself thereon, and was dismissed with an express command to send the Maccabean bound in chains unto the City of Antioch, if he would that his justifications should be believed. He returned then into Judea continuing always his impostures; but Judas having been advertised of it, distrusted him, and left Jerusalem to retire himself unto Samaria. Nicanor caused the Priests to be summoned, to deliver him up alive or dead; and in case they did refuse, he threatned to prophane the Temple, and to make a dedication of it to the false Deities. The Priests having protested to him that it was not in their power, since Judas had forsook their City, he retired with an intention to make an exact inquest after him, and to carry him prisoner to the King.

But he seeing that the danger was very great, stifned his courage, and resolved himself rather to die like a gallant man, then to let himself be taken like a fit-still. He disposed his whole Army by extraordinary devotions and exhortations, that were all of fire, as being to enterprize one of the most important Combats. Nicanor caused his troops to march who were of a great number, and concluded to give battel on a Saturday, believing that the day of Rest would make him a better market of the enemies blood. He had in his Army some Jews that followed him, either by a voluntary Apostacy, or by necessity, that at that time advertised him that he would do well to defer the day of so dangerous a battel, by reason that it was dedicated to Rest. But he demanded thereupon who he was that had ordained that day of Sabbath to countenance their sloth? They answered him, that it was the God of Heaven that had destined it for his Glory; whereto he replyed, That that God of Heaven should content himself himself to make Laws in his own Dominion, but that he, that was the Almighty here on earth commanded them to march for the business of the King. He was carried away with choler and precipitation, which are two very dangerous rocks in the beginning of a battel, besides the vengeance of God pursued him as the cheif of all blasphemers. He fought so ill, that having been defeated by Judas, he left thirty and five thousand dead upon the place, whose number he augmented, finding himself involved in the common misery. The Conquerour caused his body to be sought out, and commanded that his head should be cut off, and the hand that he had stretched out against the Altars; ordering them to be hang'd up in the very remarkable places to be beheld by all the world: the Tongue that had blasphemed against God was plucked out of his palate, and given for a prey to the birds of rapine. Such was the end of that blasphemer, who hath made us see, that a man never despises God in his life but he experiments the arrows of his vengeance at his death. He should make a long discourse that would follow in the trace, all the valorous acts of Judas. I content my self, my Reader, to set before your eys all that is most illustrious, and to make you see how God sought for Judas and his brethren under the Reign of six Kings, with whom they had great business to scuffle for.

The first and the most capital of their enemies was that Antiochus surnamed the Illustrious, who was a factious spirit, turbulent, and enraged, that had undertaken to destroy the whole Nation of the Jews, because they had rejoyced at the presages of his death. One onely expedition that he made unto Jerusalem to revenge himself, cost the liberty or the life of fourscore thousand souls, the entire desolation of the Temple, pillaged, ransaked, and prophaned even so far, as that there was seen in it a Statue of Jupiter Olympian upon the Altar. After all these disasters he left Lysias his Lieutenant to extirpate the remainder of the Jewish people, and drew away to the coasts of Persia to make some new pillages. It was a King that Daniel calls the Impudent, because he had neither God, nor Conscience, nor Faith, nor Government, alwayes carried away by an impetuous flux of his own passions, that transfigured him into the savagest of all beasts.

After a Reign of twelve years he finish'd his life by a most horrible end, which made it visible enough that God combated for his Maccabee, and for all the faithful people. The Scripture saith, That that wicked man that often passed from profusion to necessity without ever separating himself from an insatiable avarice, having heard that there was a Temple very rich in the city of Persepolis, and that it was filled with gold and silver, and all the most exquisite rarities that Alexander the Great had left there, resolved to take the City, and pillage the Temple, as he had done that of Jerusalem; But the inhabitants having had intelligence of his design, beat him back with much confusion and great loss of his men, in the ruin of which he saw himself almost overwhelmed.

As he return'd from that voyage in a very shameful disorder, he heard of the great successes of our Maccabee, and of the routing of the Lieutenants, and of the forces that he had left behind him in Judea. This news arriving at a crosse time struck him upon his wounds, and pierced him to the heart with a lively and pricking grief. He fumed against heaven, he detested his fortune and his life, and swore that he would make no more of Jerusalem but a common tomb of all the inhabitants of the City.

He hastned with great marches for that effect, and was smitten with a stroke from heaven as invisible as it was afterward incurable. He that had plucked out the bowels of so many innocents, felt himself tormented with a furious collick, and with a multitude of infernal pains, that in a moment deprived him of his appetite, of his rest, and of all the joys of life. And as evils ordinarily enough come upon the neck of one another, it happened that whiles he caused himself to be drawn in his Caroch with too much precipitation, he fell, and got a wound by that fall, wherein corruption and worms suddenly arose, that infested that miserable body after a strange manner. The stink of it was so great that all the Army sented the infection of it, and he himself had very much ado to endure himself.

Sometimes he entred into great choler that made him vomit out execrable blasphemies, sometimes he suffered himself to be carried away by lamentation unseemly to his dignity, deploring the losse of that estate which was so beautiful, so stately, so triumphant, filled with honours, with health, with contentments and delights. Sometimes he passed into black affrights, and felt stinging remorses for his life past, saying, that all his misery came from having prophaned the Temple of Jerusalem, and made so bloudy a butchery of that poor people; that he perceived at present, that there was a sovereign power in heaven to whom all Kings do owe obedience, and that it is an unmeasurable folly for men to equal themselves with God. Furthermore, he protested, that if he recovered his health, he would make reparation for all his faults by an extraordinary piety, filling with riches the Temple that he had pillaged, and using the Jews with all courtesies and all liberalities possible for a great King; adding to all this, that he would make profession of the Jews Religion, and would become a servant of the true God. This wicked man had his mouth open to sorrows, and to vows; but God had no ears for him, and it was in vain to seek for mercy after he had so many times despised it. At last he rendred up his criminal soul after a Reign of twelve years, to suffer an eternity of punishments.

One may observe in many Histories, that some very bloudy Tyrants have not ended by the sword; but that God hath laid his hand upon them by some strange malady and visible strokes, that have made them die slowly, and rendred them spectatours of their own dishonour, and of their own funerals. So died Herod, and Tiberius, Alcimus, Copronymus, and Leo.

This miserable King left a son behind him of a very small age, named Antiochus Eupator, who was as soon successour of his fathers miserie as of his Empire. It is a pitiful thing that the children of Sovereign Princes that are born so great should not alwaies be born free. Many are like those creatures that bear purple, pearls, and musk; all that they have of Rich is the cause of their destruction; men cease not to torment them, and to hunt after them; and if they love them, it is onely to have their spoils. Eupator for that he was born a King became a slave to two of his fathers servants that contended for the Regency, and fell together by the ears to possess that unfortunate pupil. It is true that Antiochus when he was dying in a strange country, called Philip one of his great favourites and gave him the diadem, the purple royal, and the ring to carry to his son, and recommended him to him as in quality of a Tutour. But Lysias that had bred up this young Prince from his tender infancy, and held him yet under his Government, thought himself to be in a good possession, and would by no means give it up.

He put off now that countenance of Governour, which bare by necessity of duty some lineaments of severity, and took one of a principal Officer of State, full of attractions and complacency towards his King, who esteemed himself very happy that he was got out of his Wardship, and had his liberty. He gained him to him by the taste he gave him of his greatness and delights, accompanied with a thousand fair promises to make him live the most contented and the most triumphant Monarch under heaven.

Eupator, that found his words true in that manner of life which Lysias let him lead, and who durst not anger him, imagining him yet to be his Master, shewed himself entirely for him, rejecting the pretensions of his Adversary. And that which aided more yet this design, was; that the Army of Antiochus, that seemed should have upheld Philip's party, was found weak, after it had been evil entreated in a long and tedious voyage. But Lysias had great forces on foot in Palestine, Phenicia and Syria, who yielded themselves to his disposal, seeing that the young King declared himself openly for him. His competitour then began to flatter, considering him guarded both with favour and with force; but he ceased not to foment his ambitions which made on that occasion a great havock.

The new Regent, whether through the hatred that he had against the Jews, or whether through the desire that came to him of giving lustre to the Arms of his young Prince, or whether he was moved to it by the complaints that ordinarily did beat upon his ears about the incursions and progresses of the Maccabee, made a great preparation of Warr, and came to fall into Judea. His Army was composed of an hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, two and thirty well-trained Elephants that were distributed into diverse legions, and carried wooden Towers with great Engines upon their backs. Thirty women combated upon them, and about them marched five hundred Cavaliers with a thousand foot-men.

Judas had the hardiness to get him out of the fortress wherein he was to go and view them, and to oppose himself against their designs. But as soon as he was perceived, the adverse Army ranged themselves into a Battalia in the presence of the young King, who was very early up that day, beginning to relish the trade of Warr with some alacrity. The trumpets began to sound, and the Legions instantly were spread over the Mountains and over the vallies all round about Jerusalem with such a pomp, as that the earth trembled under the burden of the arms and of the engines of so great a train of men of Warr. They provoked then their Elephants to fight by shewing them the juice of grapes and mulberries squeezed out. Nothing was heard but shouts of souldiers, but neighing of horses, but clashing of lances and of swords, and just at the break of day, as the Sun appeared in the Horizon, the guilded bucklers cast out so great a light, that all the neighbouring mountains seemed to be filled with burning torches.

It is a prodigious thing, that the great heart of the Maccabee should march in the head of his army and begin to charge the enemy, which he dealt roughly with, killing at first five hundred men of the Kings van-guard without any loss of his. But that which seemed most fearfull, was, that Eleazer a Jewish Captain, having perceived an Elephant well armed and pompously adorned above the rest, imagined that the King Eupator combated upon it, and was pricked forward with a generous glory to assault and overthrow him. He passed through all the ranks of the army of the Infidels that were opposed against him, and arrived even to that terrible beast, under which he slipt himself, and pierced it with his sword, but finding himself cooped in by the multitude of men that were about and over him, he could not make a retreat soon enough, but was (as Saint Ambrose said) buried in his triumph.

Yet Judas having perceived the puissant forces of the King, saw well that the party was not tenable, and made an honourable retreat into Jerusalem. Lysias failed not to follow and besiege him in his trenches with abundance of engines of stone and fire. The other defended himself very courageously, resolving rather to bury himself in that place, then to yield it up by any sort of baseness. The besieged after some time were reduced to some extremity, being combated by arms and hunger in a year of rest, wherein the Jews, according to their custom, had sowed nothing, & were no more in hopes to gather any fruits. There was every where a very great desolation, but (as the favours of heaven happen often to good men in the bottom of their miseries) behold an unexpected accident, that provided far other business for Lysias and his Pupil! Philip took his time, and seeing his Rival busied in that Jewish warr, was resolved to ruine him; and to make Eupator a companion of his misery, seeing he had rendred himself the instrument of his will. The deceased King had a brother named Demetrius, who was at that time at Rome given in hostage, having not the liberty to return unto his Kingdom. Philip pricked with jealousie against Lysias, failed not to solicite that young Prince to seize upon the Empire, businesses being not yet well settled in the Nonage of King Eupator. It was an injustice and perfidiousness against the sovereign; but for as much as Antiochus the last dead father of Eupator had hereunto supplanted his Nephew by the same artifices, Demetrius left not to hearken to it.

In those fair hopes of the Crown, and in his captivity he was as a Bird that torments himself in his cage upon the arrival of a spring, and burned with a strong passion to have his dismission from the Roman Senate, to put in order as he said, the affairs of the Kingdom, and to assist the King his Nephew after his Fathers death. But the Romans that took pity on the Pupil by reason of Justice, and that feared least this man would embroil the State, denyed him the liberty that he desired. Philip failed not to possesse himself of the City of Antioch the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and to tread out the way for Demetrius to his Nephews Throne. There were men suborned that ceased not to sow amongst the souldiers and people, That it was not a fundamental Law in the Kingdom of the Seleucides, that the Nephew should precede the Uncle; and although men had a minde to introduce it, that the Father of the pretended King had abrogated it, usurping the Scepter upon his Nephew; that one should do his race no injury to render it the same usage; that there was no reason to refuse a Prince of four and twenty years of age, well made, full of spirit, of courage, and authority, to take a Child that had neither strength nor counsel, nor industry, and which was born for nothing but to ruine all. To this was added, that it was not the bloud of the Seleucides that was upon the Throne, but that Lysias Reigned, and went about to render himself usurper of the Crown of Asia, which was the uttermost of reproaches that ſo generous a Nation could endure to ſee a man of nothing, inſolent, ſavage, to make himſelf Maſter of the moſt conſiderable part of the world, and to exerciſe a tyranny upon men of honour and merit, that oppoſe his pernicious deſigns.

Theſe complaints often redoubled ceaſed not to ſtirre up ſpirits, and to procure the change of State that followed. Lyſias ſaw well that it was not now a time to be obſtinate on the ruine of the Jews, nor to buſie himſelf about the Siege of one place, when the whole Realm was a tottering. He thought on nothing, but on getting ſpeedily out of that Warr with ſome little honour, thinking it not convenient to provoke a people, mutinous enough, in that commotion. He cauſed the young King to look upon them with a quite other countenance, and told him that it was beſt to let them live in peace, without diſturbing them in the matter of Religion; aſſuring him that in all other caſes they would contain themſelves within their duty, and that good ſervices enough might be drawn from them. Yet that he might not diſcover any lightneſs in this change, he laid all the fault upon Menelaus, that was an Apoſtate Jew, and an enemy of his Nation, who, he ſaid, had been the cauſe of all the confuſion by his railing ſpeeches; and therefore he made him ſerve for a ſacrifice to that treaty of Peace, in which he ſingularly obliged the Jews, and waſhed away the blot, that the favour expreſſed by him to this wicked villain had printed upon his face. He ſhewed by this action the counſel that Politicians give their Sovereigns, to abandon thoſe to the publick hatred that have carried them to reproachable exceſſes, to diſburden themſelves of the envy; and if he had practiſed this example towards him that then made himſelf the teacher of it, his Scepter had been more ſecured, and his life moſt laſting.

Lyſias, before he raiſed the Siege of Jeruſalem, made an Oration publickly before the Principals of the Army and all the Souldiery, alledging fair pretences for that reſolution, but taking great heed not to diſcover the chief cauſe, for fear leſt that news ſhould wave the mindes of thoſe that inclined enough already to the ſide of novelty and ſedition. He uſed a wonderfull diligence to render himſelf before the City of Antioch, into which he entred, and Philip, who found not himſelf yet ſtrong enough to hold out a long ſiege, quitted to him the place, and fled away to Egypt. This firſt ſucceſſe puffed up the heart of Lyſias, who became exceeding haughty, and conſidered ſo little the Romans in that high puiſſance that made the earth to tremble, that he permitted an Embaſſadour, ſent to him by the Senate, to be aſſaſſinated, without ſhewing any reaſon.

In the mean time, one Diodorus that had bred up Demetrius in his infancy, tranſported himſelf from Syria to Rome, and animated him by a great vigour of words and reaſons, to render himſelf an uſurper of the Crown. He certified him that his Nephew Eupator, which was a child but nine years old, was not any whit conſidered; that Lyſias was the object of the publick execration; that he had confidence in no body, nor any one in him; that all the Souldiery and people ſought a new Maſter; and that he was aſſured, that if he did onely ſhew himſelf, though he ſhould be followed but with one Servant onely, all the world would run to him to carry him to the Throne. He kindled ſo ſtrongly the ambition of that young Prince, that he ſecretly ſtole away from Rome, and made account to go to the Conqueſt of an Empire, accompanied onely with eight perſons. He failed not upon the way to write to the Senate of Rome, making great excuſes for his ſo ſudden a departure, renewing the offers of his ſervices, and the oaths of his fidelity, with a proteſtation that he went not to trouble his Nephew, but to oppoſe Lyſias that was an inſolent fellow, and would bring under the ſubjection of his Tyranny both the King and Kingdom; he forgot not to charge him with the Murder of Octavius a Roman Embaſſadour, that had been newly ſlain, adding that he would become the Revenger of ſo cowardly a Treachery.

The Romans ſeemed neither to be aſtoniſhed nor angry at his going: but attended the ſucceſſe of his affairs to make him anſwer. He quickly got as far as the City of Tyre, and ſent ſecretly Diodorus into Antioch to hear the reports, and ſound the ſpirits of men, which he found very much diſpoſed to a change.

Whereupon Demetrius declared himſelf, and took the Diadem with a generall applauſe of the Tyrians, that made a great faction for him. Lyſias with his Eupator, found himſelf much ſurpriſed at the news; and deliberated a long time, whether he ſhould go out of that narrow paſſage to meet and fight with him, or intrench himſelf in the City of Antioch, or expect him with ſure footing. This laſt advice ſeemed the more ſecure: but it was leſs glorious, ſuddenly to ſhut himſelf up upon the firſt bruit of a ſedition, and as a fearfull creature to run into his hole to hide himſelf. It was repreſented to him, That the ſovereign remedy againſt thoſe tumults, was to fly ſpeedily to them, whereas delay would ſerve for nothing but to augment the boldneſs of the inſolent; that ordinarily they were very much amated when they were ſet upon with vigour, before their conſpiracy was ſettled; that many that were yet but half engaged, would retire from them at the leaſt rumour; that the Majeſty of Kings bore ſomething of great and ſacred, that aſtoniſhed the Rebels. In fine, that it appertained to the dignity of ſo high a Prince, and to the prudence of a Miniſter of State, to endure nothing baſe: but to put themſelves ſuddenly into the field to defend their honour and their Kingdom, which are two things whoſe loſs is irrecoverable.

Thoſe that deſired moſt the ruine of Lyſias, were the firſt to flatter him concerning Courage and Generoſity, wiſhing nothing more then to ſee him in the field. This made him go out of Antioch to go meet Demetrius. But he that had ſeen himſelf ſo well accompanied in proſperity, found himſelf almoſt all alone in danger; for he was betrayed and ſold by his own Souldiers, who ſeized upon the young King and him, to deliver them to Demetrius, who was yet in a great uncertainty of ſucceſſe, and ſaid to thoſe that had elected him.

Companions, I am your work; and the queſtion of my life, of your honour, of your goods, and of all that a mortall man can fear, or hope for, is this day to be decided. If ye perſiſt in the good will ye bear to me, I eſteem my ſelf ſufficiently, and ſufficiently rich. The Scepter is nothing to me in compariſon of the approbation of your judgements and of your choice, which ought now to be verified by your courage and by your arms: We march under the favour of the Gods of the Roman Empire, againſt a Tyrant that hath poſſeſſed himſelf of that young Prince and of the Crown, to aſſaſſinate the one and rob the other. It is time either to defend Juſtice by our bloud, or to conquer the Empire by our ſweat.

As he was upon these discourses, the news came wholly to him, that Lysias had been apprehended (with his Pupil) by the consent of all the Legions, and they were to be brought to him Prisoners. This grand word gave him joy mingled with some doubt, which made him meditate how he should use his fortune. He shewed that he had a very great sense of the honour that had been bestowed upon him; but he desired not to see Lysias nor his Nephew (as the Scripture assures us) whether it was that his heart was mollified with some tenderness by the compassion of his bloud, or whether it was a wile of a Politician who would not seem to doe that which he procured to be done, that he might have lesse blame in that action, and that he might the more easily justifie himself to the Roman Senate about the death of the young King. The Souldiers finished that which he had begun, slew Lysias, and laid their bloudy hands upon the person of poor Eupator, without having any regard either to the innocency of his life, or to the tenderness of his age, or to the character that he bore: so true it is that ambition is filled with a contagious venome that spares nothing for the satiating of it self.

Demetrius saw himself King by a generall consent of all the orders of the Realm, and had no more any thing to fear, unless it was from the Romans, the distributers of Empires and of Glories. And therefore he employed all his cares to appease them by great submissions and reasons, that made them plainly see, that it was more for the interest of their State to preserve then to destroy him. He sent them for this purpose a solemn Embassage with with great presents; and above all, a Crown of an high price, for a mark that he submitted his Royal dignity to their discretion. Further yet, to testifie how he embraced their loves and their revenges, he caused Leptines and Isocrates the Gramarian to be put in chains, that were accused to have had an hand in the murdering of Octavius their Embassadour, and sent them away to Rome, to receive the sentence of the Senate. The Roman relished well all those references, and confirmed the new King in his pretensions upon the protestations that he made, that he was not stained with his Nephews bloud, whom he said to have been taken away by the misfortune of a Sedition raised against him, without having any means to save himself; and if he had not made a search after the crime, he excused himself by the generality of the culpable, as being a thing ordinary enough, that sins that have an infinite multitude of Complices, have not any punishment.

He was no sooner upon the Throne, but he saw himself involved by mishap in a warr against the Maccabees. Alcimus, that was a disloyall Jew and Traitour to his Nation, pricked forward by the ambition of the Pontificate, and jealous, even to rage, of the great Progresses of Judas, failed not to prepossesse the spirit of the King, who was a man of an easie belief, to make black his Adversary by most horrible Calumnies, and to interest all the Kingdoms of Syria to his ruine. This Forger of Warrs and Battels obtained all that he did desire by detestable Artifices, and caused Armies to go to the ruine and desolation of his Countrey. Judas Maccabeus upon this change, kindled again his antient vigour, and rallied all his forces to oppose the Generals of King Demetrius; so that at first, he defeated some of them with a very famous rout, which more inflamed that Monarch, not being able to endure that his Arms should be cryed down at the beginning of his Reign; this made him send into the field Army upon Army with so great impetuousnesse, that there was no more any means left to make resistance.

Yet the great heart of the Maccabee could not yield, but sailed against winde and tide, the thoughts of his valour making him forget those of his danger. He had yet three thousand men very resolute fellows, with which he promised himself to continue his Victories; but when Bacchides the Generall was seen appear with an Army of two and twenty thousand men, many withdrew themselves for fear of the danger into which the Maccabee, following the ordinary Tracts of his courage, was about to precipitate them. These runawayes beginning to wheel about to the other side, stole away so handsomely from the Army, that of three thousand there remained but eight hundred. The Maccabee felt his heart much pierced, seeing himself forsaken of his brethren and of his friends in his greatest need; he burned with a desire to charge his enemies, but when he considered the small forces he had about him, his heart bled within him. It was an evident peril to approach the enemy, and death to retire from them; diverse thoughts about this Combat contended in his heart, but those that favoured his boldnes had the upper hand. Let us go (sayes he to his men) and try our fortune; let us essay whether we shall have heart enough to encounter the Army that comes against us. The most considerate men replyed, that they wanted not any courage, but that their small appearance would not be able to affront an Army of two and twenty thousand men, with a Regiment not compleat; and that it was expedient for them to retire that day to rally some new Troops, and to return to the Combat with hopes of greater Advantages. God forbid (replyed the Maccabee) that our enemies should have that contentment to see us turn our backs and fly before them; this is a thing I could never yet be taught since I took up Arms. Ha! Where is that gallantry that I have alwayes seen in you? Ought we to be so much in love with life? If our hour be come, let us dye valorously for our brethren, and let us not leave a blemish upon the lustre of the honour that we have acquired.

He carryes them away all by his Authority, and they are already resolved to conquer or to dye. The Trumpet sound on both sides, the Earth eccho's with the noise of the Arms, and shouts of the Souldiers. Bacchides causes his Dragoons, armed with Arrows and with Slings, to advance, who began the skirmish, and led up a great Battel that endured from the Morning to the Evening, the one combating by Number, and the other by Valour. And when the Maccabee saw that the best Troops were on the right point about the person of Bacchides, he resolved to make his way thither, which he did, with a prodigious violence, making them lose their footing, and beating them back with much confusion. But those on the left point, that were yet fresh, seeing the disorder of their Companions, came to fall upon Judas and upon all his Troup that were extremely wearied with having laid upon the place so many bodies of the Enemies. These defended themselves valiantly, but the multitude of those that set upon them on all parts, overwhelmed them, and the incomparable Maccabee, by having received many wounds, opened as many bloudy-gates to his generous soul to fly away into the other world.

There are neither Colossus's nor Pyramids that can can equal the deeds of this gallant man. Never did any man fight better, or for a better Cause. His heart was a source of generous flames; his hand was the thunder it self, his valour a miracle; his life an example; and his death was like to be that of his whole countrey that would have buried it self in his tomb, if his brothers, Jonathan and Simon had not enlarged his conquests by the imitation of his prowess.

The good party was much weakened by the decease of him that was the soul of his whole Country and it seemed that Judea would quickly be swallowed up by the great forces of King Demetrius: but the succouring hand of the God of hosts was not wanting to his servants in the extremity of so many miseries. The pernicious Alcimus that had raised that whole storm, when he thought himself to be above his hopes, was smitten with a stroke from heaven, and died suddenly of a strange malady.

Demetrius after a Reign of some years saw a great faction raised against him from that coast whence he least expected it, which deprived him of his Scepter and his life. His scornful and haughty nature made him disdain the Kings his neighbours, even so far as to offend them, by ways of words and deeds. He was also little affable and courteous to his Subjects, that loved naturally to be caressed of their Prince; and although at first he was of an humour good enough, yet he was so much changed, that having built a very sumptuous Castle near his Capital city, he lived there constantly to take his pleasure, and let himsef be seen by very few. His people of Antioch that was on the other side arrogant enough, were incensed and wearied with his Reign. They began to raise rebellions that were fomented under hand by the Kings of Egypt, of Asia, and of Cappadocia that distrusted him, and thought to find him a successour.

He was quite astonished, when he saw one Pompalus, a young man, before that time unknown, that called himself the son of Antiochus the Illustrious, and brother of Eupator, come and demand the Kingdom of Syria, as appertaining to him by right of birth. Many Historians hold that it was a pure fiction, and that that pretended was suborned by the artifice of those three Kings, and namely of Ariarathes the Cappadocian: yet since the Scripture names him the son of Antiochus the Illustrious; I find that it is very probable to follow that which others have written, and to say that that Antiochus had heretofore made love to a young Rhodian woman named Bala, on whom he had begotten this natural son with his sister Laodice. He failed not to shew himself at Rome, and to make himself be somewhat taken notice of by the practices of one Heraclides, a wise and crafty man in managing businesses. The enemies of Demetrius embraced this occasion to disturb him, and carried (as much as they were able) this man to the throne, not by reason of Justice, but because they believed they should have a better market for their pretensions by making a new creature, then suffering any longer him they had rendred more absolute, then they desired he should be.

It is a strange thing that a man of nothing, found instantly Cities, Armies, and a Kingdom at his devotion. It was now that Jonathan, the brother and successour of Judas, was sought after, and sued to by those two adversary Kings with extreme earnestness. Pompalus that took the name of Alexander, wrote him letters ful of honour, offering him the Principality and Pontificate of his Nation, qualifying him with the name of friend; and sending him a purple Robe with a Crown of gold. Demetrius, whom necessity had rendred very courteous, made him also on the other side a thousand fair promises to draw him to his party. He exempted him from all Tributes, he took away the Garrisons, he gave him places of importance, by a free gift, he received the Jews to offices & governments, he restored all those of their Nation that he held in hostage, He granted them an intire Liberty in their Religion and Policy, and Revenues also for the Temple, so that there was nothing more to be desired.

Yet Jonathan would never range himself under his Standards, but (as injuries being yet fresh, smart more then old ones) the Jews chose rather to give themselves to the son of their most cruel persecutour, then to Demetrius that had taken from them their dear Maccabee, and held yet their liberty under oppression. The party already made against that miserable Prince, fortified it self every day; and although he took all the good order that his affairs seemed to require: yet he could not divert his unhappiness that dragged him to a precipice. It is true that he got the better in some small encounters; but when the great battel that was to decide the controversie of the Kingdom was to be given, he saw himself very much forsaken, and his enemy assisted with the best forces of all Asia. He failed not for all that to fight with all possible valour, and although his Army was scattered, he would never fly: but cast himself in the hottest of the mingling, killing many of his enemies with his own hand. His horse having taken a false step slipped himself into a slough whence he could not get out; but he suddenly quitted him, got himself on foot, and made a great spectacle, a King covered with dirt & bloud, with his sword in his hand, that laied about with a stiff arm, and without remission sustained the hail of arrows that the enemy let fly upon him, standing in flexible against all those disasters of his evil fortune. In fine, he would not quit his Crown but with his life, and buried himself in honour.

Every one bows under the happiness of that false Alexander; he mounts suddenly upon the Throne of his adversary, where he receives the services and adoration of all the world. Philometer the King of Egypt, that had much upheld his party, in which he sought his own interests, gives him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, whose wedding was magnificently celebrated in the city of Ptolomais, in the presence of the two Kings, the father-in law & the son-in law, where Jonathan was also present that was caressed of both the two by extraordinary favours, and managed the businesses of his State with all possible advantages.

Alexander seeing himself in unexpected riches, & amidst so many ornaments of a borrowed fortune, could not contain himself, but let himself flag in a sluggish and voluptuous life, abandoning all the affairs of his Kingdom to the discretion of one Ammonius, a young brainless fellow, who carried himself most insolently, & incensed the Queen Laodice, & all the Nobles of the Court in such a manner, as that he was at last set upon, & slain in the habit of a woman which he had put on to secure himself, God thus taking vengeance of his filthy and effeminate life. The Antiochians were first weary of the dissolute life of their Prince that was alwayes in the midst of wine and women, which made them believe that he was a suppositious King that had nothing in him of generous. They began to regret Demetrius, whom they had seen dy with so much courage, and knowing that he had left two ſons yet very young, one of which bore his Fathers name, and the other was called Antiochus Sidetes; They invited the elder of them, giving him aſſurance that he ſhould have the Crown.

Philometor that was aſhamed of the deportments of his ſon-in-law, and that under pretence of moderation deſired nothing leſs then to add the Diadem of Syria to that of Egypt, well knowing that ſo many changes of Maſters make a State ſhake, and give fair advantages to thoſe that would invade them, upholds this Rebellion, forſakes Alexander, and by a notable affront takes away his daughter from him to give her to the young Demetrius. And to colour his inconſtancy, he made a Manifeſt that publiſhed, That his ſon-in-law (by an execrable diſloyalty) had made an attempt upon his Kingdom and upon his life, which made him break the friendſhip that he had ſworn with him. Under this pretence he ſeizes on ſome places, which it was eaſie for him to keep whiles he made himſelf authour of the fortune of the new King. The miſerable Alexander awaking out of his ſurfeits, ſaw the Egyptian and all his Subjects bandyed againſt him, and a great Army that was coming to fall upon his head, which he reſiſted feebly, and quickly forſook his party, going to hide himſelf in the bottomes of Arabia, where he was hunted after and entrapped by Zabdiel the Arabian, who cut off his head, and carried it to the King of Egypt, who contemplated it a long time with a ſpirit more then ſalvage; for which he was puniſhed of God, and dyed three days after of the wounds he had received by a fall from his horſe at the defeating of his ſon-in-law.

Behold marvellous ſports of fortune, and great revolutions that ended not at this point yet. Demetrius, young of age and government, was not a man to ſettle a Kingdom ſhaken with ſo great concuſſions. He thought more of taking the pleaſures of Royalty, then of bearing the burthen of it; buſineſſes were to him as many puniſhments, and paſtime a continual exerciſe. This was the cauſe of new factions and great ſeditions that were raiſed in his Kingdom. The Maccabees, whom he gained to his party, rendred him very good offices, although he was more ready to receive them, then liberal to reward them.

In the weakneſs of this new Government ſtarted up the diſloyal Tryphon, who had been Captain of the Guard to the falſe Alexander; and having ſeized himſelf of a little childe that his Maſter had left behind him, he had the boldneſs to propound him for King and true Succeſſour of the Crown. When he ſaw that Jonathan already obliged to Demetrius was able to oppoſe his deſigns, and to unravel the web of his ambitions, he ſurpriſed him by a deteſtable treachery, and cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated with his children, after he had received the money that he had demanded for his ranſome.

The young King altogether aſtoniſhed at the party that was made againſt him, withdrew himſelf to the King of Parthia, to deſire aſſiſtance of him; where it happened, that by the calumny of his enemies, he was clapt up into an honourable Priſon as if he had come to make an attempt upon the Kingdom of his neighbour. His ſpirit, that was alwayes wanton, made love even in that captivity, and debauched a daughter of that King his hoſt, whom he was conſtrained to wed, although he was already married; and when he had ſtoln out of priſon, he was caught & brought back again to this new wife.

Tryphon knowing what had befaln him, cauſed his Pupil to be murthered by an execrable cruelty, feigning that he had been taken away by a natural death, and took the Diadem, profeſſing himſelf to be the revenger of the Tyrant, and the lawful King of Syria. After ſome time, the liberty of the young Demetrius was mediated, but his wife Cleopatra, that had a crafty and proud ſpirit, vext with the inconſtant loves of her husband, and wearied with his looſeneſs, raiſed up againſt him puiſſant enemies that maſſacred him. And ſome are of opinion that ſhe her ſelf was one of the complices of that attempt; and that Demetrius his brother, whom ſhe married afterwards, was not innocent of it. My Pen hath horrour at theſe bloudy tragedies, and paſſes over them as upon burning coals.

Antiochus Sidetes ſeeing himſelf on his brothers Throne, eagerly purſued Tryphon, and beſieged him in the city of Dora, where finding himſelf extremely ſtraightned, and out of all hopes of ſuccour, he killed himſelf with his own hand, and yet could not deface by his bloud the villanous ſtain of perfidiouſneſs that remained upon him by the death of the young King.

The Conquerour perceiving himſelf above his buſineſſes, ſaw that the Maccabees, in the troubles of Syria poſſeſſed by ſo many Kings, had made great progreſſes, would repreſs them; and made warre againſt Simon that ſucceeded his brother Jonathan, and who was afterward aſſaſſinated at a banquet by Ptolomy his ſon-in-law. the King, as 'tis thought upholding by his favour that cruel baſeneſs. Two of his ſons were involved in the miſerie of the father, and the murtherers were already diſpatched to add to them John Hyrcan ſon of the ſame Simon. But he, having had intelligence of that firſt deſign, ſtood upon his guard, and governed Judea the ſpace of more then thirty years with much prudence and happineſs; outliving a long time that laſt Antiochus, that was ſtoned to death as he was going to pillage the Temple of Mannea.

Hyrcan had for Succeſſour his ſon Ariſtobulus who took the Diadem, and reſumed the name of King among the Jews, after a long diſcontinuation, which happened an hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord. Thoſe of his race failed not to continue the Regall Dignity in their houſe, till that Hyrcan, which was ſo cruelly ſpoiled and maſſacred by Herod, as I have ſaid in the hiſtory of Mariamne.

Behold how the virtue of Judas Maccabeus extended it ſelf through many Ages, and without thinking of it, put the Crown upon the head of thoſe that were of his family and of his name, God recompencing his Zeal and Juſtice beyond the fourth generation. I have endeavoured to make in this diſcourſe a little abridgment of that which is contained in the two books of Maccabees, and relate it to you (my Reader) in a ſtreight line, & a method clear enough, hoping that you will have content and edification to ſee the Juſtice of God reign over ſo many crowned heads, who ceaſes not to puniſh the wicked, and to render to the good, ſafety and glory for a recompenſe of their virtue.

GODFREY

GODFREY of Bovillon.

GEORGE CASTRIOT.

IT was not the voice of a man, but an Oracle of the holy Spirit that Pope Urban the ſecond pronounced, when he gave to the Croſier for a Device, God will have it ſo: This ſpeech was the ſoul of all the Intentions of Godfrey of Bovillon. It was the Butt of all his actions. God never made the prodigious effects of his power more viſibly appear then in the conduct of this moſt Illuſtrious Perſonage. It was a Captain formed in his Boſome, and inſtructed by his hand, that was to break the chains of the Chriſtians, and to pull down the pride of the Sultans.

So many other expeditions were almoſt all ſplitted, but this of Godfrey bore a God would have it ſo, and nothing reſiſted its Good hap. Many men torment themſelves all their life-time in great deſigns that are as the Dragons, and Chimera's, and armed men, that our fancy ſhapes upon the body of a Cloud. The wind drives them, the divers poſtures confound them, the Aſpects change them, and all that we behold with admiration in the Heavens, falls in water upon our head, and makes mortar under our feet.

How many Princes have made great preparations both of Men and Elephants, of Horſes and of Ships, of Arms and Ammunitions, out of a deſign to make great Conqueſts! and all this hath vaniſhed for want of a God will have it ſo. There are certain impreſſions in great affais which are never found without the favours of heaven. One God will have it ſo, will make us ſail in the Sea upon an Hurdle or upon a Tortoiſeſhel; one God will not have it ſo, wil drown us in a well Rigged Ship.

It was a God wills it, that ſeiſed in an inſtant the ſpirit of the moſt excellent Cavaliers of Europe, to undertake a voyage into the Holy Land; It was a God wills it, that made them followed by innumerable multitudes of Mortals. But it was alſo a God wills it, that made them caſt their eyes upon Godfrey of Bovillon, as upon the moſt valiant, the moſt happy, and the moſt able to pluck Jeruſalem out of the hands of Saladine.

The King of the Bees appears not more viſible in the middle of his ſwarm, then this great Captain appeared amongſt an infintie number of Cavaliers aſſembled to revenge the holy Sepulchre. There was not one onely ray of the eyes that beheld him, that did not expreſs ſome favour to his Merit; he had as many approvers as Spectatours, and every man ſigned him his Commiſſions even by his ſilence.

That Illuſtrious bloud of the Heroes that ran in his veins, that advantageous Stature that raiſed him the head above ſo many Millions of men, that face that Majeſty had choſen for her throne, that tongue that carried inſenſible chains to captivate mens hearts, that comelineſs of the forehead that was at once modeſt and bold, that valour that was painted on all his limbs, that courage that kindled a delightful fire in his eyes, all the Virtues that ſeemed to march about his Perſon, and in fine, that finger of God that had imprinted on him the Character of Conquerour, made him be choſen as the firſt Mover of that wonderful deſign.

There was nothing but his Modeſty that oppoſed the deſires of all the World, and that would make him yield to ſome other man that which every one conferred on him. But the conſideration of the publick good carried him away, and made him load upon his ſhouldiers a burden that might tire the Giants. It is true that Hugues the King of France his brother held the firſt range by the highneſs of his Houſe: but counſel, execution of great deſigns, and experience compleated in all ſorts of accidents, gave to Godfrey the managing of the Arms.

Our Army was found to be three hundred thouſand Foot, and an hundred thouſand Horſe, that ſeemed to carry away the Maſs of the earth; yet the Saracens were not diſcouraged, but aſſembled themſelves on all ſides with ſo prodigious a Multitude, that it might, as it ſeemed, equal the veins of the Abyſs, and the ſands of the Sea-ſhore.

The controverſie was for Religion, Honour, and goods, between two Nations that aſpired to the Domination of the World, and that eſteemed all ſharing inconſiſtent with their Greatneſs. The one came thither moved by their ſuperſtition, that had gained a marvellous advantage over ſpirits poſſeſſed by errour, and inchanted by the charmes of a

falſe

falſe Prophet. The other was carried by the true Religion, perſwading themſelves, that they had all Juſtice to pluck the Sepulchre of their Maſter out of the hands of Infidels; and that it would be an immortal Glory to them to loſe their Blood in the ſame place that Jeſus had honoured with his.

Man's ſpirit is overwhelmed with the Number of Wonders that are read in the Hiſtory of this Warr. The Hiſtorians cannot follow them, and we muſt averr, that the brave Godfrey having far ſurpaſſed the deeds of Achilles and of Hector, hath had the misfortune to want an Homer.

He gave more then an hundred Battels before he ſaw himſelf at the end of his deſign; He fought with two Nations, that ſeemed Furies which Hell had vomited upon the Earth; he combated with Hunger, Thirſt, Sickneſs, and all the damnable Artifices of Negromancers that oppoſed his Valour. The eternal ſnow of the Mountain Taurus, the inacceſſible rocks, the Rivers died with blood, the Seas armed with Tempeſts and with Monſters, did never abate his ardour.

He was ready to enter for the love of his Saviour into Regions where Nature is nothing but a benummed maſs, where the Sun hides it ſelf, and the night reigns without a Peer, where the moſt ſalvage Barbariſm makes us believe that it is ranged even as far as the Gates of Hell.

The City of Nicea that bore the name of victory it ſelf, was the firſt that preſented Palms to this our Conquerour. It was there, that Solyman one of the moſt Illuſtrious Generals of the Barbarians was beaten and quite vanquiſhed, all his Army being put into a Rout, with an exceeding Maſſacre, that filled Aſia with the terrour of the Chriſtian Arms. It was there that the Valiant Godfrey killed with his own hand a Rabſhakeh that braved it upon the wals of Nicea, with an immeaſurable preſumption of his ſtrength. The City was won; and the vigorous ſtorms of the beſiegers beat down before them all the reſiſtances of the beſieged.

The proud Antioch followed quickly after. And although that Corbanes was come to its relief with innumerable troops of Parthians, Medes, Aſſyrians, he could not ſtop the current of the proſperities of this inviſcible General: but augmented by the loſs of all his Legions the terrour of that victorious arm that overthrew ſmoaking Cities, and made in all places a deſſige of the blood of the Barbarians.

The Caliph of Egypt that was now advanced to divert the Fatal day of his Sect, ſaw himſelf involved in the ſame ruines that he thought to have repaired

All their attempts now remained but for the City of Jeruſalem, which was the Object and Deſire of our heavenly Argonants. It was aſſaulted and defended with a vigour that never yet had its equal. But in the end it yielded to the Arms of the Chriſtians. It was here that the Illuſtrious Godfrey was ſeen to combat upon an engine of wood that he had cauſed to be raiſed, to enter into the City. He appeared that day, not as a Man, but as a Demy-God, all flaming in the brightneſs of his Arms, whiles the Hail of Arrows flew about his Head, and his Arm mowing the Turbants of the Saracens, made way through fire and ſword. He entred firſt of all in bright day in the ſight of the Army into Jeruſalem, and pitched the Standard of the Croſs in the place where Jeſus had conſecrated it with his blood. What acclamations! What Congratulations! What Palms and Lawrels! The Turks fled as the pale Ghoſts of Hell, and the Chriſtians erected on all parts the Trophies of our Redeemer upon their ruines.

It was then that all the Princes proclaimed him King of the conquered Country, thinking that there was not any one more worthy of it, in the reſt of the whole world; ſeeing that he had joyned to that prodigious Valour, the virtues of Religion, Piety, Juſtice Prudence, Liberality, Magnificence, Goodneſs, Clemency and affability.

They failed not to offer him a royal Crown richly adorned with Pearls and pretious ſtones; but this good Prince filled with the zeal of Devotion ſaid, What! ſhould I bear the name of King in the place where my maſter hath been covered with reproaches? Should I take the Sceptre in my hand, where he hath taken the Croſs upon his ſhouldiers? Should I ſuffer a Crown of Gold to be put upon my head, where he hath received one of Thorns? Sure I ſhould then hold my ſelf for vanquiſhed, if ſuch a vanity ſhould be victorious over my heart. It is God that hath inſpired into us theſe deſigns, it is he that hath conducted them, and that hath Crowned them. I pretend to no other honour, then to hang all honours at the feet of his Croſs.

He contented himſelf with the name of Duke, and ſet himſelf preſently about labouring in the Civil Government, to purge the City of all its Infamies, to pull down the Moſqueta's to build Churches, to give a luſtre to the Clergy, to cauſe the Goſpel to be preached, to found Hoſpitals, to adminiſter Juſtice, to order the Militia for the defence of his Conqueſt, and in a word, to do all the duties of a moſt accompliſhed Monarch. But (can we ſpeak it without a Groan?) his Reign laſted but a year, and ſo many fair hopes were mowed down in their flower, by the pitileſs ſythe of Death. O impenetrable ſecrets of Providence! There was nothing beyond Jeruſalem, there was nothing beyond Godfrey, but God and Paradiſe, that could limit his deſigns, and bound his Conqueſts.

GEORGE

GEORGE CASTRIOT.

O Ye Tombs of the Grecians, whose Ashes seem yet to exhale Valour, rejoyce now, and hide not the names you bear, for fear they should shame Posterity that hath degenerated from their Virtues. Brave Ancestours! the Glory of your Nation is not yet extinguished; It is raised again in one sole Man, who hath recollected in his Person whatsoever generosity had sown in so many hearts, and whatsoever Honour hath stuffed in so many Tropheys.

I see in Castriot a certain object greater then Leonidas and Themistocles; I see Pyrrhus; I see Alexander: and if his Enemies have been more stout then the Macedonians; his Valour ought not for that, to seem the less.

He was a Souldier as soon as he was born a man; Nature pleased to engrave a Sword upon his body, at the same time as she inspired courage into his heart.

That Stature so proper, that Countenance so filled with Majesty, those Limbs so strong and so robustuous, those Eys that mingle the Rainbow with the Lightning, those Hands that seem to have been made for nothing but to bear the Thunder, those Feet that move not one only step that savours not of a King, hath told betimes that which fame hath afterward related to all Ages.

Little Eaglet! that beganneſt in thy most innocent years to play with Lightning, thou oughteſt not to have been so valiant; or thou oughteſt to have had a more happy Father. Shall we say that fortune was unjust, in that it prepared chains for this young virtue, when she should have planted Laurels? Let us rather say, that Providence was very wise, in that she found out matter for this great heart, that would have consumed it self in its own flames, if it had not met with some obstacles to resist it.

It was meet that this Hercules should begin to strangle Serpents from his Cradle: It was meet that he should be bred in the middle of his enemies, to combat from his Infancy with that which he was to abate in his riper age.

His Father John Castriot, who had little strength and much misery, was constrained to give him for an Hostage to Amurath the Turk, to be brought up at his Gate.

Moses now is in Pharaoh's house, and Constantine in Diocletian's: but the Path is here more dangerous, because it leadeth to the ruine of Salvation, and of Honour. His proud Master, that loves him with a love worse then all the hatred in the world, would fit him for himself, and for his infamous pleasures. He aims at the one by the Circumcision that is imprinted on his flesh by an unhappy violence, he pursues the other by shameful courtings which are to the gallant child far bitterer then death. He had, (as 'tis reported) courage enough to take the Sword in hand against him that pursued him with nothing but with flowers: He drew blood from him, when nothing could be expected of him but tears; and put himself in danger of experimenting the horriblest torments that the cruelty of those inhumane people could invent, rather then to deliver voluntarily his Soul to sin, and his Body to dishonour. His cruel friend was astonished at so brave a resolution, and turned the furies that he had prepared for his Innocence, into the admiration of his Valour.

The Seraglio imposes on him the name of Scanderbeg, that is the same as Alexander which he took by a good omen, to fill up therewith the whole capacity of his brave exploits. He was educated in all the exercises of War in the Academy of the Turks, where he succeeded with so much force, art, liking, and approbation, that every one carried him in his eys, every one looked on him as a singular prop of Mahomet's Empire. But he bore always Jesus in his heart: he always thought on the means that he might find to break his chain; he felt in the bottom of his most generous Soul flames, that burned him incessantly with the zeal he had to raise again the levelled Altars of the Christians, and to destroy the estate of the Ottomans.

Amurath saw some sparkles of it flying in his conversation, although he endeavoured to cover his design with a great prudence. The Master began to fear the Slave, and was affraid to nouriſh in his Court a Lion that might be able to shew him one day his teeth.

He endeavoured to destroy him in various Encounters, making the excess of his courage contribute to the hazard of his person. A resolute Scythian came to Amurath's Court, challenging the boldest to fight all naked with a Poniard in the inclosure of a perilous Circle, where of necessity one must die, or conquer. That man had carried away already many bloody Palms, and put so much confidence in his strength, that they were (according to his speech) but the sacrifices of Death that dared to attend the thunder of his Arm. Every one trembled for fear when as the valiant Castriot undertook him, and putting his Thrust aside with one hand, killed him with the other, with the acclamations of joy of all those that envy hindred not from applauding Valour..

This Combat having not succeeded well for Amurath, he raises at another time a Persian Cavalier that kept a stir to fight on Horse-back with a Launce. He was a man accomplished in that Trade, who with much cheerfulness of heart transported himself into Cities and Provinces, where he promised himself that he should find Adversaries to exercise his Arms, and encrease his Reputation. He curvetted up and down in the List proudly plum'd, and his flaming Arms made him appear that day as the great Constellation of Orion amidst the lesser Stars.

A David was needful for this Goliah, our young Alexander assaults him, falls upon him as an Eagle, handles him very roughly, and at length laid him on the sand, where he vomited out his soul and blood, doing a sad homage to valour by a just punishment of his rashness.

But Amurath that plaied the part of Saul, failed not to find out some new occasions to exercise his David. He gave him all the most hazardous Employments of the War, wherein he had still so good success, that he changed all the Subjects of his ruine into Tropheys, and returned crowned with Laurels even out of the bottom of Abysses, and out of the throat of Lions.

The perfidious Sultan entertained him with good words, but handled him with bad deeds. He promised him to restore him his estates after his Fathers Death, but John Castriot's last hour made it appear, that if his words were full of artifice, his promises were but wind.

Scanderbeg impatient to ſtay for that which ſhould never come, pays himſelf by his own hands, and ſeizes himſelf of his Kingdom of Albania, playing the crafty fellow, by a Counter-Craft. The Alarm of it is in the Court, and all Amurath's Paſſions tend to nothing but Revenge. Haly Baſſa is ſent with an Army of Fourty thouſand men to diſpatch the Buſineſs. But all his Troops are cut in pieces; and he had nothing more honourable in his Expedition, then that he was conquered by the brave Caſtriot. Feria and Muſtapha purſue the ſame deſign with new Forces that experiment the ſame fortune.

What ſhall we ſay more of Schanderbeg's Greatneſs? Amurath beſeeches, the Turbant is humbled; that viſage of the Tyrant that was the ſame as that of Cruelty it ſelf, is mollified and takes the Lineaments of a ſupplyant, after it had borne, during his whole Life, thoſe of Rigour. He deſires Peace, and it is denied him; and ſues for an agreement, and is ſlighted. His arrogance being ſorely pricked, vomits out nothing but whirlwinds of fire, and comes to fall before Croye the Capital City of the Valiant Caſtriot, with an Army of two hundred thouſand men. The other defends himſelf with ſix thouſand. One only place bays that great Deluge, the Storm is ſcattered, the Siege raiſed, the ſhame of it remains on the face of the Sultan with ſo lively a Tincture, that the ſhadow of death muſt paſs over it to blot it out. He that had lived with Glory, dyes with the ſadneſs of his Ignominy, and carries with him into the other World the unability to revenge himſelf, and an eternal deſire of vengeance.

Mahomet his ſon, the Scourge and Terrour of the Univerſe, that overthrew two Empires, took two hundred Cities, killed twenty Millions of Men, comes to ſplit againſt the ſame Rock. Was there need of ſo much blood to write upon Caſtriot's Trophies, the Title of Invincible?

Who would imagine that a mortal man ſhould have gone ſo far? who ſhould believe that thoſe exploits were the Actions of a ſlave? Truly we muſt avow, that he lent his Name to God in all this buſineſs, and that God lent his Arm to him. It is ſaid of him, that he never refuſed Battel, never turned his back, never was wounded but once very lightly. He ſlew two thouſand Barbarians with his own hand, which he cleft ordinarily with his Courtel-ax, from the head down to the girdle. Mahomet deſired to ſee that Thunder-bolt that he bore in his hands, and had it in veneration although ſo many times bedewed with his Subjects bloud. He ſaw the Steel, but he never ſaw the Arm that gave it Life.

O brave Caſtriot! If the State of Chriſtians could have been delivered from the Tyranny of the Sultans, it ſhould have been by thy hands. We muſt now acknowledg, that our wounds are irrecoverable; ſeeing that our diviſions hinder us from enjoying the ſuccour of ſo Divine an hand. The Feaver that took thee hence in the City of Liſſa, in the Climacterical of ſeven and nine, the moſt to be feared by old men, extinguiſhed all our hopes by the ſame burnings that conſumed thy Body. After thou hadſt lived the moſt admirable of Captains, thou diedſt like a truely religious, melting the hearts of all thoſe that beheld thee by a moſt ſenſible Devotion. Thy victorious ſpirit ſoared up to the Palace of the Beautiful Sion, after it had performed in the Body all that was poſſible for a moſt eminent Virtue, and an Happineſs, to which nothing was wanting but imitatours. The moſt barbarous thy Enemies have kiſſed thy Sepulchre, have reverenced thy Aſhes, and ſhared thy Bones as the deareſt Reliques of Valour. And now thou haſt no more to do with a Tomb, ſeeing that thy Memory hath found as many Monuments, as there are Hearts in all Ages.

BOUCICAUT

BOUCICAUT. BAYARD.

WE need not ſearch the Catalogue of Saints and Martyrs for a Souldier Furniſhed before God and men with great and Divine virtues. Behold one among a thouſand, I mean the brave Marſhal Boucicaut, who flouriſhed in France under Charles the Sixth. Thoſe petty Rodomonts, who boaſt of their Duels, but indeed meer cowardiſe varniſhed with a gloſſy colour of valour, durſt not behold this moſt excellent Cavalier, without doing that which was antiently done to the Statues of the Sun, that is, to put finger on the mouth, and admire. For, not to mention his other acts of proweſs, it is he who was preſent at that daring Battel which the Turkiſh Emperour Bajazet waged againſt the King of Hungary; the Duke of Burgundy, then called the Court of Nevers, with many other of the French Gentry, being there in perſon.

The Hiſtory relateth, that the Turkiſh Emperour comming to fight with dreadfull forces, began ſo furious a charge, the aire being darkned with a black cloud of Arrows, that the Hungarians, who were alwayes reputed good Souldiers, being much amazed with this fierce aſſault, fled away. The French, who in all Battels had ever learned to conquer or dye, not willing to hear ſo much as the leaſt ſpeech of the name of flight, pierced into the Turkiſh army, notwithſtanding a field of Pikes and ſtakes faſtned in the earth, did hinder their approch, and attended by ſome other Troops, brake the Van-gard of the Turks, by the counſel and example of this brave Marſhall; whereat Bajazet much amazed, was about to retire, but that at the ſame time it was told him, that it was but a very little handfull of French-men that made the greateſt reſiſtance, and that it was beſt for him to aſſault them. The Turk, who kept his Battalions very freſh, returneth, and fell like lightning upon theſe poor Souldiers now extremely wearied. Never did an angry Lion exerciſe more violent force againſt the Hunters Javelins, then this generous Cavalier ſhewed proweſs which ſhined in the midſt of the adventurous Pagans. For, ſeeing himſelf at laſt negligently betrayed, he having no other purpoſe but to ſell his own life, and thoſe of his companions, at as dear a rate as he could, he with the French Cavalry, and ſome other people that ſtuck to him, did ſuch feats of Arms, that it was thought twenty thouſand Turks were ſlain in the place. At laſt this prodigious multitude, able to tire out the moſt hardy, although it had been but to cut them in pieces, did ſo nearly encompaſſe our French, that the Count of Nevers, with Marſhall Boucicaut, and other the moſt worthy Perſonages, were taken Priſoners.

The next day after this diſmal Battel, the proud Bajazet ſitting under a Pavillion ſpread for him in the field, cauſed the Priſoners to be brought before him, to drench himſelf in bloud and revenge, which he alwayes moſt paſſionately loved.

Never was ſeen a ſpectacle more worthy of Compaſſion; The poor Lords who had wrought wonders in Arms, able to move Tygers, were led to the ſlaughter, half naked, ſtreight bound with cords and fetters, no regard being had either to their bloud, which was noble, or youth which was pitifull, or their behaviour which was moſt raviſhing; Theſe Saracens ugly and horrible as Devils, ſet them before the face of the Tyrant, who in the twinkling of an eye cauſed their throats to be cut at his feet, as if he meant to carouſe their bloud. A ſad ſpectacle.

The Count of Nevers, with the Count of Ewe, and the Count of Marche had now their heads under the Cymiter, and their lives hung as it were by a thread; when Bajazet, who had heard by his interpreters that they were near Kinſmen to the King of France, cauſed them to be reſerved, commanding them to ſit at his feet on the ground, where they were enforced to behold the lamentable butchery of their Nobility.

The valiant Boucicaut, covered with a little linnen cloth, in his turn was brought forth to be maſſacred over the bodies of ſo many valiant men. He being wiſe, and in this extremity particularly inspired by God, made a sign with his fingers before Bajazet, because he understood not his Language, as if he would declare himself the kinsman of the Count of Nevers, who beheld him with so pitiful an eye, that it was able to have rent the most rocky heart. Bajazet being perswaded by this design that he was of the Blood-royal, caused him to be set apart among the prisoners; where afterwards by his great wisdom he endeavoured the liberty of those noble Gentlemen, and his own. I cannot think that the puny Novices of war of our time, will compare themselves to the valour of this heroick man, accomplished with such gallant prowess.

Let us come, if you please, and look into his deportment and conversation, and consider whether he were of the number of those who profess themselves wicked that they may seem valiant. Our Boucicaut was a man who whilest in time of peace he governed the City of Genoa, heard daily two Masses, with so exemplar devotion, that he never suffered any man to speak to him in the Church: where he said the office with singular attention; for which he so accommodated his company, that you should never see the least action of uncomliness in Divine Service, which he did not severely punish. And the Historian addeth, that he who had beheld his people at Divine Service, would rather think he saw Religious men then Souldiers. Noblemen have power to draw their families to what posture they please, were it not through pusillanimity of spirit; they many times give way to the torrent of nurture, and contenting themselves to be good, make all the rest naught by the easiness of their natures. I mention not here a Canonized Saint, an Hermit, a Religious man, or a Priest: I speak of a Marshal of France, of a most ardent Warriour and valiant Souldier.

Behold, I pray, whether Piety be incompatible with Arms. This brave Captain happily made his Will, disposing of all his devotions, his affairs, and charge: each day he executed some part hereof, doing all the good he could whilest he lived, not expecting the casual portions of others piety, as those who cause Torches to be carried behind to light them when they have lost their eys; and indeed never do well but when they are in a condition to be able to do no more. This charitable Lord particularly informed himself of the necessities of the bashful poor, and as the rarest pieces of his Cabinet, set their names down in his Register: he appointed on every side his Alms to the poor Religious, to Widows, to Orphans, to needy Souldiers, namely, to those who through disability of old age and sickness could labour no more. He visited Hospitals, giving according to his means round sums of money to furnish and accommodate them: if he walked in the streets he ever had charity in his hands, that himself might give all he could; for he took therein a singular contentment; and never was he seen to be so merry, as when he had distributed good store of money. This was to him as his hunting, his game, his delight.

He bear a singular devotion in memory of the Passion of our Saviour, towards the Friday: and whilest he was able, did eat nothing on that day but Fruits and Pulse, abstaining from all which participated of the life of Beasts and cloathed himself likewise in a most simple habit, desirous to shew outwardly some tast of the Reverence we ow to the blood of the Son of God. Besides abstinencies commanded, he fasted ordinarily on the Saturday, which is dedicated to the memory of the blessed Virgin. He never fed at his repast but on one dish; and though he had great quantity of silver Vessels, he caused himself to be served in Pewter and earth, being glorious in publick, but in his particular an enemy to worldly pomps and vanities.

I leave you to contemplate, how far this kind of life is alienated from the curious Nobility of our days, to whom so many Dispensations and Priviledges must daily be given, that it seems it is needful for their sakes only to create another Christendom, besides that which hath been established by the Son of God. A man would say, to see how they pamper their bodies, they were descended from heaven, and that thither they would return, without passing through the Grave, they Deifie themselves, and to fatten and gild a stinking Dunghil covered over with Snow, they sport with the blood and sweat of men.

Superfluity of tast being so well qualified, all went in true measure in the house of this good Marshal, his Retinue was well entertained according to his quality, and he had a very solemn custom by him religiously observed, which was speedily to pay his debts, and as much as he might possible, to be engaged to none. It is no small virtue, nor of mean importance, to be out of engagements of this kind, If we consider the Nobility at this time, so easily plunged in great labyrinths of Debts, which daily encrease like huge Snow-balls that fall from the Mountains, and require Ages and golden Mines to discharge them.

Is it not a most inexcusable cruelty before God and man, to see a busie Merchant, a needy Artificer, every day to multiply his journeys and steps before the gate of a Lord or a Lady, who bear his sweat and blood in the pleits of their Garments? And instead of giving some satisfaction upon his most just demands, it is told him he is an importunate fellow, and many times is menaced with bastinadoes, if he desist not to demand his own. Is not this to live like a Tartarian? Is not this to degrade one's self from Nobility, Christianity and Reason? Is not this to ruine, and, as it were, to cut the throats of whole Houses and Families? Alledge not to me, that it is impossible for you to pay what is demanded at present, foreseeing your weakness of estate, why have you heaped so many debts which cannot be discharged!

Why do you not rather lessen your Port, and live more frugally? Why do you not cast off many superfluous things that might be spared? Are not offences odious enough before God, but you must encrease them with the marrow of the poor? From hence cometh the contempt of your persons, the hatred of your name, the breaches and ruine of your houses.

This man by paying his debts well, was honoured and respected of his Officers like a Demy-god; there was no need of making any question or doubt, nor to make a false step into his house. He would never suffer a Vice, or bad Servant, were it to gain an Empire. Blasphemies, Oaths, Lyes, Slanders, Past-times, Quarrels, and such like disorders, were banished from his Palace as Monsters: and if he once found any of his Family in fault, he put them away, least they should infect the other: yet he would not scandalize them, nor divulge their offences. At the Table he spake little, and did voluntarily entertain himself with the example of virtues which he observed in the lives lives of the Nobility: never discoursing of his own atchievements but with singular sobriety.

In his marriage he demeaned himself most chastely; and had such an hatred against impurity, that he would not so much as keep a servant that had a lustful eye. Behold, how passing one day on horseback through the streets of the City of Genoa, as a Lady presented her self at a window to comb her hair, and a Gentleman of the Marshals train seeing her tresses very bright and beautiful, cried out, Oh what a goodly head of hair! standing still to behold her. This Lord looking back on him with a severe eye, said, It is not well done, it is not fit that a wanton eye should be seen to glance from the house of a Governour.

In this kind and all others which concerned the commerce and peace of the Citizens, he rendred so ready and exact justice, that it was a Proverb amongst the Genoes when any one was offended, to say to him who had done him wrong: If you will not right me, my Lord Marshal will. The other understanding it, ofttimes rather chose to submit to the right, then expect a condemnation, which was inevitable. By this means he so gained the good opinion of the people, that the inhabitants of the City sent to the King, beseeching him, that he might continue the Government to the end of his days; which having obtained, it seemed to them, that they had procured an Angel from Heaven to be set at the Stern of their Common-wealth.

At that time when the Emperour of Constantinople, then dispossessed of one part of his Empire by the great Turk, came into France to desire succour, and had obtained of the King twelve hundred men defrayed for a year, many widow Ladies were seen at the Court, who complained of injustice and oppressions which were offered them after the death of their husbands; whereby this good Marshal was so moved with compassion, that with much freedom he instituted an Order of Knights for the defence of afflicted Ladies, which he surnamed The Order of the White Lady; because they who made profession of it, bare a Scutcheon of gold enamelled with green, and thereon the figure of a Lady in a white Vestment: thus sought he by all occasions to do good, and shewed himself a great enemy of idleness, as being the very moth of great Spirits.

He ordinarily rose early in the morning, and spent about three houres in Prayer and divine Service: after that duty was performed, he went to Counsel, which lasted till Dinner-time. After his repast he gave audience to all those who would speak with him upon their affairs, never failing to behold his Hall dayly full of people, whom he speedily dispatched; contenting every one with sweet and reasonable answers: from thence he retired to write Letters, and to give such order to his Officers which his pleasure was should be observed in all his affairs: and if he had no other employment, he went to Vespers. At his return he took some pains or recreation, then finishing the rest of his Office, he ended the day. On Sundays and Holy-Days, he either went on foot in some Pilgrimage of Devotion, or caused the Life of Saints, or other Histories to be read, dayly more and more to dispose his life and Conversation unto Virtue. When he marched into the field, he used most admirable discretion, never oppressing any of his Company, nor would he permit even in the enemies Country, that the least disturbance should be done to Churchmen.

Behold you not here a Life worthy of a French Cavalier? O Nobility! This man was not a Petty Roister, that makes boast to fight in a green Meadow; But a Souldier, who during the Wars with the English kept the Field of Battel three times thirty days together, against those brave Souldiers who did oppose him; from whence he went out all sparkling with glory and wonder.

I would here willingly add a Bertrand of Guesclin Count of Longuevil, and Constable of France, whose Life Mounsieur Menard hath given us written by a Pen of that antient Age, in as antient Language. You should see a man, who after he had dedicated his Soul, Body, and Arms in the Offertory of a Mass at the Altar, fought six or seven times hand to hand in the Field, exercised strange Feats of Battel and Arms, stood in the midst of Combats unmoved and confident as in his Chamber, being otherwise furious, strong and stout in the press. You should see a man sage in Counsels, prompt in Execution, whom an Enemy found near at hand when he thought him thirty miles off. A man in all things else free from Fraud or Dissimulation, chearful, courteous, obliging and liberal of his own, employing his Moveables and his Wives Jewels for the relief of poor Souldiers.

Then you may judge, whether by being Valiant you may live in the Court of a Christian Prince like a little Turk. Where is your Judgment? and where is your Reason?

BAYARD.

BAYARD.

BEhold a man whose life not long since hath been published to serve as a model for the Nobility: we yet touch him as it were with our finger, for he dyed under the reign of Francis the First, having served three Kings in their Armies, the space of two and thirty years. It is the valiant Terrail, otherwise called Cavalier Bayard born in Daulphine. I willingly make use of his Example, both because one of our most warlike Kings, the son of Francis the First would needs be knighted by his hands, to witness the honour he bare to his valour; as also for that I see therein many noble passages which taste of the virtue of a true French souldier. He was a courageous Captain, of excellent direction, valiant and magnanimous, of whom it was said, that he had the assault of the wilde Bull, the defence of the Bore, and flight of the wolf. I set aside his warlike deeds, I take some of his virtues which here I will make use of. This royal courage had no other aim in arms, but the glory of God, the service of his Prince, and the honour of his profession, whereof we have an ample testimony in a short Elogy, which his secretary made upon him, saying, That after these two and thirty years service, he dyed almost as poor as he was born. Much is spoken in these few words; and I think Bayard more glorious under this title, then if he had borne the Dutchy of Milan on his back. He had the true piety of a good Souldier: for every morning he prayed to God most devoutly, and would not permit any man to enter into his chamber during his devotions: he was so obedient to those who commanded in the Army, that he never refused any commission imposed upon him. Yea, well foreseeing that the last charge enjoyned him by the Marshall Benivet was most dangerous, and as it were impossible; yet he went thither, sacrificing his life to the commandments of the Lievtenant of his Prince, that he might not digress from his ordinary custom. There was he slain by the most generous manner of death that could happen to any Captain of his quality. He was a Lion in Arms, who with a choice company of men selected by him, and trained to his profession, wrought such admirable effects, that there was not any battel won, of which he was not ever the principal cause. Never was any man more terrible to an enemy in the conflict; but out of it, it was said he was one of the most affable and courteous men of the earth: he was so ill a flatterer of great men, that to gain a Kingdom he would not be drawn to speak any thing but reason. His practise was to honour the virtuous, speak little of the vicious, less of his own atchievements, never to swear; to do favours to all that required them, as willingly as if himself were to receive the benefit; to give secret alms according to his ability, in such manner, that it is written; that besides his other acts of piety, he married at the least an hundred poor young maids. Behold of what elements his soul was inwardly composed. As for the manner of his carriage in the war, he as little cared for mony, as the dust of the earth, and desired not to have any, but to give: witnesse an act of great liberality, which is related of him. He took fairly by law of Arms a Spanish Treasurer, who had about him fifteen thousand Ducats: one of his Captains named Tardieu, enraged with choller, swore that he would have part of the booty, because he was in the Expedition. This good Captain smiling said unto him, It is true, you were of the enterprise, but are not to share in the Booty; and if it were so, you are under my charge, I therefore will give you what I think good. This man entred into more violent fury, and went to complain to the General, who having well considered the business, adjudged it wholly to Bayard. He caused his Ducats to be carried to a place of safety, and commanded them to be spread on a Table in presence of all his people, saying to them, Companions, what think ye? Do ye not here behold fine junkets? Poor Tardieu, who had been put by his pretensions by expresse sentence of his Captains, looked on this mony with a jealous eye, and said, If he had the half of it, he would all his life be an honest man. Doth that depend on this? (saith this brave Spirit.) Hold then, I willingly give you that which you by force could never obtain. And so caused he at the same instant seven thousand five hundred Ducats to be told out to him. The other, (who in the beginning thought it was but a meer mockery, when he saw it to be in good earnest, and himself in possession of that he desired) cast himself on both his knees at the feet of Bayard, having abundant tears of joy in his eies, and cryed out, Alas my Master, my Friend, you have surpassed the liberality of Alexander: How shall I be ever able to acknowledg the benefit, which I at this time do receive at your hands? Hold your peace, (said this incomparable man) if I had power, I would do much more. And thereupon causing all the souldiers of the Garrison to be called, he distributed the rest of the Ducats; not keeping one sole denier for his own use.

Martial vertues of a brave French Souldier.

I ask of you, whether this were not a heart of true pearl, wherein there could not one least blemish of avarice be found? Yea also, when he passed through the Country, even in a land of Conquest, he payed his expence. And one saying to him, Sir, this mony is lost: for at your departure from hence, they will set this place on fire. He answered, Sirs, I do what I ought, God hath not put me into the world to live by Rapine.

Moreover, the excellency of this man appeared wel in an affair, wherein the life of the most eminent man of the world was interessed. For, he at that time being in Italy, was sent by the King to assist the Duke of Ferrara, against the Army of Pope Julius, then much opposite to France; although so many other worthy Popes heartily loved our Nation. When one Monsieur Augustine Gerlo, a Gentleman of Milan, but yet a traitor and factious, went to the said Duke to perswade him to forsake the French Engagement, with intention to destroy them, and promised him that in recompence he would give him his Neece in marriage, and make him Captain General of the Church. This Prince would not seem in any wise to understand him; but he handled the matter so by his policy and advantageous promises, that he gained this Augustine who gave him his hand, that he in few days would destroy the Pope by a mischievous morsel which he could easily give him. The Duke of Ferrara having thus dived into his plots and intentions, went immediately to find out this our noble Bayard in his lodgings, and made a long discourse to him of the evil disposition of Pope Julius, and the enterprises he had both on his life, and on the French-men, of purpose to enkindle him for Revenge. Then he also pursued his opportunity, and made discovery to him him of the treaſon of this wicked Gerlo. Bayard, looking amazedly at him, ſaid, How, Sir! I could never have imagined that a Prince ſo generous as you, would conſent to ſuch a wickedneſs; and had you done it, I ſwear by my ſoul, before night I would have given the Pope notice of it. How! anſwered the Duke, he would have done as much either to you or me. It is no matter (replied Bayard) this treachery diſpleaſeth me. Whereat the Duke ſhrugging up his ſhoulders, and ſpitting on the ground, ſaith, Monſieur Bayard, I would I had killed all mine enemies in this ſort: but, ſince you diſlike it, the matter ſhall reſt, and you and I both may have cauſe to repent it. We ſhall not, if it pleaſe God, replieth the good Souldier: but, I pray you, put this Gallant into my hands that would do this goodly piece of ſervice; and if I do not cauſe him to be hanged in an hour, let me ſupply his place. The Duke finding in him this courage and fidelity, did all he could to wave and excuſe the plot, ſaying he had given him aſſurance of his perſon.

But, behold you not here a brave ſpirit in Bayard? See you not a man of a royal conſcience and of an honeſty in all things like to it ſelf? Away then with thoſe petty and baſe ſpirits of the Abyſs more black then ſpectres and infernal furies, who have neither loyalty for their Prince nor Commonwealth, but as it may concern their own intereſts: who ſwallow treaſons as big as Camels, to gain a fly. Such would make truth it ſelf to lye, were not Heaven's Providence awake to make their events as tragical, as are their determinations abominable and hideous.

All the braveſt Chieftains have ever held it to be higheſt of their glorious victories, to be crowned with Chaſtity. It was the Trophey of Cyrus, to whom, for this cauſe God gave all the treaſures of Aſia. It was the triumph of Alexander, who, in recompence thereof, had the Conqueſt of the Perſians. And, the Emperour Julian, who made profeſſion herein to imitate him, although he had apoſtatized and renounced all other ſacred ties, would never forſake Chaſtity, but wittily ſaid; This virtue made beautiful lives, as Painters fair faces. But, not to ſearch ſo far into the duſt and rubbiſh of Antiquity, I will draw one line more upon our Bayard in this point, whereon his Hiſtory dignifies him with a paſſage admirable and unparalell'd.

Some there were had adviſed to convey into his Chamber a Maid which was one of the faireſt creatures in the world; and indeed ſhe was endowed with an angelically graceful aſpect, ſave that at that inſtant her eys were ſwoln (above their ordinary orbs) with an extremity of tears: and that too beſpake rather the commendable virtue of her modeſty, then the blemiſh of her beauty. Whom when the Captain had well ſurveyed; How now fair Maid! ſaith he unto her; What ſayeſt thou? Why comeſt thou hither? The amazed Damſel falling on her knees, with that utterance her ſighings would afford her, ſhe thus anſwers him: Ah, Sir! My Mother hath commanded me I ſhould do what you would have me: yet (Sir) I am a Virgin, and never (truly) had I any diſpoſition to do ill, however a neceſſity enforced me hither; for, my mother and my ſelf are ſo poor, that we are nigh periſhing through hunger: but, I wiſh to God I might ſee death, thereby to be diſſolved from the number of unhappy Maidens, rather then to ſully my Soul with the leaſt unworthy and ignoble act. Which words of hers pierced ſo this generous Lord's ſoul to the quick, that they cauſed tears in his eys, aſſociated with this reply; Verily, pretty ſoul, I will not be ſo wicked as to take that from thee which thou ſo charily haſt kept for the ſociety of pureſt Angels. Thereupon he cauſed her to be veiled, leſt ſhe ſhould be taken notice of: and that ſhe might not be expoſed unto the rigid dealings of a rude hand, (not transferring the charge of her perſon to another's care) he, with a lighted Torch in his own hand, conducts her to her ſafe repoſe in the houſe of a virtuous kinſwoman of his, where he for that night leaves her. The day following, he ſent for her mother, and ſaid unto her; Are not you a wicked woman to betray the honour of your daughter, which ought to be more dear unto you then your life? Certainly for thus doing, you deſerve a puniſhment ſo much the more rigorous, as that I underſtand you are a Lady: and by a courſe ſo ſiniſter you wrong Nobility. The Lady hereat wholly confounded, knew not what elſe to anſwer, but that they were as poor as may be. Is there yet (ſaith he) no man that for her birth, beauty, and virtues ſake, who requireth her in holy marriage? Yes, truly (ſaith ſhe) an honeſt man a neighbour of mine: had ſhe (as he with her demands) ſix hundred Florens, which I am in no capacity to raiſe or to procure.

Then the brave Bayard drew out his Purſe, and ſaid, Here are two hundred Crowns (which are of more value then ſix hundred Florens of this Country) to marry your Daughter withal: which my will is you diſpatch within three days; and further, to enable you the better thereto: I alſo add one hundred Crowns more to adorn her with decent change of Apparel, and I give your ſelf an hundred Crowns, which well houſewived, may ſerve to ſtave you off from future unbecoming ſhifts and poverty. All which was done accordingly, to the unſpeakable joy both of the mother, and of the Daughter, who thenceforth lived in an honourable and comfortable condition.

O Nobility! I preſent not here an Hermit, but a Captain (who was a French ſouldier) who was moulded of no other fleſh, blood, nor bones, then are ye your ſelves; yet he performeth an act of a Religious man the moſt mortified: he exerciſeth the liberality of a King; he equalleth therein, yea, ſurmounted the heroical deeds of the greateſt Saints. True it is, Saint Nicholas ſaved the honour of Virgins, contributing thereto his gold and ſilver: as true it is, that in ſo doing he generouſly triumphed over the covetouſneſs of temporal goods: yet, he ſerved not in this action as a triumph to himſelf, which is verily the choiceſt piece of eminent virtues. But, behold a Cavalier who vanquiſheth both Avarice and Luſt (the two moſt dangerous rocks in the world.) Bayard commandeth his purſe in a fortune not the beſt accommodated; and that, merriteth no ſmall applauſe. But, Bayard in the high flouriſh of his age, of a body vigorous, commands the paſſions of his Soul and conquers them, even at the temptations of an object ſo amiable (as hath been repreſented here unto you) I beſeech you therefore let it be no longer ſaid, that Chaſtity is only to be found amongſt the truly moſt mortified retirers into Cloiſters, for, it is every where, where the fear of the omnipreſent God, & where generoſity or real virtue is. What then can ſo many wretches anſwer to this, who fill the world with ſins, the Nobility with diſgraces, their bodies with diſeaſes, their name with infamy, and load ſo many poor abuſed creatures with miſeries and deſpair? What can our ſpruce gallants deviſe for paſſable excuſe, who brave it through the ſtreets in their ridiculous oſtets of borrowed feachers and in habits; remaining indebted to the Mercer for the ſtuff, and to the poor Taylour for the faſhion, paying yet neither the one or other? True Jack-daws of Æſop, who deſerve, that all other birds ſhould aſſemble to pull their plumes off which they have (thus no better then) ſtoln to catch and to be caught with vanity. What will here ſo many gluttons and gameſters ſay, who rent up and eat the entrails of men by their bloudy riots?

You ſee 'twas poſſible that this gallant Souldier, by unravenous hands had four hundred crowns, (a ſum in thoſe days held a huge one) yet all this he gives in one only alms; but, thoſe (whom I thus have taken to task) who in a bravery talk of nothing leſs then piſtolets, nor mind any thing elſe but their ſordid voluptuouſneſs, have not a denier to throw to a poor body.

Purſuing this courſe, he did an act (at the taking of Breſcia a City in Italy) indeed for ever memorable, which was thus; That being ſet in the front of the perdues, he firſt entred and paſſed the Rampart, whence he received a hurt in the top of his thigh; ſo dangerous that the top of a pike wherewith he was thruſt, ſtuck in the wound. He, nothing terrified hereat, ſaid to one Captain Molard, I am ſlain: but it is no matter, let your men march on confidently, the Town's our own. Then, two of his Souldiers bare him out of the throng, who ſeeing his wound ſtreamed forth much bloud, they pulled off their ſhirts and rent them, binding up his thigh therewith; and in the next houſe they hit upon, they took a little door off the hinges whereon they laid their tenderly beloved Captain, to bear him the more eaſily. From thence they went directly to a great houſe which they ſuppoſed (in all likelihood) to be a very convenient repoſe, and for his accommodation (and ſo indeed it proved:) For, it belonged to an honeſt Gentleman who thence retired into a Monaſtery to avoid the fury which is ordinarily found from conquering Souldiers: for, the ſaccage of this City was ſo dreadful, that there were reckoned as well of Venetians who defended it, as Burgeſſes, to the number of twenty thouſand ſlain: yet, his wife (the Lady of this houſe) with her two daughters, fortunately had ventured to abide at home, who yet through fear had hid themſelves together under hay in a Barn, from whence the noble Matron made firſt her appearance to the two Souldiers knocking at the gate, which (arming her ſelf with reſolution) ſhe opened to them; when eſpying a Captain all bloudy, for whom they demanded a room in her houſe to retire in, ſhe conducts them with their carriage on that homely bier, (as is before related) into the faireſt and beſt furniſht chamber, where ſhe caſt her ſelf at his feet, ſaying, Sir, I freely make a tender of this houſe unto you, with all the furniture thereof, which you may call yours even by the law of Arms: However, this favour I only beg of you, you will be pleaſed to protect me and ſave mine honour inviolated, as alſo of my daughters (two poor Maids) grown up to marriage eſtate; whom I and my dear husband value as the pledges of our conjugal affection. The Captain anſwered, Madam, fear not, We Souldiers that muſt ſtand the ſhock of War, oftimes do meet with ſuch like caſualties as hath now betided me, which was the cauſe (not any deſign to wrong your perſons or diminiſh your poſſeſſions) that drave me hither: and whether I ſhall eſcape this wound, be a contingency remote as yet from my aſſurance; yet, this I faithfully promiſe you, that, whilſt I live, there ſhall not be done the leaſt injury to you nor your daughters, no more then I would have befal to mine own perſon. Only keep them in your lodging, and let them not be ſeen: ſend for your husband home again, whom you may aſſure and your ſelf too, ye have a Gueſt who will do you all courteſie poſſible. The Lady comfortably acquieſcing in the belief of his nobleneſs uttered by his word, ſhe goes about the orderly contrivance of her houſe-wife-affairs accordingly; and having emploied all her prudentialleſt care to give him good entertainment, ſhe ſoon perceived ſhe had lodged an honeſt man, (amongſt other his own perſonal civil manifeſtations) by the harmleſs and juſt deportment of the Duke of Nemours the brave General of the Army (Gaſton de Foix) who came daily (with his choiceſt Chevaliers) to viſit him; yet he, and all they (although it was then in a City of their conqueſt) made offer of paying for what ever proviſions they demanded for their repaſts. The good Hoſteſs therefore took her ſelf ſo much the more concerned to wait on her noble inmate (as indeed ſhe did) as on an Angel ſent her from Heaven: ſo much divine honour and virtue ſaw ſhe reſplendent in him. When he was well cured of his hurt, and ſpake of his diſlodging thence to be preſent at the battel of Ravenna, where that his General paſſionately deſired him no leſs for his ſociety then his ſervice; the Lady (who accounted her ſelf as his priſoner, with her husband and their two daughters, conſidering that if their Gueſt would rigorouſly uſe them, he might (according to the uſe and liberty of a Souldier) draw ten or twelve thouſand crowns from her,) reſolved to give him a preſent: and therefore went into his chamber with one of her domeſtick attendants who carried a little ſteel Cabinet, and preſently ſhe threw her ſelf at his feet but he quickly raiſed her up again, not ſuffering ſhe ſhould ſpeak a word till ſhe was ſeated by him, at which time ſhe made this ſpeech well obſerved by the Secretary of Bayard.

Sir, ſith it ſeemed good to the high Providence, that this City ſhould be deſtined to a captivity by your valour; the favour which God hath afforded me by ſending you into this houſe which is wholly at your ſervice, I thankfully contemplate as one which hath been no leſs then the preſervation of the life of my husband, mine own, and that of my two daughters, with their unattempted chaſtity which they dearlier eſtimate then their precious life. Beſides, your people have demeaned themſelves (to your own rare example, as well as to your lawfull commands, I attribute it) here in my houſe, that I have cauſe for ever to commend their ſober carriage and modeſty, and not deſerving the leaſt blame or complaint for any kind of injury committed by them. And, yet Sir, I am not ſo ignorant of the condition whereunto the miſery of war hath reduced us, as not very well to apprehend that my husband, my ſelf, and our children are your priſoners, and that all the goods in this houſe are in your power to be diſpoſed of at your liking and diſcretion. But withall, knowing the nobleneſs of your heart which is incomparable, I am come moſt humbly to beſeech you to take pity on us your poor captives, and to deal with us according to your manifeſted goodneſs and clemency, whereto we render as a thankfull ſacrifice this poor preſent, earneſtly deſiring it may be acceptable. Having thus ſpoken, ſhe took the cabinet out of her ſervants hands, and opened it before the good Captain, who ſaw it to be full of ducats, whereat he ſmiled, ſaying, Madam, how many ducats have you there? The poor woman, man dismaied because she thought his smiling had proceeded from conceived discontent, answered; Here are but two thousand five hundred Ducats: but if you be not satisfied herewith we will procure you more. Nay, Madam, (replyed the Captain) I do well assure you, that should you give me an hundred thousand Crowns, you could not (for all that) do me so much good as you have benefitted me already by your courteous entertainment and virtuous offices of recovering me. In what place therefore soever I shall remain, while God prolongs my life, you shall find you have thereby engaged a Gentleman ready to embrace occasions of serving your commands. And now, as for your Ducats, I will take none of them, but give you thanks, and so I pray you put them up again. For my part, I have ever esteemed people of honour more then crowns; and think not, Madam, but I go away as well contented from you, as if this City were at your disposition, and you had made me a present thereof.

She again humbly prostrating her self on her knees, and the Captain lifting her up, she answered, No, Sir; I should think my self for ever the most unhappy woman of the world, if you accept not of this Present, which is nothing in comparison of the infinite obligations I ow to your worth. Well (saith he) sith you give it with so good a will, I accept it for your sake: but, cause your Daughters to come hither that I may bid them farewel. These virtuous souls following their mothers precedency, had also with her charitably assisted him during the time of his infirmities, cure many times touching their Lute whereon they played very sweetly, for his minds recreation. Upon this summon of his into his presence, they fell at his feet; the elder of the Daughters (in the name of both) made a short speech unto him in her mother-language, importing a thankful form unto him for his just performed preservation of their honour. The Captain heard it, yet not without a weeping-joy and admiration at the sweetness and humility he therein observed, and then said: Ladies, ye do that which I ought to do; which is, to give you thanks for the many good helps ye have afforded me, for which I find my self infinitely obliged unto you. Ye know, men of my profession are not readily furnished with handsom tokens to present fair Maidens withal. But behold! your good Lady-mother hath given me two thousand five hundred Ducats; take each of you a thousand of them as my gift, for so I am resolved it shall be. Then turning to his Hostess, Madam (saith he) I will take the five hundred to my self to distribute them among poor Religious women who have not had like happiness with you to be preserved from the Souldier's plundering pillage. And, as you better then any other may judge of the necessities which each one may by such accidents have befallen them: so I am confident I can depute none a more faithful Steward for the disposing thereof, then is your wise, ingenious, and charitable self, unto whose sole disposal I freely recommend it. The Lady touched to the quick with so rare and pious a disposition, spake these words unto him: O flower of Chevalry, to whom none other can be compared! Our blessed Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, who for us sinners suffered death and passion, both here in this world, and in the other reward you. The Gentleman of the house who at that time heard the courtesie of his guest, came to thank him with a bended knee, making him (withal) a surrender of his person, and a sequestration of his whole estate: but he most nobly left him master of himself and of his estate. The young Gentlewoman who (amongst others their many accomplishing endowments) were skilful at the Needle, made him a Present of a crimson-sattin purse very richly wrought, and of two Bracelets woven with thread of gold and silver. He very graciously receiving them; Behold (saith he) I esteem these more then ten thousand crowns: and instantly he put the Bracelets on his wrists, and the purse into his pocket; assuring them that while these their respective remembrances would last, he would wear them for their sakes. Which civil ceremonies ended, he mounted on his horse, accompanied thence with his true friend the Lord D' Aubigny, and with about two or three thousand other Gentlemen and Souldiers: the Lady of the house, the Daughters, and the whole family, as passionately lamenting his departure, as if they should have been put to the Sword, although they had assurance from him by his undeniable protection under which he left them and their possessions to be unmolested after his departure.

If the Stars were to descend from Heaven, I would demand now whether they might find more love and respect then in this heaven-born piece of generosity did both receive and return. But, be ye your own judges, if your observations tell you not; it far otherwise befals those silly Fencers who in like times of advantages rush themselues into such well-feathered Nests, no otherwise then as fatal Comets portending fire and the destroying Sword, who make the props of buildings tremble with their loud blasphemies, who load whole families with injuries, without the least regard of age, sex, or honour, but make a sport at the blood and wounds over whom they tyrannize, pillaging them like ravenous Harpies fatted with humane ruines. However, should they do nothing else all their life-time but heap up Mountains of gold and silver; they could not arrive to the least part of the contentment which this good Captain enjoyed, who sought no other recompence from his fair way'd actions, but the satisfaction of his serene conscience, and the glory to have done so well. And thus it is (O ye who would your selves to be indeed ennobled) that hearts are gained: thus ye oblige (if I may so say) both earth and heaven to become due tributaries to your virtues, with blessings round about you here, and with a Crown of immortality hereafter.

THE SATES-MEN.

JOSEPH. MOSES.

I Begin the Elogies of holy States-men with the Patriarch Joseph, who was the first of God's chosen people, that entred into the Court of an Infidel Prince, to make of his life an example of virtue, and of his demeanour a Miracle. Here is an high design of God, who transports a young child out of the cabins and condition of shepherds, to make him the second person of a great Kingdome, to give him the heart and the treasures of his Master, the friendship of the Nobles, the veneration of the People, and the admiration of all the World. Those that look upon this History after a common manner, observe ordinarily therein the changes of humane things; the beginnings, the progresses, and the issues of worldly affairs: But if we would penetrate farther, we should find two great reasons and two admirable designs of Providence about the entrance and negotiation of Joseph in Egypt.

The first is, that according to the saying of the great S. Leo, it was reasonable that the Eternal Word that was to come for the salvation of the whole world should be divided through all Ages, and through all Nations, shewing himself to some in figure, to others in reality, giving himself to some by Hope, to others by Presence, and to many by Remembrance. He insinuated himself into the antient Jews by Prophecies; into the Gentiles by Oracles; into the Learned by Riddles; into the People by visible Figures; into the Saints and the Religious by Mysteries; into the Prophane and Gentiles by Government and Politick Prudence. This is the fashion that he held towards the Egyptians, making them see the first rays of the Birth-day of his coming in the person of Joseph, that wore very advantageously the Lineaments of his Divine Perfections, and merited to be called by advance, the Saviour of the world.

The second reason is, that God meaning to begin that Divine work of the persecutions and the wonders of his chosen People, transports Joseph thither, and makes of him a man of sufferings and of prodigies, to be as a grain of seed out of which one should see spring that numerous posterity that should equal the stars of Heaven. This eternal high Priest prepared for his Altars a great sacrifice of Tribulation and of Patience, which was to be honoured with so much bloud, and so many tears of the righteous, and would invite thereto the Saints by the imitation of a Patriarch that consecrated himself by his own evils, and mounted out of a deep pit to the triumphant Chariot of the Pharaoh's.

I have proposed to my self to represent this to you (my Reader) not relating at large his History which is sufficiently known, but by making some reflexions upon it able to make us admire the greatness of God, and to fashion the manners of Courtiers affected to virtue, by originals that God hath placed as upon the Frontispiece of his Palace.

Let us observe then (according to the pursuit which the Scripture makes us see in this narration) his entrance into the Court, his beginning, his progresses, his virtues, his negotiations, and his successes, from which we shall draw great lights and infallible proofs of the work of God upon those whom he embraces by love and by a very particular conduct.

Ambitious spirits have studied in all times the means to make a fortune at the Court of Kings, and have applied themselves strongly to this design, as to the study of the Philosophers stone, or to the conquest of the golden fleece: But they have had work enough to find out the true principles and causes of the good will of great ones, which is the reason that some seem, to have the golden wings of fortune her self to flie to the palace of Honour, without labour, and without difficulty, while others with indefatigable pains grow old in disgrace and in contempt. Lilius Gyraldus a learned man digged out of the ground in his searches an antient picture of the industrious Apelles, wherein after he had painted Favour winged, blind, standing upon a rouling boul, environed environed with riches, honour, disdain, flattery, and the impunity of all crimes; he places at her feet some Philosophers that studied her Genealogy, some making her the daughter of Beauty, others of chance, others of Industry, others of Virtue: but the ablest confessed that she was a bastard, and not begotten of lawfull Parents, but of an obscure and dark Confusion.

And indeed if we speak of the favour of Princes taken according to the world, we must acknowledge that it is very uncertain, having as many divers births as there are different humours in the mind of great ones; who are ordinarily subject to many changes, whether through an opinion of their greatnesse, or whether through the delicateness of their breeding, or whether through the diversity of those that approach them, and so many fantasticall conceits that proceed from the perturbation of their own felicities. Who is able to tell all the entrances into favour? seeing there are some that have been promoted highly, for having caused a little sucking pig to be roasted handsomely, as it happened to a favourite of Henry the Eighth's, King of England. It is true that there are some that insinuate themselves by beauty, and by a good grace, others by jesting and delightfull pastimes, others by understanding and the conduct of affairs, others by valour, others by science, others by the invention of crimes and infamous wayes of magick, by unseemly complacencies and unworthy services which they render to the revenges, or to the pleasures of their masters.

But (not to speak of other proceedings that are less clean) those that give precepts of rising at the Court will tell us, that he ought to be of a good birth, of a pleasing behaviour, very dextrous in all sorts of exercises fit for the Nobility, of a gentle wit that hath some tincture of science, of a polished conversation, full of civility, affability, and prudence. In a word, he must be a man of conscience, of understanding, of courage, of service, and held up by some powerfull friend, that will gain the good will of great ones, and to open to himself a large way to the honours of the age. This is said with much prudence; but we must avouch, that beside all these rare qualities, there is a secret push of an invisible hand that thrusts forward the favourites, which some have attributed to the stars, others to destiny, others to a good temper: but which I think with reason to be an effect of the divine Providence, and an operation of the Guardian Angels, who in prosperous affairs, procure often Counsellors and officers to Kings by high and sublime wayes, of exquisite gifts, and profitable to second the good genius of the Prince, and to advance by the same means the favourite.

This is that which may be observed clearly in the person of Joseph (whose Elogy I have undertaken to give you.) There is required in a man of a secular State, the birth of a Gentleman, to make a fortune at the Court, and this man was the son of a shepherd; a skilfulness at weapons, he had never handled, or perhaps seen any; a gentleness in the exercises of the body, he knew no other but those of shepherds; a grace of speech, he was a stranger and a barbarian to the Egyptians; Military valour, he knew no other combats but those of the Rams and Bulls; politick prudence, he came from a savage life where he had had no other conversation but that of trees and beasts. What was it then that promoted him in the Court of Pharaoh, and made him rise so high? Must we not acknowledge with all submission of spirit, that there is an Heavenly hand that takes a charge of this business, and that it is our Tutelar Angel to whom God having given Commission of our lives and fortunes? It is no way credible, that he neglects us in these great occurrences of exercises, and of conversations that are to compose the happiness or the miseries of our life.

Yet it is true that God destining a man to some great design, fails not insensibly to furnish him with necessary qualities for that disposal, though they are elevated above the opinion of the world, and sometimes even contrary to the ordinary practices of Courtiers; from thence it came that Providence had made Joseph of a good mind, and of a grace fitting for conversation, of a sweet and pleasing humour, of a spirit capable of business. She gave him a marvellous gift of Prophecy, and of Interpretation of Dreams, which wrought the principall effect of that high fortune, in a King curious to know the things that were to come, and a Nation much inclined to Divinations and to the knowledge of the secrets of Nature, and above Nature. Here is a point of Doctrine necessary to be observed, as well for the Science, as for the Conscience, since the observation of Dreams, which many make by Superstition, was made by Mystery, to the honour of the Interpreter, and to the profit of all the Nation, as the History will shew you clearly in its sequel.

We know that a Dream is a vision which is made in sleep, caused by the remainders of the images of the things which we have received in our senses and in our imagination when we were awake; and is as the Eccho which brings a repetition of the actions of the day. Our soul hath this mark of its immortality, that it is in a perpetuall motion, without any interruption, after the manner of the Heavenly Globes, and of the Intelligences. When the body is laid fast by the charming sweetnesses of sleep, and the night makes a league with all the actions of the day, the soul makes not any with its operations; it meditates, it reasons, it speaks, it is in action, it negotiates, and without parting from its body flies beyond all lands and seas to enjoy a friend. She opens her self with joy, pricks her self with sorrow, intereſſes her self in businesses, and not being able to use the members of her body, serves her self with her own members and her own faculties for the satisfaction of her desire. And as sword-players cease not sometimes to fence without arms, and to use gestures as if there passed a real combat; so our spirit, whiles we sleep, carries her self away, and does every thing in Idea, as if it were seconded by the body. Such is the state and natural condition of Dreams, as Tertullian hath well explained it in his Book concerning the Soul. But beyond this, it is expedient to note that there is something in them of extraordinary and Divine, which made the Stoicks say, that Providence carefull of our preservation, gave us Dreaming, as a domestick Oracle, to inform us of our good and evils. This cannot be understood commonly of all Dreams, the truth being such that there are five sorts of them which Macrobius following the Antients names the Phantasme, the Raving, the Vision, the Oracle, and the figurative Dream; we ought not to relie much upon Phantasmes which are as shadows, which present themselves to our imagination in the very first cloud of sleep, nor of Ravings, which follow ordina-ordinarily the ſtate of the paſſions and affections of our ſoul and of our body, as Artemidorus reaſons in the beginning of his work; but much on Viſion, which without following the paths trodden the day before by our ſenſes, make us ſee and diſcover things in our ſleep which we experiment, when we are awake, to be the ſelf ſame which we ſaw when we were aſleep. And as for Oracle, which expreſſes to us apparitions of God and Angels, or certain grave perſons that ſeem to ſpeak to us, and to advertiſe us of what we have to do, or not to do, it cannot be but very conſiderable; as alſo the figurative Dream, which ſhews us under Figures and Symbols the divers accidents of things profitable either to the common good, or to our particular conduct.

I have been willing to clear this with more day, to make us know the excellent gifts of the Divine Goodneſs communicated to our Patriarch in that interpretation which he gave to Dreams. To ſpeak truth, it was a kind of Prophecy, which being properly a manifeſtation of truths elevated above the ordinary knowledge of man, clearly diſcovered it ſelf in Joſeph, in the declaration which he made of things ſo hidden, and ſo little penetrable to the underſtanding of the moſt learned men of Egypt. Saint Thomas diſputes touching the excellency of Prophecies, and ſays, That thoſe are more ſublime that are purely intellectual, then others that are made by ſimilitudes. But although thoſe of our Joſeph were revealed by Riddles and by Figures, yet they mount for all that to an high point of excellency: foraſmuch as they were by this means more proportioned to the capacity of a Nation that loved them more when they were involved in the ſhadows and in the clouds of thoſe Figures, then if they had been naked and totally unmixt with corporal Idea's. And I think that the great excellency of a maſter and of a teacher, is to accommodate himſelf to the ſpirit of thoſe to whom he would perſwade the verities of his Doctrine.

Now it diſcovers to us at preſent, that this firſt Courtier of the choſen people had ſomething of Divine that prepared him to great actions, inaſmuch as from his little childhood he was exerciſed by thoſe myſterious Dreams, and amorous of Heaven, and of the Stars that enlightned him in the ſilence of a delicious night, and brought him the preſages of his future greatneſs. God hath often ſpoken to his moſt faithful ſervants by the means of Dreams: as, to Mordecai; to the Wiſe-men of the Eaſt: to Saint Joſeph the Spouſe of the moſt holy Virgin: and the obſervation of them is not bad when one perceives in them ſome extraordinary thing, and which tends to a good end by lawful and commendable means.

It is true that Ariſtotle thought, that Dreams came not from God, becauſe if that had any likelyhood, that favour would be for none but for the Philoſophers and for eminent perſons; but we muſt pardon a wiſe worldly man, if he knew not the admirable commerce and the ſweet diſcourſes that the ſpirit of God is pleaſed to make with ſimple and innocent ſouls, which being empty of themſelves are filled advantageouſly with the Deity. Such was little Joſeph, when he ſaw in a Dream his ſheaf of Corn that exalted it ſelf above thoſe of his brethren, and when he beheld the Sun, and the Moon, with the eleven Stars that came to worſhip him and do him reverence. This probably ſeemed to him a preſage of a great happineſs, ſeeing that according to the Maximes of Aſtrampſithus in his book of Dreams, it is a mark of felicity to ſee the Stars in one's ſleep. He had not been then refined at Court when he boaſted of that Dream by a childiſh innocence, and related it to his brothers, who conceived ſo much jealouſie from it, that they reſolved upon his deſtruction.

Here is a ſecond work of Providence which pleaſes her ſelf in doing the works of her Trade, and in conducting to the haven thoſe whom ſhe hath taken in charge by turning her back to them. His brothers, ſaith S. Gregory, ſold him, for fear leſt he ſhould be worſhipped according to his Dream; and he was worſhipped becauſe he was ſold. Envy (which is properly a ſadneſs for the honour and welfare of another; foraſmuch as that it ſeems to us to tend to the diminution of ours) finds objects in all places: it enters into Jacob's family, a family of Saints, to teach us (ſaith Saint Ambroſe) that the ſervants of God have not eſcaped Paſſions, but conquered them. He that in the Government of all Egypt found nothing but admiration amongſt ſtrangers, meets with envy amongſt his brethren, and amongſt thoſe of whom charity ſhould have been adored, though ſhe had been perſecuted in all the habitable world. There is not a more ſubtle poyſon then that of Aſps, nor a more deadly envy then that of brothers, and eſpecially of thoſe that make profeſſion of wiſdom and of holineſs. This animal paſſion, that makes at length a ſin of the ſpirit, feels her ſelf moſt conveniently lodged in the heart of ſpiritual men: ſhe ſleeps in their boſom as in her neſt; and becauſe that ſhe is always a companion of ambition, and that ſuch kind of perſons are ordinarily extreme deſirous of the glory that proceeds from the reputation of virtue and of learning, it comes to paſs that ſhe hath in them more exerciſe and nouriſhment. This ill-boding Comet diſcovers in them without ceaſing, new vapours to be digeſted; and by how the more aged the envious are, by ſo much the more ſtrong are their habits to this ſin. The rays of virtue and of all perfection are darted continually into the eys of thoſe of the ſame houſe, which makes this iniquity increaſe by the frequentation of its objects. Little things prick as well as great, and thoſe Spiders find every where matter for poyſon. Good muſt be hid from them, that their evil may not be diſcovered; and virtue be put out of ſight, that ſhe may be put out of the danger of being envied: Oleaſter ſaith, That God covered Moſes with a Cloud in thoſe familiar Colloquies which he had with him; for fear, that that being perceived by the Jews who were at the bottom of the Mountain in its higheſt luſtre, might move envy by an object that merited nothing but veneration.

But how juſt is God to turn that fury of the Serpents againſt her ſelf, to cauſe her to promote whileſt ſhe abaſes, and to honour while ſhe inſults, and to ſanctifie whileſt ſhe perſecutes, thoſe on whom ſhe imprints the ſtrongeſt venome of her Rage! O what a brave ſpectacle it is to ſee ſo many ſtorms poured down continually at the foot of the Mountain Athos, with an eternall deſpaire to cover it! And what an excellent Theater of Providence is it to behold envious men that envy without ceaſing, and that are never envied, becauſe they have nothing that merits envy! They caſt out their foam and their froth againſt a man whom Gods raiſes upon the wings of glory; and by making themſelves an hell in their entrails, they prepare for him a paradiſe.

Joſeph

Joseph sold to the Ishmaelites, is bought by Potiphar a great Prince of Egypt, who had the confidence of King Pharaoh and his Arms in his hands. He enters into the Court, a thing which he never had so much as thought on; he comes thither with a chain, to carry away one day the collar of gold; he is received there as a Slave, to become a Master, and submits his neck under the yoke of Servitude, to govern. He enters powerfully into the favour of his Lord, who finding him discret, industrious, and faithful, gives him the charge of all his house, of his goods, and of his revenues, which he causes greatly to increase, so much were his pains accompanied with an abundance of the benedictions of heaven. But the immodest love of his Mistris raised him great combats that served for an exercise to his virtue, to put it in the highest lustre of its glory.

Behold a point where God shews plainly, that one never loses any thing by being faithful to him; and that the greatest triumph of virtues, is, to have sin in ones power, and innocence in ones will. Those that would raise fortunes of glass upon the foundations of iniquity, would have thought that Joseph had had a fair opportunity in his hands to promote himself at Court; seeing himself beloved of one of the chief Ladies of the Kingdom, who was as much disposed to wish him well, as powerful to make his happiness. There was no need to woo her, and to gain her heart by many artifices; she loves, she desires, she presses: love hath robbed her of the quality of a Mistris, to make her take that of a Servant who offered to him her passion. That pleasing beauty of Joseph, which virtue placed upon the highest of the thrones of love, darted arrows at her that made her forget her self, to run after her slave.

What shall this faithful servant do, that sees that his beauty hath passed him Master in one day of his Lords house and bed? He is young, it is a vice, some one will say, pardonable to his age. He is a stranger, he hath need of an upholder, he is a man of fortune, he ought not to shut the door against her when she offers her self to him. It is a deed that will pass in an eternal secret; if he grants his Mistrisses request, wealth, content, authority, credit, are for none but him; if he denies it, he must fear chains, prisons, fire, and sword, and all that a woman will, and all that a provoked love can do. It was a great combat, wherein Reason had the upper-hand of Passion; Grace of Nature; and God of Man. Joseph would not be fair to the prejudice of another, thinking that that was not the true beauty that was adorned to the disadvantage of Chastity; but that which is preserved to the honour of Modesty. He settled his eys fast upon the Natural Law of God whom he adored; and although he seemed then to use him harshly in that captivity: yet he forgot nothing of his duty. He represented to himself the faithfulness that he had promised to his Master; the short pleasures that accompany sin, and the remorse that follows; he extinguished the flames of love; he brake all his darts; and in his slavery made himself master of him that hath captivated so many Kings.

He came out of the chamber where the snare was laid, as a ruby out of burning flames, without losing any thing of his integrity, and making his fair lustre glitter in the eys of heaven, his only witness. He quitted his coat, and thought it no more his own, after it had touch'd the hands of that immodest woman; he feared lest that contagious venome of love might communicate it self to his heart by the simple touch of a garment; he stays not near her; he busies not himself so much as to make her a discourse of continence; he answers fier by running away, and conquers the strongest of the passions by turning to it his back. O why were not all the Roses and all the Lillies that flourished in the Gardens of Egypt for that time employed to make immortal crowns for that Chastity that consecrated it self so highly even in the Kingdom of loves! O how well did he then merit, to be mounted upon a Chariot drawn with horses whiter then the snow, and to be shown to all Egypt, as a tamer of monsters, and a triumpher over vices!

Nevertheless (the love of his Mistres turning it self into rage) he is accused of having attempted to ravish the honour which he preserved. His innocence is borne down by the artifices of a wise, and the credulity of a husband; he suffers for virtue all that the most faulty could expect in punishment of their crimes. He is put immediately into the dungeon, loaden with irons, used with all possible rigours; without being defended or succoured of any one; he expects nothing every moment but an ignominious death to put an end to the miseries of his life.

Eternal Wisdom! (saith Tertullian) you cut your childrens throats and use them as sacrifices, as if you could not crown them but by their torments, as if you could not honour them but by their punishments. But why do we complain (said a learned Father of the Church) Joseph is free in this Captivity; if his body groans under the irons, his spirit walks with God, philosophizes with God, and thinks that the recompence of a good action, is, to have done it.

Behold the exact method that Providence keeps in the conduct of her chosen ones; One deep must call upon another deep; the deep of afflictions calls for that of glories, and the heighths of honour are prepared according to the measure of tribulations. It is the gold that (according to Job's speech) comes from the North; it is that divine crystal that is congealed under the breath of God; it is those burning arrows of the Lord of hosts that cause those combatants to let fly their colours; and that make wounds by communicating lights.

Ab aquilone aurum venit flamæ Deo concrescit gelu. Job. 37.

Joseph's prison was a school of wisdom where God spake, and his servant hearkned to him, having his ear in heaven, and his heart in that of his Master. A certain Grace that proceeding from the interiour of his soul spread it self upon his visage, and made it self be heard in every one of his words, gained him the heart of his goaler that used him kindly, having already an high esteem of his innocence and of his virtue. There are some men so happy that they find Empires every where, which was the cause that this holy Patriarch obtained by merit the charge of all the prisoners that were companions of his misery; and made himself by love the Governour even of him that held him in captivity.

It happens in this accident, that two of the King's officers, his Butler and his Baker, were brought into the same prison, and given in ward to Joseph to administer to them things necessary for life. He comforted them in their adversity, and entertained them with good discourses, and as he saw them one day very melancholy he inquired after the cause of their sadness, and perceived that they disquieted themselves about their Dreams. The Butler had dreamed that he saw a Vine with three branches, which which at one time was adorned with leaves, with buds, with bloſſomes, and with ripe grapes; and that after he had gathered of its fruit, he ſqueezed it into Pharaoh's cup which he held in his hand, and preſented it unto him. Whereupon Joſeph foretold him that within three dayes he ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in his office. The other had ſeen himſelf in his Dream carrying three panniers of meal upon his head; and it ſeemed to him, that in that which was the higheſt of all, there was abundance of the delicacies of his trade, which the birds of prey came and ſnatched away, which made his Prophet denounce to him an ignominious death. The effect was anſwerable to the predictions in the limited time, and the one dyed upon the gallows, and the other was re-inveſted in his place.

But, that being very true which S. Thomas hath obſerved, that there be four ſorts of people that eaſily forget a courteſie; Proud men, to whom one does ſome ſmall diſpleaſure, though they have been at other times greatly obliged in divers accidents. Baſe and mean perſons that are unexpectedly raiſed to ſome degree of honour. Children, that are become men; and Priſoners that are ſet at liberty. The Butler was ſo raviſhed with his change of fortune, that he was no longer mindfull of his friend; the enjoyment of a preſent good making him loſe the remembrance of the Prophecy, concerning the time to come.

Yet providence that would exalt Joſeph to the higheſt top of honour, at the time at which ſhe had deſtined it, ſent Dreams to Pharaoh about the ſtate of his Kingdome, which cauſed great troubles in his mind, there being no body that he could find able to reſolve his doubts. It was then that the Butler ſpake, not being ignorant that this news would be moſt pleaſing to the King, and told him the dreams that had happened both to him and his companion when they were in priſon, adding the interpretation given upon them by a young ſlave, an Hebrew by Nation, kept in the ſame goal, and the effect that had followed the Oracles of his mouth. Whereat the King being much joyed, commanded that he ſhould be inſtantly fetched out of priſon, and be brought to be ſeen and heard by his Majeſty, which was readily performed. For after they had trimmed his hair, and cloathed him with a befitting habit, he was preſented to the Kings eyes, who received him with much courteſie, and having related to him his Dreams, which were of ſeven kine, fat and wonderfull fair, that had been followed and devoured by other lean ones, and as much as could be, out of fleſh; as alſo of ſeven ears of corn extremely well filled, that had been eaten up by other empty and barren ones, he deſired him to give him the Reſolution of them. Whereupon, Joſeph ſhewed a ſingular modeſty, telling the King, that the true explications of Dreams, and all certain and infallible Prophecies, came from God which is the father of lights; and at length opening his opinion, ſaid, That Egypt ſhould have ſeven years, ſuch as never were, for abundance and fruitfulneſs, that ſhould be followed with ſeven others, over which ſhould reign ſuch a barrenneſs and famine through all the land, that it ſhould deface the memory of all that great fertility that had gone before. And therefore he would counſel his Majeſty to find out a prudent and active man to give him the ſuperintendency of all the land of Egypt, which ſhould have Commiſſaries under him through all the Provinces, that ſhould cauſe diligently the fifth part of the fruits, and the revenues of corn that ſhould proceed every year out of that fecundity, to be laid up and kept in the King's granaries and magazins, that ſhould be diſtributed in divers Provinces for that purpoſe; and that this would be a moſt ſecure means to remedy the great famine that ſhould follow that long proſperity.

The interpretation of Pharaoh's Dream was admired, and the advice judged exceeding good; which cauſed the King, thinking that there was no man in all his Realm more capable of that deſign then he that had given the invention of it, to eſtabliſh from that time Joſeph in that Charge ſo important to the whole Nation. It is a marvellous thing to conſider the honours that this Prince did him, and the high titles wherewith he qualified him (God being pleaſed to ſhew in this, that he multiplies the conſolations of his faithfull ſervants above all the meaſure of the diſpleaſures that they can have received) for he did not content himſelf to give him the ſilk Robe, the collar of the Order, the ring off his Finger, to procure him a rich marriage, by cauſing him to be eſpouſed to the daughter of an high Prieſt of the city of Heliopolis conſecrated to the Sun; but he cauſed him to be called The Saviour of the world, and commanded that he ſhould be carryed through the capital City upon his triumphant Chariot, and that the Herald of Arms ſhould cauſe men to bend their knees before him, that he might be acknowledg'd of all the people, and that all the world might underſtand that nothing was done but by his orders.

Where are thoſe admirers of the fortunes of glaſs that happen to the wicked? where are thoſe adorers of the Coloſſus's of dirt that appear by the help of ſome falſe gildings, and are immediately reduced to duſt? Let them ſee, and let them conſider that the God of heaven and earth which we adore, is the God of honour too, whereof he gives a ſhare to his, when it pleaſes him, with magnificences that ſurpaſs all whatſoever one can imagine. For a priſon of three years Joſeph is exalted to a principality of fourſcore, with an authority ſo abſolute, that it never yet had its equal ſince the foundation of the Monarchy of the Egyptians.

It now remains to obſerve for the inſtruction of Courtiers the deportments of Joſeph in that charge. And although the Scripture ſayes very little of that buſineſs, enlarging it ſelf principally upon the narration of his reconciliation with his brethren; yet it omits not to give us ſomething whereon to meditate, and whereby to inſtruct our ſelves about his demeanour at the Court.

In the firſt place, he is greatly to be commended for having preſerved through his whole life a piety inviolable in the Religion of his fathers, without altering the ſervice of the true God by any bad tincture of the ſuperſtition of the Egyptians. Repreſent to your ſelves a child about ſeventeen years of age, that was in a ſtrange Nation as the Morning-ſtar, whereof the Scripture ſpeaks, in the midſt of clouds, without a father, without a mother, without a governour or a teacher, without a Prieſt, without a Sacrifice, without a Law, without Precepts, and without example; that ſaw himſelf allured and powerfully ſolicited to quit his Religion, by that complacency which he deſired to give his Prince by the conſideration of his fortune, by the friendſhip of the great ones, by the condition of his marriage, and by the liking (which he might aim at) of a people extremely faſtned to their errour, that could not eaſily endure thoſe that had any other opinion of their Gods then their madneſs did preſcribe. And yet, in an age ſo tender he holds his own by conſtancy of of mind againſt the mighty, by reaſon againſt the Sages of the Country, by warineſs againſt his own wife, by ſweetneſs and by prudence againſt the people. He remains alone, amongſt ſo many millions of ſuperſtitious men, an adorer of the truth in ſpirit, without other ſacrifices or ceremonies which were not lawful for him to uſe. To ſpeak truth, he that ſhall weigh all theſe circumſtances will find a marvellous weight of virtue and conſtancy in this holy perſonage. We may ſee many of the yong Gentry ſufficiently well educated at the firſt, that coming to breathe the air of liberty amongſt the Hereticks, and having not the frequentation of the Sacraments ſo free as formerly, eaſily forget their duty, and without having any other corrupter to ſolicite them, corrupt themſelves of themſelves through the want of courage and weariſomneſs of virtue. But if there be any baits of pleaſure or of honor that allures them to the ſide of impiety they tread oftē-times under foot all that there is of divine and humane, for the ſatisfying of their ſenſuality. But this young man that ſaw every day before his eys a thouſand ſtumbling-blocks in a Nation that was addicted to Idolatry above all the People of the World, and that had often torn in pieces thoſe that expreſſed any contempt of their Ceremonies, preſerves himſelf amidſt theſe enticements and theſe furies, as a fountain of freſh-water in the midſt of the ſalt-ſea. The true God always returned into his thoughts; when he was to combate againſt the paſſion of his Miſtriſs, when he was to preſent himſelf to the King, when he was to require an oath of his brethren, it was by the true God; and when he was ready to render up the Ghoſt, he conjured his children not to let his bones rot in a land of Idolatry.

Yet ſome men may wonder, that in ſo long a ſojourning as he made in Egypt, and in an authority ſo abſolute, he took care only of the Politick affairs, and advanced not the intereſts of his Religion. Some may marvel at the alliance that he made with a daughter of a Prieſt of Idols, which could not be without putting his conſcience in great danger, there being nothing more full of Artifice then ſuperſtition that is upheld with Love.

But to this I anſwer; that all that he could do then was to preſerve his Faith, without pretending to ruine the contrary. It was not expedient that the figure ſhould incroach upon the Body, and that Joſeph ſhould do the work of the Meſſias. This demolition of the prophane Temples, and this deſtruction of the Idols, was not due but to Jeſus Chriſt, and to the Deifying operations of the Evangelical Law, after the coming of the Holy Spirit. How ſhould Joſeph have been able to enterpriſe the converſion of the Gentiles, ſeeing that our Lord would not permit, no not his Diſciples, while he was yet on earth, to make incurſions, and miſſions into the Country of the Heathens, commanding them to ſtay for that ſpirit of fire and light that was to inflame the whole world with its ardours? And as for that which touches his alliance, there was not yet any Law that forbad the Marriages of the Jews with the Gentiles, and he had but newly ſeen the example of his Father Jacob, who had allyed himſelf with the houſe of Laban. This was done indifferently enough in the Law of Nature, by reaſon that God had not commanded any thing that was contrary to this practice, and becauſe that this People were yet but a little family in the middle of the world. But this faſhion was changed afterward, (as it is clear by the Scripture) and thoſe who produce the Examples of Abraham and of Jacob, to perſwade alliance with Infidels, ſhew that they have little Reaſon and much Paſſion.

In the ſecond Place, I ſay that the Modeſty of Joſeph is of a rare Example, and of a ſtrength of mind almoſt incomparable. Which will be eaſie enough to prove to thoſe that know how ſeriouſly to weigh the change of humour and of ſpirit, that honour ordinarily brings with it; and eſpecially when it is great and ſudden, and falls upon a perſon that is not accuſtom'd to it. There are ſome that are like the Thracians that make themſelves drunk, ſtanding about burning coals, by the odour of a certain herb which they throw into the fire; after which they dance continually, and forget all the functions of the reaſonable life. So may you ſee abundance of ſuch men, who perceiving themſelves raiſed upon the wings of fortune, fall into ſuch a madneſs of glory, that they are as it were dizzy-headed by certain venomous fumigations of ambition, and know themſelves no more. But this man ſees himſelf at his going out of priſon mounted to the higheſt point of honour that ever happened to a Favourite; He hath the King's Ring and Seal, he triumphs upon his Chariot, he ſees the Nobles in admiration of his Fortune, and the Commons in veneration, he ſees the applauſes, he hears the Clamours of thoſe that highly publiſh him the favour of the world; and yet for all this great preparation, there eſcapes not from him one only word of vanity. He expreſſes not any complacency in thoſe honours, and in that habit; and it is not read that after the day of the Ceremony he ever uſed them. He publickly avouches that he is the ſon of a Sheepherd, he cauſes his Father and his Brothers to come into the Kingdom of Egypt, not to give them the Offices of the Court, and the Treaſures of Pharaoh; but he lets them alone in their vocation, contenting himſelf to procure their quiet, and ſome ſmall commodities ſutable to that Paſtoral Life. He humbles himſelf before his Father, he acknowledges and makes much of his Brethren, he gains the heart of all the world, and bears ſo actively that high top of glory, that he ſeems to be no more laden with it, then a Bird is with his Feathers.

The third perfection of Joſeph is remarkable in the great and laborious ſervices that he rendred to his Prince, with an high Prudence, an exquiſite Diligence, and an inviolable faithfulneſs. He viſited in perſon all the Provinces of Egypt; and in the great fertility of thoſe fortunate years, when Corn was almoſt as cheap as ſand, he laid up a prodigious ſtore in the King's Magazins to relieve the neceſſities of the barrenneſs that was to come: and indeed it did not fail to happen, but indured the ſpace of ſeven years, with ſuch a violence, and ſo great diſaſters; that it ſeemed, that the bowels of the Earth were iron; and that God had reſolved to deſtroy mankind by a General Famine. It was then that all the People implored the mercy of the King, who ſent them back to Joſeph who cauſed the Granaries of all Egypt to be ſet open; and ſold Corn to all thoſe that had need of it; firſt for mony; afterward for Cattel; and at laſt when both mony and Cattle failed the Egyptians, they ſold their Lands in great number: ſo that all Egypt was ſubmitted to the diſcretion of the King, to avoid that raging Famine. They gave themſelves and their little Poſſeſsions with all their heart for Bread; But Joſeph taking pity of their great miſeries made them Conditions that were above all their hopes. This people was of a ſpirit bright enough, addicted to novelties & ſeditions, which made them often ſhake off the yoke, but Joſeph tamed them inſenſibly by their own neceſsities, and ſubjected all Egypt to his Maſter, cauſing him to reign peaceably, and with a great authority, and yet for all this drew no envy upon himſelf, but quite contrary he made his Government be admired, and his memory bleſſed!

Amongſt all this it is not ſaid that he enriched his houſe with the great treaſures that he heaped up for Pharaoh; and although that his Maſter had put all things into his power: yet he uſed them ſo moderately, that when he had a mind to offer preſents to his brother Benjamin, whom he loved as his own heart, he contented himſelf to give him five ſutes of Clothes, and three hundred Livers, making the ſame largeſs to his Father, with ſome Mules to tranſport their Baggage. Yet it is very true that he cauſed the Land of Goſhen to be given them; but it was, as it were, by way of loan, to dwell there, and to husband it, till the return that Jacob pretended to make to the Country of his Fathers. In a word, Joſeph plainly ſhewed that he was little affected to all the Riches of the Egyptians when he received of his father, and made reckoning of it, a little piece of land that he had gained from the Amorites.

A fourth quality of this wiſe Governour, which is greatly to be priz'd, is ſeen in the great prudence and ſingular ſweetneſs which he uſed in his Government, in ſuch a manner that he gained the affection of all the great men of Egypt. David ſpeaking of this diſcretion, and of this goodneſſe ſaith, according to the Hebrew Text, That he tyed them all to his heart, which is as much as to ſay, That he united them to his perſon by a great affability, by good offices, and by honeſt yeildings. They looked upon him as a Father, and as a Maſter, and had him in veneration: and yet for all this he was not puffed with Pride, nor inebriated with the opinion of his own ſufficiency; But in all the extraordinary favours that he received of the King his Maſter, he was communicable, and eſteeming himſelf as one of them, he ſaw them all under him. To ſpeak ſincerely, it is an admirable thing, That a ſtranger ſhould have held the Stern of a Kingdome the ſpace of fourſcore years in a Nation full of Spirit and ſufficiently ſeditious, without complaints, without diſcontents, and without intermiſſions in a calm ſo peaceable, a Peace ſo amiable, a Love ſo Univerſal. How many do we ſee in Hiſtories that being come to ſome dignity ſeem continually to hold a Wolf by the ears; and as they love nothing but their own Intereſts: ſo are they loved ſincerely of no body, which puts them in continual frights, and makes them fear even the very ſhadow of an hair! They think not that there is any ſecurity for themſelves, unleſſe they put the whole world in danger; nor ſafety, vnleſs it be in the publick Ruines. This makes them be hated of God, and Men; and cauſes cares to leap over Ramparts of Steel and Iron, to beſet their ſilver Balliſters, and to call them to an account at every moment for the Calamity of the Living, and for the Bloud of the Dead.

This was a fifth Lineament of his good demeanour, that he had Bowels of Compaſſion for the poor People in that cruel Famine, and general deſpair of all Egypt. And although one might imagine that he had promoted the Intereſts of the King in an exceſſe to the detriment of the Subject; yet is it true that he that will well conſider the eſtate and Lawes of that Monarchy, will impute to Joſeph's favour that which he would have taken at firſt ſight for Rigour in his Government.

It is certain, that according to the Antient Hiſtories which treat of the Policy of that Nation, the Revenue of Egypt was divided into three parts: the firſt of which was claimed by the Prieſts that were in great number, and in great eſteem in a ſuperſtitious Nation; and that portion was employed in the building of Temples, in the expence of ſacrificings, and in the maintenance of the Sacrificers and Miniſters that were preſerved in their inheritances and poſſeſſions by the Reverence that was borne to Religion. The ſecond was the Kings who was obliged to feed and pay the Souldiery, and thoſe that adminiſtred Juſtice. The third belonged to the Common people compoſed of Labourers, of Sheepherds and of Artificers, who ſeeing themſelves oppreſſed with famine, offered willingly their inheritances and their Bodies too for Bread. But Joſeph remitted all, gave them wherewith to ſow, and even the Cattle to Plow the Ground, on this condition, that they would render to the King the fifth part of the Increaſe, which they agreed to with a free will, finding their repoſe, their good, and their ſafety in that tranſaction. So that the holy Patriarch is free from blame in all theſe proceedings. For if upon the fore-ſight of the barrenneſs he made proviſion of Corn, it was Prudence; if he ſold it dear in a time that the want of it was great, it was juſtice: but if he exacted not of the Egyptians all that neceſſity preſcribed them, uſing them with more favour then the miſery of their condition did bear, it was mercy. And to make it evidently appear that Joſeph made himſelf beloved of the People, one may obſerve an excellent Treatiſe of Julius Firmicus an antient Eccleſiaſtical Authour that aſſures us, That the Egyptians finding themſelves infinitely obliged to his Providence and to his Courteſie, conſecrated him under the name of Serapis that carried a meaſure of Corn upon his head, to ſignifie that he was the God that had given them bread.

For a ſixth obſervation, one cannot ſufficiently admire that prodigious goodneſs which he teſtified in his reconciliation with his brethren. Upon which the ſacred Hiſtory extends it ſelf with magnificence and pomp; for he did that action with much preparation, and ſeaſoned it with a certain gentleneſs and memorable circumſtances to render it more ſolemn. He frighted them to ſecure them; he made them ſad to make them joyfull; he tormented them with fears and greifs, to make them taſte their felicity with a more delicious daintineſs.

An Antient ſaid alſo, That there is never any thing Good without the experience of Evil; and for this purpoſe he afflicts them at firſt by a feigned Rigour, to make them experiment a true Goodneſs. For to follow in this Hiſtory the paths of the holy Scripture, without any other amplification, ſuch as one may read in the Hiſtory of the R. Fa. Talon, who hath handled this ſubject with a flouriſhing and delightfull ſtile, conſider how, when they preſented themſelves unto him to buy Corn in Egypt by his permiſſion, he knew them without being known. He aſſumed a ſevere countenance, and harſh language, he uſed them as Spies that come to obſerve the defects of the Cities and of the Citadels of Egypt to make a report of it to the enemy. They very much aſtoniſhed, anſwered, that they were very far from all ſuch practiſes, being of a peaceable nature and condition, the ſons of a good man, the father of twelve children, the youngeſt of which ſtayed at home with him, and the other was dead many years ago.

Joſeph that had not his reckoning if he got not his dear

dear brother Benjamin that issued from the same Mother as himself, frighted them more to make them resolve to bring him, and told them, that he perceived well that they were Impostours, and that he would believe nothing of what they said, if they came not to produce that little brother of whom they spake; That these were but inventions to amuze him, but he would not be satisfied, nor put off with Fables. Thereupon he gave command that they should all be put in prison under a good and safe Guard. These miserable men lay three dayes in a place where they endured very long, and they began to think upon their conscience, perswading themselves that it was their brother's bloud that rebounded upon their heads. Joseph causes them to be brought, and questions them again, as to make ready their indictment, and to cause them to be put to death. The fear, wherein they thought themselves to be, gave them great remorses, and made them say amongst themselves; It is upon a just ground that we suffer now an accident so little expected by us; we well enough remember that we saw the anguish of our poor brother Joseph, when we held him in our cruell hands to kill him; we have sold him to the Infidels, and he dyed in slavery overwhelmed with miseries, It is of his bloud that God makes us now to give an account.

They said this with a low voice in Joseph's and the Egyptians presence, thinking that their language had not been understood by any one; but all those words entred into the heart of their good brother, who was very much melted with compassion, and withdrew himself to let fall some tears which joy and pity forced from his eyes.

In fine, he commanded them to return unto their home, on condition that one of them should remain Prisoner till such time as they had brought their little brother. Simeon was chosen to be the sacrifice, and was bound in their presence, which they could not see without a sad displeasure. This done they were dismissed with their Loads of Corn; and the money which they had brought, secretly put up again into their sacks by Joseph's order. When they perceived it, it astonished them, but being already far advanced upon the way, they returned to their Father, related to him faithfully all that had passed, and expect thereupon his counsels and commands.

But when the Good-man heard them speak of taking away his Benjamin, he felt himself touched in the apple of the eye, and said, that he saw plainly that all his children would be taken from him, that they should remember that one had been devoured by the wilde beasts, and her lay in chains in a strange Countrey; and that instead of comforting him, they would yet carry away him that assisted him in his old age, and made him love more tenderly that little life that remained to him; That if this should come short-home, it would precipitate his grey hairs to the Grave with most bitter griefs. It was pitifull to see the torment of that good old man, and he was not for that time to be pressed farther upon a point so sensible. They let some dayes slip away, and as the famine increased, and the Corn diminished, Jacob, without being brought to it by his children, begins again to speak of a Voyage into Egypt. They reply, that it was a superfluous thing to think on it, if he made not a resolution to send with them his son Benjamin; but when they spake to him of that, they opened the wound of his heart; and he said, that it was to make all the miseries of his unfortunate house fall back on him, and that they might well have omitted to tell the Governour of Egypt that they had yet another brother. Whereupon they informed him, that he himself had inquired particularly about the State of all the family, and that they had no list to lye, not being able to divine that he would demand that child.

The necessity of food, and the love of a father combated at the same time in that afflicted heart, and he knew not what to resolve on. His sons seeing him a little stagger, urge him eagerly, as one does those that are slow and fearfull when one would wrest any thing from them, Reuben offers him his two little sons in hostage, and would have him kill them, if he brings not back to him his Benjamin. Judah engages himself for him upon his head and life. The battery was too strong for him not to yield; he orders them therefore to take some of the best fruits of their Land to make presents to that great Lord of Egypt, and to carry their money double, to restore that which had been put into their sacks, lest it should have happened by an oversight; and also to take their little brother, seeing that such was the necessity. When they came to a departure, he felt great convulsions, and said to them, go then in an happy hour. I pray my God, the God Almighty, which hath never yet forsaken me, that he would render that great Governour of Egypt favourable to you; and that you may quickly bring back that poor prisoner, and my little Benjamin, which I put now into your hands upon the promises which you have made, to which I call heaven to witness. Know furthermore, that I am deprived of all my Children, and that I shall be as in the Grave, till such time as the happy news of your return shall give me a Resurrection.

This being said, they put themselves on the way, arrive at Egypt, and present themselves suddenly to their brother, who perceived that Benjamin was there, whereat he was wonderfully pleased, and commanded his Steward to make ready a dinner, because he would eat with those strangers. They are brought into the house with much courtesie, yet (as an evil conscience is ever fearfull) they perswade themselves that it is to put them in Prison, and to keep them in servitude by reason of that money which they had found in their sacks. They address themselves to the Cash-keeper of the house, very much scared, and beseech him to hear them; they relate to him with great sincerity all that had happened to them, protesting that that came not by their fault, and offering all that they thought they were indebted to him; The other made answer with great affability, that he had received of them good money, that he held himself satisfied, and that if they had found any in their sacks it was their good luck, and the God of their fathers that had a minde to gratifie them. He gave them notice that they were to dine that day with their Lord, who would suddenly return from his affairs to set himself at Table. They order in the mean time their present, and their brother Simeon is released who embraces them with a joy which was as the fore-runner of a greater. They are made to wash and repose themselves, and meat is also given to their Mules.

And when all this was dispatched, Joseph enters to go to dinner, they prostrate themselves before him with a profound reverence, and offer him their presents. He receives them with great courtesie, and asks of them at first sight, how their good Father did, whether he was yet alive. To which they answered, that God of his goodness had preserved to them that which they held most dear, and that he was in a very good condition. Then he fixed his eyes upon his brother Benjamin, & said unto them, Is this then your little brother of whom you have made mention to me? To which they answer, that they had brought him with them, to obey his commands, & to justifie the sincerity of their proceedings. His heart was ravished at him, and turning himself towards him, my child, sayes he to him, I pray God to give you his holy graces, and to keep you in his protection. Upon this speech, he felt his heart very much moved, and ran into his Closet, not being able any longer to hold his tears, and wept in secret, so great great an impression had bloud and nature, and perhaps the remembrance of his Mother who had borne them both, made upon his Spirit.

When he had wiped his face, he returns with a merry countenance, he commands his men to wait. He dined apart, a little separated from his brethren and from another company of the Egyptians, who were also at the Feast, and had no communication with the Jews. He gives charge above all that they use well the youngest of those eleven brothers, wch say that they are all the sons of one and the same father, and that they should spare nothing on them. After all, he ordered that they should fill their sacks with Corn, and that they should put again the money also in them, as they had done at their first journey, and spake to his Steward, giving him charge to take the Cup in which he drank, and to put it in the sack of little Benjamin, which he did; and after they had well dined, they passed the rest of the day in all tranquillity, expecting the morrow to put themselves upon their way, and to return to their father.

When the day began to dawn, after they had bid their adieus, and given their thanks, they departed from the City very joyful, for that they had had so happy Accidents; But they were not very far before they see a man coming from Joseph, that seems exceedingly to chafe, stops them, & sayes to them that some body had stoln away his Masters Cup with which he serves himself to drink in and to Divine things hidden; that this could not happen but from them, and that they were very injurious, after they had been entertained in the house of the Governour of Egypt with so much courtesie, to render him evil for good, and to fly away after they had committed a Theft so base and so outrageous.

The brothers extreamly astonished, answer that this cannot be, and that they should be the wickedst men upon the earth if they had as much as dreamt of such an attempt; That there was no likelyhood that they that had brought back faithfully the money that had been put into their sacks, would steal in the house of so high a Potentate; Furthermore, that there was no need of words, but that he should come to proof, and search every where; and that if any one of them was culpable of that sacriledge, they were content to deliver him up to death, and to render themselves all, the Governour's slaves for reparation of that fault.

The condition is accepted with moderation, that the faulty should be punished, and that the innocent should go free. They are all searched in order, and the Cup was found in the sack of the youngest. The brothers are seized with a profound astonishment, and the poor child so amazed, that he hath not a word to defend himself. They begin all to afflict themselves, and to rent their clothes, and return to the City, as Thieves taken in the fact, to render an account to the Governour. As soon as he saw them he reproached them of ingratitude, and said to them, that they were much deceived to come to him to steal, seeing there was not a man in the whole world that had more news of secret things then he. All prostrate themselves on the ground, and do him Reverence; Judah takes the word and sayes, That they came not to excuse themselves, that they had nothing to say, since God had rendred their iniquity so visible, that they were come all to offer themselves to him to be his slaves, with him that had done the deed. Nay, it shall not go so, saith Joseph, but the culpable shall stay with me, and ye shall return all of you, at liberty to your house. Then Judah drew near, desired audience with a profound humility, and declared how that child was his Father's heart and life, and that having received order from his Excellence to pluck him out of the arms of the old man, and to bring him; they had given him battels to make him resolve on that Voyage, to which he would by no means hearken. But the desire they had to give all possible satisfaction to his greatness, had made them press that business so far as to oblige themselves life for life, body for body, and to deliver their little children to death, in case that they brought not back their brother Benjamin; that thereupon the goodman rendred himself with much difficulty, and that to go and tell him at present that his dear son in whom he lives, and by whom he breaths, is stayed prisoner in Egypt, for a case of theft, would be to give him a double death, and to send him to the grave with inconsolable griefs. And therefore he beseeched his Greatness to shew them mercy, and to take him for a slave in the place of his brother Benjamin.

Joseph could hear no more, so much love and pity did he feel in the bottome of his heart. He caused all the servants to withdraw, not being willing that any of the Egyptians should be witness of this action, and then he lifted up his voice with a great sigh, and a torrent of tears that glided from his eyes, and said, I am Joseph, is my Father yet alive? At that speech these poor men stood so surprised, and in such an extasie, that they made him no reply. By how much the more he saw them astonished, by so much the more did he make much of them, and making them approach very near him, he said again, I am Joseph, I am he that ye sold to the Ishmaelites to be carried into Egypt. Trouble not your selves; God permitted this for my good and for yours. Two years of Famine are past, there are yet five remaining; and I have been sent from on high into Egypt to nourish you, and to preserve you in the rigour of the time. It was not by your counsels, but by the ordinances of God that I came into this Kingdom. And now behold, I am as a father to Pharaoh, the superintendent of his house, and the Prince of Egypt. Go, haste ye to return to my father, carry him the news of my life and of my dignity, relate to him all the glory and all the magnificence that environs me, and tell him that I expect him here, and that it is the will of God that he should come to sojourn in the land of Goshen, where he shall have all that he can desire for his children and for his flocks. This said, he embraced them weeping, beginning with the little Benjamin, and then they took the boldness to speak to him with open heart about all that had passed, thinking themselves obliged above all measure to his goodness.

The fame of this acknowledgment ran in the house of Pharaoh, who ordered Joseph to cause his father to come and sojourn in Egypt with his brothers, dispatching many chariots to carry all his baggage.

The children returned Triumphing, and gave him the the news that his ſon Joſeph was alive, and the ſecond perſon of the Realm of Egypt, that had the managing of all. The Good-man thought that it was a dream, and the admiration of it held him ſo ſeized that he could not come to himſelf again; at length when he ſaw that it was all in good earneſt, and that the Chariots, that were to carry away all his family, were at the gate, he ſaid, that now there remained nothing more for him to deſire, if his ſon Joſeph was alive, and that he would ſee him before his death. Some time after, he departed, being encouraged by an heavenly Viſion that promiſed him all good ſucceſſes in that journey; and when he was arrived at Goſhen, he diſpatched Judah to give the news of it to his ſon Joſeph, who at the ſame inſtant went up into his Coach to go to meet him, and ſeeing him, embraced him with cloſe enfoldings, weeping for joy and tenderneſs upon his neck. His Father holding him between his arms ſaid; My ſon, It is at this hour that I ſhall dy content, ſince God hath ſhewed me the grace to ſee you, and to leave you alive after me. The holy man was alſo preſented to King Pharoah, who made him a great entertainment, and demanded of him his age; to which he anſwered, that he was but an hundred and thirty years old, that thoſe dayes were few and evil, and were not extended to the age of his Fathers; He bleſſed the King, and his place of abode was aſſigned in the Land of Goſhen, where he lived in a moſt full content.

And now I demand of my Reader, if there be any thing more magnificent, more ſweet, and more benigne then the heart of Joſeph in all the circumſtances of that Reconciliation with his brethren? We ſee many Hiſtories wherein the Grandees of the earth that mount up on their Throne, after they have been offended, who, have nothing ſo ordinary as to make Furies and Vengeances with ſquadrons of Hangmen march with them by their ſide, to ruine thoſe that have done them any diſpleaſure. But this man, after he had been ſo cruelly uſed, after he had been ſtripped of his cloaths, caſt into an old pit of water, domineered over, and ſold to Barbarians by his own brothers, with an intention to keep him in an hard ſlavery the reſt of his dayes, not onely forgets all that had paſſed, but pardons them with a profuſion of Charity. He does them good, he overwhelms with good offices thoſe ungratefull men, and in obliging them, he hath but one trouble, which is, to ſee them ſhamefull of their crime. He weeps, while he embraces them one after another. He would not that that fault ſhould be imputed to them. He ſayes, that it was a deſign of God on which they ſhould think no more, unleſs to thank him. Theſe bad brethren, after their father's death, finding themſelves pricked with remorſe of conſcience, and imagining that that pardon was but a diſſembling, caſt themſelves at his feet, and beſeech him to lay aſide all the reſentments of paſt wrongs; but he raiſed them, weeping, and promiſed them a Charity totally fraternal, and for ever inviolable. And though he was ſo puiſſant and ſo abſolute, he never advanced his own children to the prejudice of his brothers, obſerving them, and reſpecting in every thing the right of Elder-ſhip, which nature had given them over him. Certainly a man that hath ſuch a power over himſelf, ought to be looked upon on earth as a Star that ſhould deſcend from heaven, and as the livelieſt image of Divine Goodneſs: he merits not onely to triumph on Pharoah's Chariots, but on the Heaven of Heavens, and to be beheld by Angels with admiration of his deſert. Finally, that which was glorious in Joſeph for the fullneſs of this perfection, was the ſtrength and equality of an incomparable ſpirit; he was alwayes like himſelf, and ſaw all the changes of his fortune without changing: He deſcends into the deep pit with the ſame countenance as he mounts upon Pharoah's Chariot: He complains of nothing: He accuſes no body: He ſtifles all the diſpleaſures and all the reſentment in nature in him. He is loved of his Miſtriſs, without condeſcending to her paſſion: He is hated of her, without accuſing her cruelty: He is accuſed, without defending himſelf; perſecuted, without reſiſting. So many years roul over his head without writing one onely word to his Father, to the diſadvantage of his inhumane brothers: He ſuffers with ſilence: He hides his evils with induſtry: He does good without affectation: He bears upon his ſhoulders all the cares of a great Government, without groaning under his burden: He communicates his glories and his pleaſures: He reſerves to himſelf onely the toils: He takes the bitter and the ſweet, the hard and the ſoft, proſperities and adverſities, as the ſea that receives all the rivers without changing either colour or ſavour. All his life is but a picture that hath alwayes the ſame viſage: and as the Deity does continually one and the ſame action without altering or wearying it ſelf, he continues the exerciſes of his goodneſs without remiſſion, even to the laſt Article of his life.

MOSES.

WHat ſpectacle is this here? A Cradle of Bulruſhes floating upon the River Nile, and in it a little abandoned Infant, for whom his own Mother is conſtrained to make a grave of water to avoid the fury of the Murderers, that came to pluck him from the breaſt. His ſiſter follows him with weeping eyes, and ſayes to him, Go poor Child whether fortune ſhall conduct thee; Go, my dear brother, upon the floats of a furious Element, which perhaps will be more favourable to thee, then thoſe inhumane men that ſeek thy life, when as thou knoweſt not yet what 'tis to live. This River will have pity on thee; or if it ſwallows up thy Cradle in its waves, it will lodge thy bones in its boſom, and cover thy death to ſweeten the bittereſt of our evils, which is, to have eyes to look upon our miſery.

But while that this poor maid weeps upon the bank of Nilus, and mingles her tears with the water of the River, Providence takes the care of that Cradle; ſhe makes herſelf as the Pilot of that little Veſſel, which is without Maſt, without Rudder, without Cordage; ſhe ſupplies all, and does all, ſhe ſhews how one may finde life in death, and an haven in a ſhipwrack,

The Daughter of King Pharoah comes with her female train, and in it is her intention to bathe her ſelf; but in God's intention, that ſhe might be made the Mother of that little Infant expoſed to the mercy of the waters; and that ſince ſhe could not be ſo by Nature, ſhe might be by Adoption. She diſcovers firſt of all that Cradle which was on the waters ſide, and diſpatches one of her Damſels to take it up and bring it her, that ſhe might ſee what was in it; ſhe findes a very fair child which pleads his caſe before her by the eloquence of his tears and of his eryes, and implores her mercy againſt the fury of the Infant-ſlayers. Her heart is melted in compaſſion towards it, and ſhe gives command that it ſhould be kept and nouriſhed; his ſiſter ſtanding opportunely by, ſayes unto her that ſhe knew where was a good Nurſe that would well acquit her ſelf of that duty, if it pleaſed her Majeſty that ſhe might call her; whereto ſhe having ſhewed ſome inclination, ſhe cauſes the mother to come that nurſed with all ſecurity her dear Infant, which ſhe had expoſed through diffidence.

This little body drawn out of the bundle of ruſhes, is he that God hath choſen to ſhake all Egypt, to overthrow the pride of Pharaoh's, and to draw his people out of Captivity.

The Hebrews were already multiplied exceedingly in the Kingdom of Egypt after the death of Joſeph, in the ſpace of ſixty five years; and began to make themſelves feared of their Maſters. The face of the Realm was changed, and he that was then upon the Throne, was a Prince that remembred not any longer the obligations that the Monarchy had to the Patriarch Joſeph: but blamed the counſels of his Predeceſſours for having permitted a ſtranger-people to have a dwelling in his Kingdom; that ſeeming to him, according to humane Policy, of pernicious conſequence, and thinking that that waxing ſtronger, as it did, every day, might be capable to make an attempt upon the State, or be ſerviceable to thoſe that had a deſign to make a commotion, and to embroil the affairs of the Kingdom. He judged not ill, according to the rules of Polititians; and for that purpoſe, he reſolved with himſelf to abate and to deſtroy them by what means ſoever it was don. The firſt was to conſume them amongſt ſtones and mortar in the ſtructure of thoſe prodigious Pyramids that are to be ſeen in Egypt. The ſecond was to command the Midwives to kill all the Male-children, which they did not execute through the fear which they had of God, and the horrour of that command. This made him adviſe upon a third means, and ordain, that all the Boyes from the day of their birth ſhould be drowned in the River Nile.

But God (that would teach Princes and State-Miniſters; that although one ſhould have in Idea any juſt and lawful deſign: yet one never ought to ſeek to compaſſe it by unjuſt and violent means) permitted not this unhappy Prince that gnawed himſelf with cares and unquietneſe, and tormented his life by ſo many new inventions of malice and of fury, ever to bring about what he had projected; and his ſucceſſour after a thouſand ſcourges, and a thouſand diſaſters of his Kingdom which he ſaw every day fall by pieces before his eys, was buried in the red Sea for drowning thoſe little Infants in the Nile.

The life of one onely man oftentimes coſts him dear that will have it by Revenge; what then do we think that it is to root out a great family, or a whole Nation to ſatisfie one of our appetites? All the veins of thoſe that are perſecuted bend themſelves to reſiſtance, and God (in fine) taking their cauſe in hand overwhelms all humane Policy in a crudity of undigeſted deſigns, and a ſhame to have tryed every thing and to have done nothing, to have exhauſted the ſweat and the blood of the people, the gold and the ſteel of great Kingdoms, all malices and all hell, and to obtain no other thing but a remarkable Confuſion through the weakneſs of ones power.

Seneca ſaid to Nero, that inflicted ſo many deaths by a jealouſie of State, that he killed men to good purpoſe indeed, and that whatſoever endeavour he uſed, he ſhould never put to death his ſucceſſour. When Tyrants torment themſelves without, and ſack ſmoaking cities, and mow off ſo many innocent heads; they have within, that which will deſtroy them. Pharaoh ceaſed not to ſtorm, and to make every day new maſſacres, to cauſe him to periſh that would make an attempt upon his State; and in the mean while his own daughter nouriſhes the moſt capital of his enemies, that was to make his Scepter fly in ſhivers, and bury him in his race under the ruines of his Empire.

Natural Hiſtory hath obſerved a ſtrange thing of the nature of the Helmet-flower, that it is a plant as venomous as poſſible, and that kills all thoſe that eat of it; and yet for all this, there are little flies about that plant which are nouriſhed with it, and (what is admirable) ſerve for an Antidote againſt its poiſon. The Court is a reſidence very prejudicial to Innocence; and that of Pharaoh's was without doubt a School of Murthers and of Maſſacres, rather then an Academy of Honour: and yet God permitted that Moſes ſhould be bred up there; and that without being touched with a venome ſo contagious to virtues, he ſhould give a remedy to thoſe that were offended with it.

He learned all the Arts and all the Wiſdom of the Egyptians; he conſidered all their Policy, all their Artifices, their Arms, their Levies, their Victual, their Souldiers, the Principles of their Government, the Effects, the Succeſſes, the Diſpoſition of King Pharaoh, the Eſteem, the Credit, the Capacity, and the Deſigns of the Great ones of the Court, the Means that had upheld that Monarchy, and the Things that might ruine it. He was reſpected and eſteemed of all, as the true ſon of the Princeſs, which gave him the liberty to know every thing, and to learn the ſecret myſteries of the Empire, not as a ſtranger, but as an originary.

He ſhewed from his infancy ſome glimpſe of the greatneſs and of the power to which God deſtined him, when (according to the report of the Hebrews) being at play one day with the Crown of Pharaoh he threw it on the ground, and trod upon it with his feet, which was eſteemed a very bad preſage, and gave much trouble to the King; but when they would diſcern whether that action proceeded from judgment and from malice, or from chance, they preſented to him on one ſide an apple, and on the other a coal of fire, to ſee to which of the two he would reach his hand; now the childe quitting the fruit, took the fire, as if he would put it to his mouth to eat it. Whereupon the Sages of the Nation informed the King, that there was no reaſon to put to death an Infant, adopted by his daughter, for an action of ſimplicity.

He was then trained up in the exerciſe of Arms, and Joſephus relates, that being come to maturity of age, he was a great warriour; and that the Ethiopians having made an inundation upon the Realm of Egypt with great forces, when the State was very much troubled with them, the King was counſelled by his Oracles to make uſe of an Hebrew Captain to ſtop the courſe of thoſe hoſtilities. The charge of the Army was given to Moſes, who led it with great prudence through places that others judged inacceſſible, and by means of certain Birds which he cauſed to be carried out of Egypt, purged the Country of the Serpents that were wont extremely to annoy the Souldiers. In fine, he chaſed the Ethiopians and ſhut them up within the walls of their City Saba, which he puiſſantly beſieged. The beauty of his countenance furniſhed him with darts and engines to take it, that were ſtronger then fire and ſword. The King's daughter having ſeen him from an high tower as he gave orders for the ſiege, was ſo raviſhed with his valour, that ſhe became paſſionately in love with him, and cauſes him to be ſued unto for Marriage, on which condition ſhe would deliver the City into his hands; which was executed, and the Nuptials followed, which changed the thunders of Warr into the ſongs of Love. The glories that this Conquerour gathered from theſe combats were the ſeeds of an enraged envy which the Egyptians had againſt him, ceaſing not to perſecute his virtue, ſo that he was conſtrained to get him out of Egypt.

Yet it is held that he was at Court till the age of fourty years, without advancing any thing in that great affair of the Deliverance of his people, ſo leiſurely do mighty negotiations proceed, and are like the Planet of Saturn, which being the higheſt is the ſloweſt too. He reſented his bloud, and his originall, and had very much ado to digeſt the rigours that he ſaw continually exerciſed upon his brethren; yet as long as he was at Court his ſpirit ſeemed to be in an eclipſe without producing the vivacity of thoſe fair Lights that God communicated to him in the wilderneſs. The wiſe-men loſt their Star at the Court of Herod; and Moſes was deprived of his high revelations in that of Pharaoh. He was in a condition not to be able any longer to diſſemble the evil of his Nation, and in an impotence to advance the good as he would have done; he made a reſolution to leave that place that was ſo familiar to Crimes and inacceſſible to Virtues. The clamours that he heard, and the miſeries that he ſaw, rent his heart; He could not hold from making an inſolent Egyptian, that tormented one of his brethren feel how much his hand weighed; for having already a ſecret Magiſtracy from God, he killed him and buried him in the ſand.

A few dayes after, as he played the Moderatour between thoſe of his Nation, an impudent fellow roſe up againſt him, and demanded of him the virtue of his Commiſſion, reproaching him with the murder of the Egyptian, which he thought had been very ſecret: yet when he perceived that it was known at Court; and that Pharaoh, that was a ſuſpicious Prince, took jealouſies of his courage and of his ſufficiency, he quitted all the greatneſſes and all the delights of the Palace of that Monarch, chuſing rather to ſuffer with his Brethren, as ſaith Saint Paul: then to taſte any more the ſweetneſſes of a temporal glory. It is an act of prudence to ſteel away from the fury of a wicked Prince, who holds for enemy all that there is of virtuous, and to hide ones ſelf as thoſe Rivers that go a long way under ground without being ſeen of any one, and then unexpectedly produce themſelves, to water the Meadows, to bear boats, to ſerve for a knot to the commerce of men; and to make Iſlands and Beauties for the ornament of Nature. Theſe retirings have been advantageous to many, whom they have hid for a time, with an intention to ſet them afterward in bright day. The fire, which devours every thing, hath no more to do with the aſhes and the rage of Tyrants, that ſwallows up every thing, thinks no more on thoſe that enter while they live (as it were) into the ſepulchre of a life unknown to all the world.

Moſes paſſed from one extremity to another without the middle, when forſaking the Court, after a ſtay of fourty years, he went to range himſelf in the life of ſheepherds, and remained as one loſt in the world, to finde himſelf with God. He withdrew himſelf into the countrey of the Midianites, where he had at firſt approach a pleaſing encounter that made him find a commodious dwelling, and a marriage according to his heart. The ſacred Hiſtory ſayes that Jethro a Prieſt and Sheepherd in that Region had ſent ſeven daughters whereof he was the father, to draw water at a Fountain for their flocks to drink; and that having met with other ſheepherds inſolent enough, that taking a pride to inſult over the infirmity of that ſex, ceaſed not to harry them, and to hinder them from the uſe of an Element that Nature had made to ſlide for the commodity of the publick. Moſes (that had the quality of Plato's Magiſtrate, whom he would have to be zealous and courageous for the defence of Juſtice) could not endure the inſolence of thoſe wicked men, and takes the Maidens part whom he defended againſt oppreſſion with ſo much ſucceſſe, as that he chaſed away their Adverſaries, and gave them free liberty to draw water. For which they thought themſelves very much obliged, and failed not to make a large relation to their father of the courteſie of that Egyptian that had taken them into his protection. Their father received him into his houſe, and took ſo much pleaſure in his converſation, that he gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and allied him to his family by an indiſſoluble amity.

This new Son-in-law accuſtomed himſelf to a country-life, and practiſed the laborious exerciſes of ſheepherds; ſo true it is, that able men bend their ſpirit whether they will, and are good at doing every thing, habituating themſelves to perſons and to places where their lot hath ranged them, bearing equally want and abundance, and ſhewing by their example, that there is no life in the world ſo ſtrange, that may not ſerve for matter to virtue. But without ſpeaking yet of the great ſecrets that God kept hidden in this ordering of Moſes, I finde that it was the means to make a great States-man of him, becauſe that Philoſopher which hath deſerved the title of Divine ſayes, that a good King is nothing elſe but a ſheepherd of a reaſonable flock; and that he ought to take his firſt Rudiments from the manner of ordering ſheep, to ſucceed well in the Government of Kingdoms; that he ought to ſee the tender love, the cares, and the toils of the true ſheepherds, to learn how he ought to demean himſelf towards his Subjects. Moſes had all leiſure to lay thoſe grounds, tarrying as many years in his Country life as he had before paſſed at Court, and ceaſing not to play the Philoſopher, and to contemplate in that great Schole of Nature, where God ſpake to him, and taught him leſſons through the veil of all the Creatures. O how little did the pompous pride of the Pharaoh's then ſeem to him! O how contemptible then did ſeem all thoſe beauties of duſt, and thoſe fortunes of wind that are at Court! His heart dilated it ſelf in the greatneſſes of God, and became every day wiſer then it ſelf.

This long ſolitude having purged him from the impurities of the earth, rendred him capable of the viſits and commerce of God; and the time deſtined to the deliverance of his people being now at hand, as he went along entertaining his thoughts, he was got farr into the Deſart, and perceived that miraculous Buſh all crowned with innocent flames that gave it a delightfull beauty, and the fire that conſumes every thing ſeemed rather to dreſſe then to offend it. God meaning to ſignifie by this the eſtate of his choſen people, for whom the burning coals of perſecution prepared an high luſtre of glory.

Moſes

Moſes charmed with this Viſion draws near, and hears a voice out of the middle of the Buſh that calls him, and having commanded him to put off his ſhooes through reverence, ſpeaks with him, and declares to him its will about the going out of Egypt, which the Iſraelites were to enterpriſe and execute under his command.

To ſpeak truth, this was one of the greateſt Colloquies, and one of the higheſt Diſcourſes that was ever under Heaven, wherein the Sovereign Maſter ſeated upon a Throne of Fire, talked with the moſt excellent man of all Ages touching the means to break the chains of ſix hundred thouſand men, beſides women and little children that groaned under an horrible Captivity, and drowned every day a part of their life in their tears. Moſes that was totally accuſtomed to the ſweetneſs of his ſolitude, refuſed at firſt to be the Negotiatour of a buſineſs of ſo great importance, and to betake himſelf again to the Court of Egypt to treat with Pharaoh, alledging his inability, the incredulity of the people, and the impediment of his ſpeech, to free himſelf from that Embaſſage. But God having aſſured him that he was He that is, that is to ſay, The abſolute Being, the Independent, and the firſt Original of all Eſſences, that would be with him, and would give him for a companion, his brother Aaron, who was eloquent enough; & in fine, having confirmed him by prodigious Miracles that he cauſed to be done in his preſence won him, and made him conſent to his will.

Ariſtotle in the fifth of his Politicks hath ſaid, that of all the things that cauſe the ſubverſions of Kingdoms and of Empires, there was not any more pernicious then Injuſtice and Oppreſſion of the innocent, which may be obſerved clearly in this proceeding. For, behold the ruine of a great Realm procured by the cruelty of the Miniſters of Pharaoh, who by his conſent and orders turmoiled inceſſantly a people, miſerable and afflicted, above all meaſure. Their piercing clamours, ſo many times redoubled, clave the clouds, and were carried by the Angels even up to the Heaven of heavens, repreſented before the Throne of the living God with ſo much force and vigour, as they made tender the bowels of the God of mercy, that deſcends, and ſpeaks athwart the Flames and Thrones to bring about their ſafety.

Moſes and Aaron failed not to diſcover themſelves to the moſt eminent of the choſen people concerning the Counſel that God had taken of their liberty; whereat they were at firſt ſo joyed, that they proſtrated themſelves on the earth through reſpect, adoring the divine Goodneſs that carried himſelf with ſo much love to the caſing of their miſery: but when this buſineſs proved thorny and full of obſtacles, their courage failed them, and had almoſt as live crouch in their Servitude, as buy their Liberty at the priſe of reaſonable pain. Yet Moſes, accompanied with his brother, courageouſly tranſports himſelf to Pharaoh's Palace, ſpeaks to him with a generous liberty from the living God, and declares to him his Commands, which were, to diſmiſs his people, and let them go out of Egypt to ſacrifice in the wilderneſs.

He that reigned at that time was one Pharaoh Cenchris, an haughty and inſolent Prince, who having never heard any ſuch language, ſaid, That he knew not that God, that intermeddled to make him ſuch Commands; and that he was fully reſolved not to let go the prey which he held in his hands; that all theſe diſcourſes of Sacrifices and of Devotions proceeded from nothing but a pure idleneſs fatal to the Jewiſh people; and that he would give them ſo much exerciſe, that they ſhould not have the leiſure to dream on ſuch fancies. And, in effect, he commanded the Commiſſaries that preſided over the labour of thoſe poor ſlaves, to redouble their Pains and augment their Burdens, The ſtraw that was furniſhed them before to make the brick, taken from them; they were conſtrained to ſeek for it where they could, and yet for all this the number of their bricks which they were bound to render every day was not diminiſhed. And though this was a thing impoſſible for them, yet muſt they expect rods and baſtonado's, and all imaginable rigours. This made a great noiſe amongſt the People, which began already to murmur againſt Moſes and Aaron, blaming their enterpriſe, and complaining that they would ſet them at liberty.

It is a moſt ordinary thing in all great affairs; there are ſpirits that are like thoſe watry clouds that never carry lightning, ſo cannot they ever conceive any thing that is vigorous: they would have good things, but they would have them looſely, and would willingly deſire that Nature ſhould renew for them the favours of the Terreſtrial Paradiſe, and ſhould give them roſes that ſhould never be compaſſed about with thorns. But as one ought not to be raſh and violent to puſh forward buſineſſes out of a giddy humour, ſo ought one not to be ſlack and effeminate in letting thoſe alone that oblige us by conſcience and by duty. Moſes deſiſts not for all this, but takes a ſtout reſolution to advance the work of God, even to the Point whether Providence would have it come. He had on one ſide men to combat with, that reſiſted their own good: and on the other, an impious, obſtinate, and cruel Prince: he gains the one by reaſons and by ſweetneſs, he brings down the other by threats & prodigies.

One may here manifeſtly ſee the paths that God hath trodden in the puniſhment of Pharaoh, when he would abandon a King or a great man for his demerits, and ſacrifice him to his Juſtice, letting him fall into a reprobate ſenſe, which is the laſt ſtep that one makes to enter into Hell. He permits him (to ſatiate an Ambition or a Revenge) to entangle himſelf in ſome great deſign under the pretence of Juſtice and of Honour; and foraſmuch as he is extremely thirſty after the greatneſs of the earth, puts him upon a pinacle in the higheſt dignities and the moſt magnificent negotiations, leaves him to himſelf, and to the wiſhes of his own heart; and although he be vicious, gives him great ſucceſſes and incomparable proſperitie that puff up his heart, and make him preſume upon his own conduct. He takes from him the taſte of Divine things, letting him ſlide into a contempt of the holy Word, and of all the admonitions that one can give him about his ſafety. If ſhe hath any faithful Counſellour, he puts him out, and ſubſtitutes in his place flatterers and inchaunters. If there come any ſcourge from heaven to overwhelm him, he is made believe that it is but a natural thing, and ordinary enough, and that he ought not to trouble himſelf about ſuch a buſineſs. If he be ſenſible of any evil that affrights him, men endeavour ſuddenly to ſcatter it, and to make him underſtand that that is not the wrath of God, but an order of Nature; and that he may mock at the tempeſt as ſoon as the calm returns.

All this is made viſible in this miſerable Prince. A great Kingdom, great Ambitions, Revenges hereditary againſt the choſen People, an immoveable deſign to root them out, a contempt of God, ſucceſſe in his vengeances, and ſome ſatisfaction of ſpirit by the pains of thoſe miſerable ones, Moſes baffled, the Flatterers harkned to, the Magicians adored, the Plagues of Heaven turned into laughters as ſoon as they were paſſed, an heart (at laſt) hardned by its own malice, and not by the work of God who doth no more make ſin, then the Sun makes the night. Moſes endeavours firſt to gain him by the force of reaſons, and by the ſweetneſs of words; whereto, when he ſhewed reſiſtance, he employed Miracles for the proof of his Commiſſion, which the King cauſed to be counterfeited by his Magicians, oppoſing the Shadow to the Light, and a Lie to Truth.

After which, the wrath of Heaven cauſed thoſe ten Plagues, related in Exodus, ſucceſſively to rain upon him. For that unfortunate Prince ſaw firſt of all the River of Nile all in blood, as if it had demanded Vengeance of God for thoſe little Innocents that had been caſt into it. He ſaw Frogs that came out of the ſame Stream by an impetuous ebullition, in ſuch a manner, as that they covered all the fields, entred into the houſes, filled the tables, mounted upon the beds, and gave horrour and torments to all Egypt. He ſaw thick clouds of Gnats, that were raiſed all on a ſudden, caſting themſelves upon the Cattel and upon the men, with ſo irkſome a trouble that their life was full of bitterneſs. He ſaw after that, armies of all ſorts of Flies, ſo different in their kind, ſo violent in their aſſaults, and ſo pernicious in their effects, that they defiled every thing with their venom. He ſaw a furious mortality of Beaſts, that fell every moment, and infected the Air by their corruption. He ſaw the bodies of his Subjects all laden with Ulcers, wherewith the Magicians themſelves, in puniſhment of their crimes were covered in ſuch a faſhion as that they could ſtand no longer in the preſence of their King. He ſaw the moſt horrible Hail fall from Heaven, that ſince Egypt was in being, there was never ſeen the like; for it ſuſtain'd it ſelf upon the wings of the Lightning, and the Fire and Ice agreed extraordinarily together for the puniſhment of thoſe perfidious men. He ſaw legions of Graſhoppers that made an inundation upon the champains, and made havock of the plants, finiſhing to deſtroy that which the Hail had begun. In fine, all Egypt was covered with thoſe palpable Darkneſſes that laſted for the ſpace of three dayes, during which, the Egyptians remained as bound with the inviſible chains of a night without repoſe, which had nothing better in it then to take from them the ſight of their diſaſter.

But that which terrified them above all the plagues was when the deſtroying Angel entring at midnight into all their houſes killed the firſt-born from the childe of the Millers wife, to the Kings ſon, and there was not an houſe wherein the firſt bloſſom of the Family was not lopped off by the pittileſs hook of Death. The fathers were touched with a ſtupid grief, the diſheveld mothers threw themſelves down upon the bodies of their infants, to gather from their mouths the remainders of their life: the whole family ſent out howlings rather then complaints, and the evil was ſo univerſal, and ſo preſſing, that that their was neither conſolation, nor remedy. Pharaoh ſighed at every Plague, and ſeemed to be willing to turn to God, but as ſoon as he had the leſt releaſe, he returned to his obſtinacy, which was a mark of a Reprobate ſoul. Yet his ſubjects ſenſibly touched with the laſt accident, urged the Hebrews to be gone, & would no longer oppoſe the counſels of God.

The day of departure is taken, and the ſix hundred thouſand combatants, with an innumerable number of women and little children, after the ceremony of the Paſchal Lamb, travel to the red-Sea loaden with Gold, with Silver, with ſuits of Apparel and with all the richeſt Spoils of Egypt. The pillar of Cloud and of Fire marched before them in the head of the Army, to give ſignal to the twelve Tribes that beheld it viſibly on all parts. Notice is given in the mean time to King Pharaoh, that thoſe fugitives were already ſtoln away, and gone enriched with the treaſures of his People. And although he had given ſome kind of conſent to their going, yet he enters again into his furies, aſſembles his light-Chariots, and all the flouriſhing Legions of Egypt to purſue the Iſraelites. They failed not to overtake them quickly upon the Sea-ſhore, ſo that the two Armies were in view of one another. The one of which was filled with a great number of people badly prepared at that time for a combat, valour forſaking their heart, and their hands ready to throw away their arms; The other was compoſed of ſprightful and well trained Regiments, to whom choler and the hope of booty gave a new vigour. The glittering of the Arms, the Clouds of duſt that were raiſed, the ſhouts of the Souldiers, mingled with the neighing of Horſes, gave mortal ſtroaks to the hearts of that poor multitude which had now no other thought but to die murmuring, and to revenge their death on Moſes by their murmures.

Alas, ſaid they, What! were there no Graves in Egypt to bury our lives and miſeries, without leading us into the Wilderneſs to deliver us for a prey to the ſword of the Egyptians, and to the Birds of rapine? Did we not ſay well, that we ſhould have ſtay'd peaceably in the bondage wherein God had ranged us, without making theſe great proviſions, and ſhutting our ſelves all up as in a net, to deliver our ſelves to the diſcretion of our enemies? we have the Sea on one ſide, and on the other our incenſed Maſters that breath nothing but fire and blood: on which hand ſoever we go, we ſee nothing but images of death & infallible marks of the miſeries that threatens us.

All the Army was filled with fear, and the ſighs of the Wives and of the Children abated the courage of the Fathers and of the Husbands, who expected nothing any more but to be the ſubject of an horrible butchery. But the generous Moſes, although he had an heart pierc'd with grief to hear their blaſphemies, ran through the ranks of the army, encourag'd the Captains, animated the People, & as long as he had any voice or breath cried without ceaſing, Courage, my friend, ye are here aſſembl'd to ſee the wonders of the God of Hoſts: behold the onely, without troubling your ſelves, and God ſhall fight for you. See and conſider thoſe brave Egyptians your perſecutours, and believe that it is the laſt time that you ſhall ſee them, for they ſhall be no more. And after he had ſaid this, he ſpake to God with a ſilence that ſurpaſſed all clamours, and therefore God anſwered him, What haſt thou to do any more to cry thus after me? Lift up thy Rod, ſtretch forth thine hand, divide the floats of the Sea, and make thine Army march through the fair middle on dry foot. This was executed, and all that great people of the Iſraelites (animated by the ſpirit of God, and the voice of Moſes that marched in the head of them) deſcended with a firme footing and a ſecure countenance into thoſe Abyſſes where the water of the Sea retiring it ſelf apart made them ramparts of Chryſtal on each ſide, and diſcovered to them in the middle a path that the hand of God ſeemed to have laid with Tapistry for to make them passage. The pillar of fire that was planted in the midst of the two Armies furnished them with unparaleld lights to manifest the works of God, and on that side which looked towards the Egyptians it was horrible and dark, bearing already the presages of the funerals that attended them. The Angel of God shut up in this engine of fire, darted out Thunder-striking looks upon the Diadem of Pharaoh, and upon all those that encompassed him. Their courage failed them, and nothing now was left them but a rage yet fuming after blood. They threw themselves desperately into the Sea which they promised themselves to pass over on dry foot as advantageously as their adversaries. But the waters returning into their bed, with an impetuous course invelop'd those miserable men, there was nothing now but a confusion of men and horses, of Arms and Chariots, of bodies pestering one another, that disputed their life with the waves, and died expiring out the remainders of their fury. Pharaoh the King was drowned, the assistance of his Captains had not the strength to save him whom the hand of God would destroy. Nothing was to be seen but Bucklers and Turbants floating upon the water, and death painted in a thousand faces that made a mervellous booty. The Israelites being in an extasie at these wonders, thundred out a song in the praise of God that hath since ravished the heart and ear of all Ages.

After that Moses had drawn his people out of the captivity of Egypt, he imitated God that did not make so fair a world to abandon it, but governs it by a secret providence that insinuates it self into all the parties of the Universe. So this great Legislatour employed all his cares to the conduct of this great multitude, to which his presence produced the same effect as the infusion of the soul into the body. The chief and most ordinary pains that he took was to appease the murmures and seditions that were born at every season, and sometimes for very light occasions. But the greatest part was for the belly to which hunger gives a greedines, and the law gives no ears. When amidst the Desarts of Arabia, where they journied, they felt any mitigation in their pain, Moses was a man incomparable: but as soon as water and bred failed them, he was no more their friend, they longed inceassantly after the fleshpots of Egypt, and stirred up furious tempests.

We see examples of this in all Polities, Empires, and Republicks, where all those things that assault the life of the people make them send forth great cries, run to stones and steel, and tear men into little shreds. Those that would reign peaceably, think more of gaining the hearts of their subjects then the money, and take a wonderful order that the inferiour people may have wherewith to nourish and maintain themselves in mean commodities and all that is absolutely necessary to life. Augustus Cæsar, the wisest of the Roman Emperours, had so particular a care to provide for the City of Rome, that when he saw it threatned by any Famine, he would be like to die; and he took more pleasure to hear the poor Mechanicks commending his paternal sweetnes, and the happines of his time, then to behold Colossus's and Arches of triumphs erected in his name. Those that take a way quite contrary say, Let Clown grumble, and let Clown pay, that one ought little to care for the complaints and murmurings of a disarmed Communalty. They fill every place with menaces and with terrours; they authorise themselves by a great force of arms, seeing well that they cannot arrive to what they would have, by love. But besides that this fashion of governing provokes God which is the father of the poor, and the comforter of the afflicted; It cannot subsist but by a great violence which cannot continue long either in nature, or in a civil life.

Moses took nothing from this people, to whom it was an injury in their opinion, to give nothing. It seemed as if he bore them all in his entrails, and that he was to nourish them as a mother; If he came to fail in it, they forgat all the benefits of the time past, and ceased not to grumble and murmur at the present. He had need have had the Magazins of God himself, to satisfie them in a Desart, where there was little to live, and much to suffer. So also the Divine goodnes was never wanting to them in their necessities; and this milde conductour, that made it his glory to overwhelme these ungrateful men with benefits, opened by his prayers the gates of heaven to cause Manna to be rained down for them. It is formed in the dew, when the subtler parts of the Earth mix themselves with the moisture, and when all this composition is purified and baked by the heat of the Sun to a convenient temper. It happens in certain places with profit enough, but if the blessing of God had not given an extraordinary virtue to this food, it was a Diet too dainty for hungry stomachs.

So were they weary of it, and defired flesh, crying with ful mouth, and forcing a man that had nothing, to do miracles to content their sensuality. This great conductour that pitied their necessities, and was not willing to destroy them, pacified them by a fashion full of modesty, a powerful speech, sweet promises and good performances, by making himself a Mediatour to God to obtain favours for them, when they merited punishments. They saw clouds of Quailes fall down upon the Army which God sent them very opportunely, but he failed not to punish afterward their intemperance by sudden deaths, and Sepulchers raised in the Wilderness that bore a long time the name of their concupiscence.

Another time as they were in great want of water, and made a great tumult for the thirst that tormented them, Moses assisted by the Divine power, opened the flanks of the Rocks, and made fountains to issue forth of them, that quenched the thirst of the whole Army. Their distrust caused the greatest part of their evils; and if they had nothing capable to afflict them, they themselves framed Spectrums of terrour to themselves, and found their torments in their own imaginations.

Above all, they exceedingly feared themselves at the return of the Spies from the land of Promise; a false Rumour being sowed in the Army, that it was a Land that devoured its inhabitants, and that it was inhabited by Giants of so prodigious an heighth, that other men being compared to them appeared no more then Grashoppers. Then they entred into strange fumes, crying all aloud, that they ought rather to create a General to lead them back to Egypt, then to go and sacrifice their wives and children unto Monsters. Moses and Aaron thinking themselves not able to appease that furious storm of words humbled themselves before them, & remained prostrated on the earth, while Joshua and Caleb renting their clothes, for the horrour that they had of that sedition, assured them that report was false, that the Land of Promise was very good, that it flowed all in Milk and Hony, and that by the help of God they would possess it, and over-master the the Originaries which they would eat as bread. Notwithstanding all this they had run to stones, if God had not appeared in that high lustre of his glory, and threatned to consume them all by a general pestilence: but Moses laboured earnestly both with voice and prayers to appease the wrath of God, who punished at last the Rebels by the privation of the Land of Promise which they had spoken against with so much extravagancy.

These murmures that proceeded from fear and weakness of courage seemed more sufferable then those that came from pride and malice, as the sedition of Corah, Dathan, Abiram, which made an horrible havock. These men followed with two hundred and fifty of the Princes of the Synagogue, rebelled against Moses and Aaron, usurping the Censer, and publishing aloud that all the people was consecrated as well as they, and that they did wrong to claim to themselves an Empire over their brethren that belonged not to them: that that which had made them press this going out of Egypt, was nothing but an ambition that carried them to domineer over free-men, and that they exercised so great a tyranny over their subjects, that there remained nothing more but to pluck out theireys. Moses very much astonished at such insolent language prostrated himself with his face on the earth, referring to God the decision of the controversie, and urged them to appear the morrow after to offer Incense, and to see how God would like their offering.

The Anti-Priests failed not to be at the door of the Tabernacle with their Censers in their hands to make a combination apart, and to oppose the Pontificate of Aaron. But the living God that authorises the true High Priests, appeared upon the Tabernacle after a terrible and threatning manner. The people that environed the Mutineers suddenly separated themselves at the voice of Moses: the earth opens it self under the feet of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, to swallow them up alive with their Pavillions and all their riches. The others were devoured by fire from heaven visibly with an extreme affright of the whole Army: and forasmuch as their remained some Rebels that mourned for the dead, and inflamed the division, the hand of God yet smoaking over their heads was ready utterly to destroy them, had not Moses prostrated himself before the Tabernacle praying for them; and had not Aaron holding the Censer, and beseeching the Divine Majesty between the living and the dead, appeased the wrath of Heaven. But the punishment of these miserable men left much terrour in the souls of the people, and an example of perpetual memory to all those that resist the Powers that are lawfully established by God.

There were Combats at home and abroad; for the Amalekites, a salvage Nation descended from Esau's children, endeavoured to beat back the people of God, and gave them battel, which Moses accepted, and making Joshua General of the Army, contented himself to go to the top of the Mountain to pray to the God of the living, and to obtain the Victory. His prayers were darts of fire shot upon the Enemies; for as long as he kept his arms lifted up to God in prayer, the Israelites had the better: but if he slacked them never so little, they had the worst, which made Hur and Aaron hold up his arms to prevent a weariness in them, and by this means he desisted not till such time as the Adversaries covered with their dead bodies all the field of battel. Now because this great People would have been but a confused mass, had they remained without law and without polity, which is the soul of Assemblies: Moses was powerfully inspired by God to make laws, as well those that concerned Religion, as others that regarded the Civil. The Philosophers assure us, that every thing that lives in Nature, lives by the Light, and that all Life is nothing else but Light, which spreads it self into the whole Universe, and not content to gild it with its brightness, communicates to it quickning Spirits and secret influences which make all the productions in the bosom of Matter: That which the Light doth in the natural World, the Law imitates in the Civil. It is a participation of the first Reason of the Ordination and Providence Divine, which insinuates its self into the mass of Mankind, embellishes it with its splendours, and unites it in the point of Felicity, by invisible chains of love and obedience.

God's Reason is the Sovereign Law which resides in the Divine understanding, in the treasures of his Wisdom, and is as the Primum Mobile of all the regulated motions of the intellectual Nature. Plato says, That the World following that rule keeps an equal path, with all the fitness, and all the measures requisite to its preservation. But as soon as it departs from it, it falls of necessity into great disorders, which cannot be surmounted but by the Divine Ordination that recals Nature to the point of its Felicity. And because the Eternal Law is so high and so sublime that it surpasses all our thoughts God has caused a Rivulet to flow from that source, which is the Law of Nature, a true light of right Reason imprinted in the understanding of all men. But it being so often darkned by the black vapours of the animal Passions, there was a necessity of humane Laws and Magistrates to put them in execution, by the punishment of the wicked, and the recompensing of the good. God gave then a strong inspiration to Moses to prescribe precepts and Rules to his People, that have been admired by all nations.

The Manichees by the relation of S. Augustine, rejected the Law of Moses, as wicked and tyrannical; but in this they have been condemned by the Church: for there is no doubt but that (having been given by God that is the Father of all Goodness) it was good and profitable to keep the Jews as under a Pedagogy till the Grace of the Gospel. And S. Paul himself in the Epistle to the Romans, where he seems to go about to destroy it, calls it for all that Holy, Just, and Good: But if ye compare it to the Law of Grace, ye shall find it harsh and imperfect. The Mosaical Law, saith that great Doctor, contains Commands, but, that Jesus gives assistance; the one bestows light to know, the other strength to execute. In the ancient Law God says, Do what I command thee. In the new Law we say to God, Give what thou commandest. Moses divided that ancient Law into three parts; the first of which contained the Moral, and was included in the Decalogue: the second comprehended what ever belonged to Ceremonies, and was called Ceremonial: the third regarded Justice between party and party, and was Judicial. The first teaches how a man ought to carry himself with God and his Neighbour to obtain salvation. The second Treats of the Temple, of the Synagogue, of the High Priest, of the Priests, of the Levites, of the Prophets, of the Votaries, Nazarites, and Rechabites. It deciphers the instruments of God's Worship, as are the Tabernacle, the Ark of Covenant, the Propiciatory, the Table of Shew-bread, the Altar of the Perfumes, and of the Burnt-offerings. It prescribes the order of the Sacrifices, and of the Sacraments, of the divers obſervations of Vows, of Faſts, of Feaſts, of Jubilees, of ſhavings, of Habits. The third part ſpeaks of Kings, of War, of Peace, of Marriages, of Polygamy, of Divorce, of Crimes, of Theft, of Uſury, of Adultery, of Policy, of Men-ſervants, of Maid-ſervants, of Hirelings, of Strangers, and of the Poor. All this is read yet to this day in the Pentateuch, and is ſufficiently expounded by ſo many Interpreters of Scripture. It would be an infinite, tedious, and unprofitable buſineſs to go about to decipher it here peece-meal. Let us content our ſelves that as the Morning dies by bringing forth the Day, ſo the Law is expired by producing the light of the Goſpel.

Moſes undertook not ſo great a work by humane ſtrength, and truſted not to himſelf in ſo high an enterpriſe, God would conduct it with his Authority, and cauſed the people to be commanded to purifie themſelves, and to ſtand ready on the third day to hear his will. That day being come, from the morning were heard great Thunders, and abundance of Lightnings ſeen that iſſued out of thick Clouds at the ſound of an affrightful Trumpet that ſeized all the people with aſtoniſhment. They removed themſelves according to the Orders of their Legiſlatour to the foot of the Mountain Sinai, with a prohibition to paſs further. All the Mountain ſmoaked as a great Fornace, by reaſon that God was deſcended thither all in fire, which made it extreme terrible. But Moſes, his dear favourite aſcended to the higheſt top amidſt the fires, the darkneſſes and the flames in that Luminous obſcurity, where God preſided that ſpake to him face to face as to his moſt intimate confident. After all, that thundering voice of the Living God was heard that pronounced his Decrees and his Laws in that Chamber of Juſtice hung with fire and lights that trembled under the foot-ſteps of his Majeſty. All this Law was ſet down in writing with a moſt exact care, and is yet read every day in the five Books of the Law.

Now, Religion being the Baſis of all Policy, without which great Kingdoms are but great Robbings; This wiſe Law-giver applied his whole care and travel to the rooting out of Idolatry, and to the cauſing of the Adorable Majeſty of God to be acknowledged in the condition of a worſhip truly Monarchical, and incommunicable to any other; as appears in the puniſhment which he inflicted on thoſe that had worſhipped the golden Calf.

For the Scripture ſaith, that when the Iſraelites perceived that Moſes tarried a long time on the Mountain of Sinai in thoſe amiable Colloquies that he had with God, they grew weary of it, and ſaid to the High-Prieſt Aaron, that ſince that man that had brought them out of Egypt was loſt, they ought to dream no more of him, but make in his place Gods that ſhould march in the head of their Army. Aaron, that perhaps had a mind to make them loſe the reliſh of that deſign by the price to which it would amount, demanded of them the Pendents of the ears of their Wives and of their Children, to go to work about it; but their madneſs was ſo great that they deveſted themſelves freely of all that they had moſt precious, to make a God to their own phanſie. Aaron accommodating himſelf to their humour through a great weakneſs, made them a Statue that had ſome reſemblance of the Ox Apis that was adored in Egypt. As ſoon as they had perceived it, they began to cry, Courage, Iſrael, behold the God that hath drawn thee out of the ſlavery of Egypt. Aaron accompanied him with an Altar, and cauſed a ſolemn Feaſt to be bidden for the morrow after, at which the people failed not to be preſent, offering many ſacrifices, making good cheer, and dancing about that Idol. God advertiſed Moſes of that diſorder, and commanded him to deſcend ſuddenly from the Mountain to remedy it; although he intended to deſtroy them: and had done it, had he not been appeaſed by the moſt humble Remonſtrances and Supplications of his ſervant. He failed not to betake himſelf ſpeedily to the Camp, where he ſaw that Abomination and the Dances that were made about it, which inflamed him ſo much with Choler, that he brake the Tables of the Law written by the hand of God, thinking that ſuch a preſent was not ſeaſonable for Idolaters and Drunkards. He rebuked Aaron ſharply, who excuſed himſelf coldly enough; and not intending that ſo abominable a crime ſhould paſs without an exemplary puniſhment, He took the Golden Calf, and beat it into duſt, which he ſteeped in water, to make all thoſe drink of it that had defiled themſelves with that ſacriledge; and to make them underſtand that ſin that ſeems at firſt to have ſome ſweetneſs is extremely bitter in its effects.

After which he commanded that all thoſe that would be on Gods ſide ſhould follow him, and the Tribe of Levi, as being the moſt intereſſed, failed not to joyn with him; whereupon ſeeing them all well animated, he gave them order to paſs through all the Camp, from one door to the other, with their ſwords in their hands, and to ſlay all that they met, without ſparing their neareſt kindred. This was executed, and all the Army was immediately filled with Maſſacres; Rivers of bloud ran on all ſides, accompanied with the ſad howlings of a ſcared multitude that expected every minute the ſtroke of death. God would have that this ſo ſevere a puniſhment be executed upo thoſe miſerable men to cauſe an eternal horrour of Idolatry which is the moſt capital of all ſins. And to retain the worſhip of God, a thouſand pretty Ceremonies were practiſed after the ſtructure of the Tabernacle of the Ark of the Covenant, of the Table of the Shew-bread, of the Altars, and after, the inſtitution of the Pontifical habits, of the Offerings and of the Sacrifices that were celebrated with much order and a ſingular Majeſty.

Moſes alſo was indefatigable in rendring Juſtice, ſitting from the morning till the night on his Tribunal to hear the requeſts of all the particular men that came to him; which Jethro his father in law, that was come to viſit him, having perceived, ſaid to him that it was impoſſible for him to be long able to undergo ſo troubleſome a labour; and that he ought to chooſe amongſt all the people ſome puiſſant men, fearing God, true; and enemies of covetouſneſs to adminiſter Juſtice; and that it would be ſufficient to reſerve to himſelf the controverſies that ſhould be of greateſt importance. Moſes believed his counſel, and eſtabliſhed an handſom order for the deciſion of the differences that ſhould ariſe amongſt the people. He paſſed fourty years in the wilderneſs in divers habitations, partly in war againſt the enemies, partly in preſerving peace amongſt his people, and confirming all the Laws which he eſtabliſhed by the command of God. In this exerciſe he lived to the age of an hundred and twenty years, ſeparated himſelf from all things of the world, and was ſo united to God, that it ſeemed that even his Body it ſelf paſſed into the nature and condition of an immortal Spirit. In fine, God having ſhewed him upon the Mountain Nebo

all

all the Land of Promiſe which he had got to by ſo many good counſels and ſo much pains, he dyed in that view without entring into it; was mourned for thirty dayes by the Iſraelites, and interred of ſet purpoſe in a ſepulcher unknown to the eys of men, for fear leſt he ſhould give an occaſion of ſome Idolatry to that people that would have held him for a Deity.

Never had man a Birth more forlorn, a Life more various, or a Death more glorious: of an expoſed Infant, he became a Kings ſon, of a Kings ſon an Exile, of an Exile a Sheepherd, of a Sheepherd a Captain, of a Captain a Prophet, of a Prophet a Law-giver, of a Law-giver a Sovereign; the God of Kings, and the King of all the Prophets: Active at Court, Devout in Solitude, Victorious in War, Happy in Peace, Wiſe in Laws, Terrible in his Arms, a man of Prodigies, that opened Seas, Manured Wildernesſes, Commanded things Senſible and Inſenſible, and exerciſed an Empire on all Nature. He was Indefatigable in his Travels, Zealous for the honour of God, diſobliged from his own intereſt in the puniſhment of the Sacrilegious, Patient in his own Injuries, Familiar to few, Courteous to all; a Companion of Angels, the Favourite of God, of a Life very long, and of a Memory that ſhall have no end.

SAMUEL. DANIEL.

Samuel that ſeemed to have been born for nothing but to pray, and to paſs away his life in the Tabernacle of God, got very forward at Court, and in the managing of the great affairs of State. His Birth is a Miracle, his Life an Example, and his Death the immortality of his virtues. He was one of thoſe infants that are expected a long time before they come, that are the ſons of ſo many vowes, and that pay the expectation of their Nativity by the happineſs of their life. It belongs onely to great things to be ſeen before they are, by preſages, by deſires, by hopes, and to make themſelves be ſeen, after they are no more, by an eternal memory.

Hannah his mother barren in children, but fruitful in virtues, conceived him rather by her ſighs, then by her pleaſures. He was a gift of the Tabernacle which ſhe rendred to the Tabernacle; and as ſhe had obtained him by ſupplication, ſhe made of him a man of prayer, devoted from his infancy to the Divine Miniſteries, and a Nazarite by expreſs vow which lived in abſtinence, and had no other profeſſion but contemplation. It is by theſe exerciſes that God raiſes great Perſonages, and we cannot chooſe but expect brave actions on earth, from a man that hath much commerce with heaven.

So God began betimes to communicate himſelf to him, and to make him partaker of his ſecrets. He informed him of the deſtruction of his Maſter, Eli the High-Prieſt, and powerfully fitted him for his Service. This Eli was a reverend old man, a Judge of the People, that had lived in an high reputation and great glory amongſt the Iſraelites, but his reign being too ſoft, his children that were now great, abuſing his authority, practiſed a petty Larceny even as far as unto the Sacrifice it ſelf, and committed impurities and debaucheries of women; which are moſt ordinarily two of the chiefeſt things that make a change of Government, there being nothing that doth more exaſperate the ſubject, then the avarice and the luxury of thoſe that rule; the one making attempts upon their goods, and the other upon their bed. A grave father of the Church addreſſing a ſpiritual direction to a Governour, admoniſhes him, That it is not enough for him to be innocent, if all his family doth not imitate him, and form themſelves according to his examples; for, what profit is it, ſayes he, to a miſerable people to have a Prince or Governour wiſe and moderate, if, while he abſtains from things not permitted, there be one of his ſervants that making uſe of his name and power takes occaſion to ſatiate his Avarice?

Theſe wicked ſons of Eli, Hophni and Phineas committed a thouſand extortions under the authority of their father, and diſhonoured his gray hairs by the incontinence of their diſſolute youth. The complaints thereof came to their Father's ears, but instead of depriving them of their Offices and Commissions which they held of him, which would have been a means to wash away the stain that was imprinted on his renown, he contented himself with giving them a weak admonition, which having little force upon their pasions, had yet less effect upon their actions.

God then took the business in hand after a very strange manner: for the Philistims the sworn Enemies of the chosen people ran upon their Frontiers, and put an Army into the field, which obliged the Israelites to arm, to hinder the wast that they made; but being come to the encounter they lost the battel, wherein four thousand men were slain upon the place. The conquered people resuming heart and arms, set on foot an huge Army that marched under the wings of the Ark of Covenant conducted by Hophni and Phineas to whom it appertained by office. But these debauched men, and ill-train'd for War, rather precipitated then gave a second Battel, and did their businesses in it so ill, that thirty thousand men were cut in pieces, and they themselves increased the number of the dead, and were both slain in defence of the Ark, that was taken and carried away by the Philistims.

This deplorable news being come to the ears of Eli, gave him such a confusion of spirit, that he let himself fall, and died upon the place mourning for the Ark of Covenant above his own children. His house fell into great contempt after his death, as had been foretold him, and none of his Race came to old-age, the hand of God not ceasing to revenge the Injuries of his Tabernacle, and of his people, to instruct great ones that are in offices to look carefully to this, that Religion and Justice, as two sisters, by an indissolvable knot be kept fast to one another.

The Affairs of the Jews were in a piteous estate after the loss of those two Battels, and there was need of a puissant hand to repair those losses. But the Sovereign Master lent his thereto, and raised up Samuel to settle again all that the furies of the wars had shaken. This good Pilot consecrated himself by a Tempest, and took the Government when every rational man would have thought of quitting it. This was a sign that he entred into it by ways very clean, coming in a time when there was more matter for compassion then ambition. He had no other love, but that of the publick good; he knew no other Avarice, but that of time; nor other pleasures, but businesses. His first aim in the Government was to banish Idolatry, and to put in vigour again the Worship of the true God, well knowing that the most fatal plagues of States come from the contempt of Religion. He was a man of order, of a great understanding, and of a powerful speech that never fell to the ground. He caused ordinarily whatsoever he had a mind to establish surest, to pass General Assemblies; that what concerned the good of every man might be done by the advice of all the World.

One of the first functions that he exercised was to make an excellent Oration to the people, and to tell them of their infidelity, making them see, That God's forsaking them came from that they had forsaken God; and that if they would enjoy the favours of his protection, as their Fathers did, they ought necessarily to banish the strange gods, and to abolish eternally the names of Baal and Astaroth to whom many amongst them had devoted themselves; that God the Sovereign Master could not endure any companion in his Throne, & would not have to do with hearts divided to imaginary Deities; That if they served him faithfully, he hoped that he would deliver them from the hand of the Philistims, and would exalt again the glory of their Nation that had been brought low by so many ill Encounters and extream lamentable losses.

He perswaded the whole Assembly so powerfully by the force and sweetness of his discourse, that all those that had been defiled with those bad beliefs, abjured their superstitions, and made a strong resolution to serve no more any, but the living God, and to bury all their Idols in the Grave of forgetfulness. Whereto Samuel seeing them disposed, called together the States-General into a place named Mispah, where he promised to make very solemn prayers for all his Nation. The people failed not to be there in great number, and with a singular devotion, drawing water, and pouring it out as in the presence of God, whether it was a fashion of purification among the Hebrews, or whether by this Ceremony they would represent the vanity and weakness of all men, that are before God as little drops of water spread upon the earth, and that have no true contentment but in God alone who is the Fountain of all good things, They disposed themselves to receive the mercy of God by a publick fast and a repentance of their faults, confessing aloud their ingratitude to God. Samuel comforted them, and having reconciled them to God again, united them among themselves by a mutual concord, deciding their differences, and judging their Law-suits in the place fore-named with so much equity, that all the people thought that the golden Age was raised again under his Government.

But the Philistims that would perpetually bring them down, having intelligence that they made Assemblies in Mispah, which turned to their prejudice, drew themselves again into the field to fight them; whereat the people that had already experimented the disasters that proceeded from such hostilities, was seized with a great astonishment, and implored the aid of Samuel to secure them from the fury of their adversaries. This made him have a particular refuge to the goodness of God, whom he invoked by his ardent prayers, and by the sutable Sacrifices which he offered, being a Priest by an extraordinary mission of God. The Israelites encouraged by their Protectour, bestir themselves to resist their enemies, and combat them with firm footing not without great success. For by good luck it happened that at the same time that the battel was given, Samuel was presenting to God a burnt offering for the whole Army, which was so worthily accepted, that the Trumpet of Heaven sounded aloud in great thunderings and menacing lightnings that affrighted the Philistims and put them into a rout, which drew the inhabitants of Mispah to the glory of the Combat, and joyning their troops with those that had gone before them, defeated the Army of the Philistims, and took from them the desire of hazarding another Battel.

Samuel took his time very opportunely, and seeing them in such a disposition, hearkned to an honorable peace which he made, by recovering the Cities which the Philistims had usurped in those great advantages of their Arms. This was a most wise counsel, and worthy of that great States-man that knew by experience that the Nation of the Philistims was stirring and quarrelsom as much as possible; and that his had need of rest to shut up the wound that so many stranger-wars had opened.

Further,

Further, he conſidered that the worſhip of the true God periſhed and loſt much of its luſtre by continual wars that rendred his Subjects leſs docile in things Divine; and that the Licence of Arms ſtifled the Laws and actions of Juſtice. In fine he had regard unto himſelf, and was not ignorant that having not been breed in the exerciſe of war, he might ſucceed better in the Civil Government, and give much more ſatisfaction to all his people.

Every thing happened juſt as he had projected; for this Peace being well limited by his Counſels and by his cares, was a ſecond ſource of all bleſſings to his Nations. He viſited himſelf in Perſon the Cities that the Armies had ranſaked, and to whom the commerce of the victorious Philiſtims had given ſome bad tincture of their Superſtition, and went through all places as a favourable Conſtellation, bringing Light and healthful Influences to his People. He marked his foot-ſteps with the zeal of Juſtice, and all his journies with publick felicities.

But we muſt aver that the People is a motly Beaſt that cannot endure war, and yet loath a long peace. If it be in trouble, it doth nothing but ſigh and groan; and if it hath too much eaſe, it is only to kick and winch. It grows weary of its own felicities, and is not ſenſible of its happineſs but by miſery, nor taſts it its proſperities but by loſing them. The Iſraelites at length diſreliſhed Samuel, and inclin'd under pretence of an advantage, to change the Government. The faſhion of this ſage Judge ſeemed to them too ſimple; they would ſee a Prince of the People that ſhould have more ſtate about his Perſon, and that ſhould make a greater noiſe. And juſt as the Romans under the Empire Galba lamented the loſs of Nero, becauſe they were fallen from a Court full of Luxury and Diſſoluteneſs into another Face of Government under an old man, that had not about him the great Train of an Emperour, and that reduc'd the Libertines to the Ancient Diſcipline; So theſe blind Iſraelites diſguſted a calm and temperate adminiſtration that produc'd good effects without oſtentation. They took a colour from his age, and from the Offices which he had given his ſons, making them by a kind of Reſignation Succeſſours of his Office, but not of his virtue; ſeeing that according to the publick voice they had behaved themſelves but with little honeſty, ſtudying more to content their own Avarice, then to render juſtice. Upon this, they demanded a King whom they offered themſelves to receive from Samuel his hand, ſo good an opinion had they of his ſincerity, and ſo much reverence to his Perſon.

This Propoſition touched ſenſibly the heart of Samuel; for it is true, that good Officers, although they adhere not to their Charges through Ambition, yet they cannot chooſe but have ſome diſpleaſure, to ſee themſelves put out by a Prince, or an ungrateful Common-wealth, after long and faithful Services, and eſpecially if they are aged. They would not have their Age paſs for a Crime; and think that they are always vigorous enough to acquit themſelves of their duty. But it is as certain that Samuel, that was a man of God, conſidered not ſo much his own intereſt as the Peoples, which he ſaw weary of their Liberty, and by a profound infatuation, demand a Yoke, whoſe heavineſs it ſhould feel when it had no more the power to ſhake it off.

To ſpeak ſincerely, the Rule of one man over another is a delicate piece; and when God eſtabliſhed the Dominion of Adam, he gave him all power over the Creatures, but he would not comprehend therein the men that ſhould deſcend from him. The World was more then two thouſand years before it was known what Monarchy or Empire was; The Younger were ruled by the Elder with a ſweet and amiable diſcretion, in which there was much ſatisfaction and ſmall conſtraint.

The People of God retained always very near this form of Governing; for the Antient Patriarchs prefided over the reſt as Maſters of Families more by Reverence then by Command. Moſes in that high Authority that could do every thing both upon Men and upon the Elements, never aſſumed the name of King; and his Succeſſours till Samuel his time, contented themſelves with the Stile of Judges of the People.

Nimrod was the firſt amongſt the Gentiles that uſurped a new Domination over the liberty of the Nations that he ſubdued by Arms, having learned in the continual Maſſacres of Beaſts, Cruelty towards men. Not but that Kingdoms and Monarchies ſince that time have been holily inſtituted of God; But he hath always willed that Kings ſhould learn that there was none but he in the Univerſe of all the Creatures that was an abſolute Maſter, having alone the Power to Create, and to Annihilate what or whom he pleaſes. This is not permitted to the Greateſt Monarchs on the Earth, who remaining within the bounds of their charges ought to acknowledge themſelves the Vicegerents and Subſtitutes of God, to Conduct Men to their End, making them arrive at the heighth of Felicity, by the ways of Juſtice and of Religion. But when they ſtray from theſe intentions, and abuſe the Goods, the Bloud, and the Life of their Subjects, as if they were the Proprietours of them, and not the Stewards, they render themſelves reſponſible to God's Judgment for all the abuſes that are committed in the whole Kingdom through their default.

This change of Government projected by the Iſraelites, was not according to God's Heart, who comforted Samuel and told him, that he ought not to be ſad for that they were weary of him; ſeeing they were weary of God Himſelf which is an Infinite Goodneſs, and gave him Collegues in his Empire. He Commanded him to make known to them the Right of a King, which ſhould be; to take their children for his ſervants, and to Employ them on ſuch Trades as he ſhould judge fit for the profit of his Houſe; to uſurp their Lands and Inheritances to accommodate therewith his Minions; to exact Tithes of their Revenues, of their Vines, and of their Corn to enrich therewith his Officers; and in a word, that he would govern every thing after his own Fancy.

Thoſe that take theſe words as a Right that God eſtabliſhed in favour of Kings are very far from the ſenſe of the Scripture, for they are ſpoken by way of Menace and not of Approbation. Otherwiſe we ſhould avouch that King Ahab had right to take away Naboth his Vineyard, for which he was ſo ſharpely reprehended and ſo ſeverely puniſhed, with his Wife Queen Jeſabel. Yet it is moſt Juſt, That Kings and Sovereigns ſhould have ſome reaſonable Tributes from the People to ſupport the Majeſty of the Kingdom, to maintain their Family, to protect their Subjects againſt Hoſtilities, to open them Trading, to give them means to preſerve and increaſe their Revenues, to make Friendſhips, to live peaceably in their Commodities, and to defend them againſt the violent Uſurpers of their Goods.

The School-Doctours, as Cajetan and Gregory de Valentia require four Conditions to juſtifie Impoſts.

Impoſts, The First is, The Power and Authority of the Prince. The Second, That they tend to a good End. The Third, That they be according to the ability of the Subject. The Fourth, That they be impoſed upon fit Perſons, and rather upon certain Marchandiſes, then upon that which is totally neceſſary to the Life of Man.

Samuel failed not well to aggravate to the People the Burdens that they ſhould undergo by chuſing them a King, and the Repentance that they ſhould have of it, when the evil ſhould be incurable. But (It being hard to make them believe Reaſon that never uſe it but when it flatters their own will.) The Iſraelites were no way diverted from their Propoſition by all poſſible Remonſtrances; but continued to demand a King with great urgency, deſiring to be like in that to ſo many other Nations. They were much like the Frogs in the Fable that prayed Jupiter to give them a King, whereto he agreeing, threw into their Lake a great piece of Wood which much aſtoniſhed them at firſt; but ſeeing it without Motion they deſpiſed it, and ſaid that they deſired a King Robuſtuous, Active, and Nimble, whereupon he gave them a Bird of Prey that ceaſed not to devour them: After which they made great Complaints, but he would hearken to them no more. So God cauſed this miſerable People to be advertiſed that when they ſhould be weary of the Domination of Kings, and that they ſhould deſire another form of Government, he would have no ears for their Requeſts. All this inflamed them the more, ſo reſolved were they upon their Miſery.

Samuel being willing to deliver himſelf from their Importunities purpoſed to chooſe them a King, and to give him to them with his own hand, not for any mind that he had to keep yet the Government, but for the zeal that he had of the Glory of God and of Juſtice, deſiring that the pains that he had taken to procure peace unto his people, and to preſerve it many years together, might not be made unprofitable through the Caprichio's of an evil Succeſſour that perhaps might take a pride in changing all that he had ſo carefully eſtabliſhed. He did not caſt his eyes upon his own Kindred, to make himſelf a creature in whom he might reign according to fleſh and bloud; but he took by the Order of God a man very ignote, and little taken notice amongſt his brethren.

Here is a marvellous ſport of Divinity, that calls things that are not as things that are, that makes the Light break out of Darkneſs, and traces the rayes of his Glory upon an heap of dirt. Saul, of the Tribe of Benjamin, the leaſt amongſt the Hebrews, and one of the leaſt qualified in that Tribe, a Country-man, into whoſe heart the Court and Royalty never entred, not ſo much as in a Dream, went to ſeek his Fathers Aſſes that then were gone aſtray. A domeſtick ſervant that was with him, ſeeing that he had loſt his labour in that ſearch, gives him notice that in the neighbouring village there was a great Perſonage that was ignorant of nothing, and that he could well tell them news of their loſs; and added, that he had a piece of ſilver that was worth about ſix pence, which he would make a preſent to him. Saul conſents to it, and they go along both together into the Village of Ziph, where Samuel was that was to be preſent that day at a Sacrifice and a Feaſt that was made among the Principal men. Without thinking on it, they meet him, and asked of him where was the Prophets houſe. Samuel knew by revelation that it was he of whom God had ſpoken to him; and whom he had choſen to be the King of his People, and entertained him very courteouſly, and invited him to the Feaſt, and to tarry that night in his houſe without going further, and promiſed him that he would tell him all that his heart thought on; and as for the Aſſes he needed not to trouble himſelf, for they were found again. But there were other affairs that concerned him, and that would ſuddenly make all the Glory and all the Riches of Iſrael fall into his hands.

The other was extremely ſurpriſed to ſee himſelf entreated with ſo much honour, and confeſſed with all ſincerity the meanneſs of his family, and the little cauſe that he had to pretend to ſuch heighths as thoſe. But Samuel taking him by the hand, brings him with his ſervant into the Hall of the Feaſt, and ſets them both at the upper end of the Table, where there were thirty Gueſts, and cauſed Saul to be ſerved with all that was moſt exquiſite in the Banquet that was kept upon a little Hill, very near the Burgh to which they deſcended after their repaſt; and Samuel led Saul into his Houſe, and made him lodge that night in his own Chamber. The morrow he conducted him to the Suburbs of the City, and cauſed his ſervant to go before, poured on a ſudden upon his head a precious ointment, and kiſſing him, told him, That God had Anointed him King of his People which he ſhould deliver from the hand of the Philiſtims. After which he foretold him many things that ſhould befall him, and gave him evident ſigns of the verity of his words.

When he was returned, he had a curious Uncle that inquired after all that had happened to him, to whom he ſpake of the Aſſes, but was very wary not to diſcover the ſecret of the Royalty. Some time after Samuel called a General Aſſembly of all the people to proceed to the Election of a King, and having diſpoſed all the Tribes of Iſrael for that deſign, the lot fell upon that of Benjamin, and upon the Family of Matri, and in fine, upon Saul, who had hid himſelf, that he might not expreſs any ambition of that Royalty; But he was ſuddenly taken forth out of the place where he had retired himſelf, and was ſhewed to the whole Aſſembly, in which there was not a man that he did not out-paſs by all the head.

This rejoyced Samuel, and made him ſay that they might plainly ſee that God took a care of their affairs in that Election, by giving them ſo brave a Man that had not the like amongſt all the People; whereupon they all cryed, God ſave the King.

After this Eſtabliſhment, Samuel called a ſecond Aſſembly for his own Diſcharge, wherein he made a powerfull Oration, declaring to the People the Goodneſſe and the Favours they had received from the Hand of God in all his Conduct, ever ſince their coming out of Egypt, and made a kind of Recapitulation of thoſe that had Governed, and delivered them from their Enemies even till this time; Then he repeated to them that they had plucked a King out of the hand of God with all importunity, and that it was not pleaſing to his Divine Majeſty. Whereof he gave them a good Pledge, making at the inſtant the Voyce of Heaven ſpeak in a great tempeſt, which affrighted them ſo much that all deſired pardon of that ſin which they would never before acknowledge.

But before he came to thoſe Reproaches, he highly juſtified himſelf, calling them to give a Teſtimony of his Conduct and Converſation amongſt them; He conjured them to ſpeak before God and the new King, if he had ever injured them, or been exceſſive excessive either upon their Persons, or upon their Goods, and that if they had any thing concerning his Life, or his Conversation, or the Administration of his Charge, he was ready to give them all satisfaction.

The Reverend Old-man melted their hearts, and all rendred him the testimony of an Honesty and Justice irreproachable. Thereupon he protested that he would never forget them; and that being out of his Office, he would offer to God his most fervent Prayers for their Welfare, and would have a care of their Quiet, as far as he should be able, exhorting them furthermore to remain inviolable in the Religion of their Fathers, and in the true Worship of the Living God, and assuring them that he would never cast them off as long as they should adhere to him by the Submission and Duties of true Children.

The People began to perceive what they had lost, in the discharge of so Venerable a Person, and were ashamed of their precipitation; but they were now embarked too far, and must sail to the liking of the Tempest.

Here is a great Secret of Divine Policy which hath tormented Curious Spirits in their search into it, that demand wherefore God (making use of the Ministery of the wisest Man that was at that time on Earth to give a King to his own People, that was to be as the Foundation-Stone, and the Basis of the Royalty of Judea) made so ill a choice, that he was as it were forced by the deportments of Saul to break in pieces his own work. But we ought to consider that in the choice of Princes and Sovereigns, God approves not alwayes all that he gives, nor gives not also all that he approves. There are Kings that are given by favour, and others by wrath; Those are sent into the world as Stars, and these as Comets. He saith in his Prophet, That he will give a King in his fury, to expiate the sins of his people; and S. Gregory hath worthily observed, that Kings are measured out by Providence, according to the disposition of the Subjects; and which is more, that God permits the sins of good Kings for the chastisement of the people, and that there is such a connexion between the manners of the Master and the Servants, that the fault of the Master causes the wicked life of the Servants, and the good life of the Servants, the amendment of the Master. God was provoked against the Israelites by reason of their Idolatry, of their Obstinacy, and of their Ingratitude towards Samuel, and this was the cause that he gave them Saul, not so much to govern, as to punish them, and make them regret the virtue of their contemned Prophet by the comparison of the two Governments. He suffers also Samuel to be deceived in that choice; to teach us, that it belongs onely to the eternal Wisdome to know, and to make turns of State that surpass the capacity of the ablest men.

If the stature of the body made the Excellency of Kings, Saul (without controversie) was one of the chief; he had a very fair appearance to the exteriour, but within were found great defects of virtues and royall qualities. He was a gilded portall that nature had built for an house of straw. The people at first were ravished with him, and measuring him by the greatness of the body, judged him the prime man of their Nation, not seeing that making that judgment, they preferred a flint before a pearl. The first unhappiness of his conduct was, that he had not an heart for God, but for his own interest; and that he did not unite himself close enough to Samuel, that had made him King, and that was the Oracle from which he should have learned the divine Will. The second was a furious State-jealousie, his capital devil that put his Reason into a disorder, and infected all the pleasures and contentments of his life. He was but weak to hold an Empire, and govern with love, and yet he loved passionately all that he could least compass, and would do every thing of his own head, thinking that the assistance of a good Council was the diminution of his Authority. Sometimes he was sensible of his defects, but instead of amending them, he desired to take away the eyes of those men that perceived them. His Spirit was little in a great body; his Reason barren in a multitude of business; his Passions violent with small reservedness; his Breakings out impetuous; his Counsels sudden, and his Life full of inequalities.

Samuel had prudently perceived that the Philistims were dangerous enemies to the State of Judea; because they knew its weakness, and kept it in subjection a long time, depriving it of the means of thinking fully upon its liberty. And therefore he maintained a peace with them, and used them courteously, gaining all that he could by good Treaties, and would not precipitate a War, which was to weaken the Israelites without recovery. But Saul thought not himself an able man, if he had not spoiled all, and without making any other provision of necessary things, he made a great levy of Souldiers, and a mighty Army to go against the enemies, in which there was but two swords. It was a plot that permitted not the Hebrews to have Armorers, nor other men that laboured in Iron, totally to disarm them, and at the least motion that they should make, expose them for a prey. These assaulted Philistims found him business enough through the whole course of his Government and Life, and in the end, buried him with his children in the ruines of his State.

But God that would give some credit to Samuel's choice, sent at first prosperities to God's people under the conduct of that new King, wherein, that which served for a glory to that holy man, was a vain bait to Saul, to make him enterprise things that could give him no other ability but to destroy himself.

About a month after the election Nahash the Ammonite, raised an Army to fall upon the Jabites that were in league with the people of Israel; and those seeing that they were not strong enough to resist so terrible an enemy, dispatched an Embassage to him to treat about a Peace. But that insolent Prince made answer to their Embassadours, that he would not make any treaty of Peace with them on any other condition, then by plucking out their right Eyes, and covering them with a perpetual ignominy. These poor people that were reduc'd almost to despair, implored on all sides the assistance of their neighbours, and failed not to supplicate to the Israelites (their friends) to do something in their favour. Their Messengers being arriv'd at Gibeah, related the sad news of the cruelty of Nahash, that filled the people with fear and tears. Saul returning from the fields, was driving his oxen, when hearing the groans of his Subjects, demanded the cause of it, and having been informed, entred into so great a rage at the pitiless extremities of that fierce Ammonite, that he instantly tore in pieces his two oxen, and sent the pieces of them through all the Cities and Villages of his Dominion, commanding every one to follow him to revenge that injury, otherwise their cattle should be dealt with, as he had done done with his two Oxen. The Iſraelites mov'd, partly by compaſſion, and partly alſo by fear of thoſe menaces, poured out themſelves from all parts to this War in ſuch a ſort, that he had got together three hundred thouſand men. He divided them into three Battallions, and went to meet the Ammonite, whom he ſet upon ſo vigorouſly, and combated ſo valiantly, that he totally defeated his Army, and humbled that proud Giant that thought on nothing but putting out men's eys, making him know that pride goes before reproach, as the lightning before the thunder.

All the great people that compos'd that Army returned unto their houſes, and Saul retained only three thouſand men, whereof he gave one thouſand to his Son Jonathan, that was a man full of ſpirit and generoſity, and far better liked then his Father Saul. This Militia was too little conſiderable for ſo great Enemies, yet he had a courage to aſſault a place of the Philiſtims, and routed their Garriſon: whereat they being pricked beyond meaſure, betake themſelves into the field with an Army, in which there were thirty thouſand Chariots of War, and people without end: whereat the Iſraelites were ſo affrighted, that all ſcatter'd themſelves, and went to hide themſelves in Caves; ſo that there remained but about ſix hundred men with Saul, who marched with a ſmall noiſe, and durſt not appear before his Adverſaries. Samuel had promiſed to ſee him within ſeven days, to ſacrifice to God, and encourage the people.

But Saul ſeeing that the ſeventh day was come without having any tidings of him, takes himſelf the burnt Offering, offers the Sacrifice, and plays the Prieſt, without having any Miſſion either ordinary or extraordinary. As ſoon as he had made an end of burning the Holocauſt, Samuel arrives, to whom he related, how that ſeeing all the people debauch themſelves and quit the Army, and how that being preſſed by his Enemies, in a time wherein it behoved them to have recourſe to prayer before they gave battel, he was perſwaded that God would like well enough that in the neceſſity, and long abſence of Samuel, he ſhould perform the Office of a Prieſt by preſenting the burnt Offering, which he had done with a good intention, without pretending to uſurp any thing upon his office. Samuel rebuked him ſharply for that action, to ſhew, that there is no pretence nor neceſſity that is able to juſtifie a ſin; and that it no way belongs to Lay-people to meddle with the Cenſer, and to do the Functions that regard the Prieſts. Then Samuel fore-told him that his Kingdom ſhould not be ſtable, and that God would provide himſelf another that ſhould be a more religious obſerver of his Law: thereupon he left him for a time, and Saul having recollected all the people that he could, endeavoured to oppoſe the Enemy.

The brave Jonathan accompanied with his Armour-bearer, found a way to climb over Rocks, and to ſurprize a Court of Guard of the Philiſtims, which they thought had been inacceſsible, which put them in a terrible fright, imagining that thoſe that had got ſo far had great Forces, though they did not yet appear.

This brought their Army into a confuſion, and God alſo putting his hand far into the buſineſs, fill'd them with ſuch an amazement, that their Ranks being in diſorder, they killed one another without knowing their own party. The people of Iſrael having received intelligence of that Rout, take heart again, and get them out of the Caves, into which they had retired themſelves, to range themſelves about Saul's perſon, who was thereby tranſported with ſuch an ardour, that he conjur'd all his Army to follow the Philiſtims (without drinking or eating) till they were all deſtroyed.

This was a precipitation of his unequal ſpirit and a true Chimæra: yet deſiring to make that paſs for Zeal which was a pure Paſsion, he would needs cauſe his Son Jonathan to be put to death, for having ſucked a little honey at the end of his Rod; but the people reſcued him out of his hands, and deſiſted to purſue the Philiſtims, being not in a condition to fight with them.

Some time after, Samuel exhorted him to enterprize a puiſſant War againſt the Amalekites (ſworn Enemies of the people of God) and conjur'd him to make every thing paſs through the edge of the Sword, without ſparing any body: and above all, to reſerve nothing of the booty that ſhould be made upon them, that ſhould not be conſumed with fire. To this, Saul ſeem'd to be inclin'd with vigour, and raiſed an Army of more then two hundred thouſand men: ſo great was the weight of the Authority, when Samuel put himſelf into party. He fell ſuddenly upon the Amalekites and defeated them with a general rout, ſo far, as to take their King priſoner: but he contented himſelf with deſtroying and burning all that was caytiff and unprofitable, reſerving Agag the King with the beſt Flocks and Herds, and choiceſt moveables. In the mean while, he was ſo much puft up with this Victory, that he cauſed an Arch of Triumph to be erected to himſelf, and ſpread himſelf in the vanities of his ſpirit, while God was thinking of rejecting him, and giving Orders to Samuel to tell him his unhappineſs. Yet Saul (blind in his ſin) received the man of God into his Camp with an extraordinary joy, vaunting himſelf for having efficaciouſly fulfilled the commandment of God; and while he was ſpeaking it, the voice of the Flocks that he had put aſide was heard: whereupon Samuel ſaid, What means this Cattel that ſtrikes my ears with its bleatings? To which he anſwered, that he had reſerved them expreſly for an Offering to the living God. But Samuel replied, That there was no Sacrifice ſo pleaſing to God as Obedience; and, that ſin, which was contrary to him, was a kind of Idolatry: and that ſince he had deſpiſed the Word of God, he ſhould be caſt off, and deprived of the Kingdom; whereat he being aſtoniſhed, confeſſed that he had offended, hearkning more to the voice of the people, then to that of God; and beſeeched Samuel to excuſe his ſin, to bear with his infirmities, and to go with him to the Sacrifice to adore God in ſign of reconciliation. Whereto Samuel replied, that he would have no more any thing common with a man whom God had abandon'd, and ſaying this, ſteps forward, and turns his back to him: the other lays hold on the Fringe of his Robe which remained in his hands, which when the Prophet ſaw, Behold (ſaid he) how your Kingdom ſhall be divided and given to a better then your ſelf. The Triumpher of Iſrael, the true God of Hoſts is not as a man, to change his purpoſes, and repent him of his counſels. The King humbled himſelf again acknowledging his fault, and beſeeching Samuel earneſtly not to leave him, but to render him the ordinary reſpect before the Princes of the People, and to come and worſhip God with him. Samuel, fearing the diſorder of the Army, conſented for that time, but afterward never ſaw Saul any more to the day of his death.

He

He ceased not to weep bitterly for him, considering that he that had been chosen by his hand had come to so little good, and had carried himself with so much contempt of the Commandments of God. This wounded his heart, and would not let him put an end to his mournings, till his great Master comforted him, and suggested David to him, who should fill up worthily the place that Samuel was about to lose by his iniquity. And (indeed) he performed then a bold enterprize going to Bethlehem, under colour of a Sacrifice, and Anointing David King in Saul's life-time, although that deign was secret, that it might be managed with more success. After that time Saul was left visibly by God, possessed with an evil spirit, and gnawed perpetually with jealousies of State, which the person of David caused in him by reason of his valour and great virtues, as I shall declare in the following Elogy. In the mean while, Samuel lived retired from Court, without meddling with State-affairs: and Saul, by his departure changed the sins of Vanity and of Fearfulness into Sacrileges and Massacres, letting loose the bridle to his fury, to retain the phantasm of an Empire that flew out of his hands. Good Samuel ceased not in his solitude to bewail two Kings that he had made, looking upon one as an Homicide, and the other as a Sacrifice of death. He was afflicted inconsolably to hear of the deportments of that furious Saul, that made of one wickedness a degree to pass unto another, inventing every day new butcheries to cement his Throne with the blood of his brethren. He melted himself with compassion for his poor David, seeing Saul's Sword hang but by a little thread, always ready to fall upon his innocent head. He deplored the miseries of the poor people which he could not any longer remedy, and passing over again in his remembrance all the vicissitudes of man's life, and the treacheries of the Court, he had an ardent thirst to depart out of this world, to go to find Innocence in the bosom of his Fathers. God heard him, and drew him to himself by a peaceable death the seventy and seventh year of his age, the eight and thirtieth of his Government, and the seventh after his retreat from Court. He was mourned and lamented for, by all the people, as the Father of his Country; and magnificent Funerals were made for him, to render him a testimony at his death of the commendable actions of his holy and generous life. Saul remained yet two years upon the Throne after him, and the Even before his great overthrow, the Soul of Samuel returned from Limbus, not by the work of the Pythoness, but by the will of God, and spake to him and told him of his disaster, as I have said in the Maxim of the Immortality of Souls.

DANIEL.

Daniel entred into the Court by Captivity, stayed there by Mortification, made himself known by Prophecy, and there also rendred himself renowned by great Virtues. To comprehend this, it is necessary to know, that the little Kingdom of Judea was ordinarily very much exposed to the Armies of the Assyrians, which God had chosen to be the scourges and the instruments of the Justice that he exercised upon the sins of his people. King Nebuchadnezzar that reigned in that Monarchy six hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord, fell upon Palestine with a mighty Army, took and pillaged the City of Jerusalem, carried away King Jehojakim, with the richest Vessels of the Temple, and abundance of prisoners of the most noted men, amongst which was Daniel, accompanied with other young Children of a good Parentage.

The King gave charge to Ashpenaz chief Gentleman of his Chamber, to choose him Pages of Royal Extraction, well made, without any blemish or disgrace, as well of mind as body, that should be versed in Arts befitting the Nobility, well learn'd in Exercises, docile, and well governed, and that he should teach them the Chaldean Tongue, which was the Language of the Kingdom, that they might wait upon him in his Chamber. Ashpenaz having proceeded in the business with much consideration, resolved to take Daniel, and his three Companions, Ananias, Azarias, and Misael. From hence one may collect, that this young Child was endowed with most excellent qualities for the conversation of the world, and the life of the Court. Some have perswaded themselves that he was the Son of King Hezekiah, but it is without foundation, and with ignorance of the Chronology, seeing that if this opinion were true, it must be inferred, that Daniel that is here dealt with as a Child, and chosen for Nebuchadnezzar's Page, was at that time fourscore and ten years old, which would be a great impertinency.

Yet it is credible that he was descended from some Son or Daughter of the same King; but however, one may assure that he was of the Blood royal, seeing the King had expresly ordered, that the children that were to appear before him for his service should be taken out of that quality. Besides his eminent birth, he was endowed with a very gentle fashion, knowing according to his age, dextrous in the exercises of the Court, of a sweet and prudent spirit, very different from the temper of him that we proposed in the precedent Elogy. But to speak sincerely, if a good man ought to be considered as a Temple, these exteriour qualities make but the Portal: there are others in the understanding and in the will, that compose the Mysteries of the Sanctuary.

This young child was endowed with a great intelligence in things of Faith and Religion, and of a chast fear of God, and of rare virtues, that surpassed far the ability of his age. Who can sufficiently commend that which he did at his entrance into the Court with his companions, that took light from his spirit, and strength from the imitation of his courage? They were now from the siege of an hunger bitten City, from a long voyage, and abundance of wearisom toils; they find themselves suddenly in the abundance and delicacies of a magnificent Court, where they were to be fed as the other Pages, with the Viands that were served up to the King's table.

Youth hath ordinarily a great inclination to a sensual life, and to content all its appetites; so that there are some that seem not to eat to live, but to live to eat. Yet these young children made a firm resolution to abstain from all the delicious food that was served up to Nebuchadnezzar's table, whether for the fear that they had, lest they should have been offered unto Idols, or for the love of temperance, they earnestly beseeched the Master of the Pages to entertain them with nothing but with pulse: &when he he feared leſt that uſage ſhould make them lean, and that the King ſhould perceive it, they prayed him to try them for the ſpace of ten days, aſſuring him, that living in ſuch a manner, they ſhould be full of health and vigour. This was verified by experience, and when they were to appear in the preſence of the King, they were found in good plight, active, and well inſtructed above all the reſt.

Pſal. 64. Pingueſcent ſpecioſa deſerti.

The Prophet ſaith, That the beauties of the deſart ſhall be fat and fruitfull: ſo thoſe bodies that are as deſarts, deprived of the fat and of the abundance that a voluptuous life miniſters to the delicate, have a certain bleſſing of God, that infuſes into them an health, a grace, and a beauty, ſutable to a good temper. Do we not ſee that all thoſe birds of prey that feed themſelves with the fleſh of beaſts, ſend forth an horrid cry? but the Nightingales that live innocently by ſome little ſeeds of plants, ſing melodiouſly. Daniel was made to charme the ear of a great King by his diſcourſes, to live in contemplations and in lights; he would have nothing to do with the ſmoak and ill vapours of Nebuchadnezzar's Kitchin.

He was full three years under this Maſter of the Pages, Praying, Faſting, keeping the Law of God, learning the Language of the Country and the Modes of the Court. This time being expired, he was preſented to the King amongſt other children of divers Nations, who liked him exceeding well, with his companions, and found that he eminently ſurpaſſed the capacity of all thoſe of the Country, and of the reſt that were nouriſhed with him. When he was advanced in age, and now approaching to thirty years, it pleaſed God to render him very famous at the Court, as another Joſeph, by the Interpretation of a Dream.

King Nebuchadnezzar had a great Viſion in his ſleep which very much diſquieted his mind; for there remained in him an Idea that he had dreamt of ſome magnificent thing, but his Dream was eſcaped from him, and he could by no means unfold it, whether he ſaid true, or whether he diſſembled, to try his Diviners and all thoſe that undertook to foretel hidden things. He makes a great Aſſembly of the Sages of the Country in his Palace, to know of them what it was that he had dreamed; whereat theſe men were very much aſtoniſhed, and told him with all humility, that no man ever dealt ſo with the Interpreters of Dreams, but that the ordinary manner was to declare the Viſion, and then ſeek for the Interpretation.

This King that was of an impetuous and extravagant ſpirit, ſaid, that he was not contented with that trivial faſhion of telling his Dreams, to give them matter of inventing afterward ſuch an Interpretation as they would; but that the true ſecret of the Science was to divine the Dream it ſelf. The Magicians replied, that there was none but the Gods that could give a reſolution of that, and that their commerce was far diſtant from ours. The King thereupon ſent them away with anger; and without giving vent to his choler, reſolved to rid himſelf of all the Diviners in his Kingdom, having already given command to his Captain of the Guard to put them all to death. All of them fled, and were exactly ſearched for; Daniel that was thought to make profeſſion of theſe extraordinary Sciences was involved in the ſame danger, there being no want of wicked minded men, that ſeeing him ſufficiently in the favour of the King endeavoured to deſtroy him in that occaſion.

He would not ſuddainly forſake the Court, as one feared, but aſſuring himſelf of Gods protection, he preſented himſelf to the Captain of the Guard, praying him to make ſome ſurceaſe upon that rigorous Edict, and not to dip his hands in bloud by the death of ſo many men, but to permit him only to preſent himſelf to the King, and he hoped to give him all content. In this he ſhewed himſelf very prudent, there being nothing better in troubleſome affairs and very ſuddain, then to bring ſome retardment, whilſt the ſpirit may give it ſelf leiſure to come to it ſelf again, and to find expediments to get out of an ill way. He ſpake to the King, expreſſing much compaſſion even for them that bore him envy, and deſired ſome delay, which was very reaſonable, to reſolve ſo crabbed a Queſtion.

Now when he ſaw well that it paſſed the capacity of any created ſpirit, he had recourſe to the Creatour by moſt humble and moſt fervent prayers, which he recommended alſo to his dear Companions, that all conſpiring to the ſame deſign, they might the more eaſily obtain the mercy and the illumination of God in ſo great and ſo profound a ſecret. It is thus that good men proceed in all buſineſſes of importance, diſtruſting all their own managery if it be not directed from on high. Their prayers redoubled day and night, one upon the other, forced Heaven with a pious violence, and the Dream with its Interpretation was revealed to Daniel in the midſt of his moſt ardent Devotions. He felt his ſpirit touched with a glimpſe of the firſt light, and ſaw as in a mirrour, all that had paſſed in Nebuchadnezzar's mind with ſuch a certainty, as permitted him not to doubt of it. Then he was not like Archimedes who having found ſome ſecret of the Mathematicks, as he was in a Bath, leapt out all naked by a ſtrange tranſport, crying through the ſtreets, I have found it, I have found it. This is ordinary to ſpirits that have nothing in their head but vanity; but holy Daniel cryes out thereon, Let the name of God be bleſſed for ever, for to him belongeth wiſdome and ſtrength. It is he that diſtributeth wiſdome to the true Sages, and that beſtows knowledge on thoſe that range themſelves under his Diſcipline. It is he that reveals things hidden in the moſt deep abyſſes, and knows that which is buried in the moſt thick darkneſs, and light dwells perpetually with him. I praiſe thee, and I confeſs thee from the bottome of my heart the God of my Fathers, that haſt given this ſtrength of ſpirit, and this underſtanding to penetrate the King's ſecret.

He ſpake many ſuch like words, and riſing from his prayer, he went to ſeek the Captain of the Guard, whom he beſought to ſave the Sages of Babylon, and to cauſe no more to die, becauſe he had found out the ſecret that was ſearched after by the Prince; which the other received with much joy, and failed not immediately to carry news of it to the King, who cauſed Daniel to be called, of whom he demanded the performance of his promiſe. Then the Prophet uſing a great prudence and a ſingular modeſty excuſed all the Sages of Chaldea that could not find out the King's ſecret thoughts, and vaunted not himſelf to know them by his own ſufficiency, but by the inſpiration of the God whom he adored. In which, he expreſſed a great Wiſdome and a generous Humility, not giving any Praiſe to himſelf, but tranſferring all the Glory to the living God, that he might work in the King an high esteem of the true Religion.

S. Gregory saith, That those that seek their own glory in the Commission they have from God, are like those that espousing (in quality of proxies) a wife by order of their Master, would play the Husbands, not contenting themselves to be simple Commissioners. Daniel abhorred such proceedings, because he was a star that would shew his Sun, and would not be seen himself but by his favour. He made then a large discourse to the King his master, and told him his Dream, which was touching that famous Statue, that had an head of Gold, a breast and arms of Silver, a belly and thighs of Copper, legs of Iron, and feet partly of Iron and partly of Earth: and added, that whilst the King beheld it in his Dream, he saw a little stone come from a great mountain that strook the feet of the Statue and tumbled it down immediately, scattering the Gold, the Silver, the Copper, the Iron, and the Earth as small chaffe dissipated by a whirlewind, and that that little stone changed it self in an instant into a huge Mountain, and filled the whole earth.

After he had so subtlely touched the Vision of the Prince, making him remember all that his imagination had framed, he descended to the particularities of the Interpretation, and said, That he was the Golden Head of that Statue, God having made him a King of kings, and having given him Strength, Rule, and Glory, with a Power over the Earth inhabited by men, over the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field. Then he advertised, that after him should come a Kingdome less then his, that should be as Silver in comparison of Gold.: And after that second should arise a third, resembling Brass, that should command over the whole earth: And after that a fourth, which as Iron, should subdue and break in pieces all that it should meet with. And as for that that he had seen the Feet of the Statue composed of Iron and Clay, it meant, that there should be a great inequality and disproportion in that last Empire, by reason of the mixture of very differing parts that could not be fitted well together. In fine, that God would raise up a Kingdome of Heaven, signified by that little Stone, that should crush the other Kingdomes, and should remain stable to all Eternity.

The King was so transported with Daniel's discourse, that he rose suddenly from his Throne, and bending with his face to the earth, worshipped him, commanding that Sacrifices and Incense should be offered to him, and publishing highly that his God was the God of gods, and the Lord of kings, to whom alone it belonged to reveal Mysteries, since he could penetrate into such a secret.

Wisdome was never upon so high a Throne, as to see the proudest of Monarchs at her feet. Yet Daniel well knew how to moderate the transports of his spirit, and by shewing him the nothing of the creature to draw him to the worship and honour of the Creatour which was the master of Knowledge, and source of all pure Light. These are the wonders of the Sovereign Monarch, to consider, that a young man that came to that Court as a slave should find there suddenly in the esteem of his Prince the quality of a God; he was shut up continually in his chamber, and his spirit walked through the whole Universe; he was a Captive, and saw Kings pass before him as the Dream of a night.

For, represent to your selves with what wisdome and with what greatness of conceptions he saw in one onely Dream that which should extend beyond six hundred years, and that which had been doing thirteen or fourteen hundred years before. That Golden Head of the Statue was the chief Monarchy of the World, founded (as 'tis held) by Belus whom Ninus his son consecrated for a God, causing a great statue of gold to be erected for him, which had eyes counterfeited of certain precious stones that were afterwards called Belus his eyes. This Ninus took to wife a maid that came from nothing, named Semiramis, that gained him by her charms, and reigned after him in a most imperious way, till such time as she was assassinated by her own son, when she incited him to a most enormous sin. This son that was called Ninias was esteemed but little, and followed with about two and thirty sit-still Kings, the last of which was Sardanapalus, that was spinning out his distaffe amongst the women of his Seraglio, when he was surprised by a revolt of two of his Captains, and burnt himself with all his most precious wealth, that he might leave to his conquerours nothing else but ashes.

This Monarchy of the Assyrians was then divided into two Kingdomes by those two Chiefs that conspired against their Master. Arbaces took the Medes, and Belesus the Chaldeans; out of this Belesus issued thirteen Kings, amongst which Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar: Arbaces was followed by nine, the last of which was Astyages.

These two Kingdomes were afterward incorporated into one sole Monarchy of the Persians, figured by the Silver, founded by Cyrus, whom God seemed to lead by the hand to the conquest of Nations, and to give him happiness at his disposall, to follow no more any but his standards. His Monarchy reckoned two hundred years, and fourteen Kings, when under Darius, one of the greatest spectacles of the inconstancy of humane things, it was buried by the Grecians, after five millions of men had been consumed in three battels.

Alexander founded this third Empire, represented by the Brass, and did that great master-work, by which he seemed to have been born onely to shew posterity to what point of greatness a man may arrive by the heighth of his enterprises, and the vigour of his arms. The course of his Reign ended in twelve years, and so many conquests were bounded by a glass of poyson. His Princes shared diversly the Empire, who, after they had dipped their swords so many times in the bloud of the Barbarians, washed them in their own, and tore one another by horrible civil Wars.

Finally, the Roman Empire was that Iron which brake the Gold, the Silver, and the Copper, and swallowed up all the Monarchies to contribute to its greatness. But there was a mixture of Clay and Iron in this that so many stranger-Kings (that were effeminated by luxury) were adjoyned to the invincible force of that courageous Nation. This was not well founded; there was need of an eternal Kingdome, which began at the Birth of our Lord, seven hundred years after the foundation of the City of Rome, and is exercised after a spiritual and eminent manner to the end of all Ages.

I have desired to trace out this in a few lines, to verifie the Interpretation that Daniel gave to Nebuchadnezzar's Dream, and the great lights that he communicated to him about the estate of the Empires of the earth. The King in this consideration could not satisfie himself with admiring of him, and raised him unto most high degrees of honour, making him as Vice-Roy of all the Provinces of his Kingdome, the chief Magistrate, and the Prince of the Council of the Sages. He was constrained to accept all this by reason of the imperious humour of his Master, who in his first motions would no way be contraried; but he so ordered the business, that his cares were divided amongst his dear companions, to whom he caused Offices in the Provinces to be bestowed, whilst he was always about the Kings person.

But it seldome happens that good men are raised at Court but that God makes them know by some revolution or other, the brittleness of all the glory of the world. Scarce had they tasted the first-fruits of the honour due to their merit, but the Prince always puffed up with his victories, and pricked with an high esteem of greatness, without having any remembrance of the Conduct of his Empire that had bin represented to him in his Dream, causes a golde Statue of sixty cubits high to be erected for himself, that should be one of the most formidable Colossus's that had been ever seen. And as it was the custome to make great Ceremonies at the Dedication of these Testimonies of honour that were given to Kings, he summoned all the principal men of his whole Kingdom, the Governours, and the Officers of his Crown. One reades not that Daniel had any thing to do with it, be it, that he was absent upon some great employment, or be it that he avoyded that occurrence by a shift: But his Companions were sent for thither, because that the great credit that they had by the recommendation of Daniel had already drawn upon them the envy of those of the Country, who sought for nothing but an occasion to destroy them.

They might deliberate among themselves whether it were not permitted to render an honour purely civil to the Statue of a King, and conclude with reason, that such an action tended not to the sin of Idolatry. They could not be ignorant that the Prophet Elisha granted leave to Naaman the Syrian to accompany the King his Master to the Temple of the Idols, and even to bend the knee, not with a design to do homage to the false God, but with an intention to hold up his Prince whilst he leaned upon him, as was his custome. This action seemed more bold, because here is mention of a place wherein worship was rendred to an imaginary Deity; and although that this Naaman had neither heart nor adoration for it, yet those that saw him bow before that Abomination, might inferr; that he perished in his Superstition; yet for all that, the Prophet grants him in this thing all that he desired. By a juster title seems it, that these here ought not to have moved so furious a tempest against their Nation for lack of doing reverence to the Image of a King.

Nevertheless, these three young men, after they had considered that the King pretended to cause himself to be adored in that Statue as a God, filled with a sense of their Religion, whiles some suffered themselves to go to that adoration, and others fled for fear of torments, presented themselves to the King, and protested loudly that they were the servants of the living God, and that they should hold it for a great sin to render the honour that is due to him, to an Idol.

The King was suddainly moved with choler, and threatned to cause them to be burnt alive if they obeyed not, and that there was no God either in Heaven or upon Earth that should be able to deliver them out of his hands. These gallant Princes not being able to endure this blasphemy, answered constantly, that the God which they served was the Sovereign Master of all Kings, that nothing was impossible to his power; that it was most easie for him to draw them out of a danger so evident; but happen what would, they would never be so base and cowardly as to betray their Faith, and bely their Religion.

What cannot Resolution do? what cannot Courage do? What cannot true Piety do? And what does not the Spirit of God? That three children that were strangers amidst so many millions of Infidels that environed them as enraged wolves amidst the thundring angers of an inexorable King, the horrible faces of hangmen, whilst the flames of the fornace into which they were suddenly to be thrown flashed over, to the horrour and trembling even of those that were without danger, should stand as three rocks immoveable to all these violent shakings! What menaces did this wicked King employ to make himself to be feared! What sweetnesses and allurements to make himself be beloved! And yet they remain inflexible to rigours, and impregnable to caresses. They are cast into those fiery coals that bore a true representation of hell, to endure the sharpest of pains, and they find there the most sensible of pleasures. The fire forgets it self to be fire; the fornace strows it self with flowers; the gentle breathings of the South-winds temper the ardour of the flames, and that which was the most rigorous of punishments, becomes a Throne of honour, upon which these three Champions speak as Oracles, and all the Creatures change themselves into ears to hear them.

The King that was there present, and that had seen them thrown in fast bound and manacled, when he saw them walk all three, assisted with a fourth that was the Angel of God, in that great and horrible fornace as in a meadow enamelled over with flowers, demanded of his Princes whether they were not those same men that were newly thrown into the fire, and whence it could come to pass that that Element should change its nature for them, after it had devoured their executioners. He draws near to the fornace, he calls them by their names, and commands them to come to him, to see if they were not spirits loosed from the body. They come forth, he embraceth them, he is in an extasie for joy, and confesses with a loud voyce, that the God of those Children is the true God; and ordains, that he that shall be so hardy as to blaspheme him, should be punished with death, and his house confiscated.

What triumph was ever so glorious as that of the true Religion, that then made visible her Grandeurs to the sight of all the Infidels in her Captivity, and when one would have thought her dead, wrote her praises in characters of fire? The Nobles came about these three Princes, considered their habits, the hair of their heads, their flesh, their skin, aud found that every thing was entire. Calumny changed her self into Adoration, Rage into Astonishment, and those that were thought lost ard reduced to nothing, saw themselves consecrated by their punishments.

This should have converted the King, and all his Nation, to the Worship of the true God; and yet (those chains that keep men bound in their Superstition for a long time, aud by deep rooted habits being almost indissoluble) every thing remained in the same condition, and this Prince blinded by the Prosperity of his Arms, carried his Ambitions to the highest Point, to which those of mortal men can mount, whilst it pleased God to chastise him by a very extraordinary change.

A year before that the unhappiness befel him, he saw in a dream a tree of an immense heighth, that seemed to him to cover all the earth with its branches; the leaves thereof were pleasant; the fruit most savoury; the beasts of the earth fed under it, and lived by the favours they received from it; and upon it the little birds of the air made melodious consorts; whilst on a sudden he saw an Angel descend from heaven, and commanded that the Tree should be cut down, her branches scattered, her leaves shaken off, her fruits destroyed, that it should be tumbled down upon the grass, wet continually with the dew of heaven, bound with a great iron chain, and that there should be left only some small root to spring up again in time to come, but that it should lie seven years under ground before it should appear.

He was much affrighted at this Dream, and made a second assembly of the Sages of his Kingdom that could not give any sutable Interpretation of it. Daniel was called, and the Dream related to him from point to point by the Kings own mouth, from which he immediately discovered much misery for his Master. There is need of a great force of spirit when one is to carry an afflicting Truth to a person that one loves, and of whom one hath received great benefits.

One would have counselled Daniel to hold his peace, to dissemble, to elude the true sense by some appearing Interpretation; yet, he knowing that God had sent him to that Court not to vaunt himself in the honour of his Offices, and in the abundance of his riches; but to have a care of the salvation of his King, and to heal the vanities of his spirit, although that by interpreting this Dream according to the truth, he should bring himself in danger of the ruine of his fortunes. He disguised nothing, but told him, that it were to be wished that the effect of that Dream might fall upon his enemies, but since that unhappiness threatned him, it would be better to endeavour to divert it, then to invent artifices to suppress it.

That he was that great Tree that lifted his branches as high as heaven, and covered with his shadow the roundness of the earth, that so many millions of men were in shelter under his protection, and breathed by his favour; but forasmuch as he had despised God, and had entred into a great presumption of his sufficiency, without considering that every thing came to him from on high, that he should be separated from the conversation of men, ranked with beasts, that he should eat the grass of the field as an Ox, and should be exposed to the rain and to all the injuries of the air, living as a beast, till such time as he should know that there is one most high God that rules over the Kingdoms of Monarchs, and gives them to whom he pleases; but there being yet a root remaining to that overthrown Tree, that there should be some recovery from that brutal life, and that he should be put again into his Kingdom when he should know the power of the Heavenly virtue.

This Daniel was a sprightly Courtier, to tell a King that he should become an Ox for the space of seven years; this had been enough to have made him been declared an Impostour, and been banished from the Court. Nevertheless it is a strange thing that Nebuchadnezzar makes no reply thereto, but hears patiently the counsel that he gives him, to expiate his sins by Alms and by good Works. He was seized with a great fear of God, with an affright that took from his mouth all manner of reply, to think by what means he might appease the menaces of Heaven.

But we must aver that this great King had something in him very wild, and a spirit that had no more subsistence then the clouds and winds. He passed often from one extremity of the passions to the other without lighting upon the middle, and sometimes he appeared humbled to the abyss, and sometimes also clave to the air and clouds, and planted his Throne by extravagant imaginations even above the stars.

This Dream of the Tree kept him in his wits a pretty while; but scarce were twelve months expired, but being one day in his Palace, he entred into a mad vanity about the City of Babylon, which he said he had builded by the strength of his wit and of his arm, and for the high magnificences of his glory. The word was yet in his mouth, when the anger of God fell upon his head, as a suddain flash of lightning, and he was changed into a beast; not that he lost his humane soul, nor the ordinary figure of his body, but he entred into so violent and so extraordinary a frenzy, that he perswaded himself that he was an Ox, and instantly forsook his Palace and his Throne, ran up and down the fields, and fed on grass with the beasts; and although endeavour was used to cure him by all sorts of remedies, yet experience shewed that this evil was a wound from heaven, for which no case was to be found. He became so mad that they were fain to bind and chain him, and yet he brake his chains and tore his cloaths, and exposed himself all naked to the rain, to the winds, and to all the rigours that the seasons brought. His hair increased horribly, and his nails so crooked, that they would make one believe that he was some bird of rapine.

All the Court was in mourning and sadness for this so terrible an accident; and although his burnt bloud, and his violent passions had much contributed to his malady; yet so was it, that the blindest saw that there was in it a manifest punishment of God.

Evilmerodach his son took the Government of the Empire in quality of Regent, during the indisposition of the King his Father; and although he appeared to be much moved at that change, yet there was more shew in it then reality. But in fine, this miserable frantick having passed seven years in a pitiful condition came again to his right senses, and the first thing that he did, was, to lift up his eyes to heaven, to bless God, to acknowledge that his might was without limits, that his Kingdom was an everlasting Kingdom, that all men of the habitable earth were but nothing before him, that he disposed of all, as well amongst the heavenly virtues as amongst the creatures of this lower world, that nothing could resist his power without experimenting his Justice.

His good Subjects touch'd with a great compassion sought him out again, and re-placed him upon his Throne, where he reigned with a great modesty, and lived in the knowledge of the true God, as so far, as to work out his own salvation, as S. Augustine assures us, together with other Fathers of the Church. So every thing was restored to him with more splendour and Majesty then before, his accident bringing no diminution to his Authority. This give incompatable joyes to holy Daniel, who amidst all the Grandeurs of the Court, wished for nothing but the conversion of his Master.

Evilmerodach

Evilmerodach that had taken ſome liking to the Regency, was not contented at this change, but expreſſed ſo much deſpight at it, that the King his father diſtruſting him, kept him in priſon, which was very bitter unto him, ſeeing himſelf deſcended from the throne, in a moment, to the condition of a captive.

It is held, that Nebuchadnezzar reigned after his re-eſtabliſhment the ſpace of ſix or ſeven years, and that the ſucceſſour of his Empire was this Evilmerodach his priſoner, who remained a long time in the languor of his captivity. He found in that priſon Jehojakim King of the Jews, and (as men in miſery have a kind of obligation to love the like) he looked upon him with a good eye, and recreated himſelf often with him, having no other company at all. The memory of this friendſhip accompanied him to the Throne, and he cauſed his companion to be delivered out of priſon, uſing him honourably, and giving him even Offices of importance in his Court. The new King paſſing from one extremity to another in ſuch a ſudden, behaved himſelf but ill; for it is ſaid that he cauſed the body of his father to be torn in pieces, for fear he ſhould return again from the gates of death to reſume his Scepter, and that he reigned with much inſolence, taking a pride to trample under foot all that his predeceſſours had exalted. And therefore, that eclipſe that Daniel was in at Court, as it appears from the ſacred Text, might have happened at this time, ſince that the Jews were retir'd, and had little credit in the Kingdome.

This holy Prophet ſeeing himſelf diſcharged of the buſineſſes of the Court, and ranged in a ſolitude, was in his element, and recollected all his thoughts to give to his heart the joyes of God, which good ſouls find in a retirement. It was then that he entred farther into the commerce of the intelligences, that he was viſited by Angels with more favour, that he learn'd the ſecret of Empires, and ſaw all the glory of the world at his feet: yet he could not belly his good heart, nor avoid but that the contempt of the true Religion, and the affliction of his poor people that ſuffered much in this alteration, was very ſenſible to him.

Evilmerodach was never the happier for leaving the paths of Piety which his father had trod out for him; for after a ſhort and wicked Reign he was ſuppreſſed by his brother-in-law Nerigloſſor, who having a child by his wife named Belſhazzar, the grand-child of the great Nebuchadnezzar, put him forward to ſucceed in the Empire. In the mean while the father governed the Kingdome in quality of a Regent, and when Belſhazzar was of age, he remitted all the power into his hands, which he uſed moderately during his fathers life; but as ſoon as he was dead he laid aſide his vizard, and grew diſſolute in the quantity of exceſſes and of debauches, ſhamefull to a Prince of his extraction.

The heighth of his fatal pleaſures was in the moſt ſumptuous banquet that he made, to which he invited a thouſand perſons of the beſt quality in his Kingdome, wherein their ſpirits being poured out into an exceſſive voluptuouſneſs, the King himſelf being full of wine and impiety, commanded that the magnificent veſſels which his grandfather had taken in the Temple of Jeruſalem ſhould be brought upon their cupboard; which was readily performed, and he put them into the hands of his wanton Courtiers and immodeſt women, who mocked at the myſteries of the true Religion. That banquetting-houſe ſeem'd nothing now but a repair of Bacchanals, where Gluttony, Love, Sport, Jeaſting, exerciſed all their power; and the laſcivious devils were unchain'd to induce the gueſts to all ſort of intemperance, when behold a Prodigy comes that changes the diſſolute merriments of that Court into an horrible tragedy.

An hand of a man without the body appeared upon a wall, whoſe fingers ſeem'd to move, and to write unknown characters, whereat the King was ſo affrighted, that all his body trembled, and his countenance appeared laden with pale colours of Death, which ſpoiled all the ſport, and cauſed a great ſilence in the banquetting-hall. Immediately recourſe was had to the Sages and Diviners of Chaldea to read and interpret that writing; but they were found alwayes weak in ſuch myſteries as theſe.

The Queen Mother had a good ſoul, and retained alwayes ſome impreſſion of the true Religion, ſhe remembred Daniel that was at that time baniſhed from the Court, and had in eſteem his great wiſdome and good converſation: and therefore as ſoon as ſhe had heard of the accident that had happened, and the great trouble of mind the King her ſon was in, ſhe entred into the hall, and ſpake to him very advantageouſly of Daniel, aſſuring him, that he was a perſonage that was fill'd with the Deity, and that under the Reign of his Grand-father he had given admirable interpretation of hidden things, which made him be loved of that great King who fail'd not to declare him the Prince of the Council of the Sages of Chaldea; but that the inſolences of Evilmerodach (inſufferable to all the world) had driven him from the Court, though not from Babylon, in which yet he was, and that he was the onely man capable to reſolve him in ſo ſtrange a buſineſs.

The King received this advice with much joy, and commanded inſtantly that Daniel ſhould be cauſed to come to him, who was retired in his little ſolitude. He is ſought for, he is found, he is brought to his Majeſty, who entertained him very courteouſly, and asked of him the Interpretation of the words written on the wall, promiſing him that if he would tel him the truth he would give him the purple robe and the collar of the Order. But Daniel expreſſed to him that all theſe preſents moved him nothing, and that he aimed at no other honour at the Court then that of his Maſter, whoſe will and decrees he would declare. He puts the King in mind of his Grandfather, of the Greatneſs and of the Majeſty of his Empire, of the abſolute power that he exerciſed over men, and how his heart being lifted up againſt God, he was reduced to a brutall life, in which he remained the ſpace of ſeven years, till ſuch time as his chaſtiſement giving him wiſdome had rendred to him his health and Scepter. After he had prepared the ſpirit of Belſhazzar by a domeſtick example, he told him with a generous freedome, that that which he had known to happen to the perſon of that great King was ſufficient to humble him, and yet he had exalted himſelf againſt the Sovereign Monarch, and had cauſed with much mirth of heart the conſecrated Veſſels of his Temple to be prophaned, when he cauſed his Gods of gold and ſilver to be praiſed to the reproach of the true God, and that in revenge of ſo bad an action, that hand which he had ſeen on the wall was ſent from heaven, and had written three horrible words, which are, Mene, Tekel, Pheres, that is to ſay, Count, Weigh, Divide; the firſt ſignifies that God hath counted the dayes of his reign, and hath put a period to them: the ſecond, that he had been put in the balance of the Sovereign Judge, and that he had not been found found weight: the third, that his Kingdom ſhould be divided, and given for a Prey to the Medes and Perſians.

It is a ſtrange thing that Daniel having made ſo doleful a prediction, King Belſhazzar entred not into wrath againſt him, but on the contrary, commanded that the purple and collar of gold ſhould be given him, which he had promiſed to the Interpreter of his viſion. But there will be leſs cauſe to wonder, if we conſider that it was a Maxim amongſt the Babylonians not to be angry with the Diviners and Aſtrologers, when they foretold any evil to come, no more then with the ſhadow of a Sun-Dial that ſhews the hour, or the Weather-cock that declares the Wind. And furthermore, this young Prince hearing his Prophet ſpeak with ſo much judgment and ſanctity, had him in eſteem for a man of God, which he ought not to offend, and beſides that by entreating him with courteſie, he hoped, that being a friend of the true Gods, he might have as much power to turn away the ſcourge wherewith he was threatned, as he had underſtanding to know it, and force of ſpirit to foretel it.

One might alſo marvel that Daniel, who at the beginning teſtified that he made ſmall account of the riches and greatneſs of the Court, for all that accepted of the purple, of the chain; and of the dignity of the third perſon in the Kingdom, that was preſented to him. But we ought to obſerve, that ſometimes it is an infirmity of ſpirit not to be able to endure honour when it comes by a Divine diſpoſal and a ſecret of Providence over us. This wiſe Courtier conſidered, that being of his own nature ſo far from all theſe things, they came to ſeek him out in his ſolitude, and that it was a ſign of God that would have it ſo, not for him, but for the benefit of his Nation, which was much more favourably uſed in matter of the exerciſe of their Religion when he was in favour; beſides that the virtue and moderation which he made glitter in all his actions, even in his higheſt proſperities, contrary to the ordinary manner of all thoſe that were then at Court, gave more glory to God, then if he had been perpetually hidden in an obſcure life.

It was an indiſcretion in Belſhazzar to expreſs ſo much aſtoniſhment, and to diſcloſe that prediction, by reaſon that there was a ſecret conſpiracy againſt him which was plotted amidſt thoſe publick diſſolutions; and the conſpiratours were the more animated to the execution of that enterpriſe, when they knew that that Prodigy threatned him. The ſame night they performed their wicked deſign, and outrageouſly murdered him, after he had reigned but nine moneths ſince his Fathers death. The principal men of the Kingdom that were of the conſpiracy choſe one of their complices named Nabonidus, who is called in Scripture Darius the Mede, who knowing the Prophecy of Daniel, and the freedom with which he had ſpoken to the King, eſteemed him for it, and retained him at the Court in the quality which his Predeceſſour had given him a night before his death. When he ſaw himſelf eſtabliſhed in favour again, he forgat not God, his heart being always animated with a zeal to his Religion; and when he ſaw his King inclining to the Superſtition of the Country, his heart was much grieved at it, and he endeavours to cleanſe him from his errours, ſeeing him to be of a diſpoſition too ſimple and credulous to the prejudice of the truth.

Amongſt theſe falſe Deities, Bel was ador'd with an exquiſite & ſumptuous worſhip, in as much as there were offered to him every day out of the King's houſe twelve baskets of meal, forty ſheep, and ſix great meaſures of wine; and it was believed that that Idol did eat up all the offerings. The King that loved Daniel ſo much as to make him dine ſometimes at his own table, deſired that he would accommodate himſelf to the Laws of the Country, and that he would expreſs ſome affection to the ſervice of that great Bel that was adored univerſally by all the Nation. But this wiſe Courtier anſwered him freely that he would never worſhip any but the true living God. Darius replyed, that there was nothing required to be adored but to live; Bel was truly the living God, becauſe he did eat and drink well, and coſt much to feed him. Daniel ſmiling anſwered, that it was a great ſimplicity to think that that Idol did eat up all that was offered him every day. Whereupon the King was moved with a curioſity to know how all this went, and having cauſed the ordinary viands to be offered at Bel's altar, carefully ſaw all the doors of the Temple ſhut, and put Guards before them that no body might enter in. Daniel before he went out thence with the King, cauſed abundance of Aſhes to be ſown there, hoping by this means to diſcover the Impoſture. The morrow after the King cauſed the doors to be opened that had remained faſt ſhut with his own ſeal, and when as he entred in he ſaw that all the victuals had been taken away, he cryed out that Bel was a great God, and that it muſt needs be acknowledged that he did eat excellently well, ſeeing nothing of all thoſe offerings was remaining. But Daniel inſtantly made him ſee upon the Aſhes the ſteps of thoſe that had entred, whereat he was aſtoniſhed, and called for all the Prieſts of that Idol, to whom he ſhewed their cheat, and preſſed them ſo eagerly that they diſcovered certain little doors under the Altar through which they entred to the number of threeſcore and ten, beſides women and little children to devour the ſacrifice. The King was aſham'd at the ſimplicity of his belief, this ſhame paſſed into wrath, and wrath proceeded as far as bloud, cauſing him to put to death all the Impoſtours.

Furthermore, in the ſame place there was a Dragon which was yet worſhiped by that ſuperſtitious people, which Daniel, after he had obtained the permiſſion of the King, killed by making a maſs compoſed of pitch, of greaſe and of hair, which he made him ſwallow, and with it choak himſelf.

This made a great commotion amongſt the people that ſaid that the King was become a Jew, cauſing his Prieſts to be murthered, and killing the Dragon, that there was now nothing remaining but to ſtrangle all the ſenſe of the Ancient Religion. In ſuch a manner that behold a great tempeſt is raiſed againſt Daniel, which in the opinion of all the world, threatned him with an inevitable death. The Grandees of the Realm endeavour to raine him by all ways, and conſidering that he was exact and irreproachable in his office, they reſolve to enſnare him in a matter of Religion. Under colour of gratifying the King they beſeech him to make an Edict, that whoſoever ſhould deſire any thing of the Gods or of men, for the ſpace of thirty days, except of the King, ſhould be caſt into the Lions-den, which the King granted them, not knowing what their malice plotted againſt the innocence of his Prophet and Officer of State. He was watched on all ſides, and retired himſelf from the King to diminiſh the jealouſie that men had of him for the favours he received from him.

All

All his conſolation was in Prayer, and in thoſe amiable diſcourſes which he had with God; and therefore he was afflicted as much as can be expreſſed, ſeeing that the King his Maſter let himſelf be perſwaded to make an edict ſo outrageous againſt the honour of God, as to forbid to pray unto him. Yet this hindered not him from continuing his oraiſons, lifting up thrice a day his weeping eyes on that ſide whereon the Temple of Jeruſalem was built, and ſighing in the preſence of his great Maſter with the ardours of an heart that evaporated it ſelf all in Love.

The nobles that were every day at his door failed not to ſurpriſe him, and to accuſe him that he had tranſgreſſed the Edict, which he acknowledged freely. Complaints of it were ſuddenly made to his Majeſty whoſe heart was wounded for the affection that he bare to Daniel, and he laboured even till the Sun ſet to ſave him; nevertheleſs ſeeing himſelf preſſed violently by his Edict, and the vehemence which the Nobles uſed that it ſhould be obſerved, he abandoned the innocent to their fury againſt his will. This defiles the conſcience of many great men, who are evil-doers of their diſpoſition, and yet for all that commit great evils through the complacency that they give to the violent humours of thoſe that are about them. He had ſome hope that Daniel would eſcape, and that the God which he adored would ſave him, and therefore he made no reſiſtance by arms, but delivered him into their hands to be caſt into that horrible den of the Lions that had been kept hungry on purpoſe that he might be the ſooner devoured.

But, O God of wonders, what Prodigie is here! The Lions worſhip their prey; Daniel is viſited in that Cave by a Prophet come in an inſtant from Judea by the Miniſtry of an Angel that brought him his dinner. The beaſts change their Nature, and Nature forces her Laws for the reſpect of a ſervant of God. The King that had lain down without his ſupper, and had not ſlept all night for the fear that he had for his poor Daniel, runs early in the morning to the Lions-den, which he had cauſed to be ſhut up with a great ſtone put upon the mouth of it, and ſtamped with his own Seal, and there cryes out with a lamentable voyce, asking of Daniel whether he were yet alive; who made him ſee how the God that he adored had delivered him and preſerved him from all evil; Whereat he was ſo raviſhed, that he began to look upon him as an heavenly man, cauſed his accuſers to be apprehended, to be expoſed to the ſame Lions, who devoured them immediately, and publiſhed an Edict in favour of the true Religion. This King reigned ſeventeen years, til ſuch time as Cyrus by a moſt particular deſign of God ſeized upon the Monarchy and dealt favourably with the faithfull people. Daniel remained alwayes very conſiderable, having ſeen five Kings paſs away, and was at laſt honoured even by his enemies themſelves for his rare virtues, and for the wonders that God had placed in his perſon. One may obſerve in his life abundance of Lineaments that adorn highly the converſation of a true Courtier, as are, his conſtancy in Religion, his Devotion, the tenderneſs of his love to God, his Charity towards his neighbour, his modeſty, his ſparingneſs to ſpeak of himſelf, his Moderation in Proſperity, his Strength of ſpirit in Adverſity, his inviolable Firmneſs never to yeeld to ſin, his exact faithfulneſs towards his Maſter, his Conſcience, Science, and Ability in the Adminiſtration of his Charges, his Love to his Friends, his Compaſſion to the Miſerable, his affability towards all the World, his patient enduring of the humours of Strangers, his Prudence in his Conduct, and the bleſſing of God that made all his enterpriſes proſper.

THE RELIGIOUS MEN.

ELIJAH. ELISHA.

BEhold here an admirable Courtier that was never of the number of thoſe flatterers of the Court that keep Truth in Iron-Chains, and give to vices the colour of virtue. Elijah was a Prophet that included the name of God, and of the Sun in his Name, and who all his life-time bare the perfections of them both, as being a true child of Light, of Fire, and a viſible image of the inviſible beauties.

beauties. As he was yet hanging at his mothers breast, his father had a vision, by which it seemed to him that his son sucked fire instead of Milk, and nourished himself with a most pure flame, which without offending him, furnished him with an Aliment as delicious as possible. So was he all his life a man of fire; and as it seemed that that King of Elements followed the course of his words and will, so he burnt also in the Interiour with that fire that kindles the hearts of Angels.

He was the first of men that set up the Standard of Virginity, that consecrated it upon his body when it was unknown and despised in the World, who made an Angelical order of the Mount Carmel to which he hath transmitted his Spirit through a long and sweet posterity that hath found sources of contemplation which he derived to the World to water the barrenness of the Earth, that hath traced the Originals of all his virtues upon that fair Carmel, upon that sacred solitude that was his first Terrestrial Paradise.

His Speech was Thunder, and his life Lightning, his Example a School of great Actions, his Zeal a Devouring fire, his Negotiations the affairs of Eternity, his Conversation an Idea of the Contemplative and Civil Life, his Translation a Miracle without peer. I leave to those that have undertaken to write his Life the retail of his Virtues and of his Miracles, staying onely upon his Actions that he did at Court, treating with the Kings Achab, Jehu, Abazias, and the wicked Queen Jezabel.

He flourished nine hundred years before the Nations of our Lord in the Kingdom of Israel, which was then divided both by Religion and by Policy from that of Judah and Jerusalem. Ahab the son of Amri, an ill Crow of an ill Egg, held then the Empire. and being married to a Sidonian the daughter of the King of Sidon which was called Jezabel, an haughty and malicious woman, he was totally governed by her, and to render himself complacent to her humours caused a Temple to be erected to the God Baal, and near that Temple a Grove to be planted, where were committed all the Abominations, ordinary to Idolaters.

Elijah that burned with the Zeal of the honour of God, was touched with a most sensible grief by so scandalous an Action, and was stirred up by his great Master to destroy that Mystery of Iniquity. Now, he knowing that it was hard to Preach efficaciously the Truth to Spirits froliking it in the midst of the smiling prosperities of the World, thought, by the order of the God of the Universe, that it was best to afflict that wicked people by a long famine and great adversities to make them reflect upon themselves, and return to the Worship of the true Religion. He sware then aloud and publickly before Ahab for the punishment of his Idolatry, that there should not be during three years either rain or dew upon the earth, and that the Heavens should become Brass to chastise that Age of Iron, and that he should not expect that it should be opened during that time, unless it were by the words of his mouth.

As soon as he had said this in the presence of witnesses he went away to the Eastern Coast; and hid himself at the Brook of Carith over against Jordan, where God nourished him by Ravens that brought him orderly every day his portion. In the mean while the drought failed not to raise a great famine on the earth, and chiefly in the Kingdom of Israel, where one could see nothing but people crying with hunger; but the Heavens took in hand to revenge the God of Heaven, and the Clouds that are as the Breasts of the Earth, had no water for a people that abused the Elements and all the Creatures to the prejudice of the Creatour.

In the mean while, God that spares not always the Lands and Goods of his servants in a common havock, that they may not amuse themselves on the vain prosperities of the World, permitted that that Brook that furnished the Prophet with water, should grow dry as well as the rest. But as the Ocean which retires it self out of one River, swells it self in another, so this great Nursing-father of Elias that seemed to fail in matter of that little Rivulet, recompensed it by the miraculous liberality of a poor Widow. He forsook not that station that Providence had assigned him, although barren, before he had orders for it from God his Master, who sent him to the Countrey of Sidon to Sarepta, assuring him that he had already provided for his nourishment.

The Prophet arriving at the destined place, found at the City-gate a poor Widow-woman, the mother of a little son, and forasmuch as he knew that the Famine was great every where, that he might not astonish her at first, he desired of her only a glass of water, which she gave him with a good will, after which, he prayes her to add to it a morsel of bread; but the woman sware to him that she had but one handful of Meal left in the great rigour of Famine, and that she was going to gather two or three small sticks, to make a little fire and to bake a Cake, which would be the last that she and her son should eat in all their lives, for after that repast they must resolve to die. Yet for all this Elijah orders her to make him a little loaf baked under the ashes, and to think afterward upon her self and son, and assure her self that neither her Meal, nor Oyl should diminish any thing till such time as the Famine should be past.

It was a strong proof of the faith of this Sidonian that commanded her to take away the Bread from her self and her son to give it to a stranger, and quitting that which she had in her hands to rest upon uncertainties: Yet she obeyed in that great necessity, yielding more to a man that she knew not for the esteem that she had of his virtue, and the opinion which she had that he was the servant of the great God, then to her own life. So true it is That the Considerations of Religion and of Religious persons touch even the souls of Pagans and of Infidels. So was she worthily requited, having a little inexhaustible treasure in her house, which was sufficient for her Prophet, for her self and for her child and this was a particular mercy of the Sovereign power to her, that called her to his knowledge by this miracle, and would not that Elijah should eat alone the bread which he multiplyed by the words of his mouth, but that he should give part of it to the poor, as our Saviour did afterward; God ordaining that good miracles should be never vain, but profitable to the soul and body of men created after the image of God. While he stayed in this house, the son of the Dame of it dyed of a burning Feaver, whereof this poor afflicted woman laid the fault upon Elijah, saying that he had renewed the memory of her sins before God; and Elijah, complained of God for that he had afflicted his Hostess. But that great Master did all for his own glory, for Elijah having three times contracted himself upon the dead body of the child, breathed into him the spirit of life, and restored him to his mother.

Three years being now passed in the great angui-ſhes of hunger, God commanded Elijah to preſent himſelf again to Ahab, and was reſolved to ſend ſome Rain. When the extremity of the evil was very great, and no inventions could be found to appeaſe the ſcourge, Ahab a carnal man, inſtead of having recourſe to Prayers and Supplications to eaſe his ſubjects, thought on nothing but preſerving his Horſes and his Mules. He had at his ſervice and at his Court in quality of a ſuperintendent of his Houſe and of his Levies, a great and good man named Abdias who moderated the furies of that wicked Court, ſaved the Prophets of God when they were perſecuted, and greatly comforted the People. Ahab reſolved to go one way, and ſend him the other, to ſeek ſome herbage to feed his Cattle.

As Abdias was going along his way, he met with Elijah the Prophet, whom the King had cauſed to be ſearched after in his own territories, and through all the neighbouring Kingdoms, without being ever able to learn any news of him. And therefore he was very much amazed at that accoſt, and asked him if he were Elijah, whereto he anſwered, that he was the very ſame, and that he ſhould go and give Ahab information of his coming. The other making him a low Reverence with his face to the Earth, replyed, wherein have I ever offended you, that you ſhould deliver me into the hands of Ahab with an intention to cauſe me to be put to death: For it is true that there is no Kingdom nor Nation, whither my Maſter hath not ſent to enquire news of you, without ever getting any light of you; and now if I ſhould go tell the King of your arrival, and the ſpirit of God ſhould carry you away (as it doth ordinarily) to tranſport you into ſome other part, I ſhould be found a Liar, and the King would take away my life. What good would it do you to be the cauſe of my death, ſeeing that I have feared God even from mine infancy, and have always honoured his ſervants ſo far as to preſerve an hundred Prophets from the horrours of the Perſecution, and nouriſht them ſecretly at mine own charge in Caves wherein they were hidden? Do not deprive your ſelf now of a ſervant that is moſt gained unto you, The Prophet aſſured him, and ſware to him that he would appear before Ahab.

By which I find that this Abdias was very prudent in that he would not raſhly carry a news to his Maſter that ſhould be without effect; becauſe that great ones are eaſily incenſed, when men are ſo light as to promiſe them what they ask, and anſwer not their expectation; beſides that, if they are fruſtrated of their deſire, they think themſelves to be ſlighted, and are angry even at the times, and elements, that do not apply themſelves to their humours. When therefore he was aſſured by the inviolable oath of a Prophet, he went to the King and told him that he had met with Elijah who was ready to preſent himſelf to his Majeſty.

This Prince that burned with a paſſion to ſee him, ſtayed not till he could come to ſee him, fearing leſt he ſhould ſteal away again, but went to meet him in perſon, and having found him, asked him with diſdain, whether he was not the man that embroiled all his Kingdom? The Prophet as bold as a Lion anſwered him, that he had never embroiled any thing, but that the trouble came from his Fathers houſe, and from him, for that they had forſaken God and followed Baal; and that if he would know by experience the errour wherein he was, that he ſhould make an Aſſembly on Mount Carmel of all the People of Iſrael, and ſummon thither the four hundred and fifty falſe Prophets that are every day fed at Queen Jezabel's Table, and that there ſhould be decided the buſineſs of Religion.

It was an high attempt, on which Elijah had never ſo much as dreamed, had he not had an expreſs Revelation from God: for one ought not lightly to commit the verity of the faith before the Court and the Common people to uncertain diſputes and doubtful accidents from whence the Pagans and Hereticks may by chance draw ſome advantage. But the Prophet being well aſſured on his ſide; King Ahab expoſed himſelf on His to cauſe a great revolt among his ſubjects, and a manifeſt divorce with his wife. Yet God would have it ſo, to diſabuſe him, and to bring him back to the true Religion.

As ſoon as he had then accepted the condition and commanded the aſſembly, there were gathered together an infinite number of people (there being nothing that ſo much tempts curioſity as the affairs of Religion.) It was then, that one might ſee the aſſurance and vigour of a true ſervant of God; for he obſerving that the King and people who had not yet choaked all the ſeeds of Truth, floated in divers opinions, ſpake ſolemnly to them, That it was no longer time to halt ſometimes on one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, and that if Baal were God they ought to follow him, but if there were no other God but that of Iſrael, called upon from all times by their fathers, it was he to whom they ought to adhere with an inviolable fidelity. To this the aſſembly made no anſwer, there being none that was willing to let himſelf forward upon an uncertainty. Then Elijah taking the word again ſaid, Behold four hundred and fifty Prophets of Baal on one ſide; and I a Prophet of the true God all alone on the other part in this place here; To make a tryal of our Religion, let there be two Oxen given us, for each of the two parties, let them be cut in pieces, and the pieces put upon a pile of wood without putting any fire to them either on one ſide or on the other; we will expect it from heaven, and the ſacrifice upon which God ſhall make a flame appear from on high to kindle it, ſhall carry away the teſtimony of the true Religion.

To this all the people anſwered with a confuſed voyce, that it was a good Propoſition. The victims were brought, ſacrificed, and put upon the wood to be conſumed. The Prieſts of Baal began firſt to invoke the heavenly fire, and to torment themſelves with great cries, and a long time without any effect. It was already mid-day, and nothing had appeared to their advantage, whereat being very much aſtoniſhed, they drew out their Razors, and make voluntary inciſions upon themſelves according to their cuſtom, thinking that a prayer was never well heard, if it were not accompanied with their bloud, which the evil Spirit made them ſhed in abundance to ſatiate his Rage.

This nothing advanced the effect of their ſupplications; which gave occaſion to Elijah to mock at the vanity of their Gods, ſaying, that Baal, that gave no anſwer, was aſleep, or buſie, or on a journey, or perhaps drinking at the Tavern. He remained there with ſecurity amidſt ſo many enraged Wolves, covered with the protection of the God of Hoſts, and began to prepare his Sacrifice, taking twelve ſtones in memory of the twelve Tribes of Iſrael, to erect an Altar to the name of God; after which he divided the Offering into divers parts, put them all upon the upon the pile, and that none might have any ſuſpicion that there was fire hidden in ſome part of them, he cauſed abundance of Buckets of water to be thrown upon the Sacrifice, and all about it, and then began to ſay, Great God, God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Iſrael, ſhew now that thou art the God of this people, and that I am thy ſervant, I have obeyed thee in all this, reſting my ſelf upon thy word; Hear me my God, my God hear me, and let this aſſembly learn this day of thee, that thou art the true God, and the abſolute Maſter of all the univerſe, and that it is thou that art able to reduce their hearts to the true beſief.

Scarce had he ended his prayer when the ſacred fire fell down from heaven upon his Sacrifice and devoured the Offering and the Altar, to the admiration of all the People; who proſtrating themſelves on the ground began to cry, That the God of Iſrael was the true God. Take then ſayes he, the falſe Prophets of Baal, and let not one ſole man of them eſcape us. The People convinced by the Miracle and the voice of Elijah without expecting any other thing, fall upon thoſe falſe Prophets, takes them, and cuts them all in pieces. Ahab amidſt all this ſtood ſo aſtoniſhed that he durſt not ſpeak one onely word, nor any way reſiſt the Divine Command.

The Prophet bid him take his refection, and go into his Coach, for the ſo much deſired rain was near, and having ſaid ſo, retired himſelf to the top of the Mount Carmel, and ſent his Servant ſeven times to the ſea, to ſee whether he could diſcover any clouds; but he ſaw nothing till the ſeventh time, and then he perceived a little cloud that exceeded not the meaſure of a hand; and yet he ſends him to tell Ahab that it was time to harneſſe, if he would not be overtaken with the rain. He mounted inſtantly into his Coach to get to the City of Jezreel, and Elijah ran before as if he had wings.

In the mean time the Heavens grew black with darkneſſe, the clouds collect themſelves, the winde blowes and the rain fals in abundance. Ahab failed not to relate to Jezabel all that had been done, deſiring to make the death of thoſe Prophets paſs for a decree of heaven, for fear leaſt that imperious woman ſhould upbraid him with the ſoftneſſe of his courage. But ſhe not moved with thoſe great miracles of fire and water, that were reported to her, began to foam with wrath, and to ſwear by all her Gods that ſhe would cauſe Elijah's head to be laid at her feet by the Morrow that time.

The Prophet is conſtrained to fly ſuddenly to ſave himſelf, not knowing to whom to truſt; ſo that having brought with him but one young man to accompany him in the way, he quitted him and went alone into the wilderneſſe, wherein having travelled a day he entred into a great ſadneſſe, and laid him down under a Juniper-tree to repoſe himſelf, and there felt himſelf very weary of living any longer, and ſaid to God with an amorous heart; My God, it is enough, take me out of this life, I am not better then my fathers. It is a paſſion ordinary enough to good men to wiſh for death, that they may be no more obliged to ſee ſo many ſins and miſeries as are in the World, and to go to the place of reſt to contemplate there the face of the living God. But this deſire ought to be moderated according to the will of God.

As he was in that thought, ſleep that eaſily ſurprizes a melancholy ſpirit, and wearied with raving on its pains, ſlipt into his benummed members and gave ſome truce to his torments. But that great God that had his eyes open to the protection of ſo dear a perſon diſpatched to him his guardian Angel, who awaked him, and ſhewed him near his head a cruſe of water and a loaf of bread baked under the aſhes (for ſuch are the banquets that the bountiful Father of all Nature makes his Prophets, not loving them for the delights of the body; but contenting himſelf to give them that which is neceſſary to life) he ſaw well that it was a Providence that would yet prolong his life. He drank and eat, and at length being heavy fell aſleep again. But the Angel that had undertaken the direction of his way waked him, and told him that it behoved him to riſe quickly, by reaſon that he had yet a long way to go. Elijah obeyed, and being riſen, found that he had gained a marvellous ſtrength, ſo that he journyed fourty dayes and fourty nights being fortified with that Angelical bread, till ſuch time as he came to the Mountain Horeb. There he retired himſelf into the hollow of a Rock, unknown to men, but well known to God that appeared to him and comforted him, asking of him what he made there? Whereto he anſwered, That he was zealous with an ardent zeal for the God of Hoſts, but the children of Iſrael had forſaken him, demoliſhed his Altars, killed his Prophets, and that he alone remained; yet for all that they ceaſed not to ſeek his life to extinguiſh the whole ſervice of God. Upon this God commanded him to come forth, and to ſtand upon the Mountain to ſee great ſights cauſed by the preſence of God. And ſuddenly there came an impetuous whirlwind that overturned the Mountains and brake the Rocks, but God was not therein; after that impetuous Wind came an Earthquake, but God was not therein; after the Earthquake devouring-fire, but God was not in thoſe flames; after the Fire, behold there came a ſmall gracious gale, and God was in it. And therefore Elijah raviſhed with a profound reſpect covered his face with his Mantle, and kept himſelf at the entry of his Cave, where he heard a voice that demanded of him again what he did there? Whereto he anſwered as before, that he fled from the perſecution of thoſe that would give him the ſtroke of death for the zeal which he had to the ſervice of the living God.

But the voice commanded him to return, and to take again his way through the deſart into Damaſcus, and gave him order to anoint and declare two Kings, the one over Syria, which was Hazael, and the other over Iſrael, which was Jehu that ſhould ſucceed his Perſecutour. Furthermore, God informed him, that all was not loſt, but that he had yet reſerved to himſelf ſeven thouſand ſervants that had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor lifted up their hands to adore his Idol. He added yet farther, that he ſhould take Eliſha for his Companion and Succeſſour, of whom he had reaſon to expect good effects.

Such was Elijah's Viſion, and his diſcourſe with God; and it ſeemed that this Sovereign Teacher of the Prophets, ſhewing him the repreſentation of an impetuous wind, of an Earthquake, and of Fire, in which God was not, although he was in a little gentle blaſt, and would ſignifie to him that His Spirit is not in thoſe great commotions that would ſeem to overturn all nature, but in a certain Calm that produces little noiſe, but much fruit filling the earth with bleſſings. So alſo would he make him hope, that after theſe violent perſecutions, and thoſe fatall Convulſions of Kingdoms, there ſhould come a ſweet and peacefull Meſſias; and that for as much as concerned him, Jezabel's perſecution ſhould ceaſe, and his ſoul after the toyles of that baniſh-ment should taste the sweetness of an anticipated Paradise.

He took then his way again according to the command of God without passing by Samaria, and finding Elisha plowing the ground with twelve yoak of Oxen, cast his Mantle on him, to signifie to him that he was called of God to that sacred ministery of Prophecy, which the other understood, and quitting instantly his Oxen ran to Elijah, whom he beseeched that he would permit him to go and give the kiss of peace to his Father and Mother; after that, he would adhere to nothing, but render himself up to him: which Elijah having granted, he, when he had acquitted himself of his duty, returned and sacrificed two Oxen which he boiled with the wood of his Plough, and made a Feast with them for the people; after which he ranged himself under the conduct of the Prophet, and was a perfect imitatour of his virtues.

An ill occasion embarked him again in a Combat against Ahab and Jezabel, which was fatal to them both. The King had a mind to enlarge his Gardens, and Naboth's Vineyard was near his Palace, and for his advantage; he calls for him, and asks him very courteously for it, promising to pay him the price that it was worth, or to buy him a better inheritance in whatsoever place he would. The desire was very civill, and not like that of so many other Princes and Lords, that disposed at that time of the goods of their subjects as of their own, usurping by violence that which they could not have by right. Yet this good man, that measured all by the affection he bare his Vineyard and not by the submission he owed his Master, was obstinate, and told him, That it was the wealth of his Fathers, which he would no way part with.

Ahab was much troubled at this denyal, and returning to his Palace threw himself upon his bed, and would not eat at the ordinary hour of his repast. The Queen his wife being surprised at that accident goes to see him, and inquires after the cause of his indisposition, which he declared to her out of a desire he had to receive some ease. This Princess which was a daughter of the King of Sidon, and who knew how her Father reigned absolutely over his subjects falls a laughing, and meaning to blame the weakness of her husband, said to him; It appears plainly, Sir, that you are a Prince of great authority, very worthy to govern a Kingdom, since you receive affronts from your subjects, and revenge them upon your self by the loss of your dinner. But if that be all that hinders you, I pray arise, be merry and eat, for I know the way to make you possessour of that Vineyard that you desire.

At the same instant that Imperious Queen takes her Seal, writes a Letter to the Principal men of Jezreel, and commands them to call an Assembly, under colour of a Fast and Publick Prayers, to call Naboth to it, to make him sit amongst the chief, and not to fail to suborn two witnesses against him, that should depose that he had blasphemed against God and his King, and thereupon indite him, and stone him.

Behold how so many Ministers of Iniquity use the Innocent, not seeing that at the same time as they lay snares against the honour, the goods, and the life of their neighbour, an invisible Hand draws up in Heaven the decree of their ruine. This Letter being come to Jezreel, the principal men assembled themselves, and not seeking any delay or incident to sweeten a bad business, betray their conscience to avoid the fury of the King, executing that which was commanded them, and before they are Judges render themselves Criminal. Thus go violent Reigns, where virtue is abandoned by some through weakness, and persecuted by others through fury. Miserable Naboth astonished at that wicked calumny, protests his innocence in the face of Heaven and Earth, justifies and defends himself by good reason; but the false Witnesses, which are the instruments of Satan, and the chief furies against the peace of mankind, urge and torment him; His Judges sold to iniquity condemned him; He is led out of the City, delivered to the fury of the people, overwhelmed, as a Blasphemer of God and the King, with a bloody tempest of Stones and Flints, every hand making it self injurious against him, some through a false zeal, and others through a compliance with the humours of Ahab and Jezabel.

The news of his death comes instantly to the Court, and Jezabel carries it to the King, without specifying to him any other thing, telling him onely that Naboth was out of the world, and that he might now enjoy his spoiles all at leisure. To speak Truth, Great ones have great cause to make to God David's Prayer, and to beseech him to deliver them from others sinnes, and from those that are hidden from them. Unfortunate Ahab knew nothing of all that had passed, and takes not the pains to inform himself of the manner of that death; He trusted all to his wife, and gave her his Signet, his authority, his heart and Counsels. It was enough to make him guilty to put the Government of his Kingdom into the hands of that Sidonian woman, who he might well know, had great inclinations to blood and rapine. Princes do wisely not to rely too much in every thing upon their Counsellours of State, without watching over their actions, and using all diligence to discover their deportments without believing any thing lightly either on one side or the other.

Ahab without taking any farther information was going to possess himself of Naboth's bloody spoil: when the Prophet Elijah by the command of God came and found him upon the way, and began to roar against him as a Lion; What, sayes he, Murther the Innocent, and take away his Inheritance bedewed with his blood? After this what is there more to do? Know, Sir, that the Vengeance of God hangs over your head, and that in the same place as the Doggs licked the blood of Naboth they shall lick yours. This unhappy Prince extremely amazed at so thundring a speech was not incensed against the Prophet, but endeavouring to pacifie him, said to him; Wherein have I offended you? And in what have you found me your enemy that you use me with all these rigours? You are enough mine enemy, sayes the Prophet, seeing you are God's; and since you have sold your self, through love to an Idolatrous woman, to serve her passions, and committ so many wicked acts in the face of God. In punishment of your crimes, He will ruin your House, and blot out your Posterity; the blood of that murthered Innocent will cost Jezabel dear, for she shall be eaten up of Doggs in the field of Jezreel.

Poor Ahab returns hanging down his head without passing farther, tormented on one side by the remorse of his own Conscience, and on the other by the love he bare to his Sidonian, whome he would not any way displease. He said nothing to her of all that she had done without his privity in Naboth's business, whether through affection, or through fear of her wicked Spirit. He revenges himself upon himself, ſelf, he rents his Cloaths, he faſts, he covers himſelf with ſackcloth, without putting it off even when he went to bed; which ſoftned the heart of God, who ordained that the Kingdom ſhould not be taken from him during his life, but that his poſterity ſhould be deprived of it.

Three years were ſlipt away, and Elijah was abſent, when Ahab reſolved to proclaim warr with the King of Syria, to recover Ramoth one of his Cities that the other had uſurped, and engaged Jehoſaphat King of Judah to his party, making a new Alliance of arms and intereſts with him. When they were aſſembled, Jehoſaphat, which had a zeal to the true Religion, ſaid, That it would be good to conſult with ſome Prophet before they enterprized the warr; and Ahab to content him, called for four hundred, but they were the falſe Prophets of his wife, who were none of the beſt, and who foretold him all falſely, that he ſhould have an happy iſſue of his enterprize. King Jehoſaphat asked Ahab, whether amongſt that great number of Baal's Prophets there were never a Prophet of the true God that one might hear ſpeak, meaning by this to induce him to his duty, and to the knowledge of the true Religion. Ahab replyed, that there was none at preſent, but a certain man named Micaiah, but he could not endure him, becauſe he prophecyed nothing but miſchief to him. Jehoſaphat ſaid, that he ought not for that to hate him, but that it would be good to hear him; and inſtantly was ſent away a Gentleman of the Court to call him. This man ceaſed not to adviſe him upon the way to remit ſomething of that rigour that was uſual to him, and to render himſelf complacent to the King as all the other Prophets had done; whereto he anſwered, That he could do nothing againſt the Spirit of God, nor againſt his conſcience. When he was come, he perceived a great Aſſembly of falſe Prophets, who all approved that warr. One among them named Zedechiah had made himſelf iron horns, to ſignifie to King Ahab that he ſhould ranſack all Syria with a mighty power, and that nothing ſhould reſiſt his Arms. But Micaiah being asked, ſpake at firſt by fiction, as the other Prophets, foretelling proſperities without end. Whereat the King being aſtoniſhed that he did it againſt his cuſtom, conjured him not to flatter him, and to tell him openly the truth. To which he anſwered, that he would not counſel him to hazard a battel againſt the King of Syria, for if he did, his whole Army would be ſcattered; and added alſo, that God had given permiſſion to the wicked ſpirit to deceive him, and that he had found no better way to do it, then to ſpeak by the mouth of ſo many falſe Prophets that encompaſſed him. Whereupon Zedechiah being incenſed at that ſpeech gave him a blow, and the King commanded his Perſon to be ſeized on, and to be put in priſon, to be kept there faſting with bread of tribulation and water of anguiſh till his return. But the Prophet aſſured him, that if he went he ſhould never return again.

It is a ſtrange thing that we cannot believe Truth that comes from the mouth of God's ſervants, becauſe it complies not with our paſſion. It is alſo a manifeſt puniſhment to thoſe that deſpiſe it, not to conſider that God begins the ruine of their fortune by the blinding of their Counſels. Ahab obſtinate to his miſery marches with all his Army againſt the King of Syria; Jehoſaphat engaged through inconſideration in that league, purſues what he had ill begun; and thinks, that there is no better means to juſtifie an errour, then Perſeverance.

When the two Kings approached the enemy, and the Armies were ranged in Battel, the King of Syria gave expreſs charge to his moſt reſolute men to aim at the King of Iſrael, and to endeavour to carry him, it being the true means to diſpatch the buſineſs and put an end to the warr. Ahab began to fear his unhappineſs, and prayed Jehoſaphat to go into the mingling, putting him forward with courage out of a deſign, perhaps, to cauſe him to be deſtroyed, and to draw all the weight of the Army upon him, by diverting it from his perſon; And indeed, when the Syrians thought that he that engaged himſelf ſo boldly was the moſt intereſſed, and that without doubt there was all likelyhood that it was Ahab; they fell upon him with ardour, ſo that he thought he ſhould have been hemmed in. But when he betook himſelf to crying out aloud, animating his ſouldiers to his defence, the enemies that had a minde to ſpare him retired to fall on Ahab; It happened that an Archer letting fly an arrow at random ſtroke him with a mortal wound: whereupon he commanded his Coach-man to turn about, and to draw out of the mingling, well perceiving that he was grievouſly hurt. All the Army was immediately ſcattered, and the Herald of Arms proclaimed, that every man might return to his home. King Ahab dyed the ſame day, and his body was brought back to Samaria, where it happened, that as his Coach that was all bloudy was a waſhing in a pool of the ſame City, the Dogs ran thither and licked up his bloud according to Elijah's prophecy.

Ahaziah his ſon ſucceeded him inheriting the ſuperſtition and miſery of his father; for after he had reigned a very little while, he fell out at a window of his houſe, and grievouſly hurt himſelf without being ever able to finde a remedy to his evil. And having forſaken God, ſent Meſſengers to the God of Ekron to know if he ſhould recover from that ſickneſs; but the Prophet Elijah having met his Meſſengers upon the way rebuked them ſharply, for that they went to conſult with Idols, as if there were no God in Iſrael; and commanded them to tell their Maſter, that he ſhould not be cured of his wound, but ſhould dye without ever riſing out of the Bed wherein he lay. This Prince offended at this truth, cauſes the Prophet to be purſued, and ſends one of his Captains with fifty Souldiers to apprehend him: This man in a mockery called him man of God, and prayed him to deſcend from the Mountain, whether he had retired himſelf, but Elijah perſiſting alwayes in his ſpirit of rigour, ſaid, that he would give him proofs that ſhould make him know that he was not a man of God through vanity and irriſion; and at the ſame inſtant he cauſed fire to deſcend from heaven, which conſumed him and all his Company. Ahaziah ſends another of them for the ſame purpoſe, which meets alſo with the ſame ſucceſſe. He charges again a third, the Captain of which gained Elijah by ſubmiſſion, and brought him to his Maſter, to whom he ſpake conſtantly the truth, and advertiſed him of his approaching death; and the other durſt not do him any miſchief, well knowing, that he was under God's protection.

The truth of the Prophecy was manifeſt ſoon after by the death of Ahaziah, who had for ſucceſſour his brother Joram, who reigned twelve years; and although Elijah was already tranſlated from this life that is but a paſſage to another eſtate, his Prophecy failed not to be accompliſhed particularly upon the houſe of Ahab, and the wicked Jezabel. For Eliſha according to the order of God, and the command received from his Maſter, cauſed Jehu to be be crowned to reign in Israel. To this purpose he dispatched one of his Disciples, put a viol in his hand wherein was the oyl destined for his unction, giving him charge to go to Ramoth in Gilead, where Jehu one of Joram's principal Captains commanded, and besieged the city, continuing the siege that Joram had laid before it, whiles he went to Samaria, to be dressed of some wounds that he had received in the war against the Syrians. Above all he recommended to him that the business should be kept very secret, and that when he should be arrived, he should call Jehu aside, and withdraw into some chamber; and there consecrate him King with that unction that he had in his hand, making him know that God gave him his master's house and crown to revenge the bloud of the Prophets and servants of God upon the race of Ahab and on Jezabel.

This son of a Prophet sent by Elisha, did all that was commanded him; and arriving at the Camp found Jehu environed with other Captains, and signified to him that he had a word or two to speak to him, which made him quit the company, and enter into a neighbouring chamber, where the other powred out the sacred oyl upon his head, said to him, I have anointed you this day over the people of the God of Israel, and consecrated you King to ruine from God the house of Ahab your Master, and to revenge the bloud of the Prophets and servants of God upon Jezabel who shall be eaten up of Dogs and no body shall give her burial. As soon as he had said this, he opens the door and flies; Jehu comes forth, and shews himself to his Captains, who had a curiosity to know what had passed in that treaty, and asked of him what that mad-man meant that came to him. Jehu feigning that they well enough knew the cause of it, and need not go about to inform themselves, held them in expectation, and in fine, declared to them that it was one of Elisha's disciples that had brought him the news that he should reign in Israel, and that such was the will of God.

It is a wonderful thing that none of the chief men of the Army opposed themselves against it, but that all at that very instant laid down their Cloaks under Jehu's feet as it were to raise him a throne, and cryed out God save the King. The conspiracy against Joram being framed, he hinders any notice to be given him, and marches with a strong hand to the City, to surprise him and Ahaziah King of Judah together with him, that was come to visit him in his sickness. The sentinel that stood at the gate of the City told that he saw a body of Cavaliers coming in a right line to the City, whereupon the King ordered that one of his men should go out to discover it. This Scout was gained by Jehu, and ranged himself on his side. Another is sent out, which does also the same: whereat the King being much astonished takes his Coach, and Ahaziah his, to see what the business was. As soon as he perceived Jehu, he said, What are you not a man of peace? Whereto Jehu replyed, What peace, while the fornications and poysonings of Jezabel your Mother are yet in ful vigour? Joram saw plainly by his countenance, and by that answer, that there was mischief and began to wheel about, saying to Ahaziah his companion, We are betrayed, and seeing that he was no way prepared to make resistance to such a power betook himself to flight. But Jehu bending his bow lets fly an arrow at him that pierced him through and killed him in his Chariot. At the same instant he caused his body to be taken up to cast it on the road, in the field of Naboth and pursued Ahaziah who having received a mortal wound as he fled, gave up the Ghost at Megiddo, from whence he was carried to his Metropolis Jerusalem to be enterred with his Fathers.

In the mean while Jehu marches victoriously to the City of Jezreel, and the miserable Jezabel hearing of the death of her son by the conspiracy of his enemy, and considering that there was no way to oppose him by arms had recourse to the charmes of her self sex. She was yet in such a condition as she thought her capable to enamour that new King. Instead of putting on mourning, she decks and paints her self, and places her self in a window of the City in sight of all the world to see that Conquerour pass by. But he having cast his eyes on high, asked who that woman was, not being able yet well to discern her so far off, and when answer was made him that it was Jezabel the Queen, he commanded those that were in the window to throw her down, which they did without any farther deliberation, and the miserable in falling bedewed the wal with her bloud, and expired the remainder of her life under the feet of horses. Jehu remembred as he was at supper what had passed, and was touched with some remorse for the usage that had been shewed to Jezabel his Mistris, and said to his men, Look out the body of that wretched woman, and give it burial, for she was a King's daughter. And when they were come upon the place they found nothing but her head, with the ends of her feet and hands, the Dogs having eat up the rest. This history is horrible, and none can sufficiently imagine the vengeance of God upon those that violate Religion, and shed the bloud of sacred persons and other of God's servants.

One cannot justifie Jehu for the rebellion against his Master, but in taking him for a scourge of the wrath of God: who was an instrument of his Justice without for all that becoming just. For whatsoever pretence he made of Religion, he was pushed on by a tempestuous and bloudy ambition; and made himself a Revenger of Tyrants for no other end: but to be their successour, filling with crimes the place that he had voided by fury. He made use of the Prophets for his own interest, and left not to continue the Idolatry of the golden Calves, to render himself pleasing to the most powerful. He was an ambiguous spirit, and had as many waters and folds, as he had pretensions. He caused his Mistris to be killed more for the fear of his mind then for the zeal of Religion. This poor Sidonian that was a woman of a good understanding and courage, instead of living quietly with her husband, was pricked on with a vanity to make her Gods be worshipped, and ceased not to persecute the Prophets, having sworn that she would cause Elijah to be murthered, making him to be followed and sought after in all places without being able to entrap him. But on the contrary, he ruined her with all her house, leaving a terrour to all great ones to enterprise any thing against those that are protected under the covert of the face of God.

As this Prophet had been a man of Prodigies in all his life, so God limited his conversation amongst men with a strange miracle that since Enoch had not been practised in the world. It is said that an egg well emptied and filled with dew, will mount on high and follow the raies of the Sun that draws it. So Elijah by a long exercise of contemplation was purified from all earthly things, and filled with the unction of the Spirit of God. He thought on nothing but on Heaven, where he had lodged the better part of himself. God had revealed to him that he

he ſhould not die after the manner of other men, but that he ſhould be rapt and carried away into a place of peace and reſt. He expected that moſt happy day, & thought to ſteal away even from his own Diſciple Eliſha that would never quit him. They were walking both together after they had paſſed the River Jordan on dry foot, Elijah having divided it with his Mantle, when behold a burning Chariot drawn with horſes of fire comes to take up the Prophet. Eliſha his Diſciple had earneſtly begged of him, that his Spirit might be multiplied in him, as well in what touches Prophecy as the gift of Miracles, and Elijah promiſed him that it ſhould be granted to him, in caſe that he could ſee him when he ſhould be taken up. And this is the reaſon for which that dear Diſciple never went out of his ſight ſo much as one moment, and when that Chariot ſurrounded with innocent flames preſented it ſelf, he ſaw his Maſter aſcend who was on a ſudden ſnatched up above the Clouds of Heaven, in recompence of his zeal and moſt pure Virginity. Eliſha looked upon him with tears in his eys calling him his Father, the Chariot of Iſrael, and the Conductour of the people of God. In fine, when he appeared no longer, he rent his clothes wearing mourning for a loſs common to all the people of Iſrael, but very particular to him; and gathered up his Mantle as a precious Relique, which he carefully kept, making uſe of it to divide the waters of Jordan, and to renew the Miracles of his Maſter.

Elijah according to the common opinion was tranſported to the Terreſtrial Paradiſe from which he is to come at the renovation of the world. And as if in that dwelling of delights he had not yet caſt away the care and direction of the Court, Joram King of Judah received a Letter from him nine years after his Tranſlation, in which he chid ſharply for his bad deportments, and foretold him the ſickneſs that ſhould happen to him. Some hold that that Letter was written by Elijah before he was taken up by way of Prophecy, and kept till that time by Eliſha. Others as the Hebrews think that it came by Miracle and by the Miniſtery of an Angel, directed by Elijah at the ſame time, to teach us, That the Saints renounce not a Legitimate care of the Court, and of the Affairs of the World, when they are to be directed to the glory of God, to whom the Living and the Dead ought to render the Homages of their Fidelity.

ELISHA.

HE that hath ſeen Elijah cannot be ignorant of Eliſha, ſeeing his maſter made him heir of his Spirit (as it were) by a wonderful tranſpiration. That man of fire engraved his character upon the perſon that he loved moſt in all the world, with ſo perfect an expreſſion, that he ſeemed to be born again in him in every thing that he had of excellency.

He went to take a new life in a terreſtrial Paradiſe without looſing that which he had in the world. He lived in the one by himſelf, and in the other by Eliſha; in the one he performed contemplative Functions, and in the other, active; in the one he was a Demi-God, and in the other the Prince of men. That Mantle of Elijah was more then an heaven beſpangled with its Starres, ſince it carried ſo many Lights and Sciences. It dried up the waters of Jordan, but it opened at the ſame time ſprings of Wiſdome. It was an Oracle (more admirable then the gift of the high Prieſt) that ſpake without a voice, and taught without a ſchole, that could change in a moment Ignorants into Doctours, and Peaſants into Prophets.

Eliſhah was taken from the plough, and after he had tilled the earth, he manured his own ſpirit. He that commanded a little field, exerciſed his Empire over great kingdoms; he made and unmade Kings, as the true ſervant of Elijah, or rather as the Interpreter of God. Happy are the lands (ſaid one) that were heretofore tilled by the hands of Triumphers, and with a Plough crowned with Lawrels, but more happy thoſe of Eliſha, that experimented that ſame arm as was to divide the waters and crown Kings.

O what a great thing is Nothing in the hands of God! ſince that a man come from the plough does miracles in Nature, and prodigies in Empires. His wonders have in ſome ſort exceeded thoſe of his maſter, for he reſembled the ſhoots of the Vine that raiſe themſelves even above the tree that have ſerved for a prop. We let paſs all that he did amongſt the people, to conſider him treating with the Kings and Princes of the earth, where we ſhall ſee how he brought the Maxims of heaven.

The firſt encounter that happened to him at Court, was with three Kings, Jehoſhaphat King of Juda, Joram King of Iſrael, and the King of Idumea. Joram had taken arms againſt the King of Moab, that refuſed to pay him a certain tribute, and had drawn to his party thoſe two other Kings that went to aid him in perſon. Now as they paſſed through the deſarts of Idumea, they were in extreme want of water, ſo that the men and beaſts were ready to periſh; which put Joram in an unſpeakable grief, ſeeing he had aſſembled thoſe two Kings with their Armes, to make them die with thirſt. Jehoſhaphat, that was more pious then he, counſels him to have recourſe to God by the interceſſion of ſome Prophet. One of his Courtiers ſuggeſt Eliſha to him, who was near the place. The three Kings go to ſeek him in a company, to implore his aid.

But as ſoon as the Prophet ſaw Joram the ſon of Ahab, who was an Idolater, as his father had been, he ſaid to him with an incomparable conſtancy, What have we to doe together? Go and conſult with the Prophets of your father and of your mother Jezabel; thoſe that are the ſervants of God, are not for you. This was to expreſs contempt enough to a King, and yet it is the faſhion of men at Court not to be repulſed at firſt by the diſdains and anger of a man with whom they have buſineſs. This man purſues and tells him, that it was a piteous ſpectacle to ſee thre Kings periſh for thirſt, and ready to be delivered into the hands of the Moabites. Eliſha remaining in the ſame opinion, replyed, were it not for the reſpect I bear Jehoſhaphat, who is a worſhipper of the true God, I would not ſo much as look you in the face.

Which diſcovers clearly, that alliance with Infidels, although for certain neceſſities they may be ſomewhat tolerable, ceaſe not for all that to be alwayes much to be feared. Eliſha would not for that time addreſs himſelf to Jehoſhaphat and diſunite him from that enterpriſe, imitating the prudence of thoſe that let a buſineſs begun, run on when it may any way be defended; but yet he ſufficiently expreſſed, that that company did not pleaſe him: and when Jehoſhaphat was returned to his houſe from the warr that he had maintained with Ahab against the King of the Syrians, the Prophet chid him for it, and told him, that he deserved the wrath of God for having given aid to an impious King; but that he had had a regard to other good works done by him, and was not willing to destroy him. So Elisha could not endure to see that company with him, and was so far transported with a fervency of zeal, that he was fain to call for a Musician to sing some song, and by his harmonies appease the ardours and commotions of his spirit, to set it again in a perfect calmness. After this, he felt the powerfull effects of the hand of God, and in a desperate drought commanded to make channels and pits, and promised water in abundance, with a compleat victory over the Moabites. And this Prophecy was verified the Morrow after, when streams were seen gliding in all places, to the comfort and admiration of all the World.

The Moabites having discovered the design of these three Kings that came out against them, put themselves into the field, and when they perceived upon the break of Day a River that was all red by the reflexion of the rayes of the Sun that shined upon it, they imagined that their enemies had mutually slain each other, that that River was red with their bloud, and that there was no more to do but to run after their spoils. But they were extremely amazed when they saw themselves combated furiously by those that they had put in the number of the dead. The King retired into his Capital City, which was immediately besieged, and pressed with violence. He essayed to make a sally and surprize the Idumeans, but had no good successe. And therefore he had recourse to an horrible attempt, and made a pitifull Tragedy; for he killed his onely son, the heir apparent of his Kingdom, and offered him in sacrifice to his false Gods, causing his head to be cut off as a victim upon the ramparts, in the view of all the world. The Devil had perswaded those miserable Pagans that the sacrificing of humane bloud was sovereign to appease the wrath of the Gods; which made this desperate King slay his own son to preserve his Crown and State by a Remedy worse then the disease.

This mad man saw not that Kingdoms cemented with the bloud of Innocents cannot be of long continuance in the hands of those that possesse them by such inhumane wayes; and that sacrificing his own son to buy a Peace, he made himself an interiour warr in his own soul, and raised against himself a thousand furies, with as many snakes and torches to stirr up bloudy remorses the rest of his whole life. The besiegers had such an indignation at an act so barbarous, that they left the siege through horrour, being unwilling any more to presse him that for the fear of evil had descended (in their opinions) to the last of evils. This warr had good successe, and the presence of a faithfull King brought a blessing to the Infidels; whereas at other times the faithfull ones have perished by their alliance with the Infidels: as it happened to Ahaziah King of Juda, who was at last killed by Jehu for having too much embraced the friendship of those that were not of his Religion.

Now although the Prophet Elisha had an heart pierced with grief to see Joram separated from the true God, yet he left not to suffer him as long as Providence would have it so, to serve him like a good subject, and to give him Advice very necessary for the Preservation of his State. He declared to him the Counsels and the Enterprises of the King of Syria his enemy, which he knew by the spirit of Prophecy, so that the other was amazed to hear that the most secret businesses which he had treated in his Cabinet with his most intimate Confidents were discovered. He thought that his Counsellours of State sold him to the King of Israel, but one assured him that that came from the Prophet Elisha, who knew things to come by the spirit of God, which was in him in a wonderfull manner.

This Prince inflamed with choler, dispatches immediately Souldiers (in a great number) to apprehend Elisha, who failed not to beset the little City of Dothan whether the Prophet was retired. The Prophet's servant being risen at break of day, to go abroad, perceived those Companies of men of arms, and ran to his Master much affrighted, crying out, That all was lost, and that the City was environed with Chariots and with Horses that came to take him. But Elisha filled with the confidence that he had in God his great Master, made him answer, That there was nothing to be feared, and that his party was much the stronger; which seemed very hard to be believed by a man whom fear had so much shaken, till such time as his Master taking away the fillet of ignorance that was upon his eyes, discovered to him a Mountain full of Chariots and of Horses that entowred Elisha, and watched for his protection.

Thus it pleases God sometimes to draw his Servants out of the hands of Persecutours by extraordinary wonders. At other times he permits darkness to exercise its power upon the light, and the impious to take and persecute the just, to render them glorious by their sufferings. He would not admit on the day of his Passion the twelve Legions that he might have obtained of his heavenly Father for his defence, that he might not deprive our Christianity of the example of his dolours; and yet he raises up armies of fire to defend Elisha, with intention to make us see that he is able to hinder us from receiving any harm, but that it is the greater glory to conquer it by patience.

The Prophet seeing the heavenly Legions that stood to aid him, would not for all that thunderstrike those that come to take him, but contented himself to blind them for a time, that he might have given them light for ever, if they would have preferred it before darknesse. Those poor men seeing themselves struck with such a sudden blindness were extremely astonished, yet (as malice quits not so soon her venome) they sought for the servant of God, blind-folded, darkned as well in minde as body, when he presented himself to them, and told them that he would shew them the man they sought for, if they would follow him, which being agreed to, he led them straight into Samaria, the capital City of their enemies, and at that instant restored to them their eyes, to give them the knowledge of the danger wherein they were.

They thought that there was nothing now remaining to them but to be cut in pieces; and indeed Joram the King of Israel would have caused them to be massacred, had not Elisha forbid him to touch them, because that he had not got them by the point of the sword, but were come by miracle into his hands. Furthermore, he ordered that something should be given them to eat, which was done, and after they had taken their refection, they were sent back the straight way into their Country. Behold a courtesie worthy of the new Testament and of the Evangelical Law! Elisha would not that his miracles should be mischievous; he contented him-himself to overcome those by Benefits that he might hurt by Justice, to shew, that there is nothing so victorious as a great heart that can make visible, that it is the highest point of power and goodness to pardon that by grace and mercy, that might be revenged by reason.

Sometime after, Benhadad King of Syria came to lay siege to the City of Samaria, where the King was shut in, and pressed so vigorously the besieged by famine, that an Asse's head was sold for fourscore Livers, and a little barrel of Pigeons dung for five Franks. It was an extreme rage, and a furious despair, that expected nothing but the heighth of evils for its remedy.

It happen'd that King Joram passed through the street, that he put on Sackcloath under his cloaths, when a poor woman all be-blubber'd with tears came to him, and requested of him life and safety: but the poor King not knowing what to do for her, said only to her, That he was not God to give her bread: she then desired Justice of him in a controversie which she had with a wicked woman. The King was content to hear her, and thereupon she told him, that she had made an agreement with that woman to eat together two little sons whereof they were mothers, on such conditions that hers should be eaten first, and that the morrow following, her neighbours should be serv'd up to the table also: and that in the pursuance of this, her little son had been massacred and devoured by his own mother and the Complice of her crime: but that now there was a question of proceeding to eat the son of her Comrade, she had hid him, and refused to give him, and that thereupon she beseeched his Majesty to do her justice. Joram was so affrighted at the proposition of that woman, that he rent his cloaths, and put himself in mourning.

But instead of humbling himself, he sware that the head of Elisha should not stay a day longer upon his shoulders, vexing against him, that he being so powerful, suffered such a famine of his people without helping it. He was like those Mexicans that make their King swear that the Sun shall give the Day, and the Clouds their Reign, and the Earth its Fruits, and in case that this fails, lay the blame on him and murther him. He imagined that the Prophet had barrenness and fruitfulness in his hands, as his Master Elijah, and that he ought to sacrifice him for the Publick. This Speech cost Joram dear, who was afterward dispossessed of his kingdom. and the Prophet doubting of this attempt, said to those that were about him, That the son of the Murtherer Ahab had given command to cut off his head, that he that was to give the stroke was upon the way, and that they should keep the door fast shut: Where we see, that the same Prophet that had before fiery Legions at his command, is on terms to defend himself after a fashion weak enough to resist the force of a King. But it is to teach us, that God gives not always to the Saints the power of Miracles, no more then the spirit of Prophecy, and that that failing, they ought to make use of the lights of their ordinary prudence.

It may be inferr'd from the sacred Text, that Joram changed his mind, and came himself to find Elisha, not as a persecutour, but in quality of a supplant, advertising him of the extreme rage of the Famine by the accident that had newly happen'd to those miserable women. Then Elisha inspir'd promised aloud, that in that very time that seem'd so calamitous, a bushel of Meal should be sold but for twenty Sous at the gate of Samaria, and that for the same price one should have two of Barley. Whereto one of the Nobles of the Court, on whom the King leaned, replied, That that would be very hard to be believed, though it should please God to open Windows in Heaven to make it rain Corn. But Elisha answered, that he should see that miracle before his eys, but should not enjoy its good effects.

The morrow after it happen'd, that four Lepers that had withdrawn themselves near to the gate of Samaria, pressed with hunger and with misery, of which they could find no ease, neither within nor without the City, were resolv'd to go into the Camp of the Enemy, to find there either bread or death. As they approached their Trenches, they perceiv'd that all was empty, which made them venture to enter in their Tents, where they found abundance of booty and began to pillage. Yet they had some remorse of conscience to think so ardently upon their own profit, without carrying that good news to the City, and ran instantly to the Porters of Samaria, to cause the King to be advertised of that happiness. He was so out of hope, that this made him enter into distrust, lest it should be a plot of the Enemies, out of a design to make them come forth and so surprise them. A resolution was made, that some Cavaliers should be sent forth to discover what had passed, and of the five horses that were left in the City, the rest being consumed by the Famine, two are dispatched, who confirm the news brought by the former messengers, and assure that the Syrians had raised the siege in disorder, forsaking their victual, their ammunitions, and all their riches. The God of Hosts that holds in his hand the issues of Battels and of Sieges, had operated therein, raising a fervour in them that made them believe, that the King of Egypt and the King of the Hittites were coming to fall upon them with huge Armies to cut them to pieces, whereat they were so affrighted that they quitted all that they had most pretious, to save their lives.

This hunger-starv'd people that had been so long shut up within the walls of a desolate City goes out in throngs, and runs on all sides to the prey that the hand of Heaven had prepared for them. The abundance was so great, that the Prophecy of Elisha was verified, and that great Lord that had contraried it by derision was trod to death by the people at the gate of the City, so dangerous it is to distrust the power of God, and to oppose his Prophets.

Elisha had another passage with Naaman in which he expressed a great generosity. This Naaman was a Syrian by Nation, and Lord high Constable of the King of Syria. His condition had filled him with honours and with riches, but his constitution had burthened him with a shameful Leprosie that deprived him of all the sweetnesses of his life. God that often makes the renown of great personages fly upon the tongue of simple people where it is less sophisticated, permitted that a little Girle (a slave) that had come from Judea, that was at that time in Naaman's Wive's service, should speak a thousand good words of the miracles of Elisha to her Mistris; and assured her, that he would easily be able to restore health to her Master, and to cure him of his Leprosie.

This came to the King of Syria's ears, who very much prised his Constable by reason of the great and faithful services that he had done him. And, as those that desire cure neglect no advices, he sends Naaman to the King of Israel with many presents, requesting him to heal him by the means of his his Prophet. The King was greatly amaz'd at these letters, and imagin'd that that crafty Syrian mean'd to pick a quarrel with him to invade his kingdom, entreating him as a Deity, as if he had been the authour of life and death. His apprehension was so great, that he rent his cloaths and put himself in mourning, as in the danger of near disaster.

But Elisha comforted him, made him know that there was a most mighty God in Israel that wrought by his Prophets, and bad him not to fail to send the sick man to him, which he did, and Naaman was immediately at Elisha's door, with a great train of chariots and horses. But the Prophet having a mind to shew at that time that he was not moved with the vanity of all the retinue of great personages, would not so much as see him, but sent him word that he should go and wash himself seven times in Jordan, and then he should recover his health. This Lord was vext at so dry a proceeding, and went away discontented, saying, that if there were no other mystery in it, his own Country wanted not Springs and Rivers; so ordinary it is for men to slight remedies that seem too easie, and for the imagination to look to be entreated with pomp.

Yet his servant told him, that the experiencing of that counsel would not cost him much, and would annoy him nothing, and that in any case he should make tryal of it, which he did, and carried away a perfect cure; whereat he was so ravished, that he betook himself suddainly to Elisha's house to give him thanks, confessing that there was no other God in the world but that of Israel, in such a manner, as that he gained the health of his soul by that of his body, and quitted at the same time his leprosie and his infidelity.

He urged the Prophet to accept abundance of rich presents, wherewith he came well laden, but he constantly refused them, which is no small proof of virtue and of greatness of courage. For covetousness is like the shadow that hinders the light of the Sun, extinguishes its heat, and nourishes serpents; so she doth eclipse the brightnesses of the spirit of the Prophets, deads the love of the Devout, and gives nourishment to the passions. Men antiently were tryed by the river of Rhine, but now they are experimented by the golden streams of Pactolus. Those that render piety mercenary, have none at all; the spirit in them follows the flesh, and heaven gives way to earth. All the importunities of Naaman could not shake Elisha; he was a basilisk that could not be inchanted by the charms of avarice; he had eys of proof against the glistering of the gold of Syria; when he would have no mony, the other begged of him a little earth, as much only as would load two Mules, to build an Altar to the true God with holy ground, and not prophaned by Idolatry; expressing by this request, that he desired to worship the true God in spirit and in truth, though he received not Circumcision, nor the other Ceremonies of the Jews. He added to his former suit the permission to accompany his Master to the Temple of the Idols through a pure civility, without rendring any inward adoration to the Gods of Syria, which the Prophet granted him, and sent him away in peace, all full of blessing.

But Gehazi Elisha's servant was like to spoil all by a wicked couzenage; for he ran after Naaman, who seeing him come, alighted out of his chariot and received him with much honour, asking what he desired of him. The other feigned that two children of the Prophets were come to see his Master, and that he desired to gratifie them with a talent of silver, and to give to each of them a change of raiment. Naaman thought himself obliged by this request, and instead of one talent gave him two, with two handsome suites of cloaths, causing all of it to be carried by two of his servants, by reason that a talent of silver was a good load for one man. Gehazi thought that he had succeeded bravely in his cheat, but when he presented himself to his Master, he told him, that he had been present in spirit at all that had passed, and that he was not ignorant, that he had at present silver from Naaman enough to become a great Lord, and to buy lands and servants; but for punishment of his crime, the leprosie of Naaman should stay on him, and should pass as an inheritance to all his race: and at that instant he was stricken with the leprosie, and retired himself, leaving an horrible example to all those that betray their conscience to satiate their covetousness.

It happens that these bad servants extremely black the reputation of their Masters that have not always their eys on their shoulders, as Elisha had, to see that which passes behind them; but when they imagine that they live very innocently, and that they discharge their consciences in their charges, one may find that a crafty wife, or a corrupted Committee sell them by a thousand practices, and devour the marrow and the bloud of men under the favour of their name. Sigismond the Emperour made one of his Officers named Pithon, that had betrayed his affairs through covetousness of mony, drink up a glass of melted gold. 'Twas but a bad potion, but sutable for the chastisement of an overflowing avarice that hath no longer eys for heaven, having already given all her heart to the earth. It is credible that Naaman was advertised of the untrustiness of Gehazi, and that this nothing blemished the high reputation of Elisha, that was spread through all Syria.

After the cure of this Naaman, Benhadad, that was his Master and his King, fell into a mortal sickness, and when he had learnt that the Prophet Elisha was come as far as his City of Damascus, he dispatched Hazael, one of the prime men of his Kingdom with fourty Camels laden with great riches, to consult with him about the hope that he might have of his recovery, and to desire his help. the prophet was not like Hyppocrates that would cure none but Greeks, and refused to go into Persia, though he was invited thither by letters, and by the offers of that great and magnificent King Artaxerxes. But quite contrary, the man of God thought that one ought not to limit the gifts of heaven, and that he that opens the treasures of nature to all the Nations of the earth, would not have one detain the marks of his power without communicating them to those that bear in any fashion his Image.

He cleansed the leprosie of Naaman, but yet for all that cured not Benhadad, because it was a decree of Providence that he should dy of that sickness. The Scripture tells us not expressly what became of those great presents, but it leaves us to think that Elisha refused them as he had done those of Naaman, and did nothing that belied his generosity. Although one may also believe that he accepted them, as well to diminish the levies of the enemies of his people, as to spread them amongst the poor of his Country. He spake only to this Hazael the King's Embassadours a very short speech, which was, that he should dy of that sickness, and should never rise out of his bed again; and yet in appearance he commands him to tell him, that he ſhould eſcape it, and recover again his health.

Which cauſes here a queſtion to ariſe (though enough) touching the permiſſion of a lie, and which hath made Caſſian and other antient Divines ſay that there are ſome profitable lies which one ought to make uſe of, as one uſes ſerpents to make treacle. But this opinion is no way followed, but is found condemned by S. Auguſtine, and the moſt renowned Doctours. So that when Eliſha ſaid to Prince Hazael touching his King, He ſhall die, but tel him he ſhall eſcape: we ought not to take it as a command that authorizes a lie, but as a prophecy of that which ſhould be done. For the Prophet foreſaw theſe two things with one and the ſame ſight, both that Benhadad ſhould die, and that Hazael to flatter him, ſhould promiſe him health and life. And therefore he adds, Tell him that he ſhall eſcape, which in a Prophets terms is as much as a future, and means, that although I declare to you his death, yet I know you well, and am certain, that according to your politick Maxims you will not fail to promiſe him a cure. It is juſt as God commanded the evil ſpirit to lie and to deceive Ahab, foretelling what he would do, and not commanding that which ought not to be done according to the laws of a good conſcience.

As Eliſha was foretelling of that Kings death, he felt an extaſie of ſpirit and changed countenance notably, and began to weep, whereat Hazael was much aſtoniſhed, and had a curioſity to know the reaſon of a change ſo ſudden. But the Prophet continuing in the tranſports of his ſpirit, ſaid unto him, I weep and I ſigh bitterly, for I know the evils that thou wilt make my poor people one day ſuffer. Thou wilt burn down the fair Cities; thou wilt make the younge men paſs by the edge of the ſword; thou wilt daſh out the brains of the little infants; thou wilt inhumanely rip up women great with child; thou wilt ſack my dear Country, for which I now poure out my tears by way of advance. The Embaſſadour was amazed at a diſcourſe ſo ſtrange, and ſaid, Why? What am I ſhould do all theſe outrages? God forbid that I ſhould ever proceed ſo far; I have in all this no more beleif then hath my dog.

But Eliſha inſiſting, told him, I know by divine Revelation that thou ſhalt be King of Syria, and that which I ſay ſhall come to paſs under thy Reign. Behold a ſtrange Prophecy, and ſome body may wonder that Eliſha did not cauſe that wicked man to be ſtrangled that was to make all thoſe tragedies; for how many mothers are there that would have choaked their own children at their breaſt, if they had foreſeen that after they had ſucked their milk, they would one day aſſume the ſpirit of an hangman, to tyrannize over mankind! Yet Eliſha rejects not that Hazael, but conſecrates him King by his ſpeech, becauſe that he knew that it was a diſpoſition of God who would make uſe of him as of the rod of his fury, to chaſtiſe the Idolatries of his Kings, and the ſins of his People.

All men of God have this property, to ſubmit themſelves exceedingly to God's will, although it ſeems to will and permit things ſtrangely lamentable. In concluſion, as Predictions are very tickliſh and flatter the intention of thoſe that promiſe themſelves Empires and wonders; they animate alſo the heart of thoſe that have wicked undertakings; and one ought never to permit any one to take conſultations with Aſtrologers and Southſayers about the life and fortune of great men. This Embaſſadour returning to the Court deceived his King, giving him all hopes of a life, and when he doubted leaſt of death, ſtrangled him with a wet napkin, paying himſelf with a Kingdome for a recompenſe of his wickedneſs. And although it was a diſpoſition of God that Benhadad ſhould be deprived of his Scepter, yet it failed not to be a crime in Hazael.

The laſt rancounter that Eliſha had at Court was with King Joaſh, who went to ſee him a little before his death; and this Prince foreſeeing that he would quickly depart out of this world ſaid to him weeping that he was the Father, the Chariot, and the Conductour of his Kingdome, and of all his People: expreſſing, that he was afflicted with the regret of his loſs above all the things of the world. But Eliſha to comfort him, made him take his bow and arrows, and put his hand upon the King's hand as to guide it; after that, he commanded the window to be ſet open towards Syria, and cauſed the King to let flie an arrow which he accompanied with Propheticall words, ſaying, That it was the arrow of ſalvation, whoſe feathers God himſelf did guide, and that it was a meſſenger that prophecied to him, that he ſhould combate and deſtroy the Syrians, enemies of his people.

After that, he bad Joaſh again ſtrike the ground with the point of a dart that he had in his hand, which he did three times; and the Prophet told him that he ſhould carry away as many victories over the King of Syria; but if he had ſtricken till ſeven times he ſhould have ruined him even to the utmoſt conſummation.

A little while after Eliſha dyed, with an high reputation of ſanctity, and an extreme regret of all the orders of the Kingdome, and was interred in a place where he raiſed afterward a dead man by the touching of his bones; God rendring every thing wonderfull in him, even to his very aſhes.

It appears by all this diſcourſe that this perſonage had not a Piety idle and fearfull, amorous of its own ſmall preſervation, without caring for the publick good; but he had an heart filled with generous flames for the protection of his people, and an incomparable ſecurity to ſhew to Princes the eſtate of their conſcience. He ſupported all the Realm by his prayers, by his exhortations, by his heroick actions: and the loſs of one ſuch man was the overthrow of the prime Pillar of the State.

ISAIAH. JEREMIAH.

THe Prophet Iſaiah hath engraved his Spirit in his Book, and cannot be commended more advantageouſly then by his Works. He that would make him great Elogies after ſo ſublime a Prophecy, would ſeem to intend to ſhew the Sun with a Torch. The things that are moſt excellent make themſelves known by themſelves, as God and the Light: and I may ſay, all the words that this divine Perſonage hath left us, are as many characters of his Immortality.

It is with a very juſt title that we put him amongſt the holy Courtiers, for he was born at the Court of Judea, and ſome hold that he was the Nephew of King Amaſiah. This birth ſo elevated, and ſo many fair hopes which might flatter him to make him follow the courſe of the great ambitions of the world, did no way ſhake the force of his ſpirit. It was a Soul conſecrated to things Divine, that ſacrificed the firſt fires of his youth by the moſt pure flames of Angels. Never did Prophet enter into that Miniſtry with more authority and diſpoſition of heaven.

He had a ſublime viſion, in which he ſaw the Majeſty of God ſeated upon a Throne of glory environ'd with Seraphims, that were tranſported through the admiration of his greatneſs. God in perſon created him his Prophet; the Seraphim, a meſſenger of the ſovereign power, purified his lips with a Carbuncle, from whence proceeded a celeſtial fire, that if he had got any pollutions at the Court, where tongues are ſo free, they might be taken away by that ſacred touch. He offered himſelf to God with an heart full of chearfulneſs, to carry his word before Kings and Subjects, without fearing their menaces or their furies. And he acquitted himſelf all his life-time worthily of that duty, and propheſied more then fourſcore and ten years, not ceaſing to exhort, to counſel, to rebuke, to inſtruct, to comfort, and to perform all the exerciſes of his charge.

His Eloquence is as elevated as his birth, he ſpeaks every where like a King, with a ſpeech firm, lofty, and thundering, that paſſes all the inventions of man. When he threatens and foretels the calamities of Nations, it is ſo much lightning kindled by the breath of Seraphims that proceeds out of this divine mouth, that pierces the rocks, that ſhakes the mountains, that cruſhes the higheſt Cedars into duſt, the Nations into fear, and the Kings into reſpect.

When he comforts, they are rivers of milk and honey that flow from his tongue, and ſpread themſelves with incomparable ſweetneſſes into afflicted hearts. When he deſcribes the perfections and the reign of the Meſſias, they are the amorous extaſies of a Spirit melted by the heats of Jeſus that ſtrikes, burns, and penetrates him, more then ſeven hundred years before his birth.

The holineſs of his life marched always hand in hand with his Doctrine: he was a man dead to all worldly things, that lived but by the raptures of his deified ſpirit. He loved ſingularly the poor, and comforted them in all their neceſſities. He ſpake to Kings and reproved their ſins with an heroick conſtancy worthy of his Blood and Miniſtry.

At the ſame time, as Romulus began the Court of Rome, Iſaiah ſaw that of Judea, where he experimented great changes and ſtrange diverſities according to the revolutions of humane things. He paſſed his youth under his Uncle Amaſiah, who was at firſt a Prince good enough, and very obedient to the voice of the Prophets: for when he had enterpriſed a mighty war with the Idumeans, he raiſed two Armies, one of his own people, and the other of the unbelieving Iſraelites which he had invited to his aid; but when the Prophet told him that he did not well to make uſe of the Arms of Iſrael that was impious and ſeparated from the true God: he diſcharged them freely, although he had already paid an hundred thouſand men, and contenting himſelf with his own troops, gave them battel, which he gained with great advantages.

But it is a ſtrange thing, that by taking the Idumeans, he took alſo their Gods to worſhip them in Jeruſalem, and made himſelf an arm of hay with the prop of theſe imaginary Deities that had in nothing profited their Adorers. A man of God that propheſied in thoſe times rebuked him ſharply for it; but he demanded who made him the Kings Counſellor, and threatned to ſlay him, if he did not learn to hold hold his peace. The other, without being afraid, denounced against him that he should come to some ill end, and left him, by flying from the Court. After which, this miserable Prince fell into a reprobate sense, was taken in war by his enemy the King of Israel; his capital City was laid waste, the Temple and his Palace pillaged; there was no more that remained to him but a shameful & miserable life which his own Subjects tare from him by a wicked conspiracy.

Uzziah his son and Isaiah's Cousin-german was set on his Fathers Throne at sixteen years of age, and reigned a very long time with a reign peaceable enough. He built some Cities, and fortified others, set in order an Arcenal stored with good arms, enterprised wars against the Philistims, which he ended happily enough. He defeated also the Ammonites and the Arabians, which made incursions upon his Territories, and renowned himself by famous victories. He embraced also willingly his rest in season and addicted himself in the time of peace to husbandry.

The conversation of his dear Cousin that began to prophesie the seventeenth year of his Reign, contributed many good effects to his Government. But as he saw himself enjoy a long Reign, with abundance of favours from heaven, he became very absolute in his will, and would joyn the high-Priesthood to the Royalty. For he took the Censer, entred into the Temple, presented himself at the Altar of Perfumes, to burn Incense after the manner of the Priests, and although the high Priest Azarias opposed him stoutly, he desisted not from that attempt, till such time as by a manifest punishment from heaven he found himself on a suddain touched with a leprosie, which appeared on his face, and rendred him hideous, and out of knowledg, which made the Priests (animated by the judgment of God that had intervened thereon) chase him from the Temple; and he was constrained to retire himself unto an house out of Jerusalem, having left the administration of his Kingdom to his son.

This change was very sensible to the Prophet that had loved him tenderly, and supported the interests of his house; but on the other side, it was a comfort to him to see that he had a sense of his fault, and had reduced himself voluntarily unto the obscurity of that life for the chastisement of his sin.

His example ought to serve for a terrour to the Secular Powers that will encroach upon the Ministery of the Priests, and break the barriers that Providence hath established for the differencing of the Spiritual and Temporal Authority. There is need sometimes but of a little tongue of Earth to seperate two seas, and to keep them in good intelligence, but if one should go and cut it off, they would mix themselves and make a great deluge. So may we say, that the wisdom of God hath put certain bounds between the Priests and the Kings, which keep the affairs of the Church and of the State in a good temper; but when certain young Abirams interpose themselves to confound these Powers, they overflow the banks, and make wastes, prejudicial to mankind.

After the death of Uzziah, Jothan who was already fitted for business, took the Government with title of a King, and making a strong reflection upon the deportments of his Grandfather and of his Father, extracted from thence a most excellent Lesson, ruling his Subjects with great moderation, so that the Prophet Isaiah had nothing to do with him.

But he left an abominable son named Ahaz that quitted the God of his fathers, renewed the Idolatries of the most corrupted of his Predecessours, took the false Religion of the Kings of Israel, caused statues to be planted on the mountains and on the hills, offered Incense to them, made his children pass through the fire, and consecrated them to Idols; which drew the wrath of heaven upon him and upon his people, which was beaten with a thousand scourges and most great calamities.

The Prophet Isaiah saw all these storms falling down upon the miserable Judea, and ceased not to forewarn them, and to arm himself with a mouth of fire against the disorders of that wicked Prince; but it was without much effect, he being so much corrupted.

Who would ever have thought that of so bad a Father should have been born so excellent a Son as Hezekiah, who was instructed by Isaiah, and followed totally the course of his will and counsels so Divine, so wholesome; and wiped out the blot that his Father had imprinted upon the Altars of the living God, and made the true Religion flourish again, which seemed altogether extinguished in the confusions of an abandoned age! He brake down all the Idols that that unhappy Ahaz had erected. He dissipated the prophane Groves planted on the mountains for the exercise of his abominations. He did not pardon so much as the brazen Serpent that Moses had caused to be set up to a good end, although the Idolaters had afterwards abused it.

He commanded that the Temple should be purified and cleansed by the Levites, together with the Tabernacle and sacred Vessels, polluted by his Predecessour. He renewed the order of the Sacrifices, and the Quoires of Singers dedicated to the praises of God; he rallied all the faithful people to celebrate the Passover and the other solemn Feasts amongst the Jews. This Reign was a golden Age, and a true School of Wisdom, when the Prophet and the King conspired with a wonderful accord in the service of their great Master. Isaiah ceased not to produce sound thoughts; and that which was wholesomely thought on by that holy man, was stoutly executed by the courageous piety of this good King. He laboured in all things for the honour of him on whom do depend all Crowns, and God also laboured powerfully for him, doing more business in one night, then the arms of iron and steel could have done in ten years.

Every one knows how Sennacherib the King of the Assyrians came to lay siege before Jerusalem with a prodigious Army, against which there was no humane resistance. He sent a certain man named Rabshakeh, in an Embassage to King Hezekiah, who vomited out blasphemies, and proposed to him conditions shameful to his reputation and impossible to all his Powers. All the people were in an affright, expecting nothing but fire and sword. The King covered with sack-cloth implores the heavenly assistance, and sends the chief Counsellours of his State to the Prophet Isaiah, to turn away this scourge by his prayers. The holy man, in that confusion of affairs wherein one could not see one only spark of light, encourages him, animates him, and promises him unexpected effects of the mercy of God. The Prophecy was not vain, for in one only night the Angel of God killed an hundred fourscore and five thousand men in the Army of the Assyrians by a stroke from Heaven and a devouring fire which reduced them to dust in their guilded arms. This proud

King

King was constrained to make an ignominious retreat, and being returned to Nineveh the capitall City of his Empire, he was slain by his own children. This is a manifest example of the amiable protection of God over the Holy Court, who defended his dear Hezekiah by the intercession of the Prophet as the apple of his eyes.

He expressed yet another singular favour to him in a great sickness, caused by a malignant ulcer, of which (according to the course of nature) he should have died: and therefore Isaiah went to see him, and without flattering him, brought him word of his last day, exhorting him to put the affairs of his State in order. This good King had a tender affection to life, and being astonished at that news, prayed God fervently with a great profusion of tears, that he would have regard to the sincerity of his heart, and to the good services that he had done him in his Temple, and not to tear away his life by a violent death in the middle of its course. The heart of the everlasting Father melted at the tears of that Prince, and he advertised Isaiah, who was not yet gone out of the Palace, to retread his steps, and carry him the news of his recovery.

He told him from God that he should rise again from that sickness, and within three dayes should go up to the Temple to render his Thanks-giving. Further, he promised him that his dayes should be augmented fifteen years, and that he should see himself totally delivered from the fury of the Assyrians, to serve the living God in a perfect tranquillity. The King was ravished at this happy news, and desired some sign of the Divine will to make him believe an happiness so unhoped for. Isaiah for this purpose did a miracle, which since Joshua, had not been seen nor heard, which was to make the Sun turn back, so that the shadow of the Diall which was in the palace, appeared ten degrees retired, to the admiration and ravishment of all the world. And to shew that the Prophet was not ignorant of Physick, he caused a Cataplasme composed of a lump of figs to be applyed to the wound of the sick man, whereby he was healed, and in three dayes rendred to the Temple.

This miracle was not unknown to the Babylonians, who perceived the immense length of the day in which it was done, and their Prince having heard the news of it, sent Embassadours to King Hezekiah to congratulate his health, and to offer him great presents; whereat this Monarch, that was of an easie nature, suffered himself to be a little too much transported with joy, and out of a little kind of vanity made a shew of his treasures, and of his great riches to those strangers; which served much to kindle their covetousness. And therefore the Prophet, who was never sparing of his remonstrances to the King, rebuked him for that action, and fore-told him that he made Infidels see the great wealth that God had given him, through a vain glory which would cost him dear; and that having been spectatours of his treasures, they had a mind to be the masters of them; and that at length they should compass their design, but that it should not be in his time. This Prince received the correction with patience, and took courage, hearing that the hail should not fall upon his head, passing over his to his childrens.

Manasses his son succeed him, a Prince truly abominable, who wiped out all the marks of the piety of his father, and placed Idols even in the very Temple of the living God. All, that Idolatry had shown in sacriledges, cruelty in murders, impudence in all sort of wickednesses, was renewed by the perfidiousness of this man abandoned of God. Poor Isaiah that had governed the father with so much authority had no credit with the son; this tyger was incensed at the harmonious consorts of the divine Wisdomes that spake by his mouth, and could no more endure the truth, then serpents the odour of the vine.

Yet he desisted not to reprehend him, and to advertise him of the punishments that God prepared for his crimes; whereat this barbarous man was so much moved and kindled with fury, that he commanded that this holy old man that had passed the hundreth year, should be sawn alive by an horrible and extraordinary punishment.

O Manasses! cruel Manasses, the most infamous of tyrants, and the most bloudy of hang-men! this was the onely crime that the furies themselves even the most enraged should never have permitted to thy salvageness. This venerable Master of so many Kings, this King of Prophets, this prime Intelligence of the State, this Seraphim, this instrument of the God of Hosts, to be used so barbarously at the Court by his own bloud, after so many good counsels, so many glorious labours, so many Oracles pronounced, so many Divine actions so worthily accomplished! All the Militia of Heaven wept over this companion of the Angels, and the earth caused fountains to leap up to bedew her lips in the midst of her ardent pains. His Wisdome hath rendred him admirable to the Learned; his Life inimitable to the most Perfect; his Zeal adorable to the most Courageous; His Age Venerable to Nature; and his Death deplorable to all Ages.

JEREMIAH.

BEhold the most afflicted of Holy Courtiers, a Prophet weeping, a Man of sorrows, an heart always bleeding, and eys that are never dry. He haunted not great men but to see great evils, and was not found at Court but to sing its Funerals, and to set it up a tomb.

Yet was he a very great and most holy person that had been sanctified in his mothers womb: that began to prophecy at the age of fifteen years; a spirit separated from the vanities and the pretensions of the world, that was intire to God, that lived by the purest flames of his holy love, and quenched his thirst with his tears. He drank the mud of bad times, and found himself in a piteous Government, in which there was little to gain, and much to suffer.

After that the cruel Manasses King of Judea had been spoiled of the Scepter, and led prisoner into Babylon, chained as a salvage beast, he was sensibly touched with his affliction, and made a severe repentance, being cast with his irons into a deep pit, where he converted himself to God, with bitter sorrows and roarings of heart that made him obtain a pardon of his sins, even so far as to restore him his Liberty and his Crown. He behaved himself exceeding well the rest of his days, destroying that which he had made, & repairing that which he had destroyed. But he left behind him a wicked son, who having imitated him in his vices, followed him not in his repentance. It was the impious Amon, who was nevertheless the father of the holy King Josiah, who began to reign at 8 years old, and was governed by the good and salutary precepts of the Prophet Jeremy who took him into a singular affection.

This

This good Prince conſecrated the firſt fruits of his government by the expiation of Idolatry, which he deteſted alwayes by words, and combated by an indefatigable zeal. He never took any repoſe till he had cauſed the Idols in Jeruſalem and in the neighbouring places to be beat down, plucking up all thoſe abominations even by the root. He had ſworn ſo capitall an enmity with impiety, that he perſecuted the authours of it even to the grave which the condition of our mortality ſeems to have made as the laſt ſanctuary of naturall liberty, yet he cauſed the bones of thoſe that had heretofore ſacrificed to Idols to be burnt upon the ſame Altars as had been prophaned by them. After that, he commanded that the Temple ſhould be purged, and that the orders of the ſacrifices and of the praiſes of God, ſhould be there carefully obſerved.

The reading of a good book found in the Temple had ſo powerfully wrought upon him, that he aſſembled his people, and cauſed it to be read in preſence of all the world, with fear and trembling at the threatnings contained therein againſt the impious. Then he conjured all the company there preſent to renew in the ſight of God the oath of fidelity, & to promiſe him never to depart from his Laws and his Commandments, which was performed. There was a re-birth of a quite other world under the reign of this wiſe Prince that rejoyced the heart of the Prophet Jeremy; but he taſted a little honey, to drink afterward a cup of wormwood.

Joſiah was now come to the flower of his age, and of his brave actions, having reigned more then 30 years in a marvellous policy and great tranquillity, when Pharaoh Necho King of Egypt making war againſt the Aſſyrians would paſs through Judea, which gave ſome fear to this good Prince as well for the oppreſſion of his ſubjects that were menaced by the paſſage of a great army, as not to give cauſe of diſcontentment to the King of Aſſyria; and therefore he beſtirs himſelf to reſiſt him, and to oppoſe his paſſage.

It is the miſery of little Princes to be engaged in the differences of greater ones, as between the Anvil and the Hammer; they cannot favour the Party of the one, but they muſt render themſelves the ſworn enemies of the other, and Neutrality renders them ſuſpected to both. It is a difficult paſſage, where whatſoever Induſtry one brings to it, one often leaves behind the beſt feathers of his wings. Joſiah without advertiſing the King of Aſſyria that the Party would not be maintainable if he ſent not a powerfull Ayd, arms ſuddenly againſt a mightier then himſelf. Necho ſends to him his Embaſſadours to tell him that he meant no harm to his Perſon or to his State; that his deſign was againſt another King whom he went to combat by the orders of Heaven; that God was with him, and that if he endeavoured to ſtop his paſſage, evil would betide him for it. Notwithſtanding theſe preſſing ſpeeches Joſiah goes out to meet him, and as he was come to coping with his adverſary, at the very beginning of the mingling he was wounded mortally with an arrow; and commanded his Coachman to draw him out of the combat, which he did, and as he was put in his ſecond chariot which followed his chariot of war after the faſhion of Kings, he gave up the ghoſt without finding any remedy to divert the ſharpneſs of that fatal ſtroke. His body was brought back to Jeruſalem all bloudy, and the mournings for his death were ſo ſenſible and ſo piercing, that it ſeemed as if there had been an univerſall ſacking of the whole City.

Never Prince was ſo beloved, never any more paſſionately lamented, nor is there to be found any one among all the Kings of Judea that had leſs vices, and more zeal for the honour of God; his life was without ſpot, his reputation without reproach, and to ſay truth, his goodneſs was as it were the breath that all the world did breath. Poor Jeremy was ſo caſt down at a death ſo ſudden, that he loſt all his joyes, and begun then, according to S. Jerom, to make thoſe ſad lamentations that have engraved his grief on the memory of all men.

To queſtion why ſo good a King after ſo many actions of Piety was killed by the hand of an Infidel, as an old ſuit that human curioſity hath commenc'd againſt providence from the begining of the world; Some (ſaid Pliny) thrive by their wickedneſs, and others are tormented even by their own Sacrifices: But who are we to think to draw the curtain of the Sanctuary before the time, and to know the reaſons of all that God does, and permits in the world? For one virtuous Prince that is afflicted in the accidents of humane things, we ſhall find alwayes ten wicked ones that have ended miſerably; and yet we ceaſe not to quarrell with the ordination of heaven. By what contract is God to make his ſervants alwayes win at play and war? Muſt he do perpetually miracles to make himſelf be thought what he is? What wrong did he do Joſiah, if after a reign of 31 years, conducted with great ſucceſſes, and an univerſal approbation, he dy'd in the bed of valour defending his Country, and rendring proofs of the greatneſs of his courage? What injury was it to have giuen him the honour to carry the hearts of all his ſubjects to his grave, & to ſpread the glory of his name through all ages, and all the living? After that we have ſeen in Hiſtories 100 Tyrants die, almoſt all in a row, of hideous and bloudy deaths; we come again to King Manaſſes, who after he had ſhed ſo much bloud, paſſed out of this life by a death peaceably enough, we return to Herod, and Tiberius, and to Mahomet, who died in their beds, as if they had been great Saints of fortune, canonized by their happineſs.

Alas, what is the life of theſe and of their like! to be ſtabb'd every moment in the heart, and in the publick opinion; to be curſed of a million of mouths every hour of the day; to remain ſhut up in the encloſure of a palace walls, as old owls; and to have no other pleaſure but to make fire and bloud rain upon the heads of men! What contentment to wax pale at every flaſh of lightning; to tremble at every aſſault of the leaſt diſeaſe; to prepare poiſons and halters for every change of fortune; to live for nothing but to make men die; and to die for nothing but to make the devils a ſpectacle of their pains! Is this it that deſerves the name of felicity, and the admiration of the world?

After that Joſiah had drawn teares from the eyes of all the Kingdome, the people honouring his memory, ſet his ſon Jehoahaz upon the Throne, who reigned but three months, becauſe that Nechoh puft up with his victory, that would not ſuffer them to think of making a King without his conſent, came and fell upon Jeruſalem, and carried him away priſoner into Egypt where he died of diſpleaſure and bad uſage. He took his brother Eliakim or Jehojakim to put him in his place, and to make him reign under his authority. But Nebuchadnezzar who eſteemed himſelf the God of Kings could not endure that the Egyptian ſhould intermeddle with giving Crowns, came to beſiege Jeruſalem with great forces, and having won it, carried away the miſerable Jehojakim captive into Babylon with the flower of the City, and the ſacred veſſels of the Temple, when he reckoned yet but the third year of his Reign.

It was a pitiful thing to see this infortunate King in chains after a dignity so short and so unhappy, but this so lamentable a change moved his adversary to compassion, who released him upon condition of a great annual tribute. He discharged it for the space of three years by constraint, his heart and inclinations leaning always towards Egypt, and never ceasing tacitely to contrive new plots. Besides, he so forsook the service of God, and abandon'd himself to the impiety of the Idolaters, that the admonitions and menaces of the Prophet Jeremy that had foretold him of a most tragical issue, had no power upon his spirit.

And therefore Nebuchadnezzar returned the XI year of the reign of this unhappy King, and having conquered him again, caused him to be assassinated, and his body to be cast on the dunghil for a punishment of his rebellion. He permitted his son Jehoiachin, otherwise Jechonias to succeed him: but scarce had this disastrous Prince reigned three months before this terrible Conqueror transported him, with his mother, his wives, and servants, & made him feel in Babylon the rigours of captivity after he had robbed him of all his treasures, and drawn out of Jerusalem ten thousand prisoners of the principal men of all Judea; so that this deplorable Realm was then between Egypt and Babylon, as a straw between two impetuous winds, incessantly tossed hither and thither without finding any place of consistence.

Nebuchadnezzar made a King after his own fancy, and chose Zedekiah the uncle of Jehoiachin who was at last the most miserable of all the rest. Here it is that Jeremy received a good share of the sufferings of his dear Country, and found himself entangled in very thorny businesses, in which he gave most excellent counsels that were little followed, so resolute were the King and Nobles to their own calamity. He had been very much troubled under the reign of Jehojakim: for as he was prophecying one day aloud of the ruine of the City of Jerusalem, and the entire desolation of the Temple, the Priests seized upon his person and caused the people to mutiny against him out of a design to make him be torn in pieces. But it chanced by good hap that some Lords of the Court ran to appease that tumult, before whom Jeremy justified himself, and protested it was the Spirit of God that moved to foretel those sad disasters for the correction of the sins of Jerusalem, and that the only means to shelter themselves from the wrath of Heaven, was seriously to embrace repentance; and told them that it was in their hands to do him justice, and that if they used him otherwise, they would shed innocent blood that would rebound against them and the whole City. These Courtiers judged that there was nothing in him worthy of death, and delivered him from the hands of those wicked Priests that were ready to assassinate him; there being no persecution in the world like to that which comes from sacred persons when they abuse their dignity to the execution of their revenge.

After this shaking, command is given him again to hold his peace, and to remain shut up in a certain place without preaching or speaking in publick: which was the cause that he dictated from his mouth his thoughts and conceptions to Baruch his Secretary commanding him to read them in a full assembly of the people, which he did, without sparing the great and principal men to whom he communicated them, so that this passed even to the ears of King Jehojakim, who would needs see the book, and when he had read three or four pages of it, he cut it with a Penknife, and cast it into the fire, commanding that Jeremy and his Secretary Baruch should be apprehended. But God made them escape, ordaining that that deplorable King that had despised his Word and the admonitions of his Prophet should fall into that gulf of miseries that had been foretold him.

The same abominations ceased not under the reign of Zedekiah; and Jeremy resumed also new forces to fight against them, and to publish the desolations that should suddenly bury that miserable Nation: then Pashur one of the principal and of the most violent Priests caused the Prophet to be brought before him to reprehend him, for that he ceased not to foretel evils, and to torment all the world by his predictions. Whereupon he entred into so great a wrath against the innocent, that without having any regard to the decency of his dignity, he stroke him, and not content with that, caused him to be clapt in prison, and chains to be put upon him.

This Divine Personage seeing himself reduced to that captivity for having brought the Word of God, and being left (as it were) to himself to do and suffer according to nature and humane passions, was seized with a great melancholy, and made complaints to God which parted not but from the abundance of love that he bare to him.

Ha! what (said he) my God, have you then deceived me? And who doubts but that you are stronger then I? Who am I to resist you? You have made me carry your word, and to speak boldly your adorable truths to Kings and Peoples, and for this I am handled as an Imposture, and as the dreg of nature, and the reproach of the world. Behold what I have gained by serving you with so much obedience and fidelity. Often have I said by my self, I will obey the Magistrates, I will hold my peace, and remember no more the thoughts that God reveals to me; nor speak any more in his name: but then I felt a fire boiling in my heart that was shut up in the marrow of my bones, and I fell into a swoon, and could not endure the violence of my thoughts without unloading my self by the tongue, and publishing that which you inspired into me. And for this, behold me reduced to irons. And have I not good cause to say that which miserable men use to say, That the day of my Nativity in regard of Original sin, and so many calamities that spring from that source, is lamentable and cursed; and that it were to be wished, that the Womb of my mother that bare me had been my Sepulcher? Wherefore did I come out of the bowels of a woman to be a spectatour of so many sorrows and so much confusion?

The Saints speak sometimes like men, according to the sense of the inferiour part of the soul, especially when they see themselves overwhelmed with great evils; but God raises them up immediately, and makes them resume the tongue of Heaven.

As the Prophet was deploring his miseries in that dark prison, God gave lights and remorses to his persecutour that came the next day to deliver him, either through some compassion, or because he had attempted that beyond the limits of his authority. The prisoner instead of expressing some kind of weakness spake more boldly then before, foretelling even to Pashur that he should be led captive into Babylon, and that he should die there, the other not daring to enterprise any thing against him.

After that very time, Jeremy betook himself to the Palace to speak with the King & with the Queen his wife, to advertise them of the utmost misery that menaced their Crown, if they did not make an entire cóversion to God to give an example to their subjects.

Besides

Besides this, he gave some State-counsel, & told the King, that since God had permitted that he should be subdued by the Arms of the King of Babylon that had put him on the Throne, & to whom he had promised Faith, Homage, and Tribute, he should do wel to keep his promises inviolable, rather then to adhere to the King of Egypt, and expect the assistance of his Arms. This was the most important point of State, that concerned the safety of all the Kingdom.

Nevertheless, King Zedekiah, whose spirit was a little soft, hearkned to the advice, & took sometimes fire, but it was but for a little times, he being no way constant in his good resolves. When he saw himself menaced with a siege by the King of the Babylonians he was affrighted, and inclined a little to his side, but as soon as he perceived that he diverted his arms another way, he brake his promised faith, being weary of the rigour of the tributes that the other exacted of him. Thereupon, Jeremy ceased not to publish, that it was an errour to expect that the army of Pharaoh K. of Egypt wch was reported to be upon its march to help Jerusalem should do any good, that it should return upon its own steps without enterprising any thing; that Nebuchadnezzar was not so far off, but that in a small time he would render himself before the city to besiege & win it: That it was a decree of God, & although the Army of the Chaldeans should be defeated, yet those that remained (though wounded and sick) should be sufficient to take Jerusalem abandoned of the Divine protection.

When he had spoken this publickly, he resolved to retire himself for a time, and to go into the countrey; but he was taken at the gate of the city by Irijah that accused him falsely, and said that he was going to render himself to the army of the Chaldeans, whereupon, he carried him under a good guard to the Magistrates, who having beaten and ill used him, sent him to prison, where he remained many dayes without consolation.

At last, the King having heard of what had happened to him, caused him to come secreetly to him, & spake to him, to conjure him to tell the truth, whether those Predictions that he ceased not to sow in the ears of all the world were Revelations from God whereof the Prophet assured him again, & gave him some good incitement to incline to the most wholesome counsels. Poor Jeremy seeing this Prince use him kindly, said unto him.

Alas, Sir, what have I done, and in what have I offended your Majesty to be used as a rogue by those that usurp your authority? What crime have I committed by telling you the truth? Where are your false Prophets that said, that there was no need to fear the coming of Nebuchadnezzar, and that he had other business to dispatch? is he not at length come to verifie my Prophecies? since you do me the honour at present to hear me, My Lord and my Master, hearken to my most humble request, & grant me a courtesie that I desire of you in the name of God, which is, that I may no more return into the the prison out of which your Majesty hath caused me to be drawn; for, the continuation of the evils that I have suffered there, is able suddenly to tear my soul from my body, and it will be but a grief to you to deliver me to death for having given you counsels of life and safety.

The King was softned by the words of the Prophet but he was so timorous that he durst not take the boldness to cause a prisoner to be delivered by his absolute authority, fearing the reproaches and outcryes of those that would have the upper end in all affairs. He caused onely the gaoler to be bid to use him a little kindlier, taking him out of the black dungeon, to give him a place more reasonable, and to have a care that in that great famine of the City he would not want bread.

This was executed, and he staid some time at the entrance of the prison with a little more liberty, during which, he spake again to those that visited him, & said freely, That there was no way to escape the sacking of the City, but by rendring themselves to the Chaldeans. This made Pashur and his complices incensed again with a great wrath, and spake insolently to the King, that Jeremy might be delivered to them, publishing that he was worthy of death, that he was a seditious fellow that did nothing but make the people mutiny, and separate them from their obedience to him.

The miserable Zedekiah that had let these men take too high an ascendent upon his person had not strength of spirit enough to resist them, but against his conscience abandoned his poor Prophet to them, although it was with some regret. These wicked men having taken him, let him down with cords into a deep pit of the prison, which was full of mire and filth, where he expired the remainder of his deplorable life, and dyed there of miseries, if God had not raised him up a protectour, of whom he never so much as dreamed.

There was in the King's house a famous officer, an Ethiopian by Nation, & a man of heart, who hearing of the cruelty that was used against the Prophet took pity on him, and said boldly to the King, what (Sir) can your Majesty well approve of the rigours that poor Jeremy is made to suffer for doing the function of a Prophet? It well appears that his enemies would have his skin, for they have let him down with ropes into a deep dungeon, where it is almost impossible to breath. There is danger if this good man dyes by this ill usage that you are guilty of his death, and that this may draw some wrath of God upon your Majesty. He spake this with so good an accent, that the King was moved, and gave him charge to take thirty souldiers, and to draw him thence, which he did quickly, casting down to him old linnen raggs to put under him, that he might not be galled by the cords when they should make him ascend out of the bottom of that hideous prison.

When he was plucked up again the King had another time the curiosity to see him, not in his Palace but in some secret place of the Temple, where Jeremy spake to him with much fervency and tenderness telling him that the onely means to save his person, his house, and all the city, was to render up himself to Nebuchadnezzar, and that if he refused to do it, he and all his would be destroyed. The King answered that he was afraid to commit himself to the King of Babylon, lest he should deliver him to his rebellious subjects that had fallen from him to the enemy. Jeremy replyed, That he need not fear any such thing, and affectionately beseeched him to have pity on his own soul, on his wife and on his children for otherwise there would happen a great misery. This poor Prince feared to attempt this against the opinion of those that governed him, and to scatter them by this means from his party. Nay, he was afraid even to be seen with Jeremy, and recommended to him very much to keep secret that discourse, and to tell no body that he had spoken to him about State-affairs. He was sent back to prison that he might not make the seditious mutiny, & all that he could obtain was not to be plunged again in that pit from whence he had been delivered. In the mean while Nebuchadnezzar after a long siege carried the city of Jerusalem which was taken about mid-night, the enemies being entred by a breach that no body perceived. Zedekiah much amazed betakes himself to flight with his wife and children, and a few men of war about him, taking his way through night darkness, affrights, fear, and a thousand images of death. The Chaldeans had notice of his retreat, and caught him on the plains of Jericho, where he was immediately forsaken of his men, and left with his wives and little children that sent out pitiful cryes through the apprehension of servitude and death.

He was carried away from thence to Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar was expecting the issue of that siege. This unfortunate Prince was constrained to present himself before the frightful countenance of a barbarous King, puffed up with his victories and prosperities, who loaded him with reproaches and confusions, upbraiding him with his rebellion, his ingratitude and unfaithfulness: he would willingly have been ten foot under ground before he suffered such indignities, thinking himself sufficiently punished by having lost his crown and liberty.

But this cruel Conquerour would give other satisfactions to his revenge, for after he had a long time digested his gall and thought on the means that he would use to punish him, he causes his children to come before him, and commands the Hangmen to murther them in the father's sight. These poor little ones seeing the glittering sword now ready to be plunged in their bloud, cried out for mercy, and called pitifully upon the sad name of their father that had no other power but to suffer his calamity. The sword passes through the bodies of his children to find his heart who dyed as many deaths as nature had given him gages of his marriage.

He expected that the sword stained with the bloud of his dear progeny should have ended his life and griefs; but this inhumane Tyrant having left him as much light as was needful to illuminate his misery, after that he had filled himself with this lamentable spectacle, caused his eys to be plucked out by an execrable cruelty; and having commanded him to be put in great & heavy chains caused him to be carried into Babylon where he ended his miserable life, & in his Person ended the Kingdom of Judea that had subsisted since Saul four hundred & fourscore years.

Nebuchadnezzar having heard the narration that was made of Jeremy & the good counsel that he had given to his K. esteemed him highly, & gave charge to Nebuzaradan the General of his Army to give him content, whether he had a mind to go to Babylon, or whether he would stay in his own countrey. But to shew he sought not the splendour of greatnesses, he chose to make his abode amidst poor labourers and vine-dressers that were left after the sacking of the city, the better sort being transported into Babylon.

He was recommended to Gedaliah who was settled Governour of those miserable reliques of the people by Nebuzaradan, but when this Gedaliah was murthered seven months after his creation, Johanan that was one of the principal men, counselled the Jews to quit that miserable land, & to follow him into Egypt. Jeremy opposed it, and foretold misery to all those that should go thither; but instead of believing him, they dragged him along by force, either to afflict him, or to prevail over his prophecies. He failed not to prophecy the desolatiō of Egypt that was to bend under the arms of Nebuchadnezzar, whereat his country-men found themselves incensed; and fearing left he should draw some envy on them, stoned him in a sedition. The Egyptians hearing talk of the life and predictions of this great personage made account of him, and set him up a Tomb, where God to honour his servant did great miracles, chasing away by his ashes the Crocodiles and serpents. Alexander that flourished two hundred years after him admiring those wonders caused his reliques to be transported into Alexandria, where he caused a magnificent sepulchre to be erected for him, as the Alexandrian Chronicle reports. Behold how virtue persecuted in its own house finds a prop with strangers, and even veneration amongst the Infidels; God using all sorts of instrumēts to honour the merits of those that have rendred him proofs of a perfect faithfulness.

Saint IOHN Baptist. Saint PAUL.

WHat makes an Hermit at the Court, a Solitary man in a Tumult, a sacred amongst Prophane, a Saint in the house of Herod? He was far more secure amongst wolves, amongst Foxes and Tygers, then amongst those wicked Courtiers. He was more contented with his little little dinner of Locusts and wilde Honey, retired in his Cabben, then at the sight of the pomps and pleasures of the King of Galilee. But God that is the Master of Kings and the Directour of Hermits hath thus disposed of him, and willed that he should dye at Court after he had so long time lived in the wilderness.

It is not certainly known what occasion drove him to it, whether he went thither by zeal, or whether he was sent for by design, or whether he was forced by violence. Some think that the miseries of his countrey afflicted under the Government of a dissolute Prince, affecting him with a great Compassion, He went out of the desert, of his own accord to admonish the King of his duty; Since that all those that came near him, and were obliged to speak to him were mute, partly by a servitude fatall to all those that are tyed to the hopes of the world, and partly also being seized with fear by reason of the power and cruelty of a womans spirit that possessed Herod. Others, as Josephus, have written that the Prince hearing every day of the great concourse of all sorts of people that went to the wilderness to see S. John, was afraid lest under colour of piety this might make some change of State. Tyrants love not men endowed with an extraordinary vertue, and that have not learnt the trade of flattering; their voice is the Cock that frights those cruel Lions; their life is a flash of Lightning that dazles their eyes; their actions are as many Convictions of their Iniquity. And therefore this Authour saith, that without other form of process, Herod caused him to be apprehended, to prevent him and break off those Assemblies that were made about him.

Yet it is probable and more consonant to the Scripture (which assure us that this Prince bare some respect to John, and heard him, and did many things according to his advice) that he proceeded not against him at first with so much violence. But the cunning Fox (as he was, according to the judgement that the Eternal Truth made of him,) seeing that St. John was in an high esteem for holiness, and on great credit amongst the people, strived to winn him, and to draw him to him, to make himself be reputed for a good Prince that cherished honest men, and to maintain by this means his authority that was already tottering, and little rooted in the true Maxims of a good Government. It was thus that Dionysius the Tyrant made use of the Philosophers, not for any affection that he bare them, but to appropriate them to the bad intentions that he had in State, and to give them some colour by the express or interpreted approbation of those personages that were in reputation for their wisdom. But Herod did ill choose his man; this was not a Court-flatterer, a Tool for all Trades, a Shoe for all Feet, but a stiffe and austere man, to whom a whole World would not have given the least temptation to do any thing against his conscience.

It would be a superfluous thing to enlarge ones self at length upon the rare qualities of Saint John, who having been many times highly commended by the Creatour of Vertues, and the Distributer of true praises, who hath preferred him above the greatest of the world, seems to have dryed up by his abundance the Elogies of the most eloquent. Let us content our selves to say, that there are abundance of excellencies in him, enough to make all chaires speak, and all pens write even to the end of the world.

He was born of the bloud of Aaron the brother of Moses, the first ornament of the Priesthood, and the great Conductour of the People. He came out of a barren Womb which he rendred fruitfull above all fecundities of the earth. His birth was declared miraculously by the voice of an Archangel. He was sanctified almost as soon as conceived, and vertue appropriated him to her self before that nature had brought him to the Light. He was a worshipper of the word when he was yet in the bowels of his Mother, and received the first rayes of the everlasting day before that his eye was open to the brightnesse of the Sun. Reason was advanced to him by a wonder altogether extraordinary. He hath had this honour, to know first, after the Virgin Mary, the news of that high mystery of the Incarnation, and of the Redemption of the world. Of all the Nativities of so many children of Adam, the Church celebrates none but that of John, who hath this common with our Saviour and his most holy Mother, who by a special priviledge honoured his birth by her actual presence; So that he saw his first day under the aspect of the Mother of the Universe. His name was given him by an Archangel, a name of grace and favour, that shewed he was placed in the rank of the dearest delights of Heaven, and the tongue of his dumb father tyed by an heavenly vertue, was loosed by its power, that it might pronounce that fair name. He was exempted from grievous sins, and (as many Divines hold) even from venial. He consecrated his retirement in the Desart almost as soon as he entred into the world. Furthermore he was a Prophet, and more then a Prophet, a Virgin, a Doctour, a forerunner of the Son of God, the Trumpet of Repentance, the Authour of a Baptisme (that ushered in that which regenerates us all) whereof Jesus was pleased to receive the sprinckling. In fine, he was the Horizon of the Gospel and the Law, and the first that shewed with the finger, the Lamb of God and the Kingdom of Heaven.

But let us make no reckoning of what I have alleadged, but let us say onely that which the word hath said of him, That he was not a Reed to bow at every wind, nor a man that could be allured by the delicacies of the Court; He spake their as a Prophet, he conversed there as an Angel, and at last dyed there as a Martyr. The time furnished him with an occasion, about which he could not speak without making much noise, and he could not hold his peace without betraying his Conscience.

That Herod Antipas, which we are to speak of here, was the son of the great Herod the Murtherer of the Innocents and of a Samaritan woman, who after the death of his Father (for as much as the Legitimate issue of Mariamne had been unworthily murthered to make way for unjust heirs) had for his part of the Kingdom of Judea, Galilee, which he held in quality of a Tetrarch. He was a Prince of a small courage, addicted to his pleasures, lascivious and loose, that endeavoured to preserve himself by poor shifts, having nothing stout nor warlike in his person.

He had a Brother named Philip, which held another parcel of that Kingdom of Judea dismembred and little enough considerable, the Romans having possessed themselves of the best part of it, after they had deposed Archelaus that had reigned as Successour of his Father in quality of a King. Philip was married to Herodias the Daughter of his Brother Aristobulus, and by consequence his Niece, those Marriages being ordinary enough in the Court of Herod. The Husband was a sweet and moderate spirit, that kept his small Government very peaceable, and pleased himself with rendering Justice to his people with so much ardour that he often stayed his Chariot by the way, and heard the differences of the meanest people to reconcile them. But the Wife quite contrary was an Haughty, Ambitious, Turbulent, Immodest spirit, that was not content with what God had given her, but tryed by all means to become Queen.

It happened that Herod Antipas under colour of a progress or recreation, went to visit his brother Philip who received him in his Palace with all curtesie and sincerity. He amused himself in the abode that he made there, to cajoll that Herodias his sister in Law, that needed not much courting to be brought in Love, so fickle was her disposition, and so desirous still of Novelties.

They found that Antipas was not pleased with his Wife, nor Herodias with her Husband; they make an audacious and irregular complot, which was to seperate themselves from their Mates under colour of a divorce, and to marry themselves together. Herod promised her, that he would go to Rome and make her Queen, which she could never hope for of her Husband, who (he told her) was a man without heart, and born onely to converse with inferiour people. He made himself a brave man at his Sword, Rich, Valiant, Happy, Magnificent; and his body was not ill made, so that this false marriage is concluded between the parties, and it is not known whether it began then by a clandestine adultery. Their privacies were but too remarkable: so that Herod's wife that was the daughter of Arethas King of Arabia had an inkling of them; and dissembling her thoughts, wrote to the King her father, that she could no longer live with a dissolute husband, that had no affection to her; and that violating the faith plighted in marriage, had made a promise to an adultéress to espouse her. Her father was greatly exasperated at this affront, expressing that he was ready to receive her to his Court, and counselled her to steal away warily from her Husband; which she did prudently enough, asking leave of him to take a little journy to the Castle of Macheron, which was upon the frontier to recreate her self. This was very freely granted her; and in the mean while she orders her fathers men to carry her away into Arabia. Yet she needed not to have studied her flight, and to have made a mystery of it; since her Husband had no great minde to run after her, but had given her much annoyance out of a design to weary her, and to make her escape from him of her own accord, to have an excuse to the King her father when he should complain of him.

This departure of the Arabian suddain and meditated, came to the ears of Herod and Herodias, who made Bonefires of joy at it in their hearts, and believed that it was an overture that Heaven had given them, to the accomplishment of their design. The wicked woman quits Philip her husband and comes into Galilee to lodge in the Palace of her brother bringing with her a shameless daughter, whom the deportments of the mother made men believe not to have appertained by good right to her husband. Josephus, out of whom we have in part taken this History, doth not tell us whether the good Philip was much troubled for his wife; but her insolent spirit makes us believe that he had no great reason to lament her. This coming was coloured at first with the pretence of a visit that she gave her brother in Law; but at last the business came to light, and to cover the scandal of it, a divorce was to be protested, and a marriage feigned. Herod had no want of flatterers and servile spirits at his Court that found out reasons to colour so great a crime.

He would have much desired that Saint John would have approved it, or that staying near him without speaking a word, his silence would have made the people believe that he was not upon tearms of disapproving it. But this was to judge too basely of so high a virtue. The holy man resolutely tells him, that it was not permitted him to marry his brothers wife; that it was an Adultery, and an odious incest in the sight of God, and scandalous to all his Subjects. He advertised him of the obligations of the Law, whereof he made profession, of the examples of the good Kings that had preceeded him, of the chastisements of the wicked that had felt the weight of divine justice. He laid before his eys how States passed from one hand to another by Injustice, Iniquity, Impiety, and the filthyness of those that Governed ill. He put also into his admonition the contempt of God, that was dreadful above all things, the interests of his brother, the ill example that he would give his family, the speeches of his people, the judgments even of stranger Kings; and as it is credible, forgat nothing of all the considerations that were worthy to be represented to him.

The spirit of Herod was not altogether bad, nor as yet forsaken of God, He heard Saint John, and conceived sometimes a remorse of his fault. But as soon as he had seen Herodias he remembred no more any of those advertisements, and durst not express that he had so much as any scruple of his marriage, So imperiously did this cunning woman carry him. She knew at last what the man of God had spoken, & was transported with a fury that suffered her not to breathe any other thing but revenge & menaces.

She laid hold of an opportunity to her advantage, and seeing this Prince besotted with her Love, and in a condition to deny nothing to her inticements informed him (as far as one may guess) that John was very dangerous to the welfare of the State; and that that great deluge of people that he drew after him spake nothing good; and that if he were a crafty man, as he seemed to be, he would be able to raise a sedition for the interest of his ambition; and if he were but simple, which she did not imagine, there would enough be found with him every day that would abuse that simplicity; that it was a great arrogance in him to find fault with the alliances of his marriage, and to disallow of that, which so many others, as good men as he had approved of; that she saw plainly that this tended to his ruine, and that if Saint John could bring about what he aimed at, she should be good for nothing but to be cast to Doggs, and that that was not the recompence that she expected of her love and faithfulness towards him after she had despised every thing for the price and esteem of his contentment.

She ceased not to beat upon the Prince's ears with such like words, and to breed a distrust in him of Saint John, in such a manner, as that he consented that he should be apprehended and put in prison; under colour, as Josephus saith, that he went about to change the peoples minds, and to embroil the State. This detaining of a man so holy and so renowned made a great noyse through all Judea, but the wicked woman had this Maxim, That one ought to take ones pleasure to content Nature, and little to trouble ones self at the opinions of the world below, nor at the complaints of honest men, judging that all mouthes ought to be stopped by the rigour of punishments, and that she should be innocent when no body durst any more find fault with her actions.

She

She slept not one good sleep with her Herod as long as Saint John was yet alive, but fearing alwayes either that her pretended husband whom she thought light enough, might be softned with compassion to release him, or that the people that held him for a Saint, might break open the prisons to take him thence, she resolved to see the end of him to give all liberty to her unbridled passions.

She watches the opportunity of Herod's birth-day, on which he was accustomed to make feasts and to entertain the principall Officers of his Kingdom. This crafty woman tampered with all the wills of those that had any power over his spirit for this design, and seeing that her Daughter was a powerfull instrument to move that effeminate Prince, and that he was extraordinarily pleased to see her dance, conjured her to employ all her Genius and all her industry, all the baits, allurements and gentilesses that she had in dancing, to gain the King's heart, and that if she saw him very freely merry, and on terms to gratifie her with some great advantage, she should take heed of asking any thing but the head of John; and that he was necessarily to fall, if she would not see her Mother perish and all her fortunes overthrown.

The daughter obeyed, and fits herself even to perfection to please the Prince's eyes; she enters into the banqueting house richly deck'd, and makes use of a dance not vulgar, whereat he was ravished, and all the Guests (that were perhaps hired by Herodias to commend her) made a wonderfull recital of her perfections. There was nothing now remaining but to give her the recompence of her pains. This daughter of iniquity and not of nature, sayes Chrysologus, seeing that every one applauded her, and that the King, that was no longer his own man, would honour her with some great present which he would remit to her own choice, even as far as to give her the Moity of his Kingdom, if she would have desired it, made a bloudy request, following the instructions of her wicked Mother, and required that instantly S. John's head should be given her in a plate.

Herod felt his heart pricked with a Repentance piercing enough, but because he had sworn in presence of the Nobles of his kingdoms to deny nothing that she should ask, would not discontent her, but gives command to the Master of his House to go to the prison and to cut of S. John's head, to put it in the hands of this wanton wench. As soon as the word was pronounced, her Mother was not quiet till she saw the execution of it; to Prison they run; every one thought that it had been for some grace, since that it was upon the nick of the feast of the Nativity of the King; but they quickly saw an effect quite contrary to that thought, when S. John was called for and told, that he must resolve to dye.

What, think we, did this divine Forerunner do at this last moment that remained to him of so innocent a life! but render thanks to God that made him dye a Martyr for the truth, after he had inlightened his eyes with the visible presence of the Incarnate Word which permitted him not to have any thing left in this world to be desired. He exhorted his disciples to range themselves about our Saviour, who was the Way, the Life, and the Truth. He prayed for his Persecutours, and for the easing of the miseries of his poor people; afterward having a relish of the first contentments of his felicity by the tranquillity of his spirit, he yielded his neck to the bangman. His body was honourably buried by his disciples, and his head brought in a plate to that cruel feast, put into the hands of that Dancéresse, who presented it to her Mother; and the Mother, according to S. Jerome, made a play-game of it, pricking the tongue with the needle of her hair.

All that one can speak is below the horrour of its spectacle, sayes S. Ambrose. The head of S. John, of the Prime man of the world, that had shut up the Law, that had opened the Gospel, the head of a Prophet, of an Angel, is outrageously taken off and delivered for the salary of a dancéresse. The sobereſt of men is massacred in a feast of drunkards, and the chastest by the artifice of a prostitute. He is condemned on an occasion, and on a time in which he would not even have been ablolved, as abborring all that proceeded from intemperance. O how dangerous is it then to offend a woman that hath renounced her honour! Herod gave her an homicide for a kiss. The hangmen wash their hands when they are ready to sit down at table, but these unhappy women pollute theirs in the banquet with a Prophet's bloud. The righteous slain by Adulterers, the innocent by the guilty, the true Judge by criminal souls. This banquet that should have been the source of life, brings an edict of death. Cruelty is mingled with delights, and pleasure with funerals. This horrible plate is carried through all the table for the satiating of those inhumane eyes, and the bloud that drops yet from his veins falls upon the pavement to be licked up with the ordures of that infamous supper. Look upon it, Herod, look upon a deed that was worthy of none but thy cruelty; stretch out thine hand, put thy fingers in the wound that thou hast made that they may be again bedewed with a bloud so sacred. Drink, cruel man, drink that river which thou seest glide to quench thy thirst. Look upon those dead eyes that accuse thy wickednesse, and which thou doest wound again with the aspect of thy filthy pleasures. Alas! they are shut not so much by the necessity of death as by the horrour of thy luxury.

The vengeance of God delayed not long to fall upon those perverse souls that had committed so enormous a crime. Arethas King of the Arabians, resenting the affront that had been given to his daughter by those Adulterers, enters in Arms upon the Lands of Herod, who bestirrs himself but weekly to resist him. Pleasures held him so fast chained that he had not the boldnesse to go to his frontiers in person to oppose his adversary: but contented himself with sending a Colonel that lost the battel hazarded against the Arabian; and this miserable King was in the way to have been deprived of all his Kingdoms, if the Romans had not intervened, who would not permit Arethas to make himself great in their vicinity. Some while after happened the passion of our Saviour, who as we know, was presented to this Herod; but by reason that there was no Herodias to urge him then to murther, he contented himself with the mockeries and derisions of his person. He thought from that time forward to enjoy a great quietnes but the justice of God that punishes exemplarily the violences that are committed against his servants, raised him up a great Catastrophe.

His Wife that spurred him incessantly with ambition perswaded him to take a journey to Rome to make himself great by the favour of the Romans, and to bear openly in his Titles the name of King. But he was much amazed that young Agrippa his Kinsman had supplanted him, and found so much favour with the Emperour Claudius, that he gave him the Kingdom of Herod Antipas, with the other of Philip that was now deceased, and sent him into Judea with the name of King, and with good Patents to authorize his Election. And for as much as concerns this murtherer of the Prophet, having been accused of much insolence and cowardise, the Edict of the Prince banished him to Lyons, so that he was like the Camel in the Fable, that for having asked for horns of Jupiter lost his ears. The Emperour let Herodias know that he intended not to comprehend her in the Edict, but that he permitted her to stay in the Countrey. Yet she was so constant in a wicked friendship, that she answered, That since she had been a companion of her husband in prosperity, she would by no means abandon him in adversity, & that she had rather be banished with him then have a Kingdom with another man that should not be according to her heart. She was left to do after her own head, & both of them set forth to go to exile, accompanied with that little wanton, which according to Nicephorus, passing over a frozen River fell in before she was aware, the Ice melting under her feet. She hung a long time in this snare, moving her self up and down as if she would have danced, in such a sort as that her neck was cut off by a razour of Ice, and her life fisled under the waters to make an honourable revenge to the holy forerunner of Jesus Christ. Herod Antipas and his Herodias were overwhelmed with poverty, with misery, and with ignominy in a strange land, offering up a long sacrifice of their pains to Divine vengeance without ever recovering either liberty or safety.

Saint PAUL and SENECA
In the COURT of NERO.

BEhold here a Theatre and a spectacle worthy of Saints, of Philosophers, and of Kings, the meeting of Paul and Seneca in the Court of Cæsar. The Doctour of the Nations with the most knowing man in the Universe. The Wisdom of the Cross with that of Philosophy. The birth of the Roman Church in the Bloud and in the Flames of Martyrs. The Gospel preached in a City which was the gulph of corruption; and which is more admirable, the Habitation of Christians in the Palace of Nero. To understand aright the greatness of our Christianity, the force of the Gospel, the combats of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, the Triumphs and the Majesty of the Church, it is needful to represent unto you an Idea of the estate of this chiefest city of the world, and the wicked manners which those two great Apostles observed in it, to root them out, and to cause a people to be born anew, regenerate in the Bloud of their Saviour.

The estate of Rome and the Court of Nero when Paul came to it.

It seemeth, that S. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans hath undertaken to describe the inordinate life of Nero, and of those in his Court who did conform themselves to his example to partake of his favours. He speaketh of some men who were faln into a reprobate sense, & who had changed the order of nature, and their sex, by most infamous lusts, being filled with all Iniquity, with Riot, Covetousness, Detraction, Envy, Murder, Debate, Deceit, and Malice, Whispering, Despiteful, Cursing, Proud, Arrogant, Inventers of evil things, Disobedient to their parents without Understanding, without Order, without Affection, without Fidelity, without Compassion: And this most clearly is manifested in all the Deportments of this most infamous Emperour, who was the monster of men. And we of necessity must affirm, that it is the manifest choler of heaven, and a scourge, enough to exterminate mankind from the earth, when a wicked and a licentious life is joyned with the heighth of Power, which giveth as much force to wickedness as it takes off from the strength and execution of the Laws. It is not my design to stretch forth that in words which might be spoken of Nero, but to make a short Collection of the manners of his own person and his Court, that the Readers might observe on what stuffe Seneca and S. Paul did work, and what were their proceedings and success.

The birth and education of Nero.

In the seven and thirtieth year of our Saviour, this prince (fatal to the ruine of the Empire) was born on the fifth of December, betwixt seven and eight of the clock in the morning; he came into the world with his feet foremost, contrary to the order of nature; he took all the vices of his ancestours and did partake of none of all their virtues. On the Fathers side he was descended from the Domitians sirnamed Barbarossa, whom the Romans vulgarly called Brasse-beards; & it was one of his ancestours unto whom the Oratour in choler did reply, That it was no marvel that he had a Beard of Brass, since Nature had given him a Mouth of Iron, and a Heart of Lead. His grandfather was a fiery man, cruel, & prodigal, and so amorous of playes, that he caused the Ladies of Rome to ascend the Theatre, and to act the Comedies themselves. He gave also the combate of the Gladiatours, performed with so much cruelty, that Augustus Cæsar was constrained to stop it by his Edicts. His father Domitius was detestable over all his life, insolent, furious, who with his own hand did stab one of his Free-men to death, because he would not be drunk; & in the pride of heart made his caroach to pass over a little child in the street; & quarelling with a Knight of Rome he caused one of his eys to be pulled out. Besides his cruelty, he was a man without faith, without probity without honesty, who deceived all his creditours, mocked all the world, and secretly abused his own sister. His wife was named Agrippina, she was daughter to Germanicus of the Bloud of the Cæsars, but of an evil Spirit, and prostituted to all manner of vices. And it is no marvel, that Domitius father to Nero, (when much joy was wished him on the birth of his son) did make answer, that there needed not such acclamations, for nothing could be born from him & Agrippina, but what should be pernicious to the Empire. Not long after, this unfortunate man did dy, consued with diseases that attended his filthy life, & left behind him his son three years of age, who saw his mother banished, & being destitute of means was brought up in the house of his Aunt Lepida, under the discipline of a dancer and a barber who did corrupt his spirit with the first impressions of vice, wch from his birth he was too much disposed to receive. The times changing, his mother returned into favour, & by her charms prevailed upon the spirit of the Emperour Claudius the successour of Caligula, a simple and a stupid man who espoused this dangerous woman, who afterwards poysoned him by a potion, and so placed her own son on the Throne of the

The perfidiousness of his mother.

Cæsar's.

Cæsars. And although the Astrologians had foretold her that he should be Emperour, and withall the murtherer of his mother, she made nothing of it, and thought it no hard bargain to buy the Empire with her own blood, saying, Let him Reign, and let him kill me.

By the artifices of this wicked woman, Nero was saluted Emperour in the seventeenth year of his age with a marvellous applause, and in the publick acclamations honoured with all great Names and specious Titles, all which he received, saving, onely that of Father of his Country, saying, He was too young to have so many children. He was very tractable in his youth, upright, gentle, discreet, well-spoken, and demeaned himself for the first five years very worthily under the conduct of Seneca. But when he approached to the one and twentieth year of his age, the ingredients of vice, which, with his birth he brought into the world, the base education in his infancy, the heat of his youth, the delights of the Court, and (which is the greatest of all temptations) the power to do all, did weigh down the Philosophy and the Instructions of Seneca, who proved by experience, That there is nothing more difficult then to perswade those to virtue whom too much power had put in the possession of all vices. His debaistnes began by the ill examples which he learned in his infancy, which were altogether unbeseeming his person: he became a Tumbler, a Puppet-player, a Comedian, a Waggoner, a Songster, and a Minstrel, not for Recreation but to make a publick profession of it, to dispute with the Masters of those faculties, and to abandon all the affairs of peace and Warre to be vacant to those exercises; insomuch, that he made it more to out-act a Comedian on the Stage, then to gain a Battel in the Field. He was also a Night-walker, and gave, and sometimes received many sore blows which did not permit him to pass unknown.

From hence he laid himself open to most extravagant profuseness, insomuch that he gave to Tumblers the patrimonies of Consuls, and made the funerals of some inconsiderable men to equal the Magnificence of the Obsequies of Kings; he never did wear the most gorgeous garments longer then one day. He did build his Palaces with so much cost, as if he would dispend on them onely all the wealth of Rome. When he travelled, he would be followed with a thousand Caroches, and his Mules were all shod with silver He made his Hall after the form of the Firmament, where the Vault being of Gold intermingled with Azure, and illuminated with counterfeit Starres did roul continually over his head, and rained on him showers of flowers, and waters of a most exquisite smell. There would he dine from noon till midnight in the riot of execrable services. He had a touch in his tender age of the vices of wantonness, luxury, avarice and cruelty, but being in the beginning, it was with some shame concealed in private.

But in the end he took off that mask by an open and inordinate dissoluteness, which knew no restraint. He was of belief that there was not one chaste person in the world, and took great pleasures in those who did repeat their filthiness to him. There was never man more abandoned to all manner of uncleanness without distinction of kindred, Sex, time, place, or man-hood. There was not one part in all his body that was not sacrificed to dishonesty: his polluted spirit made him invent those abominations, which are not to be endured by chaste ears, and with which I will not defile my paper.

The excess of his insolencies did at last render him odious to those who were most near unto him, and when they gently told him of his extravagancies, he would leap into a fury, and made a crime of their virtue, who did best advise him. He filled up the apprentiship of his enormities with the death of Britannicus, a young Prince the son of the Emperour Claudius, and brother to his wife Octavia, in which he employed the most famous Sorceress of Rome named Locusta who prepared the poyson, and made an assay on it before him on a sucking pig, who died immediately: now finding it for his turn, caused it to be served to his brother as he dined at the table with him. The malignity of the poyson was so piercing, that in an houre after, he fell dead at the feet of his mother and his sister, who were both present at this tragick spectacle. Nero, to excuse himself, said, That it was the effect of a great sickness to which he had been subject from his cradle, and that they ought to be of comfort. But the Princesses concealing their imagination for feat of provoking his rage, did manifestly perceive that he sowed those seeds of his murther, which he would afterwards continue in his Family.

His cruelty towards Britannicus.

It is almost impossible to believe the tender affection with which he prosecuted his mother Agrippina. He sometimes did give to the Souldiers that did guard his body for their word, The good Mother. He could not live without her. He did put into her hands the most delicate interest of all his Affairs, and desired that all things should stoop to her Authority. The mother also did endeavour by all possible artifices to tie her self unto his person, even unto the using of Charms; for it is most certain that she gave him the skin of a Serpent inclosed in a Bracelet of gold, which he carried ordinarily about him, & afterwards in despite did lay it by, & did look for it not long before his death but could not finde it. The endearments of this Agrippina were too fond, and her kisses more hot then belonged to a mother.

The love to his mother degenerated to misprision.

Seneca was amazed at the horrour of it, and to avoid a greater evil, he procured a young maiden named Acta, who otherwise was a slave that came from Asia, but very beautiful, to serve as a Love for Nero, and to divert him from that infamous passion towards his mother, in which he demean'd himself as Lot, who presented his daughters to the Sodomites to avoid the greater fury of their brutish lust. This Acta played her part so well by the counsel of Seneca, that mingling with her familiarities the considerations of State, she gave Nero to understand that his great privacies with Agrippina would render him contemptible to the Great ones of his Empire, and to all his Subjects, and would also give an advantage of power to his mother, which she would abuse to his own destruction.

Seneca by a less evil diverts a greater.

He believed her, and became very amorous of her, and that so furiously, that he intended to prepare a Genealogy for her, in which, he would make her to be descended from the Kings of Asia, and afterwards would marry her. His mother was as much enraged on the other side, that a Slave was become her rival, her choler did so much boil over, that she made horrible threatnings what she would say, and what she would do: She would go to the Army, she would complain to the Senate, she would discover the disasters of her infortunate house, and the empoysonings by which she had ravished the Diadem which belonged to the sons of Claudius her husband, to put on the head of ingrateful Nero.

His mother inraged.

Nero whether he would appease her or else deride her, did send her a gown of the antient Emperours which was very rich, but quite out of fashion; at which Nero's present to his mother.

which (she was much incensed, and said she was no Comediah to be dresst in such habiliments as those; and that he ought not but give one part to her from whom he received the whole, she would see she said if so poor a fellow as Burrus was, or such a pedantick as was Seneca, should govern the world at their pleasure in the disgrace of the bloud of the Cæsar's. Sometimes again she would display her self so weakly, that she would offer her self to be a procurer of Loves for her son, and to hide in her own cabinet, nay, in her own breast, whatsoever he would keep secret.

The fond love of parents chastned by God in their children.

Behold how God doth punish all fond affections and wickednesses by those themselves who have received the profit from their poysons! What shall this miserable mother do? She is no more in a condition to give content if there came by the by any small re-accomodation in their freindships, it was but langoishing and of a short continuance. Nero desired nothing more then to eschew her company, & if he was obliged to see her, it was with a Complement as cold as ice; he would kiss her indeed, but rather out of ceremonies then out of love, and would immediately forsake her.

Tacit. ex. 35. in Nerone.

It is recorded, that beholding her self altogether misprised, her fury provoked her to love a young Prince (on his mother side of the bloud of Augustus) named Plautius, whom she served for the satisfaction of her desires, and to find a subject to embroil the seat. This was brought to the ears of the Prince who began to startle at the apprehension of it, and could not be at rest until he was rid of them both. He killed Plautius having first violated his body and took a dismal resolution to infold his mother in the same calamity.

The horrible attept of Nero upon his mother.

After a faint reconcilement which continued for a few dayes, he sent her a letter full of fine Complements, inviting her to Baja whence he then took his pleasures. Aristotle saith, That women are naturally credulous, especially when they have something sent them to amuse their passion. She immediately prepared to come to him, who was as ready to entertain her, and brought her to Baula where was his house of pleasure. He had a desire to poyson her as he did his brother Britannicus, but he knew she had an eye always open for her own preservation, and had with her, antidotes to divert the operation of any poyson.

Therefore he consulted to put her to death on the sea, which is the field of dangers, where there is more of the effect and less of the suspicion. To accomodate her on her return, he caused a pópous vessel to be prepared, the deck whereof was to fall down by artifice, and charge was given to disloyal Anicetus, who was to conduct it, to put the device in practice, and to drown the barge. In the mean time he entertained the Queen in his Palace of delight, with incomparable chear. He would place her at the table above him; he would comport and comply with her in a gallant & graceful posture; sometimes he would whisper some soft words in her ear; sometimes he would openly renew the tenderness of his first love, and ancient confidence; he served her both with the gentle and with the serious, to give her full satisfaction: she poor woman in long draughts drank deeply of the sweets of those poysonous endearments, and found her heart much inlarged at so unexpected a change. At the hour of her departure he would conduct her to the boat, and entertain her with sugered words, telling her, that he would not live but onely for her love, and that the greatest and the most acceptable office that she could do him, was to be chearful, and to have a particular care of her health. He seemed to look upon her with ravishments, whether it were to put the better countenance on his perfidiousness, or whether he were touched in mind at the near misfortune of his mother, who being made a lamentable sacrifice was going now insensibly to her death. At parting, he was not onely content to kiss her mouth, but taking her in his arms, he in a lovers complement did embrace her, and omitted nothing to cover his horrible design.

She entred into the barge in the evening: The sea was calm, the winds had fallen asleep upon it. The sky was full of stars, as if it had opened all its eyes to behold the spectacle which it ought to revenge upon the Authour. Agrippina had two Gentlemen which sate on each side of her, and a Lady on whom she much relyed, named Acrocerannia, who was placed at her feet, who entertained her with the rehearsal of many of the late passages at Court, and the obligations and the protestations of her son, when (behold) the sign being given, the roof of the cabbin in which they were being covered with weights of lead (with which their treason overcharged it) did fall down, and killed one of the Gentlemen, and wounded Agrippina on the shoulder. The Ingineers who undertook the charge that the deck should fall directly down (being troubled in their consciences, or counterchecked by those who knew nothing of the game they were to play) did not perform it with that dexterity as was pretended but gave leisure to those whom they would destroy to provide for their safety. Acrocerannia beholding her self in that danger, cryed out that she was the mother of the Emperour, and that they should make haste to preserve her which was the occasion of her death, for immediately on those words she was killed with blows of the poles and oars.

Agrippina beholding this goodly pageant, and being most assured that it was a design of her sons, had yet such a command over her passion that she spake not one word, & was saved by the swimming of one of those who were not of the Conspiracy. The Frigots made to receive her, and to convey her to her own house which was not far off. The amazement of the accident did not so abate her spirits, but she sent to Nero to acquaint him, That the Gods & the good fortune of her Son had delivered her frō a great danger, but she desired him not to take the pains to visit her, nor to send any of his servants to her, because she desired to take her rest.

The amazement of Nero.

The dismal Prince who every moment attended the issue of this most execrable enterprise, was much amazed to understand that she had escaped the danger, and counterfeited that the messenger whom his mother had sent was an Assassinate imployed to murder him. He awaked Seneca and Burrus to demand their counsel, and did remonstrate to them the danger in which he was, if he should not throughly accomplish what he had so ill begun. These two great personages did look on one another, being unwilling to dissvade him without effect, or to consent unto it by reason of the horrour of it. Seneca, to whom the fluencies of Language were never before wanting, held his eys fixed on Burrus Captain of the Life-guard, as if without speaking to him he would ask him if he had not souldiers enough of his company to execute that which should be conceived to be expedient: but Burrus did prevent him, & told the Emperour, that the men under his command were too much affectionate to the Bloud of the the Cæsars to undertake so hardy an Enterprise. They both had a desire to divert him from so bad a deed for the want of an undertaker.

The death of Agrippina.

But the detestable Anicetus, Admiral of the Fleet, did again present himself to put the last hand unto the massacre. He immediately with some souldiers did transport himself to Agrippina's Castle; he broke open the gates, and found her in bed forsaken of all the world. As soon as she beheld three frightful faces to enter into her Chamber, she spake courageously to them, & told them, if they came to give her a complement, that she had no need of it, and if they had any other design, she believed her Son was not so wicked as to command her murther. These Villains without answering one word, did begin the assassinate; one struck her with a Truncheon, another had his Sword at her bleeding breast, to whom she cried out and only said, The Belly, Souldier, the Belly that did bear the Monster. After which she gave up the ghost, her body being hacked with many wounds. Her Corps was burned that very night, and one of her Servants killed her self before the Funeral pile, either for fear of the Son, or for grief of the Mother. Howsoever, Nero caused a Declaration to be published, in which, not without horrour to the Readers, he laid all the fault upon his Mother; and after this, he had never any rest, for he dreamed almost every night that he saw his mother calling him down to Hell, and beheld unnumbred Furies tormenting him in the flames thereof.

Nero continueth his Cruelties.

For all this, he desisted not from the nature of a Tyger, but to the massacre of his mother he added the murther of his wife Octavia, the most innocent Princess on earth. The cause of it was, one Otho, a companion of his deboistness had taken from Crispus, a man of quality, his Poppea, and in a fury (such as Nero's himself) had espoused her. He told Nero so many wonders of the pleasures of his marriage, that he gave him a desire to tast them, thinking it would be a means to raise him to a higher dignity: but the event was, that the Lady perceiving her self to be beloved of the Emperour, did totally devote her self unto him, and did advise him to send her husband into Portugal under the colour of Ambassadour.

He falls in love with Poppea, and estrangeth himself from his wife Octavia.

This cunning woman had a commanding beauty, a sweet and pleasing voice, and incomparable attractions and allurements. She did lead Nero as a child, and observing him so violently enamoured of her, she would be his Mistriss without a Paramour, and would not permit his own wife to partake of his bed. For which purpose she contrived a detestable plot, and caused the virtuous Empress to be accused for prostituting her self to a Player on the Flute, who by his birth was an Alexandrian; an accusation which could not be spoken without the absolute dislike of all good men, nor believed by any but ignorant and depraved persons.

Nevertheless, Tigillinus the most intimate with Nero, who was a great stickler in the marriage with Poppea, caused the men and maid-servants of the Princess to be examined; some of whom being torn upon the Rack, did in the extremity of the torment let fall some untruths to deliver themselves from the intolerable pain: others continued constant; and there was a maid-servant of that courage, that being in the midst of all her torments, she said to infamous Tigellinus; Know, Executioner, that there is not one part in all the body of my Mistriss, but it is more chast then thy mouth.

There being not proofs sufficient to destroy her, Nero was content to send her away into one of his houses, and to be divorced from her under the pretence of barrenness. Not long after, she was removed thence and kept under guard, and was afterwards called back to Rome, to appease the trouble which the absence of so illustrious and so virtuous a Lady had caused. She was received with great applause of all the City, which so alarm'd the spirit of Poppea, that she threw her self at Nero's feet, and did remonstrate to him; "That he should take no "more care for his loves, but for his life; and that "this return did tend to nothing else but to ruine "him with her self, and to make them both fall un-"der the fury of the people. That this was not it "which she had deserved of his friendship; and if "he had rather advance in his Palace the Child of a "player on the Flute, then to have from her a le-"gitimate heir; that he would give her leave to de-"part in a good hour; and that she would look "out her husband Otho in whatsoever place of the "world she could find him.

She used such and so many attractions, so many counterfeit tears, such sweetnesses, and such rigours of love, that she prevailed with detestable Nero, who (by Anicetus, the same man who before killed his mother) did raise a horrible calumny against the honour of his wife, and caused this instrument of the Devil to affirm, that he had played with the Empress; on which he caused her to be banished, and poor Octavia as a guilty person, did suffer under that wicked sentence, and was banished into the Isle of Pandaluria: and because Poppea could not sleep in quiet with Nero, as long as Octavia was alive, he filled up his cruelty, and by a most unworthy death he sacrificed her to the appetite of that most bold woman, whom afterwards he killed with a spurn of his foot on the end of his life and of his Empire.

A horrible calumny.

My Pen is weary to describe so many horrours, and doth go over them as on so many burning coals, but (my Reader) it is to represent unto you, that this pernicious caytiff causing the poyson of his evil actions to diffuse it self into the veins of all the City of Rome. The world was in its heighth of iniquity, when S. Paul and Seneca (meeting together at one time) did endeavour to cure the maladies of this wicked Court, the one by Philosophy, the other by the Gospel. Behold here the manners, learning, abilities, and the success, both of the one and of the other.

Johannes Sarisburiensis.

Who hath not Seneca in veneration (a good Authour saith) hath not the understanding of a reasonable man. He is known by all knowing men in his Writings, and mis-known by some in his Manners and in his Life. Suillius, a Roman Advocate, accused for corruption and banished by the counsel of Seneca, at what time he was employed in the government of Affairs, did write a defaming Book against that great Personage, which two Greek Historians, but men of small judgment, Dion, and Xiphiline have followed, and in many things have blamed him with as much passion as impertinence. This Opinion hath infected divers spirits, who, either for want of capacity or application, do discourse unto us of Seneca, as of a man quite contrary to his Books, which hath made me diligently to examine his Life, to take away the abuse and to give you an Idea of that puissant Genius with as much clearness as sincerity.

From whence proceeded the calumnies against Seneca.

Know then that he was a Roman by his Extract and bloud. He was born at Corduba a City in Spain, which was then under the Empire of Rome and full of Italians, who being born almost in all the parts of the world, were yet born within the Circle of their Empire. His father was of an ordinary family, a Gentleman of no great account, removed from the observation of the world, and as far from command as from ambition, addicted above all things to the study of Eloquence, reasonably learned, but of an admirable memory; for having but once heard them, he would readily rehearse two thousand names, and two hundred verses. His mother was named Helvia, one of the most beautiful women in the Empire, full of understanding and judgment, of a high virtue and a rare modesty; she had some knowledge in letters, and an extraordinary capacity to increase that knowledge, if time and custome had given her leave to take an advantage of it. His elder brother was called Novatus or Gallion, and had a great command in the Empire. His younger brother was named Mela, a man far from ambition, who lived in the house, and studied Eloquence with his Father, who in that regard did prefer him in his own judgment above his brothers.

His Education and Spirit.

But Seneca was nourished and advanced in Rome in the time of Augustus Cæsar; he received his first elements of learning under the Discipline of his father, and afterwards studied Philosophy under Attalus and Socion. In his first years he made the vigour of his Spirit, the force of Eloquence, and the abundance of Learning, to appear so fully in him, that he was admired by the most knowing men. But that great spirit did by degrees consume his body which was lean and thin, and troubled with defluxions and the ptisick, which would have brought him to his grave, if the cruelty of Nero had not prevented it.

The fury of Caligula against him.

He was obliged to make an Oration in publick before Caligula the Emperour, concerning which that monster in nature who could not endure any thing that was great and praiseful, and by a malignity of manners, envied all professours of Learning, did pronounce aloud that he had too much spirit, and that they must kill him; which had presently been put in execution, if one of the Mistrisses of the Emperour, who knew Seneca, and favoured him for his Eloquence, had not perswaded him, that he was not worth killing, a lean poor fellow, and one whom death would suddenly of it self take away from the world. Howbeit, he lived many years afterwards, and increased in knowledg as in age, and as much in Eloquence as in them both, attending a more favourable time to make a manifestation of it.

Claudius succeeded the Emperour Caligula, who was not a man for Seneca, and though he was induced with extraordinary qualities for a Courtier, yet the favour of the times did not much smile upon them. His clear spirit and his brave works made him to be known in the house of Germanicus, a Prince of the Bloud, who was poysoned in the flower of his age, and left behind him children of great consideration, namely two Princesses who made themselves diversly talked of in Rome; the one was Julia, the other Agrippina, the mother of Nero. This Julia took an affection to Seneca, being much pleased with the beauty of his spirit, and the grace of his discourse. He daily frequented the house of Germanicus, being no less in discretion then in favour, and wisely judged that these two high-born Princesses might one day contribute to the making of his fortunes.

Dion doth distinguish them in his 9. Book and Suetonius chap. 19.

But the Court is an uncertain sea where sometime a tempest doth arise when a calm is expected. The favour of Julia, in the stead of advancing Seneca, did suppress him, and did almost overwhelm him without any hope of rising again, although in the end it was in effect the cause of all his reputation. It came to pass that Messalina the wife to the Emperour Claudius, the most insatiable woman in her lusts that Nature ever produced, did conceive an enraged hatred against the house of Germanicus, and especially against the Princess Julia, because she was highly esteemed for her rare beauty; and the high spirit of Messalina could not endure that any Lady should be praised at Court for her beauty, but her self. Besides, she perceived that her husband, whom she absolutely governed, did make very much of that young Princess; she therefore caused her to be falsly accused for prostituting her honour, and procured her to be banished the Court. An inquiry was made after those who did frequent her house: Seneca was named amongst the foremost, and by calumny invelopped in the same accusation, whether it was suspected that he had treated of love with her, or whether it was thought that he was an accomplice in her excesses, and had flattered her in her passion without giving her advice.

Calumny against Julia and Seneca.

It it true that our Seneca was then in the flower of his age, and was none of those sullen and stern Stoicks that had put the world into a fright: He had a gentle spirit, discreet, and agreeable to women; but he was too advised to let his passions fly so high as to commit any loose act in the house of the Cæsars. Dion his greatest Enemy doth justifie him in this business, and doth confess that all this accusation was most unjustly grounded, and that Messalina was so depraved and so corrupted with the inordinateness of filthy lusts, that no credit was to be given to her.

Nevertheless, she ceased not to bear down the innocent with the weight of her power; she condemned the Princess to banishment, and afterwards to death, as Dion and Suetonius do affirm. It did much afflict her that Seneca was alive, who by divers sentences in the Senate was allotted to death: but the good Emperour Claudius was most unwilling to extinguish in that Spirit, the Glory of Eloquence and of the Empire, desired his life of the Senate, and was contented that he should be banished into the Isle of Corsica, where at the beginning he was touched with a melancholy amazement to find himself separated from the pleasures of the Court to live amongst the rocks, and people as ungentle as the rocks; but he imployed all his Philosophy to comfort himself, and to temper the eagerness of his fortune with the tranquillity of his mind.

Here his spirit being delivered from the noise and the tumults of Rome, and the servitudes of the Court, did altogether reflect upon it self, and found there those Lights and those Treasures which before lay undiscovered to him. Tribulation is to men as a spur to incite them to the production of brave works and of generous actions; and this appeared in Seneca, who in this place of banishment did write most excellent Treatises, neither did his conversation with those rude inhabitants alter the graces or the beauty of his language. He treated there with the Intelligences, and dived into the Contemplation of the World: He took off the vail from Nature that she might the better be seen in her Majesty. Howsoever in that solitary place he had sometimes his hours of affection, beholding himself severed from his Mother whom he tenderly loved, and whom, in that affliction, he comforted with a Letter which might pass for a good Book. He passionately desired the Company of his brothers, and ſome perſonages of Honour who loved him with as much ſincerity as profeſſion.

There was ſome that think it ſtrange in Seneca that he ſhould deſire and endeavour his return, and that in his conſolatory letter to Polybius, he did write the praiſes of the Emperour Claudius who did baniſh him. But have not they ſomething to do who exact more perfection in Seneca, a man at that time of the world, then is required in a Prophet: where is the bird that doth not ſometimes beat his bill againſt the cage to find out the door to his liberty? Jeremy was exceeding patient, and yet he humbly beſought K. Zedekiah to draw him out of priſon where he had ſuffered much, and much feared that he ſhould be committed again unto it. Doth not S. Paul ſay that liberty is better then ſlavery, and that one is to be ſupported by neceſſity, and the other to be procured by reaſon. What fault hath Seneca done, that in his exile he wrote unto Polybius (a great favourite) a letter conſolatory on the death of his brother, and inſerted in it a few good words to appeaſe the Emperour. Should he have ſpared a period or two to deliver himſelf from a baniſhment where he had continued for the ſpace of 8 years? I ſhould no way approve him for beſtowing flatteries on a wicked man, which ſhould be an act unworthy of a Philoſopher; for a generous ſpirit had better to endure the extremity of evil then praiſe a tyrant, and give applauſes to his perſon. You may obſerve how careſull he is in that Tract to give not ſo much as one Complement to Meſſalina, who was a very bad woman, although ſhe had the command of all; he onely praiſed an Emperour who in that time wherein he wrote his Conſolation to Polybius, was in good reputation, and made the face of the Empire look far otherwiſe then it did in the Reign of Caligula his predeceſſour. He is ſo diſcreet, that all the praiſes he doth give him, are no more then wiſhes.

Seneca did well to deſire and procure his liberty.

The excellent Complement of Seneca.

Let the Powers of Heaven preſerve him long on earth; Let him ſurmount the years and the acts of Auguſtus; and as long as he ſhall be mortall, let there not any die in his houſe. Let him give us a long ſon to be Maſter of the Roman Empire, having approved him by his long fidelity; And let him have him rather for his Colleague then for his Succeſſour. (Afterwards he addreſſeth himſelf to Fortune, and ſpeaketh unto her,) Take heed, O Fortune, how thou makeſt thy approaches to him. Let not thy power be ſeen in his perſon but by thy bounties. Let him redreſſe the calamities of mankind, and re-eſtabliſh all that which the fury of his Predeceſſour hath ruined and made deſolate. Let that fair Star which is riſen when the world was falling into the Abyſmes, continue alwayes to illuminate the Univerſe. Let him pacifie Germany, and let him open England. Let him gain and ſurmount the Triumphs of his Father. His Clemency, which is the firſt of his Virtues, doth promiſe that I ſhall not be a Spectatour onely, and that he hath not caſt me down, to raiſe me up no more. But why ſay I caſt down? he hath upheld me from the hour that I fell into my misfortune; When they would have thrown me headlong down, he interpoſed; and by the moderation of his divine hands he laid me gently on the earth. He hath entreated the Senate for me, and not content himſelf to give me life, he hath deſired it of others that I might enjoy the Grant with more aſſurance. Let him deal with me as he pleaſeth, I aſſure my ſelf that his Juſtice will find my cauſe to be good, or his Clemency will make it ſo. It is all one to me whether I am judged not guilty by his Equity, or whether I am made innocent by his Bounty. In the mean time I rejoyce in my miſeries with a ſenſible conſolation to ſee the courſe of his Mercy which goes through the Univerſe, and which every day doth call forth the Baniſhed from this little corner of the earth in which I am buried alive. I have that hope that his Mercy will not come to me, to go beyond me, and to leave me to die in this place. He knoweth the time in which he will relieve thoſe whom he pleaſeth, and I muſt leave that to his Diſpenſation; onely I ſhall endeavour not to render my ſelf unworthy of his Benefits, and I will provide in ſome ſort that his Goodneſs ſhall not bluſh to have made its approaches to me. How happy, O Cæſar, is your Clemency! under whom the Baniſhed do live more contented, then Kings did heretofore under your Predeceſſour.

Behold here the fineſt Complement that ever proceeded from the mouth of man, and he who well obſerves it, will find nothing of ſordid flattery in it. And that the Reign of Claudius, compared to that of Caligula, doth go ſo far beyond it, as ſilver ſurpaſſeth lead. Yet for all thoſe fair words, Claudius did nothing for him as long as Meſſalina did manage the heighth of the Affairs, and till after his Polybius, who ſuffered himſelf to ſink into that infamy, as to be numbred in the Liſt of the Adulterers with the Empreſs, was diſgraced, and condemned to death: not long after which, this proſtituted Woman having wearied both heaven and earth with her filthineſs, did incenſe her husbands Patience into a Rage, who cauſed her to paſs under the edge of the ſword.

The revolution at Court, and the return of the baniſhed.

Agrippina, widow to Domitius the Father of Nero, returned then to the Court, having abſented her ſelf long from it by reaſon of the misfortune of her ſiſter Julia; ſhe knew ſo well to cajole the Emperour, that he eſpouſed her as I have mentioned before. The firſt action ſhe did, and for which ſhe was praiſed by all the world, was her revoking of Seneca to Rome from the Iſle of Corſica: immediately afterwards, ſhe committed the charge of her ſon Nero into his hands, who was then eleven years of age, and finding him to be a man of a choice ſpirit, ſhe took a reſolution to make one day uſe of his ſervice in the management of the affairs of State.

Seneca returns into high repute.

To ſpeak ſincerely of the manners of Seneca, he had a great and a gallant ſoul, and diſpoſitions to a high virtue; he was neither guileſull, nor wilfull, nor malicious, nor cruel, nor voluptuous; and I do ſtrongly believe, that of a Gentleman he was the beſt man of that Age. Alſo Cornelius Tacitus, who concealeth no evil that he knows, and oftentimes doth divine on that of the which he is not throughly informed, doth never ſpeak of Seneca but with honour, as a wiſe and ſober man, and moderate in his paſſions. And Saint Hierome himſelf doth witneſſe, that he was a moſt continent perſon, which may ſuffice to diſabuſe thoſe who ſuffer themſelves to be amazed with the Rapſodies of Dion.

The manners of Seneca.

Without all doubt he had ſomething in his ſoul as religious as it was great, which did not content it ſelf with words but did proceed to actions; And this did eaſily appear in his youth, for when ſo many gentlemen of Rome did reſort to the Univerſities of the Philoſophers, ſome for the wantonneſs of ſport, others to ſee faſhions, others to carry away ſome fine ſentence in their Table-book, and by that means to get some esteem in conversation, Seneca addressed himself unto them to learn and to practise virtue. When he intended to speak of Riches, of Solitude, of Chastity, of Sobriety, he found his heart inflamed, and he would have lived altogether a retired life, if the great qualities wherewith God had endued him, had not imbarked him in the Affairs of the Court.

It is a wonder that amongst so great a confluence at the Court, he always observed that austere life which he practised in his infancy. He did never eat of any Delicacies which do serve only to flatter the appetite, and did content himself with the most simple Viands. He never drank any Wine; he used altogether cold Baths, he did not care for perfumes, he oftentimes would lie on the ground upon a poor Mattress, where no print of his body was to be seen, so hard it was. He also sometimes did abstain from food, and he found it good for him, and all his lifetime he had practised it, if his Father had not expressly commanded him to the contrary, because in the reign of Tiberius, there was a sect of strangers condemned at Rome, who made a profession of certain Abstinences. Some are of opinion that he did speak of Christians, but they were neither known nor persecuted under the Emperour Tiberius. For the rest, all his Train were carried in one Caroach, which oftentimes was out of order; and instead of lovely Pages and Minions, he was served by men only, and small was the Retinue that attended on him.

Epist. 108.

He received all things that were given him with facility, and complained not of any thing: He took no offence at the reports and slanders of men, and pardoned many other inconveniencies, he had an honest heart and full of love to those to whom he professed love: he was tender of compassion on the behalf of the poor, and a hater of covetousness. After he had satisfied the Affairs of the Empire, he took no pleasures at all but in Contemplation and Study, Books being unto him as necessary as his bread. His table was moderate, his discourse affable, his life innocent, and his conversation most attractive. Amongst other things, he would be angry with himself for not having professed Virtue openly enough., and for reflecting his thoughts on the considerations of the World: and in modesty he would say, that he aspired always to the heighth of Virtue, and nevertheless he still found himself to be in the center of Vices. Those who condemn him without knowing what he was, would think that they themselves did great penance if they should live after the manner of Seneca. He was with Nero five or six years before he was made Emperour, and formed his Infancy with excellent Instructions: in the mean time Agrippina did the fatal act, as I have spoken and poisoned Claudius her husband. to devolve the Empire on her son, who was elected by the general consent of all the States.

It is too true that Seneca found himself overcharged with joy at so great a change, and at that time a little forgat the severity of a Philosopher, when he composed a railing Book on the death of Claudius, which he called Apocolocynthosis; as if he should have said, Divinity acquired by the means of a Drug, alluding to that he was numbred in the Catalogue of the Gods, being preferred to Heaven by poyson. Some believe that he composed that Book as well to revenge himself for the death of his dear Benefactor Julia, and for the affliction of his long banishment, as to rejoyce his Scholar Nero who took great pleasure in it. But in my opinion it is unworthy the gravity of so great a personage: and I know not to what purpose it is to revile the Ashes of the Dead, although it is not forbidden to write a true History to leave a horrour to Posterity in recording the lives of the wicked. This, howsoever may serve for instruction not to play with wasps, or incense those who have the Pen in their hand, and can eternally proscribe their Adversaries.

Seneca made a Libel against Claudius.

He is made Minister of State.

After this sport he was employed upon the Earnest, and Agrippina, Mother of the young Emperour, desiring to confirm her self in the Monarchy, and to govern by her Son, did supply him with two creatures, men of great capacity and fidelity; Burrus for Arms, and Seneca for Laws. The first, was severe in his conversation, the other, was of a mild and pleasing disposition. They both agreed even to their deaths in the government of the Affairs of State. Then it was, that Seneca did enter into those great Employments, and exercised that high wisdom which he had acquired for the Government of the Empire. He began with his Prince, who was the first and the most amiable object of all his troubles: and although at the first he did express himself very tractable and agreeable to all the world, yet Seneca perceived in his infancy the marks of a cruel & bloody nature; and told to his intimate Friends that he nourished a young Lion whom he endeavoured to make tractable, but if he should tast once of the blood of men, he would return to his first nature. And this was the occasion that at that time he did write for him the two Divine Books of Clemency, where, with variety of remarkable proofs he doth establish the Excellency, the Beauty, and the profit of candor of Spirit, and the advantage which redounds unto a Prince to govern his Subjects with Bounty and Love. On the contrary, he remonstrates the horrour and disasters of Tyrants, who would prevail by cruelty in the management of their Estates. All his endeavour tended that way, wisely foreseeing that Nero would fall into extreme Cruelties, and for that cause he did willingly give way that he should delight himself in Comedies, in Musick, and such Exercises of softness, hoping that in some manner it would make more civil his savage nature. He also composed for him many eloquent Orations, which the young Emperour would pronounce with great grace, to the general admiration both of the Senate and the people.

His judgment on Nero.

He made also many excellent Ordinances, some whereof by the report of Dion, were engraved upon a pillar of silver, and were read every year at the renewing of the Senate. He hated all the inventions, the deceits, and tricks of State, as a trade of iniquity, and did ground himself on the eternal principles of Justice, by which he kept the Empire in a profound peace, in great abundance, and a sure felicity. So that in a manner Frontine makes a true narration: he saith, that Seneca had so redressed all abuses, that it seems he had brought goodness into the Empire, and called the Gods from Heaven to be conversant again with men. In which he made use of the Philosophy of the Stoicks, not that which is so rigid and so sullen, but that which he had tied and seasoned for that design, to give to the world a tast thereof. His opinions for the most part are Rational, Sacred, and Divine.

He put his State in good order.

The Maximes of Seneca.

If he speaks of God, it is in the same sense as the Saviour of the world did discover to the Samaritan. He professeth openly that God is a Spirit, and that the difference betwixt God and us, is, that the better part of us is Spirit; but that God is all Spirit, most Pure, Eternal, Infinite, the Creatour of the great works works of nature which we behold with our eys.

Of Religion. If he ſpeaketh of true Worſhip and the moſt ſincere Religion which we ought to imploy to honour and adore the Sovereign King of the Univerſe; he doth ſufficiently declare, that the worſhip of God ought to be in Spirit and in Truth, as our Saviour hath preſcribed. When you figure God (ſaith he) repreſent a great Spirit, but peaceable, and reverend by the ſweetneſs of his Majeſty; a friend to men, and who is always preſent with them, who is not pleaſed with bloudy Sacrifices, for what delight can he take in the butchery of ſo many innocent creatures. The true Sacrifice of the great God, is a pure Spirit, an upright underſtanding of him, and a good Conſcience. We ought not to heap ſtones upon ſtones to raiſe a Temple to him, for what need hath he of it: the moſt agreeable Temple that we can build for God, is to conſecrate him in our hearts. Lactantius hath ſo much eſteemed of this paſſage, that in the ſixth Book of his Inſtitutions he doth oppoſe it to the Gentiles as a buckler of our Chriſtianity.

Lactan. div. Inſtit. lib. 6. cap. 25.

Of the divine preſence Epiſt. 83. If there be a queſtion about the Preſence of God, which above all things the maſters of ſpiritual life do commend in their Inſtructions, he ſaith, that it is to no purpoſe to conceal ones ſelf from man, and that there is nothing hid from God who is preſent in our hearts and in our moſt ſecret thoughts.

Of Providence. If we reſt in the Contemplation of the Divine Providence, which is the foundation of our life, he believeth a Providence which reacheth over all. And in a Tract which he hath compoſed, he pertinently doth anſwer thoſe who are amazed, why Evil arriveth to good people, ſince ſo great and ſo good a God hath a care of their ways. He ſaith, that it is the chaſtiſement of a Father, an exerciſe of Virtue, and that what we take to be a great Evil is oftentimes the occaſion of a great Good; that ſuch is the courſe and order of the world according to the Divine Diſpenſation, to which we ought to ſubmit our ſelves.

Of the Immortality of the Soul. Juvat de æternitate animarum quærere, imò credere. Epiſt. 102. If we conſider the Immortality of the Soul, which is the foundation of our Faith and of all virtuous actions, it is certain that he had a good opinion of it, and profeſſeth in his 102. Epiſtle, that he delighteth not only according to Reaſon to ſearch after the Eternity of the Soul, but to believe it; and he complaineth that a letter received from a friend did interrupt him in that Contemplation, which ſeemed to him ſo palpable, that it was rather to him an agreeable Viſion that he had in a Dream, then any Diſcourſe in Philoſophy. And in the end of the Epiſtle he ſpeaketh of wonders, of the Original of the Soul, and the return of it to God. And in the Preface of the firſt Book of Natural Queſtions, which he did write ſome few years before his death (which makes the truth more remarkable) he ſpeaketh clearly, that the Soul returneth to heaven, if it be well purified from its commerce with earth; that heaven is its true Country and Element; and that it is a great proof of its Divinity, that it delighteth to hear of heavenly things as being the affairs proper to it ſelf.

We muſt take care not here to judge and condemn Seneca on a doubtful word, as when in his Conſolation to Martia, he ſaith, that all end by Death, and by Death it ſelf. He only there toucheth of Goods and Evils, of Honours, Riches, Pleaſures, Troubles, and the Cares of this preſent life. It is moſt clear, that there is nothing in that Sentence which derogates from the Immortality of the Soul, becauſe he concludes that Treatiſe with the joys which a happy Soul receiveth in the other life. And it is not from our purpoſe to conſider, that Seneca ſometimes in diſputing ſpeaketh by ſuppoſition, according to the Idæa of others, and not according to his own. We cannot know better the opinion of an Authour then by his Actions and his Practiſe; and we obſerve that Seneca hath not only profeſſed the Immortality of the Soul by words, but believeth the effect in ſecret; for he reverenced the Souls of great Perſonages, and did believe them to be in heaven, which he teſtified before he received the Chriſtian Faith, when being in a Country-houſe of Scipio of Africa, he rendred divine honours to his Spirit, proſtrating himſelf at the Altar of his ſepulchre, and perſwading himſelf (he ſaid) that his Soul was in heaven, not becauſe that he was General of the Army, but becauſe he lived an honeſt man, and having infinitely obliged his ingrateful Country, he retired himſelf in a voluntary ſolitude to his own houſe to give no fears and jealouſies of his greatneſs. Epiſt. 86.

His opinion of the ſovereign good. If we demand where he placed the ſovereign good and the end of Man, we ſhall find that he eſtabliſhed the felicity of this preſent life to live according to Reaſon; and that of the life to come in the re-union of the Soul with its firſt beginning which is God. From this foundation he hath drawn a rule and propoſitions which he hath diſperſed over all his Books, and theſe are to deſpiſe all the goods of the world, Honours, Empires, Riches, Reputation, Pleaſures, gorgeous Habiliments, ſtately Buildings, great Poſſeſſions, Gold, Silver, precious Stones, Feaſts, Theaters, Plays, and to take all things as acceſſory, and to regard them no more then the moveables of an Inne where we are not but as paſſengers. And above all things, to eſteem of virtue, of the mortification of looſe deſires, of contemplation of eternal virtues, of Juſtice, Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance; of Liberality, Benignity; of Friendſhip; of Conſtancy in a good courſe of life; of Patience in Tribulation; of Courage to ſupport Injuries; of Sickneſs, Baniſhment, Chains, Reproaches; of Puniſhments, and of Death it ſelf.

We may affirm, that never any man ſpoke more worthily then he, of all theſe ſubjects. Never Conquerour did ſubdue Nations with more honour, then this great Spirit, with a magnificent glory at his feet, hath levelled and ſpurned down all the Kingdoms of Fortune. All that he ſpeaketh is vigorous, ardent, lively. His heart when he did write did inflame his ſtyle to inflame the hearts of all the world. His words followed his thoughts. He did ſpeak in true Philoſophy but as a King, and not as a ſlave to words and periods. His brevity is not without clearneſs. His ſtrength hath beauty, his beauty hath no affectation: he is poliſhed, ſmooth, full, and entire; never languiſhing, impetuous without confuſion; his diſcourſe is tiſſued, yet nothing unmaſculine; invincible in his reaſoning, and agreeable in all things. Howſoever, we ought not to conclude by his Books that he was a Chriſtian, becauſe he wrote them all before he had any knowledge of Chriſtianity, and therefore it is not to be wondred at, if ſometimes he hath Sentences which are not conformable unto our Religion.

The anſwer to the calumniatours of Seneca. Some one will object that he is admirable in his Writings, but his Works carry no correſpondency with his Pen. This indeed is the abuſe of ſome ſpirits grounded on the calumnies of Dion and Suillius, which thoſe men may eaſily ſee confuted, who without paſſion will open their eyes unto the truth. He reproacheth him for his great Riches, in lands, in gold and silver, and sumptuous moveables, and layeth to his charge that he had 500 beds of Cedar with feet of Ivory. It seems that this slanderer was steward of Seneca's house, so curious he was in decyphering his estate. But all this is but a mere invention; for how is it possible that he who according to Cornelius Tacitus did not live but onely on fruit, and bread, and water, and who never had any but his wife to eat with him, or two or three friends at most, should have 500 beds of Cedar and Ivory to serve him at his feasts. It is true that he had goods enough, but nothing unjustly gotten; they were the gifts and largesses of the Emperour. And because he had sometimes written that Goods were forbidden to Philosophers, he therefore was content to hold them in servitude and not to be commanded by them. He was overcome by Nero to carry some splendour in his house, as being the chiefest of the Estate; and it was put upon him as a sumptuous habit upon some statue. We cannot find that he had ever any children but his Books, or that he made it his study to enrich his Nephews or his Nieces, or to raise a subsistence for his house from the charges, greatnes, and riches of the Empire. He had the smallest train and pomp that possibly could be, and when he had the licence to be at liberty from the Court, he lived in an admirable simplicity; and which is more, he besought Nero with much importunity to discharge him from the unprofitable burden of his riches, and to put several stewards into his houses to receive his revenues: but he made answer to him that he did a wrong unto himself to demand that discharge, for he had nothing too much, and that he had in Rome many slaves enfranchized who were far more rich then Seneca.

Yet for all this Reproach is proved to be unjust, Dion proceeds further in his slander, and alledgeth, That he indeared Queens and Princes to him; for he wrote their Papers, and professed himself a friend to the richest Favourites. What is this, but to reproach a Courtier with his Trade, his Discretion, his Civility, his Affability which this great personage made very worthily to comply with his Philosophy. He married an illustrious Lady, and of invaluable wealth. What! should he being in that high dignity to please Suillius, become suitor to some chamber-maid, or for mortifications sake, court some country girle? Ought he to bring such a reproach after him to the Court of the Prince, what sin hath he committed to espouse the most honest Lady in Rome called Paulina, and to have lived with her in the condition of a good husband, and in a perfect intelligence. But he made love to the mother of the Emperour. This slander never came into the thought neither of Tacitus, nor Suetonius, nor any other Historian who was a man of judgment. It was onely the invention of an Impostor infected with poyson that dreamed of any such thing. Agrippina had other manner of gallants and servants then Seneca in her Court: she sought not after bodies made thin with abstinence, and manners quite removed from such commerce. In a Court so clear-sighted, there could never be discovered any familiarities which might give the least impression of such a thought, and which would have removed both the one and the other; no, Seneca did rather incline too much unto severity then to give any allurements to Agrippina.

His falling off from Agrippina.

The Glosser yet goes further and saith, That he was ungratefull to her. What ingratitude? he always endeavoured to tie the spirits of the mother to the son in a perfect friendship, and did not cease to redress all breaches that might give occasion of offence. But when he observed that Agrippina did mount upon the Throne of her son, did give audience to the Ambassadours of the Nations, did visit the Armies; and when he heard her vaunt that the Empire came unto him by her means, and that she would take it away from him when she thought good, he could not digest it. He preserved himself in that fidelity which he had sworn unto the Emperour, but he never counselled him either to remove Agrippina, or to displease her. When Nero very warmly called him and Burrhus together, and in a great fright told them that his mother had conspired against his life, and that he was but a dead man if he did not prevent it, Seneca remained so lost in amazement, that in all his life he was never dumb but at that instant. And Cornelius Tacitus makes no mention of the least word he did let fall that might witness his consent to so horrible a deed. It is true that he composed the Declaration of Nero after his mothers death, but it was by a rigorous necessity. He found himself betwixt two desperate extremities, either to leave the whole Empire at randome, to forsake the Helm and the Vessel in the tempest, and tender his neck to Nero, or to find some lenitive to ease the calamities so full of virulence. Some there are that do thus excuse him for it, and say, It was no marvel that he did deport himself in this fashion, because he was near to Princes; and that those who even make a profession of virtue, do study their own preservation, and oftentimes conceal those affairs which they cannot redress.

He is excusable for making the Declaration.

For my own part, I am of judgment, that great men being in a place where they are obliged to speak, if they should wilfully or timorously hold their peace, do grievously offend God by their silence; and that Seneca should rather have died then have adhered to Nero polluted with his mothers bloud, and execrable to all the world.

He had before demanded leave to be gone from Court, wisely foreseeing the tempests that follow, but he could not obtain it, nor resist Nero, without putting himself in danger of his life. You see there may be a time when an honest man should rather venter his life then give a scandall unto Virtue. But his dissimulation could not help him from being made at last a sacrifice to his most cruel Scholar, as we anon shall declare unto you.

Why Seneca having so many gallant qualities did perform so little in the reformation of Manners.

But for the present let us demand and examine the cause, why Seneca with so much Power, Authority, Eloquence, Philosophy, and humane Wisdome, did effect so little for the reformation of manners in the Court of Nero, and in the City of Rome? It is without all doubt that the wisdome of Books was too low for so high a design. We must make use of the grace of Redemption, and the Bloud, and the Gospel of Jesus to redress such lamentable confusions. Let us then behold S. Paul, who at the same time did come to plant the Faith in Rome, and talked with Seneca, and made him to behold more excellent Light in the purity of his Life and Doctrine.

Serrar. Tal. Tac. Cornel.

It is not my intention in this place to write at large the life of S. Paul, which is already sufficiently known, but particularly to touch on those things which he did at Rome when Seneca was in the government of the Affairs of the Empire. Nevertheless, it is expedient to make a short recapitulation of the Times and the Voyages of this great Apostle, to understand the occasion that did bring him to Rome, and what he there did practise for the advancement of the Faith.

S. Paul being born in the second or third year of our our Saviour, was miraculously converted to the Christian Religion in the three and thirtieth year of his age. By his Extraction, he was a Jew born in the City of Tarsus, in the Province of Cilicia, where was a flourishing University, from which came Antipater, Archidemus, Artemidorus, Diogenes, and Diodorus. But S. Paul, although he took his birth in the air of the Philosophers, and had some tincture of their Principles, did not amuse himself on the Philosophy of the Gentiles, but retiring to Jerusalem he studied at the feet of Gamaliel a great Doctour of the Mosaick Law. The zeal which he had for his Religion made him furiously to persecute Christianity from his birth unto the time that he was subdued by the Spirit of God; and of a ravening wolf was made a lamb of the Fold. Saul fell (saith S. Augustine) and Paul did rise, the interpretation of which name according to Hesychius is admirable; to shew unto us, that all things are marvellous in him, even his name it self.

S. Paul falsly accused

After his Conversion, he preached in Arabia and in Damascus for the space of three years, and did powerfully convince the Jews on the verities of our Faith, who to divert the course of his Ministery in the embroilments which then were raised between the King of the Arabians and the Romans, did accuse him for having moved in the favour of Rome against the Arabians and their King Arethas, who at that time held the City of Damascus, and had placed in it a Governour of his own faction. This Barbarian made an exact inquisition, and would have apprehended S. Paul, who was then in the same City. But his brethren the Christians were very careful to deliver the Innocent from the hands of the guilty; and shewing themselves neither slothful nor fearful in a business of that difficulty, (although he who had in his hands the Government of the City did threaten to destroy them if they delivered not Paul unto him) they caused him to escape out of a window, and to come down all along the Ramparts thereof in a panier which had a cord fastned to it.

Baron. Anno Christi. 39. Cornel. in 2. apud Corin. cap. 11.

His conversation with S. Peter.

From thence he transported himself to Jerusalem, where he saw S. Peter, and continued with him fifteen dayes in one lodging, not without joys and ravishments that cannot be expressed. We ought to content our selves with that which the Doctour of the Nations saith in his Epistle to the Galathians, where he assureth us, that he did historize the Prince of the Apostles, that is to say, he did contemplate on him as an Historian doth on a Prince whose History he hath a design to write. He regarded not (saith S. Hierome) whether he were fat or lean, or whether he were bald, or had a Roman nose, he only dived into his spirit and his heart, and there he discovered all the treasures of wisdom.

Gal. 1. 18. Ἱστορῆσαι Πέτρον.

After this most pleasing Colloquy he retired himself into the City of Cesarea, from whence he passed to Cilicia the place of his nativity, which he made fruitful with his Instructions for the space of four years. From thence S. Barnabas did lead him into Antioch, a famous City, where were a great number of Christians, who in that place were first called by that most glorious Name, and which hath ever since continued with all those who have made Profession of our Faith.

He preacheth the Gospel.

Having there sojourned one year, he was deputed with S. Barnabas to carry the Charity of the Faithful in Antioch unto Jerusalem, which office he most worthily discharged, and they both taking John and Mark into their company, did travel into divers Cities of Greece, and gave the Light of the Gospel unto the Nations, which is at large described in the Acts of the Apostles, which seems almost to be only written for S. Paul his sake.

On the end of this long Voyage he came unto Jerusalem at the first Council held by the Apostles for the abolishing of Circumcision, and other Jewish Ceremonies, to which certain Jews would oblige the Gentiles, who were converted to the Faith, which Saint Paul could not endure, and what in him lay, did endeavour to chase away the shadows of the Old Law to make place for the light of the Gospel; which was the reason that the Jews stirred up great Persecutions against him, and caused him to be apprehended in the fourth journy he made unto Jerusalem, and were resolved there to put him to death.

A great persecution against him.

As he entred privately into the Temple with Trophimus his Disciple, to discharge himself of some legal Ceremonies, the Jews that were come from Asia did discry him, who could not be ignorant of his conversation with the Gentiles, and began to cry aloud against him, saying, that he was an enemy of the Temple and the Law, which he endeavoured to destroy both by words and deeds, and that it was not fitting he should live. On this cry, a mutiny of enraged people did advance their fury, who did throw themselves upon S. Paul to stone him, and to tear him in pieces. The noise was brought to the Roman garrison in Jerusalem, and the news thereof came to Colonel Lysias, informing that all the City was in a confusion. He presently marched thither with the most resolute of the Souldiery, and plucked the Innocent from their hands to hear his Defence at their leisure. But these insolent Jews ceased not to follow him to the Corps de Guarde, where he was so environed with them that he was carried by force on the Arms of the Souldiers into a place of safety.

When he saw himself within the power of the Romans, he demanded of the Colonel the permission to speak to appease the people, which being obtained, he began to make an Oration to them in Hebrew, to inform them of his life and condition, and of the zeal which he had to the Religion of the Jews, and of his miraculous Conversion from it, as also of his Orders which he received from God to preach the Faith unto the Gentiles. When they heard these Words, they believed what was told them of him, and they did deal with him as a friend of the Heathen, and an enemy of their Law. They began to lay down their Garments to stone him, and to throw dust in the air, and to make a horrible tumult; whereupon, Colonel Lysias who understood not the Hebrew tongue was amazed, and conceived S Paul had been some felon, and guilty of some hainous crime. He took him to be the Egyptian who a little before had raised a great Sedition, and had drawn after him four thousand men into the wilderness; and to give consent to the wild multitude he did command that he should be scourged.

S. Paul condemned to the whip, did divert that punishment.

They proceeded to the execution of this Injustice; and now Saint Paul was bound by the hands of the Executioners, who prepared themselves to put him into bloud, when he advised with himself to acquaint the Officer who was to begin the punishment that he was a Citizen of Rome, in regard that those of the City of Tarsus did enjoy the priviledge of being Burgesses of the principal City of the World. The Officer made haste unto the Tribune, and informed him with the quality of the prisoner, advertising him, that if they proceeded proceeded further on him they might be questioned for it. This was the occasion that the punishment was forborne, and the Tribune (to understand what he could plead for himself, being unwilling to trust unto the people) did assemble the Priests and Scribes with the chief of the Jews, to hear his Apology.

His Address.

S. Paul did here use great discretion, and observing that the Assembly were composed of Sadducees and Pharisees who were counterpointed in the question of the Resurrection, he did cast them on it, and publickly acknowledging the Resurrection, he cried out, that the Dead should rise again, and held it as an inviolable Article of his Faith. On this, the Doctours of the Law did enter into a hot dispute, and there was a great debate amongst them, without making any examination at all concerning the fact of the prisoner. Lysias did very well perceive that all the contention was concerning some questions of the Jewish Law, and knowing that Felix Governour of Judea was then at Cesarea, he resolved to send Paul to him with a strong and a safe guard, because there were fourty Jews so obstinate, that they had made a vow neither to eat nor drink until they had massacred S. Paul.

He is committed into the hands of Felix the President.

Felix, who was a man of a delicate ambition and jealous of his Authority, was well satisfied with what the Tribune had done, and did resolve to examine the Process himself. The Saint was presented before one of the most corrupt Judges under Heaven; he was brother to Pallas (a Servant infranchized) who in the reign of Claudius was the God of the times: and Felix (as Cornelius Tacitus doth affirm) being covered with the great power and favour of his brother, did usurp the authority of a King, which he managed with a servile spirit, making Cruelty and Lasciviousness to reign with equal power in his Government. He was the husband, or rather the adulterer of three Queens, and she who then possessed him was called Drusilla, who was the Daughter of that Agrippa, who was in chains by Tiberius, of whom I have made mention in the Tome of the Maximi, and descended from the bloud of Mariamne. She was married to one named Azizus King of the Emmessaens; but because that Royalty was of no great extent, she preferred the President above the King, so that Felix courting her for her rare beauty, she did willingly forsake her husband, to espouse the brother to the great Favourite Pallas, who lived then under a most high consideration. She conversed with him according to the Law of the Jews, and was almost as nice in the curiosity of Religions, as of her beauties, which was the reason that (the more to gratifie her) Felix did cause S. Paul to be brought before him.

S. Paul before the Tribunal of Felix.

He was brought in chains before the President, and the Prince of the Priests failed not to make his appearance at Cesarea, with the Antients of the Jewish Nation, who brought with them an Advocate, named Tertullus, to plead against S. Paul, which he performed coldly enough. But the great Champion of Jesus Christ did defend himself with so great a vivacity of spirit, that the Judge did clearly discover that he was not guilty of any fault, which was the occasion that he used him with the more humanity, and told him, that at leisure he would decide that business himself: in the mean time he permitted him to live at more liberty, not hindering any to come unto him and administer things necessary for his life; yet for all this, he was still under a guard of Souldiers.

Not long after that, Felix called for him, and his wife Drusilla (who was the cause of his more gentle usage) did speak unto him in the presence of her husband, and desired to hear him on his discourses of Faith, which gave a fair occasion to our Apostle to speak, who driving on his Discourse with vigour, did so enlarge himself on the subject of Justice, of Chastity, and of universal Judgment, that Felix was much afraid, and interrupted his Discourse, fearing that he should leave some scruples on the conscience of his Wife concerning their Marriage. It is easie to conjecture that this poor Princess was much shaken at it, although the chains of Love and of Ambition did so link her to the world, that we do not read that she was absolutely converted to the Faith and number of the Christians. Felix stopping his ears to Judgment, did open his eys to money, and having learned that S. Paul had brought great summs of Charity unto Jerusalem, he oftentimes spoke with him, and seemed to make much of him, hoping to gain something from him; but when he perceived that there was nothing to be had, and that the time of his Commission was expired, he left S. Paul to the discretion of Festus his Successour, desiring in that to gratifie the Jews, and to divert the accusation which they intended at Rome against him.

Drusilla comes to hear him.

Festus being arrived at Jerusalem was environed by the chief of the Jews, who with importunity did demand that Paul might be sent to Rome to be judged there, having a design to kill him by the way. But the President did deny them, and did command them to come to Cesarea, where he would continue in the expectation of them. Thither they did transport themselves violently to follow their Accusations, which were all effectually answered, and confuted by S. Paul, who did demonstrate that he had offended neither their Law, nor the Temple, nor Cæsar. Festus to content the importunity of the Jews, did demand of him if he would go to Jerusalem to decide the controversie there; but he refused the Jurisdiction of those perverse people, and said, That he stood at the Tribunal of Cæsar, and would have no other Judge, and that he appealed to the Emperour. The Judge had some debate thereupon, and it was resolved that he should be sent to Rome.

Festus renues the Process: S. Paul appealeth to Rome.

In the mean time, the young King Agrippa the son of that Agrippa before specified, came to Cesarea with his sister Bernice, to complement the new Governour, who received them with great courtesie, and amongst other things he made a relation to them of his prisoner, which possessed them both with a great curiosity to see him. Festus did invite them to the Audience, at which on the next morning they appeared with great pomp. This was a great Theater which God had prepared for the publishing of the the Gospel, where were present, a King, a Queen, the Governour of the Romans, the principal of Nation of the Jews, and an infinite number of people who did attend the success of that action.

The young Agrippa King of Judea, with his sister Bernice, assist at the judgment of Paul.

S. Paul having received commandment to speak, made a long discourse couched in the Acts of the Apostles, where he rendred a reason of his Faith, and spake most worthily of the Resurrection of the dead, of his Conversion to Christianity, of the Apparition of Jesus, of the Publication of the Gospel, and of the Prophecies that did forego it. He declared himself with so much ardency, that Festus the President, who was a Heathen, and found his Pagan Conscience wounded by his truths, was constrained to interrupt him, and to tell him, That much learning had made him mad; but Festus touched with the words of S. Paul.

S. Paul

Saint Paul replyed to him, That he spoke the words of Truth and Sobriety; and turning from him to King Agrippa, he took him to witnesse it, as being one who was not ignorant of the Prophets.

This young King was so ravished at it, that he professed publickly to the Apostle, that he had felt him in his heart, and that he had almost perswaded him to be a Christian; whereupon S. Paul made a great acclamation of joy, wishing him that happiness to be like him in all things, his Bonds excepted, not judging that this Prince was yet an object capable of the Cross. He was of a sweet condition, but he had then great obstacles which hindred him from embracing the saving Truth. Bernice, who assisted at that Audience, was a most lovely Princess, the sister of this Agrippa and Drusilla, but not so happy in the reputation of her Honour as of her Beauty. She was married first unto her Uncle; and it is affirmed that she was taken with the love of this her brother Agrippa; and that most passionately she did affect him, nevertheless to divert the fame and suspicion of the world, finding herself courted by Polemon King of Cilicia, she consented to espouse him, on that condition that he should be circumcised; to which the Prince was presently resolved, being overcome by the temptation of her Beauties and the excess of Love to which she had inflamed him. She remained a certain time with him, but her high and wanton spirit did distaste him, and she returned into her own country to the Embraces of her brother, who lived with her, and entertained her in his Palace without regarding of the scandal.

I leave you to judge, my Readers, how the matter was disposed to receive the fire which proceeded from the mouth of S. Paul. All that he could do was to imprint in the soul of the Prince and Princesse a good opinion of the Christian Religion, and a good respect for his own person; for at the rising of this Session they told the President, that there was nothing in that man, that deserved either imprisonment or death; but because he had appealed to Cæsar, it was necessary that he should be sent to Rome.

S. Paul embarked for Rome.

After this, S. Paul was embarked under the conduct of the Centurion Julius, who did use him with great humanity, and in the end, after a laborious voyage and shipwrack, they arrived at Rome. He made his coming known to the chiefest of his Nation, who then resided in the capital City of the world, and did inform them of his good Intentions, protesting to them that he was not come to accuse his Nation, but having done nothing against their Law or their Religion, they had delivered him over to the Infidels, who having found his cause good, were ready to clear him, had not the clamours and the oppositions of some of the Jews obliged him to that voyage; and as concerning the rest, he was in chains (he said) for the hope of the salvation of Israel. They made answer to him, that they had understood nothing of him in particular, but knew very well that the Sect of the Christians which he had embraced was contrary to all the world, and that they should be glad to understand by what Arguments he could pretend to justifie them.

He arriveth there, and treateth with the Jews.

To which S. Paul consented, and there were great Disputations amongst them concerning the mysteries of our Faith. S. Luke doth conclude his History on these conferences, and speaketh nothing of the Trial of S. Paul before the Magistrates of Rome; but we may learn it from the Epistle which the Apostle did write to his Disciple Timothy, and from that which he addressed to the Philippians, where he declareth, that on the first action of that Trial he was forsaken of all the world, but singularly assisted by God; and that the carrying on this affair did much improve it self to the advancement of the Gospel, his chains being known in Jesus Christ to all the Prætorium's in Rome, and to all the world; as also, that at last he was delivered from the mouth of the Lion, by whom he understood the Emperour Nero.

2 Tim 4. Phil. 1.

From this, and from that which the holy Fathers and Interpreters have delivered, we may collect that Saint Paul came to Rome in the third year of the Emperour Nero, when as yet he was not depraved, and when Seneca was in the heigth of his reputation and the management of the publick Affairs. We ought not to doubt that what is reported by the Pope S. Linus, concerning the knowledge which Seneca had with S. Paul, is true; seeing that great Minister of State who had his eye over all, and who was extremely curious to understand the diversity of Sects and Religions, and to be informed of extraordinary Causes to make report thereof unto the Emperour, could no wayes be ignorant of so famous a thing which was made known in Rome both to the great and small. Besides, it is very probable that Seneca assisted at the Trial, and heard the Reasons of S. Paul. We may also easily conjecture the Discourse which he made before the Priests and the Senatours of Rome by the Apologies and Defences which he used before Felix, Festus, King Agrippa, Bernice, and all the Assembly of the Jews; and by what he spake to the Senate of the City of Athens. He then declared himself to them much after this manner.

S. Paul undoubtedly known to Seneca.

S. Paul's Oration to the Senate of Rome.

I think my self this day happy that God hath granted me the favour to justifie my self in your presence on all those Articles with which they of my Nation have accused me, being throughly possessed of the great sufficiency and integrity of this Senate to decide all differences in the Empire. For this, I do begin to breathe again after my long and heavy voyage, and after a thousand troubles, beholding my self now at the Tribunal of Cæsar which I have implored; and I beseech you to attend me with that Patience and Equity which you never refuse to those who are oppressed.

My accusers know very well what hath been my life from my youth, and how by the pleasure of God being born at Tarsus a City in Cilicia, which is honoured by the priviledge of Burgesses to this Capital City of the world, I have followed the Religion of my Fathers, conversing with a good and an upright conscience before God and before men, without offending any.

I do avow, that according to the most perfect Sect amongst us, I have alwayes conceived assured hopes of our Immortality, and of the universal Resurrection of men, which is established by the inviolable promise of the living God to whom nothing is impossible; and that I have been most curious to observe all the Ceremonies of our Law. The zeal which did inflame me for it, did make me conceive that I had reason to persecute the Christians; and having received a Commission from the chiefest of the Priests, I made an exact search to surprize, imprison, and torment those who made profession of it.

The fury did so far transport me, that not content to prosecute a violent warr against them in Judea, I passed into strange Cities into which they were fled to relieve themselves from punishment; it came to passe, that going to Damascus (a city famous enough) as I did breathe forth nothing but fire, and threatnings I saw my self suddenly environed with a light so glorious, that it did surpass the brightest rayes of the Sun, and from that Splendour there did proceed the voice of a man, who called me by my name, and demanded of me where- wherefore I did persecute him. I speak (Sirs), before God and before you with all sincerity, that I felt my self strongly surprised, and I demanded of him that spake unto me, Who he was? to which he made answer, That he was called Jesus, and that it was difficult for me to strike my heels against the sharps of the spur. And immediately, as I lay in amazement prostrate on the ground with those that were with me, he commanded me to rise, and said unto me, That he would make choice of me for his people, and for the Nations of the earth, to give a testimony of him, and to draw them from the power of wicked Spirits to come unto the Light, that they may obtain remission of sins and the inheritance of Saints by the means of Faith, which subsisteth in Jesus Christ.

Sirs, For this I was not rebellious to the heavenly Vision, but incontinently I set my self to preach the word of God, & to exhort all the world to convert themselves unto him by the works of Penitence. Behold all my fault having done not any thing against the Law, the Temple, or against Cæsar; having always counselled all the Subjects that ever heard me in the Empire, to render unto him perfect obedience. Nevertheless, certain of the Jews caused me to be apprehended in the Temple, and excited the people against me, who had torn me in pieces, if I had not been succoured by the Armies, and the Legions of the Empire. God hath preserved my life until this present, to discharge the ministery and the Commission that he hath given me, which is, to deliver to the Nations the news of eternal Salvation.

Sirs, I do observe you to be great observers of the Religion of the Gentiles; you have Idols, and Temples most magnificent, but we ought not to imagine that God who is a most pure Spirit, the Creatour of heaven and earth, is inclosed in Temples built by the hands of men, or that he stands on need of their works for the accomplishment of his Glory. It is he that giveth life, breath, wealth, honour, profit, & all that we can hope for in this world. It is he who from one man hath derived the vast multitude of the people, who by a continual succession do inhabite the roundness of the earth. It is he who giveth measures unto Times, and bounds unto Empires, and who inhabiteth a Light unapproachable. It is he who inspires us all with a generous curiosity to seek him, and to do our endeavours to find him, and to touch him with fingers if his condition render him palpable. But he is not far from every one of us, For in him we live, we move, and have our being: and to speak according to your own Poet, We are of the generation of God.

It is not then permitted to vilifie the Divine nature beneath us, and to make it like unto things insensible; as, to gold, silver, precious stones, and other materials, elaborate by art, and by the invention of men. And certainly, God from on high hath with compassion beheld this ignorance of men, and hath given them, his Son the substantial Image of his Beauties, and the Character of his Glory; true God, and true man, who is dead for our sins, to wash us and regenerate us in his Blood; whose Words are Truth, & whose Life a miracle, even to the triumphing over Death by his Resurrection. It is by him that the eternal Father will judge at the last both the quick and the dead; and we all shall be represented before the Throne of his Majesty, to receive the salary of the Good or Evil which in our bodies we have done.

This sovereign Monarch of Angels and of Men suffers not himself to be taken by the flesh or the blood of bullocks, or by the perfumes of incense, but by the exercise of Justice, and by the purity of our bodies in all sanctification. Therefore (Sirs) as he hath advanced you in Dignity above other men, so he hath more particularly obliged you to acknowledge and serve him, and to adore him in Spirit & Truth, & to render Justice according to the Comission which you have received from Cæsar; which is, to deliver the innocent from the persecution of the insolent, that so being true imitatours of his Justice and mercy, you may be one day partakers of his Glory.

This discourse was wel received by divers of them, and a day was appointed for another Appearance, where he so much explained and enlarged himself, that he was sent back and pronounced guiltless; and permitted to preach the Gospel in Rome with all liberty, which gave much encouragement to all the faithful, & even those who had before forsaken him, did now re-assemble themselves, preaching in the Name of Jesus, and exhorting all the world to Repentance. Cornelius reports the opinion of some men who affirm that S. Paul was expressly delivered by the advice and the authority of Seneca, who at that time began miraculously to delight in his conversation. And although they could not see one another as often as they would by reason of the considerations of State, yet they mutually did write to one another, wch hath given occasion to some weak men who have not their spirits to counterfeit their letters ill imitated, & wch all knowing men are assured to be not of the strain either of S. Paul or Seneca. Howsoever the fiction of the style doth no way hinder the truth of the antient deed, seeing that S. Hierom doth cite the true letters which were in his time, and doth alledge the Texts wch are not now to be found in the Libraries of the Fathers. S. Paul continued at Rome two years after his first voyage, where he gained many Christians to the faith, and some of the Court of Nero, as is declared in his Epistles. Seneca was amazed at the Authority which he had, and desired that he might enjoy amongst his the like opinion of Belief as S. Paul had amongst the Christians; but there was a difference in their spirits, and there proceedings were from divers Methods. Seneca was a man, and S. Paul a demy-God. The one studied with Attalus and Secion, the other had the Word for his Doctour, and the Angels for his Disciples. The one sought after nature, the other found out the God of Nature. The one laboured after Eloquence, the other studied silence, which is the father of Conceptions. The one pleaded the Causes of parties, the other pleaded the Cause of God. The one governed the Republick of men, the other laid open before us the Hierarchy of Angels. The one was in the porch of Zenon, the other in the school of Jesus. The one laid the world low at his feet with his golden words and when he pleased did carry it on his head, the other subdued it with mortification, and the arms of the Cross. The one was ful of good Desires, the other of great Effects. The one sought for himself in himself, the other found himself altogether in God. The one was a Minister of State, the other of Heaven The one promised much and performed little, the other promised nothing of himself & gave all things. The one lived in the Court of Nero, the other in the Courts of Jesus Christ. The one defied Persecutions in his Discourse, the other did bear them engraven in his body. The one had a considerable estate the other had nothing, yet possessed all things. The life of the one was exposed to Honours and the Delights of the world, the Life of the other was altogether composed of the Cross.

Phil. 1. 13.

The effect of his Oration.

The parallel betwixt S. Paul and Seneca.

The evil opinion of the Stoicks to trust altogether to themselves without acknowledging the Grace and the assistance of God.

To conclude all in few words, Seneca had excellent Precepts of Virtue, but he derived them from an evil Principle, which was to hold fast to himself, and to conceive that by his own power he was sufficient of himself without any need of assistance from above in as much that we may imagine that we hear him speak, That a Wiseman may pass by God and take no no great notice of him, and live without him as contentedly as himself. From this great Illusion proceeded Arrogance; from Arrogance, Ignorance of the Truth; from Ignorance, Feebleneſſe; from Feebleneſſe, a Confuſion both in the life and in all the wiſdom of the Stoicks.

From hence it came to paſſe, that having braved it on the paper, they found themſelves too ſhort for great actions, and had their pens far longer then their hands. They made a flight but without one wing to virtue, contenting themſelves to have brought ſome weak lenitives to their Malady, and not endeavouring to root it out.

Wherefore Seneca prevailed ſo little for the reformation of Manners of the Court.

And although that Seneca did live uprightly according to the Moral Virtues, yet being forcibly tyed to the world by his Honours, Dignities, Riches, the Cares of this life, and his endeavours to preſerve himſelf at Court, he could not diſpenſe any ſtrong influence on the body of the Eſtate, by reaſon of the defect both of Example and Practice. The Sun and the Moon may both make a Rainbow in the front of heaven, but that of the Moon will be feeble and obſcure in compariſon of that of the Sun, which will be all luminous and immailed with Emeraulds and with Rubies. Seneca did make at Rome a Rain-bow of the Moon which had in it much imperfection, and clouds, and darkneſſe. But Saint Paul made the Rain-bow of the Sun viſibly, producing the brightneſs and the beauties of the eternal Wiſdom.

The Grace of Jeſus and the Croſs, are the two Principles of S. Paul.

As the Principles therefore of the Philoſophy of Seneca were to reduce all to himſelf, and to ſtudy his own particular content; ſo the Principles of Saint Paul were quite contrary to attribute all to the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, and in the imitation of him, to love, deſire, and ſeek after the Croſſe, and the Perſecutions attending on it. In thoſe two Maxims, he doth eſtabliſh all the Greatneſſe and the Glory of the City of God, which he doth prove, deduce, and preſſe with inſtant importance in all his Epiſtles. As for that which pertains to the Grace of Redemption, never man before him ſpake more clearly or more divinely then he hath done in his Epiſtles to the Romans, to the Galathians, and to the Hebrews. He is the thundering and the lightning Cherubin on the Chariot of the God of Hoſts, who ceaſeth not to ſhoot forth his inevitable and his flaming Arrows againſt the head of the pompous Wiſdom of this World.

He makes it apparent how all the antient Philoſophers who were thought to be the Gods of Sciences and Letters, do vaniſh away in their proud imaginations, and how they are faln into a Reprobate ſenſe: blind and ignorant, who have transformed the Divinity into hideous forms of Serpents and Monſters: feeble and caytiffe, who having filled their books with Precepts, have abandoned themſelves to baſe and ſhameſull actions, and have overthrown all the order of Nature. From hence alſo he makes another Battel againſt the Jews, who tyed their happineſſe and ſalvation to a dying Law, to feeble Elements, to Shadows flying before the firſt Rayes of the Law of the Goſpel. He prized nothing but the Incarnate Word, he breathed forth nothing but his Jeſus, who is the deſire of the eternal Mountains, the Splendour of the Glory of the celeſtial Father, the Character of his Subſtance, who by the virtue of his Word doth ſupport the Univerſe, who is our Wiſdom, our Juſtice, our Sanctification, and our Redemption; there being no Name either in heaven or earth, or on or under the waters by which we may be ſaved, but the Name of Jeſus.

His ſecond Principle is the love of the Croſſe, and he doth publickly and loudly proteſt both to the great and to the ſmall, to the proud and to the humble, that there is no Knowledge but in the crucified Jeſus; and that he is not come to preach him to them with painted Words according to the Wiſdom and the Eloquence of men (fearing by that means to make void the myſtery of the Croſſe) but with the virtue, and the force of the God of the afflicted. He eſteems of Scepters, of Empires, of Nobility, of Beauty, of Strength, of Valour, of Wiſdom, of Induſtry, of Eloquence, of all things in this world from Heaven unto the Deeps, but as dung, in compariſon of the Croſſe of his beloved Jeſus, on which by love he had aſcended, and there did reſt as on a Throne, from whence he condemned whatſoever this world did honour.

By theſe two Principles, he arrived into a moſt great Perfection which did fill him as well in the Intellectuall part as the Affective. As for that which concerns the former, he was enlightned with a moſt high and a moſt excellent Wiſdom, with the knowledge of all Nature, with all the Myſteries of our Faith, with whatſoever is in Man, with whatſoever the World locks from him in her Treaſuries, with Grace in all her Virtues, and with Time in all the Turns and the Revolutions of his Being. S. Paul his perfection.

According to the heigth that the river Nilus riſeth, the other rivers do decreaſe; and accordingly as Saint Paul did increaſe in the Wiſdom of God, all humane Science fell down before him even into the Abyſme. It is he who with all humility can ſpeak that which Lucifer did uſurp by pride, I ſit in the Chair of God, I have been in the heart of the Deeps. He was in the Chair of God when he ſpake as if he had been encloſed in the Word, as the Vicar of his Powers; the Diſpenſer of his Myſteries; the Oracle of his Thoughts; and the Interpreter of his Will. He was in the heart of the Deeps when he was abyſmed in the profound knowledge of the Beauties and the Perfections of the Incarnate Word, of whom he never did loſe the ſight. His high knowledg. Ezech. 28.

What an Abyſme of Patience was he? What a Trumpet of the Goſpel ſaith S. Denys? What a roaring of the Lion ſaith S. Hierome? What a Flow of Learning, what a Torrent of Eloquence? who makes us to underſtand the Myſteries, unknown in all Ages; and that as much by his Admiration as his Words. He wrote his Epiſtles with his Ear in Heaven, and with a Style in the Schole of Paradiſe. The feebleneſs of humane Words could not ſuſtain the force of his Spirit. pion. de Divin. Nom. S. Hierom. Epiſt. 6. ad Pammach.

In the Affective part, he was filled with a Seraphick Love, with a fire drawn from the moſt pure flames of Heaven, which was ſhut up within his heart and within his bones, and did unceſſantly burn him without conſuming him. On his mortified fleſh he did bear the Characters of a ſuffering God, which were his deareſt Delights. He was no more himſelf; he was all and altogether transfigured into that amiable Word by a Deifick tranſammation. He lived on his Bloud; he breathed not but by his Spirit; he ſpake not but by his Words; he thought not but by his Meditations: yet nevertheleſs, in ſome manner he did leave God and the delicious Schole of Paradiſe, to run unto his Neighbour to ſave his Soul; and in this exerciſe of Charity, he defied Tribulation, Anguiſh, Hunger, Nakedneſs, Dangers, Perſecutions, and bloudy Swords, and burning Fagots, and boiling Caldrons. If Hell it ſelf were portable, he would adventure to have carried it on his back for the love of his Neighbour. His Love.

He looked upon the world as if every mothers ſon were of his begetting; he carried in his heart Europe, and Aſia, and Africk, and all the Provinces of the Earth, to communicate the Light of the Goſpel either by himſelf, or by his children whom already he had begotten in Jeſus Chriſt. Nothing rebated him, nothing hindred, nothing ſtopped him. He gave no bounds to his Love ſince God had given no limits to his Spirit. With theſe fair and extraordinary qualities, God gave him Succeſs in the preaching of the Goſpel, which did draw upon him the admiration of all the Apoſtles.

He marched in triumph through all Provinces, and God was on his heart. He was like unto that Ark of the Teſtament which is ſpoken of in the Revelations, which at the ſame time that it was perceived did cauſe a Lightning to be ſeen, a Voice to be heard, the Hail to rattle, and the Earthquakes to roar; ſo, whereſoever S. Paul did paſs, there were the Light of Learning, the Oracles of Wiſdom, the impetuous Tempeſt of words of fire, which made the Philoſophers and Kings to tremble, and even removed Nature it ſelf. Behold here the difference which was between S. Paul and Seneca, which being well conſidered we ſhall forbear to admire, wherefore one was ſo fruitleſs in the Court of Nero, and the other had ſo great ſucceſs in Rome, and amongſt ſo many Nations.

Apoc. 21.

After that Paul was for a ſeaſon retired from Rome, leaving unto Seneca a ſtrong tincture of the Chriſtian Faith, Nero did every day grow worſe and worſe, inſomuch, that having killed his brother, his wife, his mother, this ſcourge of mankind in the wicked jollity of his heart had a plot in his head to ſet the City of Rome on fire, which was almoſt wholly conſumed with it, whiles he from a high tower did behold it, and laughing at the calamity, did ſing the burning of Troy the Great; which did ſo exaſperate the ſpirits of his Subjects, that on the year following, the chief of the Empire did enter into a conſpiracy againſt him, in which were compriſed, Senatours, Captains, Colonels, Citizens, Ladies, and all the choiceſt perſonages in Rome: but misfortune ſo would have it, that the ſecret being diſperſed amongſt ſo many people, it did not anſwer the event to which it was deſigned, but being diſcovered, it occaſioned a bloody butchery in Rome, Nero like an enraged Tygre deſiring nothing more then to bathe himſelf in blood.

Saint Paul leaves Rome. Nero grows worſe and worſe.

Anno Neron. 10 Chriſt. 66

The Conſpiracy againſt him deteſted.

Seneca's name was entred at the laſt in the liſt of the Conſpiratours, whether his Scholar had conceived a jealouſie againſt him, miſtruſting his high Virtue, and fearing leſt he ſhould tear the Diadem from his head, or whether the inſolence of his deportments had put him into that condition as not to indure the very ſhadow of a Tutor. It was now a long time ſince this great perſonage overcom with grief at ſo many tragical accidents, did lead a retired life in his Country-houſe not far from Rome. There was not againſt him any manifeſt conviction to rank him amongſt the Conſpiratours; as Tacitus hath obſerved. It is onely ſaid that one of that number named Natalis did depoſe before Nero that he was ſent to Seneca by Piſo, who was the chief of the Conſpiratours, to complain that he would not ſuffer him to give him a viſit, and to meditate an enterview to which Seneca made anſwer, that ſuch a meeting in ſo dangerous and ſo fatal a time, could be profitable neither to the one nor to the other; and as for the reſt, that his life ſubſiſted not but in the ſafety of the life of Piſo.

The conſtant and the famous death of Seneca.

On this the Tribune of the Emperour's Guard was diſpatched to Seneca, to underſtand what anſwer he could make to the Depoſition of Natalis. On the evening he arrived at Seneca's houſe, which he ſuddenly environed with a troop of ſouldiers. He was no ſooner entred, but he found him at ſupper with his wife and two friends, he preſently acquainted him what he had in Commiſſion from the Emperour; on which, Seneca confeſſed that Natalis indeed was ſent unto him by Piſo, to intreat him to receive a viſit from him, but he excuſed himſelf by reaſon of indiſpoſition and retiredneſs, without ſpeaking one word more unto him; adding, that he had never ſo high an eſteem of Piſo, as to judge that the ſafety of his life did depend upon him, that ſuch flattery was not ſuitable to his diſpoſition, and that Nero knew it very well, who by experience had always found in Seneca more of Liberty then of Servitude.

The Tribune made a faithful report of Seneca's anſwer in the preſence of Poppea that impudent woman, and Tigillinus that execrable villain, who in thoſe cruel deſigns were the onely two that were now of his Majeſties ſacred Counſel. This barbarous Prince who had promiſed his Tutour that he would rather die then permit that any offence ſhould be done unto him, did bare that reſpect unto him as not to queſtion him on that Conſpiracy amongſt ſo many other Senatours; peradventure he had not a brow of braſs enough to out-face the reproaches of ſo eloquent a mouth. He demanded of the Tribune if he did not prepare himſelf to a voluntary death, who made anſwer, That he obſerved not the leſt ſign of it, either in his countenance or diſcourſe; whereupon he was commanded to return to Seneca, and to ſignifie unto him that he muſt die. The Tribune, whether in reverence to the man, or for fear to precipitate the death of ſuch a Miniſter of the State by too haſty an execution, demanded counſel of Fannius his Captain what in this caſe he ought to do, who did adviſe him to execute the command of the Emperour; and this was don by a ſloth fatal to all of the Conſpiracy, ſome Ladies onely excepted, who ſhewed themſelves more courageous then the Senatours and the Cavaliers.

Howſoever, he having not the heart to carry theſe heavy tidings did deliver his Commiſſion to a Centurion, who informed him with the laſt of all neceſſities. Seneca, without troubling himſelf deſired ſo much liberty as to make his Will, which was refuſed him: On which, he turned to his friends and ſaid, That ſince it was not permitted to him to acknowledg their merit, that he would leave unto them the very beſt of all he had, which was the Image of his Life; in which, if they would pleaſe to call to mind how he had paſſed it in ſo many commendable Exerciſes, they ſhould enjoy for their recompence the reputation of a faithful and a conſtant friendſhip. And this he ſpake not out of arrogance, but as it were by the authority of a Father when he bids his laſt Farewell unto his Children, recommending to them to imitate him in what he had done well; and ſo ſaid S. Paul to his Diſciples, Be you imitatours of me as I am of Jeſus Chriſt.

This made their hearts to melt, and they began all to weep, but he did endeavour to wipe away their tears, mingling ſweetneſs with reproaches. What do you mean, he ſaid? where are the Precepts of Philoſophy? where is that Reaſon ſo long prepared againſt all the chances of humane Life? who is he that can be ignorant of the cruelty of Nero? and who did not ſee that after the death of his mother and his brother, there nothing remained but to add unto it the murther of his Maſter and Governour.

After

After this Discourse which served for them all, he embraced his wife, gave her his last farewell; and having fortified her against the terrours of the present dangers, he did intreat and conjure her to moderate her grief, and to sweeten the sorrows of her dear husband by the consideration of his life which was without reproach. He loved most tenderly that virtuous Lady, and did not cherish his own life but for her sake, saying sometimes, That he would spare himself a little the more, because in an old man there lived a young woman, who deserved that he should take care for her, and being not able to obtain from his dear Paulina that she should love him more fervently, her love being in the highest degree of perfection, she should obtain from him that he should use himself for her sake with the more indulgence.

This fair Lady observing all that had passed, said, That there was no longer life for her after the death of him whom she loved above all things in the world; and that she would keep him Company in the other world. On that word he stood a little in a pause, and would not contradict her, as well for the glory of the action, as for the love which he did bear her, and for the fear he had to leave so dear a person to the affronts of an enemy; he therefore said unto her, My dear Love, I have shewed you the sweetnesse and the allurements of life, but I see you preferr unto it the honour of a generous death. I will not envy the example of your Virtue; and although the constancy in our death shall be equall in us both: yet yours shall be alwayes more glorious then mine, for you contribute unto it a courage which is above your sex. Having said this, they caused their veins to be opened by one hand in the presence one of the other; and because the body of her husband was attenuated by great abstinence, and the bloud did issue but slowly from him, he gave order that there should be a new incision made in the veins of his legs and of his feet. The poor old man did endeavour to put himself all into bloud, and endured cruel dolours but more in the body of his dear wife then in his own, which was the reason that he caused her to be conveyed into another chamber to mitigate a little the sorrows which one had for the other in beholding themselves to dye with so much violence.

It is a wonderfull thing, that this great man had so untroubled and so ready a spirit in so fatal an Act. He called his Secretary to whom he did dictate his last Thoughts, which were full of a generous constancy. In the mean time, Nero having no particular hatred against Paulina, and considering that the death of so innocent a Lady would but render himself and his cruelty more abhorred, did command that her veins should be stopped, and the bloud stanched, which it appeared, that she suffered to her greater grief, both by the short time that she out-lived her husband, and by the inviolable faith which she did bear unto his ashes; and she looked ever after as she were some prodigy, such abundance of bloud and so much spirits she had lost.

Seneca was yet remaining in the tedious pangs of death, when upon advice he demanded poyson of his Physicians, which had no operation at all, his Members being already cold, and his body shut up against all the forces of the poyson. He caused himself therefore to be carried to a Bath, and taking some of the warm water, he sprinkled his servants with it that stood about him saying (according to Cornelius Tacitus) That he offered that water to Jove the deliverer; after which words he entred into the stove, and was stifled with the vapour that did arise from it.

Many grave Personages have conceived that he dyed a Christian; and though it is no easie matter to perswade those to this opinion who are possessed with another, and who speak but with little consideration on this subject, yet there are not wanting grounds to prove the truth thereof.

Flavius Dexter a most ancient Historian, who hath composed a small Chronicle from the Nativity of our Saviour unto the fourth Age, affirmeth in expresse terms, that in the sixty fourth year, Seneca entertained good thoughts of Christianity; and that he dyed a Christian; although not declared one.

S. Hierome in the Book of Ecclesiastical Authours doth put him in the number of Saints, that is to say, of those who acknowledge and confesse Jesus Christ.

Tertullian, a most grave Authour saith, that he was one although not openly. S. Augustine in the City of God, alledgeth many excellent passages of a Book which Seneca undoubtedly did write against the Superstition of the Payens, in which, he overthrows all the heathenish religion of Rome, although he doth not vigorously perswade them to change it, for fear of troubling the Estate. This Book was afterwards condemned and burned by the Enemies of our Religion. The holy Doctour doth observe, that he never spake ill of the Christians, although he hath violently inveighed against the Jews, which testifieth that he was endued with some good thoughts in the favour of it. His brother Gallio being Proconsul in Achaiah, would never judge S. Paul for any fact of Religion, although the Jews did presse him to it with much importunity.

Add to this, that our Seneca two years before his death did live a retired life, under the colour of indisposition of body, and would no more frequent the Temples of the Heathen; as also that he would not procure his own death before the Emperour expressly had commanded it, as being then of the opinion of the Christians, who did forbid self-murder; and also that at last, that he did forbid the vain pomp and the vain ceremonies at his Funerals.

These reasons being weighed do draw unto this Conclusion, That it is more beseeming our Religion to conceive well of the Salvation of Seneca, then to condemn him. The strongest Objection which can be made against this Opinion, is, That at his death Cornelius Tacitus doth make him to invoke on Jove the Liberatour. But no esteem ought to be given to this Argument; for Tacitus could not understand that which was altogether out of his knowledge, seeing that Seneca did never make open profession of Christianity, but kept that thought totally concealed from Nero and all the Heathen. And we ought not to be amazed that he was not comprized in that search which was made for Christians, it being sufficiently manifest, that many illustrious Christians have lived in the Courts of the Heathen Emperours, and dissembled their Religion, they being not bound in conscience to declare it at all times, to run willfully into Martyrdom. Moreover, this Historian above named, hath written diverse things very lightly, especially when he maketh mention of the Religion of the Jews and Christians, which he describes richer according to his own idea then any way according to the truth; insomuch, that when Seneca at his death implored Jesus the Deliverer, he did not forbear to translate Jesus into Jove. As rashly as this, he leaves recorded to posterity, that the Jews are descended from the Hill Ida, the name of which he saith the Jews do bear; and that they worship the head of an Asse, as also, that the Christians ſtians confeſſed that they were Incendiaries, and that they burned the City of Rome under Nero.

But we finde by S. Paul himſelf in his Epiſtle written from Rome unto the Philippians, that he had many Chriſtians in the houſe of Nero; and Linus theſucceſſour of S. P who was there preſent at that time, doth rank Seneca amongſt them with an high title of commendation. And though his Hiſtory hath been corrupted by the *Heretick*s and the Ignorant, it is nevertheleſs received in thoſe Points, which are conformable to the other Fathers of the Church, ſo that Tacitus in this ought not be conſidered.

This Name then of redeemer or deliverer whereof Tacitus maketh mention, and this ſprinkling of the water wᵗʰ the faithful were accuſtomed to preſent to God in the manner of Libation, doth emply ſome ſecret of which he never heard. And as for that Objection, that there are ſome opinions in Seneca's books which are not conformable to the Chriſtian Religion, it is of no value, ſeeing thoſe works were compoſed before his Chriſtianity.

And to that which others do alledge, that he himſelf was the author of his own death, it is moſt manifeſtly falſe, ſeeing he did not ſuffer a vein to be opened before the expreſs commandment of the Emperour, who had pronounced againſt him the ſentence of Death, as I have ſaid already, which was afterwards executed according to the faſhion of thoſe times, in which, by the permiſſion of Magiſtrates, the houſhold-ſervants of the party condemned performed that office which belonged to the publick executioner of Juſtice. Beſides this, in the beginning of Chriſtianity, Seneca who had but a light tincture of it, could not yet know that it was not allowable for him to aſſiſt his at his death, ſeeing that many Chriſtian Virgins have killed themſelves to divert the violations by their deſigned raviſhers, and yet have not been condemned for it.

S. Paul returning to Rome, according to the Calculation of Baronius, did find that Seneca was dead, and that he was deprived of a great help in the propagation of the Goſpel. Howſoever he deſiſted not with all his endeavour to advance with S. Peter the Chriſtian Religion, which by and by they ſhall both bedew with their bloud.

For Nero, to fill up the horrour of his crimes, did begin the firſt Perſecuti on againſt the Chriſtians. And it is our glory, ſaith Tertullian, that he was in the head of our Perſecutours. The wicked Prince perceiving that he could not wipe away the evil reputation with which he was defamed for the burning of Rome, did cauſe the Chriſtians to be accuſed; and did torment them with outrageous and inhumane puniſhments. Some were nailed to Croſſes, diſtilling their bloud drop by drop in extremity of pain. Other by cruel inventions were covered with the skins of ſavage beaſts and expoſed to bandogs, who would fly upon them with a moſt violent rage and tear thē in pieces. Others being faſtned to blocks, were burned by degrees by fire, with diabolical art and ſport; inſomuch, that in the evening, when the Sun made haſte to bed, to be no longer polluted with ſuch horrible ſpectacles, the bodies of the Faithful being all on fire did ſerve as torches for the reprobate joyes of the Heathen. Nero would be then in his gardens to glut his barbarous eys with the torments of thoſe innocent Souls. Happy ye Stars, who in the combats of that laborious night did behold ſo many victorious ſouls aſcend from the midſt of the flames to take poſſeſſion of the Temple of eternal lights. The infidels themſelves had compaſſion on them; knowing that it was an artifice of Nero's to ſacrifice thoſe poor Victims to his brutiſh cruelty.

Not long after, S. Peter and S. Paul did find themſelves to be involved in the ſame Perſecution; for as they endeavoured themſelves to perſwade Chaſtity to ſome Chriſtian Ladies againſt the allurements & ſurpriſals of the Emperour, he grew enraged at it, & commanded them to be locked up in cloſe priſon, from whence ſome few days after, they were taken forth to go to their Execution, where S. Peter was crucified with his head downwards, and S. Paul was beheaded, after they had converted many ſouls, and even the Executioners themſelves. They kiſſed one another with tears of joy, and with an aſſured pace they marched to their place of torment as to a garden inamelled with the moſt delightful beauties of Nature. At every minute their ſacred mouths did call upon the name of their moſt beloved Maſter; & the pleaſures they reſented to communicate with him in his ſufferings, did not permit them to have the leaſt fear of that which of all fears is the moſt horrible in Nature. The Chriſtians followed them melting into tears, calling them their Fathers and their Paſtours, and beſought them not to abandon their Flock. But they with countenances as clear as are the ſmiles of the faireſt morning, did comfort them, and did promiſe not to forget them in the other life. They did exhort them to ſhew themſelves courageous in Perſecutions, aſſuring them that they were the places of pleaſure, where even the Thorns ſhould grow into Crownes. They both looked back upon Rome, and beheld it as the field of their deareſt Conqueſt. And God did diſcover to them the effect of their Bloud; how that Infidelity was ſubdued; the Church was eſtabliſhed in the capital City of the Univerſe; the Croſs was planted on the root of the Capitol, where they dyed as amongſt palms, and the odours of their ſacrifice did aſcend to heaven.

As long as there ſhall be Intelligences and Stars above, as long as there ſhall be ages and men below, theſe two Apoſtles ſhall be beheld as the two Eyes of the Chriſtian world. The Fathers & the Doctours of Mankind; the Gates of heaven, and Triumphers over unbelieving Rome, which they have now converted into Rome the Holy. At their Palms all the Laurels of the Conquerours ſhall fade, and the inſtruments of their Puniſhments ſhall obſcure their Trophyes. The Tongues of men can pronounce nothing more pleaſing then their Name. The Church hath nothing more precious then their Virtues; nor more powerful then their Examples; nor more honourable then the Veneration of them. The deteſtable Nero the year after theſe Martyrs ſuffered, finding himſelf tormented with furies, inveſted with infernal ſhades, torn in his conſcience by Vultures, and wounded with ſharp Razors, being abandoned both by God and men, underſtanding that Vindex from France, and Galba was marching againſt him from Spain, to revenge his Sacriledges, he did fly away and killed himſelf; it being impoſſible for him to dy by a more polluted, or a more execrable hand

QUEEN

MARY STUART.

The true Portraiture of Princesse Mary Queene of Scotland and Dowager of France.

IN the last place, I will produce the History of the incomparable Queen, Mary Stuart, where in the height of its lustre, I will represent unto you Innocence persecuted, as much by the jealousies of love, as State; and that by a general combat of all passions, on which she hath raised a Trophey, by the invincible constancy at her death.

I have taken delight to peruse many Authours on this Subject, and to draw out the truth from a confused Chaos, where the malice of many passionate Historians had extremely perplexed the Story; and I have done it the more willingly, because it is a service which I render to the first Truth which I adore: to France, which nourished and advanced that great Spirit; to the King of Great Britain, who is honoured for his Blood and Royal Virtues; to Scotland, who brought her forth; and to England it self, the founder part whereof have always detested the attempt which was committed on her person.

I must intreat the Reader to believe, that there was never History more disguised by a knot of Heriticks, never wickedness did carry more artifice, nor calumny more fables, or fables more colours, or impiety more strength, to cry down a poor Princess. And this hath made so bold a noise, that some Catholicks, either too ignorant or too negligent, not taking the pains to read and examine the reasons alledged, were betrayed themselves to an indifferent belief of the defaming Libels of the Enemies of our Religion, as if they would believe the History of Jesus Christ, compiled on the reports of the Scribes and Pharisees. A Calvinist of late, the Authour of a Spanish History, hath thrust into his Book many outrageous reports against the Memory of Mary, Queen of Scotland, by a Digression stale enough which doth eclipse the light of the History, and the Day of her passion. If that man had any modesty, he would have acknowledged his small abilities to be seen in print. If he had any reverence, he would have spared the person of a Queen. If his heart had been touched with any piety, he would have pardoned the Dead. If he had in his soul any sence of honour, being in the service of the King of England, he would never have printed such insolent things, to the disadvantage of his Majesty, he would never have barked at the ashes of so great a Lady.

Reader, to make you the better to understand with what equity I will proceed in this Narration, I will not alledge unto you either Sanders, or Bosy, or Florimond of Raymen, or Father Hilarius of the Order of the Right Reverend Fathers of the Minims, who have all wrote very worthily concerning this Subject. I will derive the principal truths I shall produce from Cambden an Huguenot, Historiographer of the Queen of England, who hath wrote this Story, not in Pamphlets running without authority, but in authentick Memorials. It hath pleased God that this person, having a generous ambition to speak the truth, should search into the Records, & produce papers that had been buried, which sufficiently do make appear the artifices of Elizabeth, and the innocence of the Queen of Scotland. Reader, behold whither the abundance and the force of Right and Truth doth carry us, that we take even our enemies for our Judges and Witnesses in this cause.

MARY STUART, the onely Daughter of James the Fifth, King of Scotland, and Mary de Lorain, Grand-child to the thrice-vertuous Antonietta of Bourbon, was a Queen, who in my judgement hath equalled the excess of her disasters, with the height of her glory, and it seems her whole life was no other then a Theatre, hung round with blacks, and covered with blood, where the revolution of humane affairs did act unheard-of Tragedies. Never did Nature produce more beauties, nor Grace more wonders in a personage of that high condition. Never did Fortune deal more rigorously with a head, which heaven had made to support three great Crowns. The Birth and Education of this Queen Mary Stuart.

She

In the year 1542. on the 13. of December, on S. Lucy's Day.

She was born in Scotland, she lost her Father eight dayes after her birth, she was brought into France at the age of five years, and was nourished in the Court of Henry the Second, and Katharine de Medicis, who did love her most entirely. She was yet but as the Bud of a Rose, which within her first infancy did preserve her Graces undisclosed. But as she began to lay them more open by the increase of age, we might then behold a Princesse, descended from the bloud of an hundred Kings, who had a body formed and fashioned by the hand of Beauty, a fine and a clear spirit, a deep and a sound judgement, a high Virtue and an incomparable Grace in her expressions. All which, made Henry the Second resolve to give her in marriage to his Son Francis, to whom she was espoused about the fifteenth year of her age, being himself not much more indebted unto years then she was. All things laughed at the beams of this bright Morning; and it seemed, that Felicity her self had with full hands poured down her favours upon a Marriage which had been made in Heaven, to carry along with it the approbation of all the earth.

Her Matriage and widowhood.

The inconstancy of humane affairs.

But who can dive into the secrets which Providence hath in her own breast concealed from us? Or who is he that hath tears enough to deplore the condition of great Fortunes, when they are abandoned to the pillage and plunder of Destruction? This young French King, having in his way but saluted Royalty, after his Reign but of six Moneths was taken out of the World by an Impostume in his ear. All France did groan under this losse, by reason of the excellent inclination of that Prince, but she was more touched with the impressions, which in her heart her most dear Spouse received, who desired to sacrifice the rest of her dayes unto the ashes of her husband. Nevertheless, as the tenderness of the King's age who was troubled besides with diverse indispositions of body, and the short time they were married together, did not permit that any issue should be left behind him, there did arise upon it a Report, that the young Queen should return into her own Countrey, where two Crowns did attend her, the one in England, the other in Scotland, she being the true Inheritresse of them both, of one of which she took possession, and was deprived of her rights in the other, by the Injustice of Usurpation.

Her return into Scotland.

The first fire of the jealousie of Estate.

3. Elizabeth of England now began to torment her self with a furious jealousie against her, and had already laid the Design to stop her in her return to Scotland; but God was pleased that she was gallantly accompanied with a great part of the most generous of the Nobility of France, and did passe the seas very fortunately, and arrived so suddenly in Scotland, as if she did fly in the Air: there she was received of all the good Catholicks, with wonderfull entertainments of applause and joy. Elizabeth who did swell with despight, that she failed in her design, covering her Artifice with the veil of friendship, did send a solemn Embassage with Presents, to congratulate her Arrival, and to give her the assurances of an eternal Alliance. The good Princesse, who had a heart as credulous as generous, was passionately taken with this friendship, and disputed with her self how she should overcome her in honour and in courtesie. She took from her Treasury a Diamond, of which she made a Present to her. It was cut in the manner of a heart, and enriched with a verse of Buchanan's, who had not as yet his spirit infected with Treason. In the mean time Elizabeth, not unlike those Sorcerers, which from the fairest Mornings do produce the foulest weather, did not cease under-hand to sow troubles and divisions in the Realm of Scotland, endeavouring to destroy her Cousin by the fines of policy, whom she durst not attach by the force of Arms.

On the first Arrival of Queen Mary into Scotland, she found the Kingdom overspread with the Factions of the Calvinists, which at that time troubled all the Estates in Christendom. And seeing that the youth and experience of her widowhood was not compatible with the great underminings, which her Enemies did dayly form against her State, she began, after the space of five years, to think of a second Marriage. The small successe in her first Marriage, made her suspect an Alliance with strangers; and those who were most near unto her, did diswade her from it. She did cast her eyes on her Cousin Henry Stuart, the young Earl of Lenox, who for the comelynesse of his person, was one of the most remarkable in the Kingdom of Scotland; and having procured a Dispensation from the Pope, she married him. This affection although most innocent in it self, being not managed with all the considerations of State, did bring upon her the jealousie of other Princes, and was in the end attended with great disasters.

Her second Marriage.

The seed of the jealousie of love.

But to speak the truth, the Earl of Murray, natural brother to the Queen, a pernicious and luxurious man, who under-hand was the Instrument of Elizabeth of England, did sow the first seeds of all these Tragedies. In the beginning of these troubles he was called, The Prior of S. Andrew, as being ordained by James the Fifth, to Ecclesiastical dignity; but having drunk the air of a turbulent and furious Ambition, which Knox the Patriarch of the Hereticks in Scotland had inspired in him, he did not cease to affect the Quality of Regent, and of King, nor sparing any wickednesses to arrive to the butt of his desires.

As he observed that the Queen his sister, being yet very young, and very beautifull, was sought for in Marriage by the King of Spain, to be married to his Son, and by the Emperour, to be married to his Brother, he used the utmost of his power to divert that Design, politickly fore-seeing, that such Alliances would tend to the diminution of his power, and he failed not with most violent perswasions, to represent unto her, that she should enjoy neither peace nor honour in her Kingdom, if she were espoused to a forein Prince; and the better to divert her from it, he ceased not to advance the perfections of young Lenox, which he did rather to amuse her, and to possess her with thoughts of love, then in earnest to bring the Marriage to accomplishment

Ambition, the beginning of all evils.

The generous Princess, who understood not yet what Dissimulation meant, gave ear unto him; and overcome by his counsel, she proceeded to the effects of the Marriage with the Earl of Lenox, who was indeed accomplished with all excellent endowments both of body and of minde, but being very young, had not the qualities requisite to serve him to secure himself. This Murray, who thought he should reign in him, and by him; and that having advanced him to the Royal Dignity, the King should be but as the instrument of his will, did finde himself much deceived, when he observed the King to grow cold in his behalf, and to reign with an Autho-

Authority more absolute then he intended. His fury did proceed to that height, that he drew into the Field to make war against the King; but having bad success therein, he was constrained to retire himself into England, where he began his designs to destroy his Sister. He had in the Scotch-Court the Earl of Morton, who was unto him as his other self, to whom he gave Commission to throw the Apple of Discord on this Marriage of the King and Queen. This he performed with incredible cunning, and finding some disposition by the cooling of his affection, he perswaded Lenox, That he was a King in Name only, and that the Queen signed first in all the Declarations, and did not permit that any Effigies should be stamped on the monies, but her own. That of necessity he must discharge himself from the tutelage of that imperious woman, and teach her to submit to the Law of Nature, which allows not that Sex to command their husbands. On the other side, this Forger of Iniquity heating two Furnaces with one Fagot, ceased not by his complaints to set on fire the heart of the Queen, telling her, That she must chastise the rash young man, and retain the Sovereignty entire on her own side, otherwise his unruly passions attempting to part the Crown betwixt them, would take it away from them both, and put all things into a confusion. This was the occasion that Mary, arming her heart with a manly courage, would enjoy the Rights and Prerogatives of her birth, and did afterwards reign in full Authority.

The effects of Envy and Ambition.

The pernicious language of an Incendiary.

4. This young Husband, who of a Subject was become a Master, could not with moderation endure his change of fortune, but daily endeavoured to hold more of command then of compliance. The Queen also, who desired to be known the sole efficient cause of his preferment, being unwilling to lose the name of Mistris in taking that of Wife, did distast his importunity, deferred his Coronation, and did allow him but a little part in the Affairs of the Kingdom. She ordinarily did confer much with David Riccius her Secretary, an old and discreet man, who with great honour possessed her ear and her good opinion; for she cherished him rather for the necessity of her Affairs, then for any attractive qualities that were in him, for he was but of a deformed body as they who have seen him, do affirm. But the calumny of the Puritans, who know of every wood how to make an Arrow, did not forbear in their bold discourses, to reflect upon the honour of Queen Mary concerning that subject, although it was the most incredible, and the most ridiculous thing in the world.

The jealousie of King Henry Stuart Darley.

The book of the death of the Queen of Scots, printed in the year 1587.

Cambden also, the most sincere of all Historians of the pretended Religion, and Monsieur de Castelnau, have disdained to speak of it, as being an outrage, which had no foundation at all of truth, although the Earls of Morton and Lindsey, two execrable Incendiaries, who had undertaken the divorce of the Royal House, following the spirit of Heresie most impudently to breath forth the greatest lies, did work a great alteration on the King, in the cooling of his affections to his Wife.

A spirit tormented with two great Devils.

The spirit of Henry now became furious, and did perceive it self to be possessed on by two Fiends, the one, the Jealousie of Love, the other, of Estate, which both at one time did commit a prodigious Ravishment on his heart. They made him believe that he passed for a King in fancy only, and that his Throne was no more then a meer Picture, whilest another was made a Partner in his Bed. In effect the excellent Beauties of the Queen which had given him such heats of Love, did now raise his jealousie to the heighth of those flames. He was all on fire perpetually night and day, and being tormented with shadows, suspicions, and rages, with choler, frenzies, and with terrours, he lived as on the Wheel, not knowing which way to turn himself.

His Passion did suggest unto him a bloudy remedy, which was to draw the Secretary from the Cabinet of the Queen at the hour of Supper, and under colour of communicating some Affair unto him, to stab him with a Poniard in the Presence-Chamber. The body being all bloudy by threescore wounds which it received, fell down just at the door of his Mistris, imploring Heaven and Earth against those, who by so black a treason had ravished his life from him in the flower of his hopes. The Queen being frighted at the noise, did run to the door, and with his bloud, received the last breathings of his Soul, some drops of the bloud falling on her outward Garment. She startled at the horrour of the sight, and believed that some sprinklings of the bloud had painted on her face the opprobriousness of the Act.

A tragick remedy by the death of the Secretary of the Queen.

But as she made her complaint, the Murtherers presented a Pistol to her, without any regard to the brightness of her Majesty, or the bigness of her Womb, desiring nothing more, then at one blow to destroy both the Tree and the Fruit. They locked her up in a Chamber of the Palace, taking from her all her ordinary servants, and putting a Guard on her of fourscore Souldiers.

The passion of devlish fury.

On this the Estates met, and the pestilent Council were assembled, where, with mouthes full of fire, the Hereticks ceased not to breath forth Rebellion, Bloud, and Butcheries. They gave it out aloud, that they ought not by halfs to do a Work of so great Importance, and since the Queen, who was a Pillar of the Papists Religion in Scotland, was already shaken, they ought to lay her low as the earth, and utterly destroy her, in giving allowance to the Libels and the Calumnies which were published against her. They had attempted to have seduced the spirit of the young King, promising him to put the Crown in peace upon his head, if he would maintain and support their Design, to which, as he shewed an inclination, they began to weave an horrible Conspiracy, to take from him all the most eminent persons of the State, and imbarque the innocence of the Queen in the common shipwrack.

The horrible attempt of Heresie.

The Earl of Murray who fled into England for having raised Armes against their Majesties, returned back and came into Scotland, rather as a Triumpher, then a guilty person. They made him an Overture of their pernicious counsels, which he entertained with horrour: for as yet he was unwilling that the Affairs should be carried on with such an extremity of violence, wherefore in private he repaired to the Queen, demanding pardon for his Offences past, and promising all obedience for the time to come. He counselled her to recollect and rouze up her spirits, and pardon the injuries passed, and to take away from the Conspiratours all the apprehensions of despair. The Queen bending her spirit to the necessity of the time, and her present Affairs, did receive him with all courteſie, and told him that ſhe was ready to perform all as he pleaſed. She aſſured him, that he was not ignorant that her heart was without gall, having always pardoned offences even to her own deſtruction, by her too much clemency. And though ſhe had been uſed by him with too much rigour for a Brother, that ſhe would not ceaſe to cheriſh him, and to gratifie him above all other, to give him the beſt teſtimony of full ſatisfaction.

Love and Piety.

As he departed, the King came in, and then it appeared how Grace and Nature wrought their effects; for the innocent Queen faſhioning her countenance and her words to the moſt ſenſible paſſion, ſpake thus unto him:

Alas, and wherefore thus, SIR, Is this that I have deſerved for loving you above all the men in the world? Muſt I be forced from your friendſhip, to adhere to my moſt cruel Enemies? If I have deſerved death for doing you all the good that lay in the poſſibility of my power, what hath this little Innocent in my womb committed, whom I do not preſerve, but only to increaſe your power. The Exceſs of theſe violent proceedings will tear away the life both from the Mother and the child, and then I am afraid you will too late diſcover the violence and rage of thoſe, who perſwade you to deſtroy that which you ſhould hold moſt dear, and to bury your ſelf in my ruins.

The King reconciled with the Queen.

As ſhe ſpake theſe words, and mixed them with her tears, the King's heart was ſoftned into compaſſion; Upon his knees he demanded pardon, breathing forth many ſighs, accompanied with groans and tears of love. And having declared to her the conſpiracy that was plotted for her ruine, he told her, that he now came either to live or to dy with her: This confidence did greatly rejoyce her, and having exhorted him above all things, to appeaſe the anger of God, and particularly to have recourſe unto his mercy, ſhe gave him inſtructions neceſſary for him, ſhe counſelled him to diſſemble this their love, and make not the leaſt diſcovery of it to the Conſpiratours, but only to repreſent unto them, that he had found the Queen very ill, and that the violence of her malady might be as ſtrong as poiſon or ſteel, to take her out of the world; That there was now no more need of keeping any Guard upon her, for in paſſing affairs according to their advice, he would anſwer for her, if God ſhould not otherwiſe diſpoſe of her.

This counſel was followed; and after the King had perſwaded the Rebels, to what he had deſired, he returned to his dear wife, and about midnight both of them ſaved themſelves, nine or ten thouſand armed men being drawn together by the diligence of the Earl of Bothuel, who in one morning made the whole Rebellion to vaniſh with the Rebels.

Choler and Vengeance prejudicial.

Now the Earl of Murray had re-poſſeſt himſelf of the favour and good opinion of the Queen; but the King, who well underſtood the pernicious counſels, of which he was the Author, and that he made him ſerve to be his inſtrument at the death of the Secretary, could by no means endure him, and though the good Queen, who would have nothing done violently, had expreſly charged the contrary, he was reſolved to ſeize upon him. But Murray apprehending the ill intent of the King towards him, did by a moſt deteſtable crime prevent it, by drawing to him the Earl of Bothuel, a man bold of ſpirit and of hand, and prevailing on him to maſſacre the King, aſſuring him that he ſhould marry the Queen, if ever he arrived to the end of his fatal Enterpriſe. This miſerable King, whom Jealouſie had tranſported to the cruel murder of the Secretary, was now again fully reconciled to his wife, and loved her moſt tenderly, and conceived an extreme pity, to ſee her youth entangled among ſuch pernitious counſels of her enemies. He was then at Glaſco ſick of the ſmall-pox, which the Queen underſtanding, ſhe immediately repaired thither to bring him unto Edenborough, where were better accommodations for him. At the ſame time the Conſpiratours aſſembled themſelves to accompliſh their Deſign, and moreover they had a deſire to involve the Queen and her Son in the ſame ruine, but they feared that it would be too apparent, and it would be more expedient for them, to bring all the Envy of the death of the husband, upon the head of his wife, whom they conceived to be ſtill highly offended for his ill demeanour towards her. To which purpoſe they undertook to torment her ſpirit, and prompt her to thoughts of vengeance, which they never could effect, ſo ſtrong was the new knot of their reconciled love. They deliberated amongſt themſelves to put this miſerable Prince to death by fire, and becauſe it was inconvenient to perform it in the Palace, they entred into counſel amongſt themſelves, to remove him into a fair houſe, which was at the upper end of the City, where they had prepared a fatal Myne for his deſtruction. His ſickneſs being ſuch, the Queen accorded to his removal, and very innocently did take her husband by the hand, and did conduct him to the Entry of his Lodging, where, with a ſingular prudence, ſhe diſpoſed of every thing which concern'd the recovery of his health. And not contented with that, ſhe ſtayed with him without the appehenſion of any danger of infection, which put the Plotters of this delicate conſpiracy into fear, but ſhe ſeemed to be nothing troubled at it, and ſtaying with him until midnight, ſhe entertained him with all the ſatisfaction that he could expect from ſo bountiful a Nature.

Horrible inventions of Envy and Vengeance.

As ſoon as ſhe was retired; behold by the ſecret artifice of the powder, to which fire was given, under the Lodging of the King, the Chamber was blown into the Air, and the bed all on fire. He found himſelf to be deſperately inwrapped in this calamity; and the Authours of the Miſchief, conſpiring with the Elements, did diſpatch him outright, having found him half dead in a Garden, into which place the violence of the fire had thrown him. The Queen hearing of it, was poſſeſſed with a wonderful amazement, and loſt in the depth of ſorrow, ſhe feared every thing, and knew not what to do, or what to hope, every hour attending to ſee the end of that Tragedy, to be the beginning of another on her own life.

The death of Henry Stuart.

The malicious Earl of Murray, who now had given the blow by the inſtrument of his wickedneſs, as he had ſpoken a little before to thoſe that were neareſt to him, that the King ſhould dy the ſame night, did cunningly retire himſelf. The people murmured, and knew not what to take to; but the cleareſt ſighted amongſt them perceived, that it was a work of this pernicious Brother, who had a deſire utterly to deſtroy the Royal Family, to mount himſelf upon the Throne.

Cambden in the firſt part of his Hiſtory in the year 1567.

And this is that which Cambden aſſureth us in the firſt part of his Hiſtory, who, though by Religion he was a Calviniſt, and by profeſſion the Hiſtiographer to the Queen of England, yet he hath not diſſembled the truth; in confirmation whereof, he produceth proofs as clear as the day, with the atteſtations of the Earls of Huntley and Argathel, two principal principal Lords of Scotland, who by a writing signed under their own hands, have authentically protested to the Queen of England, that the Earls of Murray, Morton and Lidington, were the Counsellers and Authours of the horrible Parricide committed against the King; the good Queen alwayes professing, that she did forbid them to do any thing whatsoever, that might any way reflect upon her honour, or offend her conscience. Also this unfortunate Earl of Morton, who was afterward convicted and executed for this murder, did totally discharge the Queen from having any hand in the King's death, and named the Conspiratours, who by writing had obliged themselves one to another, to defend the murder of his Royall Majesty. John Hebron, Paris, and Daglis, who prepared the Myne, being put to the Rack, to accuse the Innocent Queen, did absolutely discharge her, protesting before God and his Angels, that she was free from all fault, and that Murray and Morton did give them commandment to perform it. Buchanan, a Pensionar of Murray's, who cried down this Queen by his venomous pen, being touched at last with the remorse of conscience, with tears demanded pardon of her Son, King James. And being sick to death, desired that his life might be prolonged, either to clear the integrity of Queen Mary by the light of Truth, or by his own bloud to wash away the stains of his reproaches. Some Protestants being amazed to hear him speak in this manner in the apprehension he had of Gods judgments to fall upon him, did give forth, that his old age had made him to doat. This which I now write, was afterwards acknowledged, as we shall see anon by a publick and solemn sentence of the principall Nobility of England, who although Lutherans and Enemies, being chosen to examine the business, did highly publish the Innocence of this Queen.

And now Detractours, what have you to say? Do you not behold wherewith to make your shame to blush, and the despite of so many infamous Historians to increase, who have made black her whitenes? Nay, some of the Catholicks themselves, being but little versed in the discerning of History, having suffered themselves to be surprized concerning this subject, not considering that all this calumny is derived from the Book of Buchanan, being corrupted to it by the bastard Murray, who promised to make him Patriarch of Scotland, if ever he should come unto the Crown. And this is it which made this Apostate to write a detestable Libel against the honour of this Queen which was condemned afterwards by the Estates of Scotland, and retracted by the Authour himself. But some Huguenots of the Consistory, who are the most pestilent slanderers that ever the earth brought forth, have not ceased to give some countenance to this fable and illusion of mankind, although it was legally condemned of false-hood by the most apparent of all their party. It is an unhappiness of most men, that they are wilfully given to believe the worst, whether by an inclination they have unto it, or whether by a difficulty to forsake and to put off that, which first they entertained in their belief. The most virtuous Queen Dido doth pass perpetually through the world for a woman lost in love, although indeed she died in the defence of her chastity, chusing rather to be devoured by the flames of fire, then to be given in marriage, as Tertullian doth affirm.

The rash love of the Earl of Bothuel.

6. But to take into my hand again the thread of my discourse. Some time after the King's death, Bothuel, who was one of the most powerfull Earls of Scotland, did prevent to court this Queen in the way of marriage, and the rather, because the Earl of Murray had promised her unto him for the recompence of this treason. This motion came directly cross to her heart, although as yet she did not know that this pernicious man had imbrued his hands in her Husbands bloud, having always found him most faithfull in his service. But as the report thereof increased, she grew very angry with all those who offered to renew the motion to her, alledging, that there was no apparance that he should be propounded for a husband to her, who is suspected for so detestable an act, no, although he indeed were innocent. Besides that, she urged that he was already tied in marriage to another woman. Murray the Bastard, and other of the conspiratours, who with an obstinate resolution had undertaken this business, did justifie this Crime by the Judges of their faction, and gave the Queen to understand, that his first wife was not lawfully contracted to him, and therefore she was removed from him.

All this was not able to perswade her, who was wonderfully troubled with the dismalness of these late events, which was the occasion that Bothuel being transported with love, and assured of the high reputation which he had in the Kingdom, did draw forth into the fields with five hundred horse, where corvetting before them, a wild presumption did invade him to take away the Queen as she returned from Sterlin, to which place she was gone to see her Son, and to bring him with her to her Castle at Dunbar, At which place having with strange submissions demanded pardon for his boldness, He represented to her the contract of his marriage signed by the Earl of Murray, and the principal of the Nobility of the Kingdom, who thought very well of it, by that means to remedy the publick calamities of the Kingdom. Moreover he protested to her that he would never over-value himself for the Honour he should receive from her Majesty, nor for the greatness of his unexpected fortune, with which the greatest Monarch on the earth might proudly content himself; but that he would alwayes continue her most humble and most obedient servant. In this manner did this Philistine adore the Ark in its captivity.

But she moderating her passion, did represent unto him, that to proceed in this nature was to overthrow the whole business before it was established, that she would be absolutely brought to Edinborough, the chiefest City of her Kingdom, where she would take a resolution to do that which should seem good unto Her.

On this occasion it came about, that the Earl of Murray, who had removed himself a little, to be the less suspected of the murder, did return to Court, and brought with him the Suite of the Assassinate, rewarding him for it with the obtainment of the bravest Lady in the world, as the recompence of his murder. He ceased not to importune her to take Bothuel for her husband, declaring his innocence, publickly avouched the splendour of his house, the exploits of his courage, the proofs of his fidelity, which did render him most worthy of her love. He added, that being alone and without assistance, she was no way capable to appease the troubles, prevent the ambuscadoes, or sustain the great charges of the Realm. Therefore she ought to receive him for her husband, and the Companion of her Fortunes and designs, having both power, will, and courage to defend her in all conditions, and that he would never suffer her to be in quiet, but only by the consummation of this Marriage. This wicked man by this counsel did promise to himself, either to reign with him being his familiar Friend, or by this action, to cry down the Queen, and over-throw her Authority, as afterwards it came to pass.

The Marriage is now to be accomplished, and the Importunities of the Earl prevailed on Mary's heart, who married him in the face of the Church with all the Ceremonies requisite to it. Some have written, that this virtuous Lady by reason of her beauties, was strongly persecuted by divers with dishonest motions concerning Marriage. And that the easiness of her nature (which could not resist the great importunities and continual battels, which love stirred up against her) did bring upon her a deluge of misfortunes: likewise her neighbour Princes, who knew not the Artifice of her Enemies, did in the beginning blame her for having so easily adhered to a man, who was so dangerously suspected concerning that she ought to clear her reputation from the least shadows of suspicion, wherewith Envy began to cloud it. But who shall well consider a young Widow of seventeen years of age, placed in the furthest part of all the World, where Heresie had over-turned all order, and let loose the blackest Furies of Hell for the dissolution of the State. Who shall contemplate her alone, as the Morning-star in the midst of so many Clouds, without assistance, without forces, without counsel; persecuted by her brother, outraged by the Hereticks, betrayed by the Queen of England under the colour of good will, sought for in Marriage by force of Arms by the Princes of her own Realm; he shall find, that she hath done nothing improvidently in choosing those by friendship, which necessity did give her by force; and whether that there are times and revolutions of affairs so dangerous and remedilesse, in which we have no other power left us, but only to destroy our selves.

The persecution of the Queen of Scots by the Protestants.

7. In the mean time, the Lutherans and the Calvinists did not cease to cry out, and to bray against their Princess, and having begun by infamous Libels, they prevailed so much by their Trumpets of Sedition, that they kindled a War under the pretence of revenging the King's death, whom they had caused to be pourtrayed dead in a bloudy Standard, with his little Son at his feet who demanded vengeance. Bothwel, who as yet was drunk with the sweetnesses of affection which he received from his new Spouse, was altogether amazed when he saw an Army marching in the Field against him. And that the clamour of the people did charge him aloud with the death of the King. The Queen was struck into such a horrour at the report of the Crime, that forthwith she commanded him to withdraw himself, and never to see her more; and although she was ignorant, that his Courage and Valour were able to secure her from the Tempest which was falling on her, yet she chose rather to abandon her self as a prey to all the fury of her Enemies, then to keep but one hour that person near her, which she then only knew to have had some ill designs on the person of the King. He fled from Scotland into Denmark, where after ten years tedious imprisonment, he living and dying did protest that Queen Mary did never know of the conspiracy against her Husband, and that those who gave the blow, having demanded some Warrant from the Queen for their discharge, she made answer, That it was Sacriledge to think of it, so innocent a Soul she had. This Protestation which he made at his death, before the Bishop and other Lords of the Realm, was afterwards sent to divers Princes of Europe, and to Elizabeth her self who did dissemble it. In the mean time, the Rage of the Infidels did seize on Mary, and did constrain her with execrable violence and treasons plotted under-hand by the Agents of the Queen of England, to resign the Kingdom to her Son, whom these seditious people caused to be Crowned at one year of age, to put all the Authority into the hands of Murray in the quality of Regent. Not content with this, they surpriz'd her in a morning as she was putting on her cloaths, and taking from her all Ornaments worthy of her quality, they cloathed her in a sordid habit, and having mounted her upon a horse, which by chance passed through a Meadow, they brought her into a place out of the way, and confined her to a Castle, situated on the Lake of Lonox, under the Guard of the Earl of Douglas, Brother by the Mother's side to the Vice-Roy, using her as a lost creature, and with horrible boldness accusing her for the death of her husband, and a design to invade his Kingdom.

The fury and infidelity of Ambition.

In this Captivity she was charged with Contumacies by the Concubine of her Father, a most insolent woman, to whom the keeping of her was committed, and by a disrobed Prior who did visit her, and tendred her some Remonstrances to assist her as her Father Confessour. And at that time some black and butcherly spirits did take a resolution to strangle her, and to publish to the world, that she had done it of her self, being overcome by despair.

What an indignity was this, and what a confusion in Nature and the Laws of the world, to behold that excellent Lady, to whom Grace and Nature had given chains to captivate the hearts of the most barbarous. That great Princess, whom the Sun did see almost as soon to be a Queen, as a living Creature. She that was born to Empires, as all Empires seemed to be made for her, to be deprived of her sweet liberty, to see her self severed from all commerce with mankind, to be banished in a Desart, where nothing but Rocks were the witnesses of her sufferings. Nay, which is more, she is now become the Captive of her own Subjects, and a Servant to her Slaves. The poor Turtle ceased not to groan, and often through the Grate would look on the Lake, where in every Wave she conceived she beheld the waving image of her change of Fortunes.

Not long after she entred into a deep melancholy, when the evil Spirit that fisheth in troubled waters, did tempt her into thoughts of despair, representing to her, that since the air, and the earth were shut from her, she should make choice of the water into the which she should throw her self, and end the languishment of her Captivity, by burying her self in a moment with her afflictions.

But as her pious Soul was fastned unto God by chains not to be dissolv'd, she fervently besought the Divine Bounty, that he would vouchsafe to comfort her, and confirm her spirit, which was descended into the bottom of the Abyss of the miseries of this world. Her prayer being ended, she was inspired with infusions of love towards her Creatour, and armed with a noble confidence, she in this manner did express her self.

Wherefore

Wherefore art thou so sad my soul? if GOD permits this for thy sins, shouldest thou not kiss the Rod that strikes thee, and adore that infinite mercy who doth chastise thee by temporary punishments, not willing to make thee an object of that choler, which is kindled by an eternity of flames? and if this comes unto thee to approve thy virtues, dost thou fear to enter into the furnace, where that great Workman will consume the straw only that burns thee, and will make thee to shine as gold? wherefore art thou so sad my heart? To be deprived of liberty and the delights of the Court, take unto thee the wings of contemplation and of love, and fly thou beyond these Waters, fly thou beyond the seas which environ these Islands, and understand, that there is no prison for a Soul which GOD doth set at liberty, and that all the world doth belong to him, who knows how to misprise it.

1. Hope against all hope.

In these considerations she took incomparable delight, and as well as she could did charm the afflictions of her imprisonment, when behold a blind felicity which made her to see unexpected events. GOD stirred up a little Daniel to deliver this poor Susanna, a little Infant, the Son of the Earl of Douglas did feel his little heart touched with the miseries of this brave Queen, and had the hardiness to speak thus unto her. Madam, if your Majesty will understand a way to your deliverance, I can give it you. We have here below a Gate, at which we sometimes do go forth to delight our selves upon the water, I will bring you the key, and have the Boat ready, in which, fearing my fathers anger, I must save my self with you. The Queen, extremely amazed at the discourse of the child, made answer. My little friend, your counsel is very good, do as you speak, and acquaint no man with it, otherwise you will ruine us; if you will oblige me for so great a favour, I will make you a great man, and you shall have content all your dayes. In the mean time for want of pen and paper she wrote on her hand-kerchief with a coal, and found a means to advertise the Viscount of Selon touching that design, assigning both the day and the place where he should attend her, to which he disposed himself with so much activity, as if he had rather wings to fly, then paces by foot to measure. The child failed not to put in execution what he promised. The Queen took the key in her hand, opened the Gate, and nimbly leaped into the Boat with this little Companion of her fortune, she took her self the pole into her hand, seeing the young child had not force to steer the boat, she began to guid it, and to save her life by the favour of her arms. One of her Maids, named Queneda, seeing her Mistris in this difficulty, did leap into the water out of a window of the Castle, and abandoned her self to the mercy of the waves, to joyn her self unto the fortunes of her Mistris.

Her departure.

O good GOD, how may the stars in the greater silence of this world, with admiration behold so great a Queen, to sit at the stern of a boat, with oars in her hand, and practising a trade of life, which necessity doth teach her, and felicity doth govern. The waters stroaked into a calm, did perceive the effects of her fair hand, and gently opened themselves to make a passage for her. At last, she arrived at the bank on the other side, and found there the Viscount, who received her with all reverence and joy. She retired her self into a place of safety, and thought on the means to re-establish her self, to which she found her good Subjects well disposed, and in a short time, raised an Army of about seven thousand men. At which the Enemies being inraged, drew up against them in great bodies, and giving them battel, they over-powred them in number, and obtained the victory. The encounter was bloudy, to which one part did contribute courage, and the other fury. Seven and fifty personages of Honour of the House of Hamilton, which is next unto the King, did with their dead bodies cover the field where the battel was fought. The Queen, who with horrour entertained the apprehension of so many massacres, did prefer an innocent Retreat before an uncertain Victory. Her bastard brother, the chief of the Rebellion, of an imaginary King, did now make himself an absolute Tyrant, and as much as in him lay, he endeavoured to root out the rest of the true Religion in Scotland, by the perswasion of Knox and Buchanan, he robbed the Churches naked to cover himself, he oppressed all honest men, and let himself loose unto all manner of insolence.

8. The deplorable Queen is constrained to depart out of her Kingdom, to fall no more into such cruel hands. She took shipping, having a desire at first to sail into France, where her Memory was still preserved in singular Reputation; but having a lofty heart, though excellently well tempered, she was ashamed to transport her self, and to be seen in the condition of a banished woman, in a place where all the graces and virtues had given her so many Trophies. She conceived that concealed Misery was the more supportable, and that it was more expedient for her to live in an Island, which was an out-corner of the World, then in the splendour of France. Besides, she conceived that she ought to continue within the Neighbour-hood of her own Kingdom, the better to facilitate her Return unto it. The Arch-bishop Hamilton, a most wise old man, did dissuade her from that resolution, understanding very well the Deportments of Murray with the Queen of England, and because she made apparence to give but little heed unto his counsels, he threw himself at her feet with tears in his eyes, and besought her not to follow the greatness of her mind, as to make choice of that place, which would be her certain destruction. On the other side, Elizabeth did solicite her again and again, and did importune her by a thousand courtesies to repair into England, to which at last she condescended, as if Necessity had prepared links of Diamonds to chain her to her misfortunes.

Her Retreat into England, where her enemies accused her.

A civil shame doth hinder good designs.

The innocent Dove, in endeavouring to eschew the nets of the Fowler, did fall into the talons of the Hawk. She came into a Kingdom, from whence Justice and Religion were banished by the horrible factions of the Hereticks. She put her self into her hands, who had usurped her Scepter, and who made use of all Interests to procure her death. In stead of coming to the Court to be received there according to her birth and merit, she found her self to be confined into a corner of a desart Island, where in a new captivity, she most unworthily was detained. Her disloyal Brother, the Vice-Roy, seeing her escaped from his bloudy hands, did promise to himself to oppress with much ease, by the circumventions of the Protestant Judges. He laid anew for her the nets of his old Accusations, and made use of all the falsities which had been invented to eclipse her honour.

Queen Elizabeth, in stead of suppressing the unnatural insolence of her Subjects, gave them Commissions and an Order, that a Process should be made against her. The Puritans and the Lutherans the mortal Enemies of Queen Mary, are now her her Accusers, her Judges, and her Witnesses. The number of honest men was here very few, and the apprehension of the danger did stop the mouths of those men which understood the truth, but had not the courage to defend it. Nevertheless, amongst others, there was a Scotch Gentleman, the Viscount Herrin, worthy of eternal Memory, who presented himself to Elizabeth for the defence of his own Queen, and said unto her,

MADAM,

A generous compassion.

THe Queen my Mistris, who is nothing subject to you, but by misfortune, doth desire you to consider it is a work of an evil Example, and most dangerous Consequence, to give way that her rebellious subjects should be heard against her, who being not able to destroy her by arms, do promise themselves to assassinate her, even in your own breast, under the colour of Justice. Madam, Consider the estate of worldly affairs, and bear some compassion to the calamities of your poor Suppliant. After the most horrid attempt on the King her husband, the murder of her servants, the cruel Designs on her sacred Person: After so many prisons and chains, the subjects are heard against their Queen, the Rebels against their lawfull Mistris, the guilty against the Innocent, and the felons against their Judge. Where are we, or what do we do? Though Nature hath planted us in the further parts, and the extremities of all the earth; yet she hath not taken the sense of humanity from us. Consider she is your own bloud, your neerest kinswoman, she is one of the best Queens in the world for whom your Majesty is preparing bloudy Scaffolds, in a place where she was promised and expected greatest favours. I want words to express so barbarous a deed, but I am ready to come to the Effects, and to justifie the innocence of my Queen, by witnesses unreproveable, and by papers written and subscribed by the hands of the Accusers. If this will not suffice, I offer my self (by your Majesties permission) to fight hand to hand for the honour of my Queen, against the most hardy and most resolute of those, who are her Accusers. In this I do assure my self of your Equity, that you will not deny that favour unto her, who will acknowledge her self obliged to your bounty.

Elizabeth, who found her advantages in the misfortunes of Mary, made no account of these remonstrances, and commanded the Commissioners, who were the Dukes of Norfolk and Sussex, to proceed unto the Charge. But there is a God, who rules the Assemblies of men, and oftentimes doth turn their Advice against their own consciences. The greatest part of this Court were so transported, that they had a Resolution to destroy Queen Mary: Murray, Morton, the infamous Bishop of Orcades, and the pernicious Buchanan, with divers other Enemies of the Queen were now come, and brought with them the most execrable inventions, and blackest calumnies that ever were fetcht from hell, to charge the Queen with the death of the King her husband; may, Letters of love were produced, which had been invented by some Puritans, who with an insupportable impudence affirmed, that they found them in a silver coffer of the Queens.

The inhumane cruelty of ambition.

The Earl of Murray, who in the beginning pretended to wish better to no man then to Bothuel, doth now declare himself the chief of this Accusation, outrageously pursuing the death of his Sister; alleadging, That she was the occasion of her husbands death, in revenge of the murder of her Secretary, that she never loved him afterwards, that she never lamented his loss, nor repented of her own sin. That she altogether abandoned her self to the love of the Earl of Bothuel, whom afterwards she married, although he was the murderer of her husband. Lesley the Bishop of Ross, Gordon, Ganvin, Baron, and others, who were there on the behalf of the Queen (for she was present her self in person) knowing the whole truth of the business, and being incensed at the heart, to see the foul treasons of this Judas, did handle him according to his desert, and did answer him by a very strong Apology, which was afterward presented to the Judges, to consider of it at their leisure. I will in this place insert the substance of it, having some years since found it amongst the Acts of the Queen of Scotland.

My LORDS,

IT is a great favour of Heaven to us, that the Earl of Murray is an Accuser in this Cause since his name is able to justifie the greatest crimes, much more to accuse the Innocent, before persons so approved for their justice and their wisdom. It is sufficiently known, that by the ignominie of his mother, he was the son of a Crime, as soon as a son of Nature, that he hath ever since lived by wickedness, and is grown great by insolence. The Queen his Sister hath but one fault, which is, that she hath advanced him against the intentions of the King her father; who designed to him no Crown, but what (when he was to take Religious Orders) the Barber should give him, and now he hath usurped the Crown of the Realm. His desire and endeavours are, that the Diadem should be taken from the head of Mary, in recompense to him, for having cried her down by his calumnies, dishonoured her by his outrages, imprisoned her by his fury, and dispossessed her by his tyranny.

Murray doth accuse the innocent for having contrived her husbands death, and he doth accuse her in a Court, where there are witnesses unreproveable, that will presently be deposed upon Oath, that having plotted this horrible murder, he being in a Boat, did say, That the King should that night be cured of all his maladies. And surely it was easie for him to presage it, when he and his Accomplices had before decreed it, and he had assigned them the place, the time, and the manner of the execution. Murray hath made himself an Accuser, to ravish the Kingdom, and sway the Scepter, imbrued with the blond of the Queen his sister. And we are not so much amazed at this, for he hath sold his soul to work wickedness at a far cheaper rate.

Who had a deeper interest in the death of the King, then a Monk; for so was his condition of life assigned him from his nativity: but by this most detestable murder, he is now become the Regent of a great Kingdom. Who had a more labouring desire to see the King out of the world, then he, who daily expected from the hand of death, the just reward of his disloyalty?

We are here ready to represent unto him a paper signed with his own hand, and the hands of his Adherents, where amongst them all, they are obliged against all, to defend that person, who should attempt upon the person of the King. That execrable writing was intrusted in the hands of Bolfou, Captain of the Castle of Edinborough, whom at the first they had drawn unto their side, and being since insensed against some of the Conspiratours, hath discovered all the business. This is that which we now manifest with reasons, more clear then the day, and with assurances as strong as truth it self.

My

My Lords, We demand what is that which the Rebels oppose against all these proofs, nothing at all but frivolous conjectures which are not sufficient to condemn the vilest creature in the world, although they are made use of, to overthrow the person and Majesty of a Queen. Ten thousand tongues such as Murrays are, and his Accomplices, ought not to serve to make half a proof against the honour of Mary, and yet you have the patience to hear them, rather then chastise them.

Her poor servants have been examined again and again, they have been torn to pieces, and flead alive, to accuse the Queen, and could ever so much as one effectual word be racked from them, to stain her innocence? Have they not in the middle of their torments declared aloud, and before all the people, that she was ignorant of whatsoever was done, and that they never heard the least word proceed from her, which tended to the murder of the King.

All their Reasons are reduced into two Conjectures. The first whereof is, That the Queen committed the said Act, in revenge of the death of her Secretary. The second is, Her Love and Marriage with the Earl of Bothuel, the murderer of her husband, these two are the incvitable charges against her. But to answer to the first: I demand, if the Queen had any desires of revenge, on whom should she exercise that vengeance? Upon her husband, whom she loved with incomparable affection, whom in all companies she defended, as a young man, seduced by evil counsels, to whom she had given a full forgetfulness, and abolition of the murder of David Riccio, for fear that one day he should be called to an account for it, whom she very lately had received into favour, and the strictest friendship, to whom she had given the testimonies of a fervent love unto the last hour of his death. Is it on him that she would discharge her choler, or on those who were the Authours and Executioners of the act? If she hath pardoned the Earls of Murray, and Morton, her sworn Enemies, whom on a thousand occasions she could cut off: here is it to be believed, that a Lady, who had ever a most tender conscience, would destroy a husband so agreeable to her, and whom she knew to have never offended, but through the malice onely of these desperate spirits.

But why then hath she married him, who made this attempt against the King her husband. This is their second Objection, and to speak the truth, the onely one, which they so much cry up. For this it is that they have taken away her Rings and Jewels, and put in the place of them infamous letters, invented by Buchanan, or some like unto him, who treat of love, not as in the person of a Princess, but of a loose licentious woman. And these Letters, when they were produced did appear to be never made up, or sealed; but exposed to all the world, as if so chaste and so wise a spirit as this Queen, could be so stupid, or so wicked, as to publish her own infamy to the face of all the world.

But in the end, they say, the Marriage was accomplished. And who did do it but these onely, who now do make it a capitall Crime. These are they who did give advice to this match by reasons, did sollicit it by pursuits, did constrain it by force, and did sign it by continuance. Behold, we are here ready in your presence, to represent unto you the Contract, which doth bear their names and seals of Arms, which they cannot disprove. The Queen hath protested before God and men, that she had rather die ten thousand deaths, then to have married Bothuel, if she had thought he had been stained but with one drop of her husbands bloud, and if he had not been proclaimed to be innocent.

And now judge (My Lords) with what impudence they dare appear before you, and do believe, that the Queen of England hath sent you hither to serve their passions, and sacrifice so great a Princess to their vengeance. We do hope all the contrary, and do firmly perswade our selves, that the great God, the undoubted Judge of the living and the dead, will inspire you with such counsels, as shall give the Day to Truth, for the glory of your own consciences, and the comfort of the most afflicted of Queens, who desireth not to breath out the rest of her life that is left her, but under the favour of your Goodness.

This in this manner being spoken, the Agents and Deputies for the Queen having aloud pr[illegible]ed, that they here assembled not to acknowle[illegible] any power Superiour to the Crown of Scotla[illegible], but onely to declare in the behalf of their Queen, being unwilling to lose time in words, they came to the proofs, and did defend them with incredible vigour, making in the first place the falsifications, which were very ordinary with the Earl of Murray, to appear in full Council. In the second place, representing the Contract of the Marriage with Bothuel, which he condemned, to be signed by him and his Adherents. Moreover, producing the instrument of the Conspiracy against the King, subscribed by their own hands, and signed by their own Seals. And lastly, reporting the Depositions of John Hebron, Paris, and Daglis, who being executed for this Act, did fully discharge the Queen at the instant of their death before all the people.

Her justification.

After that the Commissioners had judged the Queen of Scots to be innocent of all the Cases and Crimes, which falsely had been imposed on her by her traiterous and disloyal Accusers; and that the proceedings which they made, were for no other purpose, but to exempt themselves from the crimes which they had committed, and to cover the tyranny which they had exercised in the Kingdom of Scotland. The Earl of Murray did flie away, filled with fear and with confusion, seeing that his life was in great danger, if he had not been secretly protected by the Queen of England.

The confusion of her Accusers.

In the pursuit of this Sentence, the most honest of the Council did propose three Remedies to take away the differences, and to re-establish the true Queen in her Kingdom. The first was, That she should give assurances to the Queen Elizabeth, no ways to disquiet her in the Succession of the Crown of England. The Second was, That she should grant an Act of Pardon and Forgetfulness to her rebellious Subjects, for fear the punishment should otherwise extend to a number that was infinite. The third was, That the Marriage with Bothuel being condemned to be unlawfull, she should consent to be espoused to some illustrious Person in England, who should be answerable in all conditions, and maintain both Kingdoms in a perpetual friendship, to which Queen Mary shewed a singular inclination.

The labyrinths of the hypocrisie of Elizabeth.

9. But the Queen of England was wonderfully amazed at this Sentence and proceedings, and although in publick she seemed to be much contented at the justification of her Cousin, yet in secret she much raged at it, and encouraged the Accusers to prosecute their complaints in full Parliament, telling them, they were both lazy and impertinent to begin their Suit, and not to accomplish it.

The

The Proceſs upon this, was brought again to the Council of England, where the Baſtard Murray, armed with the outrageous pen of Buchanan, uſed all his power, even to the affrighting of the Agents of Queen Mary, by the Authority of Elizabeth. But the beſt ſort of people began to murmure, ſaying, that it was neceſſary that the Traitours ſhould be taken off, and the innocent Queen reeſtabliſhed in her Kingdom. On the one ſide, Elizabeth ceaſed not to make delays, and on the other, ſhe pretended that ſhe would underſtand what ſhould be the conditions of her enlargement, whether it were to appear civil and humane, or whether ſhe would ſound the minds of thoſe further whom ſhe thought did talk with too much liberty, concerning that affair.

In the mean time, the Spirits which could not clearly enough diſcover the labyrinths of her dark heart, conceived, that Truth had now prevailed to Deceitful hopes. publiſh the innocence of the Queen of Scotland, that the Storm was grown into a Calm, and that ſhe now began to arrive at her deſired haven, ſhe now was looked on by every one with another eye, and the greateſt perſonages in England, did paſſionately deſire an Alliance with her.

The Earl of Leiceſter, an intimate favourite of Elizabeths, obſerving that his Queen had no intention to be married, and that the the Scepter of England did look upon this Priſoner, did entertain a delicate Ambition, to court her in the way of Marriage; but the Tranſalpine humour of his moſt jealous Miſtriſs did ſo perplex him, that he durſt not tell to his own heart, what his own thoughts were. He moſt paſſionately deſired, that the Queen would make ſome overture to him of it, to ſubmit all things to her diſcretion, and to make her underſtand, that this would be a happy means to take away all doubts, and miſapprehenſions that ſhould ariſe from Scotland. But ſo it was, that he durſt not proceed in it, ſo well he underſtood the ſpirit of Elizabeth, who was as apt to receive an evil impreſſion, as ſhe was cruel to revenge it.

Treaſon againſt the Duke of Norfolk, and his ruin. The Duke of Norfolk, who was Preſident at the Trial of Queen Mary, was advanced above all others in Dignity, and remarkable over all the Realm for his great and gallant qualities. The baſtard Murray did flatter him with the hope of his Siſters marriage. The Earl of Leiceſter began to dive into his heart concerning that ſuit, and gave him ſome touches of it, whether it were that by that means he would know the pleaſure of Elizabeth, or whether he were reſolved to deſtroy the Duke, who only was able to caſt a ſhadow on his light. Throgmorton, who was a friend unto them both, did firſt carry the meſſage, and acquainted Norfolk, that Leiceſter had a deſire to ſpeak with him on a buſineſs of high importance, which was concerning his marriage with the Queen of Scotland, he told him, that he ſpoke this unto him as of himſelf, but counſelled him as a friend, to refer the further proceedings on that Marriage to the Earl of Leiceſter, who, though it was thought did pretend himſelf to it, yet he deſired that his modeſty would give way that the Earl might adviſe him, becauſe there was no great apparance of any thriving in that motion without his direction. He believed this counſel, and as ſoon as the Earl began to open his mouth concerning it, he did comply unto him with all honour and ſubmiſſion, and did expreſs himſelf to be indifferent and cold enough concerning that Marriage; although, to ſpeak the truth, her Innocence ſo much perſecuted, had kindled already the firſt fire of love within his heart. Leiceſter, touched with this courteſie, did increaſe his flame, and did remonſtrate to him, that this Marriage would highly conduce to the benefit of the State, becauſe it would prove a happy means to divert all ſtrange Alliances, which might carry the Queen of Scotland to purſue her pretenſions to the Crown of England, and ſerve abſolutely to confirm her in the good opinion of Queen Elizabeth. The Duke, who was indued with a natural freedom of diſpoſition, and knew not how to diſſemble, beholding himſelf at one time betwixt two violent fires of Love and Honour, did entertain the heat, which too ſoon he did evaporate, and beſought the Earl, ſince he pretended no more to that affair, and that he himſelf would not proceed in it without his aſſurance, that he would do him a courteſie worthy of the place which he had near the Queen, for which he never would be ingrateful. This the Earl did promiſe him, and if men may judge by apparence, very heartily; which did ſo blow up the heart of the Lover, that in thinking of it, he did adore his own thoughts. It was indeed a ſtrange temptation, to propoſe unto himſelf ſo accompliſhed a Beauty, and ſo eminent a Virtue, on whoſe train two Kingdoms did attend. The world is not capable to be governed by two Suns, and the heart of man ſuffers more then mortal Agonies, when it ſuſtains the ſhock of two violent paſſions, who unite their forces and deſigns, to make a war upon him.

Great paſſions of Love and Ambition. The Duke beholding himſelf flattered with theſe loves, by divers other Agents, did write unto the Queen of Scotland, with magnifick complements, and offers of unparallel'd ſervice, with the greater pomp and ſweetneſs to enter into the ſecrets of her thoughts. The Priſoner, who laboured for nothing more then to break her chains aſunder, did deſire rather to ſee the end of the affair, then to underſtand the beginning of it; but the experience which ſhe had of the diſſimulation and jealouſies of Elizabeth, did make her to go upon theſe conſiderations, as on a fire covered with aſhes. Wherefore, without being much moved at it, ſhe made anſwer, that ſhe muſt commit the whole Negotiation to the Queen, and truſt to none to whom ſhe had not ſpoken, and openly teſtified her deſires.

In the mean time, the Earl of Leiceſter, who had promiſed to ſpeak unto her, and who only could give a fair colour to the eſtate of that Marriage, to perſwade Elizabeth to incline unto it, did defer to ſpeak unto her from day to day; and being importuned to it, by the violent ſolicitations of the Duke, he counterfeited himſelf ſick, and continued in a malignant ſilence.

The fury of Elizabeth. He knew very well that to ruin a good buſineſs, we muſt make uſe of an indiſcreet tongue, he therefore permitted that ſome Ladies, who for the moſt part with curioſity enough do deliver the ſecrets of Lovers, ſhould report the firſt news of it unto the Queen.

This was to put her ſpirit upon the Rack, and to torment her in the moſt ſenſible part. She, who was extremely jealous on any motions that were made unto her concerning the Queen of Scotland, and would grow into a fury upon the leaſt diſcourſe that did reflect upon her right unto the Crown, finding her ſelf aſſaulted at one time by two ſtrong paſſions, did enter into a rage that cannot be repreſented. Her ſpirit, which naturally was formed for diſſimulation, could not now conceal conceal it self, but she did let fall some words unto the Duke of Norfolk, telling him; That although he slept softly upon a Cushion, he should take care it was not taken from him. And immediately upon it, leaving off these Riddles, she sharply reproved him for presuming on the marriage with the Queen of Scotland, without first acquainting her with it. The Duke made answer, That he never attempted any thing of himself, without attending her pleasure and commandment, and that he gave an express charge to the Earl of Leicester, to acquaint her with it, and to desire her condescent unto it: but perceiving her Majesty was averse unto it, he would willingly forbear any further suit, having no other aim, but to rule his life and fortunes according unto her intentions. On this promise, she departed from him, and went to look out the Earl of Leicester, who was the Master of the Guard of the Chamber, who understanding that she was advertised that the secret of the marriage was disposed in his breast, he was suddenly possessed with a great fear, which made him look pale and tremble in the presence of the Queen, whom he prevented; and with tears in his eys besought her to excuse him, that he had not acquainted her with it, because, he said, he waited an opportunity to find her in a good humour, to give the less trouble to her mind, which he found before to be too much disquieted. His counterfeit sickness, his pale colour, but above all, the inordinate affection which Elizabeth did bear unto him, did at that time save him from the thunder of her Choler. But poor Norfolk did presently behold himself abandoned by his Friends, discountenanced by the Queen, followed, spied, persecuted, and at last confined to the Tower of London.

The horrible Catastrophe of the Duke of Norfolk.

Not long after, there were Scaffolds made in the great Palace, a Tribunal was planted, and seats were made on both sides of it, for the Commissioners to sit, who were to be his Judges. He was brought to the Bar by two Knights, before whom an Axe was carried, the back whereof was turned towards the accused. The Earl Talbot, was made President of the Court, and sate on the Judgment seat, and on both sides of him there were ranked a considerable number of Judges and Counsellours. After that their Commission was read, the Duke was cited, and accused to have endeavoured to dispossess Queen Elizabeth, and to set the Queen of Scotland on her Throne; To hold great intelligence with the Pope, and forreign Princes, Enemies to the Crown of England; and with his possession to have assisted the Enemies of the State, with many more particulars. The poor Duke was much amazed to see himself so suddenly invested with so dangerous an accusation, and charged with so many Articles. He desired that he might be allowed Counsel to draw up his justification, but it was refused; and being demanded to answer readily to the Crimes of which he was accused, he replied very innocently.

"I commend my self to God and to my Peers. "The Atrocity of the Crimes do amaze me, but "the Royal Clemency of her Majesty, which hath "conferred Favours on me beyond my hope, doth "again encourage me: I beseech you my Lord "President, that I may have right done unto me, "and that my memory may not be too much op- "pressed with the variety of confused complaints. "I acknowledge my self happy to have you my "Peers to be my Judges, and most willingly do "commit my life to the integrity of the greatest "part of you, assuring you on my innocence, that "I will not faulter with you; and though I do "ingeniously acknowledge, that I have not alto- "gether directed my actions according to an ex- "act rule of Justice; yet so it is, that I have not of- "fended her Majesty.

At that time there was one Barret, Advocate General to the Queen, a violent man, bold against those who were fearful, and fearful of those who were bold, who to shew his abilities, and the zeal which he did bear to the service of his Mistris, did vigorously proceed against the Duke, and did perplex him with multitudes of words. The good Duke, who knew better how to handle his Sword then his Tongue, and had withal but an uncertain memory, did defend his Honour and his Life as well as he could; but his party was no way equal, so much Authority, perfidiousness, and malice did pour down upon him, that he was not able to wade through it. At the last, he was commanded to withdraw, that they might advise upon his sentence, and on his return they shewed the edge of the Axe towards him, to carry him before hand the sad news of the sentence of his death, which condemned him to be drawn upon a Sledge unto the Gibbet, to be there hanged, drawn, and quartered. This Sentence did startle him at the horrour of it, and produced from him these expressions:

"Sentence is here pronounced against me as a "Traytour, but I do trust in God and the Queen; "and I hope, though I am deprived of your com- "pany, I shall rejoyce in that which is in Heaven: "in that assurance I will prepare my self for death. "I desire nothing of the Queen, but only that she "will be favourable to my Children and my Ser- "vants; and that there may be care taken for the "discharge of my Debts.

Some Months afterwards the Sentence of Death being a little moderated, he was brought to the place of execution, where he died like a Divine rather then a Souldier, preaching to the people and accusing himself, that he treated on the Marriage with the Queen of Scotland, without acquainting his own Queen with it. He also accused himself of having sent Letters written from the Pope, to which he said, he never condescended; and withall, that he had maintained Servants affectioned to the Religion of the Church of Rome, in which, if he had offended God, the true Church, and the Protestants, he demanded pardon. A new Dean, a Heretick, who had taken a wild possession of his afflicted Soul, being present at his Death (according to the Order he had received) did perswade him to speak any thing in the favour of his own party; after which he prostrated himself on the earth, and having pronounced a prayer or two, he laid his head upon the Block, which the Executioner with one blow divided from his body.

God's judgment on wicked Murray.

The Earl of Murray, who was the Creature of Queen Elizabeth, for the ruining at once of this Commander's life, and his Sister's hopes, being returned into Scotland, where after so much perfidiousness, he resolved to triumph in the bloudy spoyls of his neerest kinswoman, was killed by a Pistol-bullet, shot by the hand of one Hamilton, who was one of the chiefest of the Nobility of that Kingdom; and now at last that uncontrouled Ambition, which did blow up so many storms, is extinguished in its own blood, he not witnessing at his death any Act of Christianity. His good Sister did much lament his despoiled body, but above all his Soul, which being snatched away by sudden death, had not the leisure to repent the actual Crimes of his life, nor the blasphemies of his mouth.

The Queen's languishments in prison.

10. Nevertheless, she found her self fast bound with the chains, which this malicious contriver had linked for her destruction; and under the shadow of this pretended marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, although she deported her self in it with all discretion, yet she was persecuted again, so absolutely were mischief and misfortune to pursue her to her graye; and at the same time, when she thought to have seen the beams of her dear liberty, she had double Guards set upon her, to afflict her with all the rigour that was possible.

Of the four and fourty years of her life, which God had dispensed to her, she suffered almost the half of them under the cruelty of a tedious imprisonment, where she had a thousand times been overcome with melancholy, were it not for the consolations which she did draw from the fountain of true piety. Pope Pius the fifth, understanding that she was denied the assistance of Priests, did permit her to communicate her self unto him, which oftentimes she did, and oftentimes the consecrated Host was privately sent unto her by those whom he intrusted. Besides this, she being a most knowing Princess, who had her education in France from five years of age, and always loved good Letters, and understood and spoke six Languages, did improve her understanding and her time, by the assiduity of reading, which did much sweeten the afflictions of her captivity.

During the time of those persecutions, she received the comfort of benediction from divers Popes, who secretly did send some Fathers to her, who being as industrious as courageous, did find out a way to see her, and to fortifie her in the true Religion, and to discourse with her on heavenly things, which was the sweetest Manna which she tasted in that Wilderness. She always protested, in the singular confidence which she had in God, that no violence should separate her from the Ancient Religion; and that it should be unto her a peculiar gift from heaven, to seal her confession with her bloud.

Henry the Third of France, honouring her Dignity and Alliance, forgot not to send divers Embassadours to comfort her, although for certain reasons of State he did never act effectually for her deliverance. We have yet living in Paris, a venerable man of fourscore years of age, full of Virtue, Honour and Merit, who did visit her in her captivity by the commandment of the said Henry, and who oftentimes hath assured me, that no man could see that excellent Queen without raptures of celestial joy. She loved the French naturally, and was magnificent in her gifts; and finding her self at that time unprovided of those things, which she desired not to enjoy, but only to distribute amongst her friends, she did take a Ring of Diamonds, which was left her, and her own Table-book, which she gave to this good Gentleman, who shewed them to me for the rareness of the Work. It is true indeed, the Book was very rich, being covered with crimson Velvet, and garnished with clasps, and on the corners with plates of Gold, but she did guild it far more with her royal words, telling him, that it was one of the misfortunes of her imprisonment, that she was not able to present a gift unto him, that was worthy of his merit: Howsoever she would tender to him that small gift, which would be the more observable for the profit it should bring him, having written in it some few, but remarkable observations, which should conduce much to his advantage, and, but little to her own.

In the mean time this great soul passed many years weeping on the banks of this cruel Babylon, where she heard nothing spoken, but what carried the sounds with it of chains and prisons, and the massacres of Catholicks. She was perpetually sick in body, and overwhelmed with the bitterness of mind; but amongst all the cares of her cruel and tedious imprisonment, nothing came more near her heart, then the danger of her son, a young Prince in the hands of Hereticks, and abandoned to their Doctrine, receiving his first principles from their errours, and exposed as a prey to their conspiracies. This was the occasion that some years before her death, she wrote a long Letter to the Queen of England, in which behold some notable expressions.

A pithy and courageous letter to the Queen of England.

MADAM,

CONcerning what is brought to my knowledge, touching the late conspiracies executed in Scotland against my poor Son, finding by my own example, that I have a just occasion to fear the sad consequence, it is most necessary, that before I depart this world, I should imploy all the strength and life that is left me, to discharge my heart plainly to you, by my complaints, which are as just as they are lamentable.

I desire that after my death, this Letter may serve you as a perpetual remembrance, which in the deepest characters I would imprint in your conscience, as well for my discharge unto posterity, as to the shame and confusion of all those, who under your Warrant have so unworthily, and so cruelly used me: And because their designs, their practises and proceedings (though never so detestable) have always prevailed on your side, against my most just Remonstrances, and all the sincerity of my deportment, and the force which you have in your hands warp and byas the common capacities of men, I will therefore have my recourse to the living God, our only Judge, who under him hath equally and immediately established us, for the Government of his people; I will invoke him in this extremity of my afflictions, to render both to you and my self what is due, either to our Merits or Demerits. Remember, Madam, that he is the only Judge, a Judge whom the painting and policy of this world can no way disguise, although men for a time may obscure the truth, by the subtlety of their inventions.

In his name, and being, as it were, both of us before him, I must remember you of the secret practises you have used to trouble my Kingdom, to corrupt my Subjects, to forsake their Allegiance, and to attempt my person. I shall represent unto you the unjust dismission, which by your Counsel I was overcome to sign, when my enemies held their poniards at my throat, in the prison of Locklevin; you assured me that the Dismission should be of no force, although since, you have made it as effectual and powerful as you could, assisting those by your forces, who were the first Authours of it. You have transmitted my Authority to my Son, when he was but in his Cradle, and was not able to help himself; and since I have by law confirmed the Crown on him, you have intrusted him in the hands of my most capital enemies, who having forced from him the effect, will also take away the title of a King, if God doth not preserve him.

I will

I will profess unto you, before the most impartial Judge, that beholding my self pursued to death by my Rebels, I sent unto you expresly by a Gentleman the Diamond Ring which I received from you, with an assurance to be protected by your Authority, succoured by your Arms, and received into your Realm with all courtesie. This promise, so often repeated by your month, did oblige me to come to throw my self into your Arms, if I could be so happy to approach them. But indeavouring where to find you, behold I was stopped in the way, environed with guards, detained in strong holds, confined to a lamentable captivity, in which I do at this day die, without numbering a thousand deaths, which already I have suffered.

After that the Truth hath laid open all the impostures which were contrived against me, that the chiefest of the Nobility of your Kingdom have acknowledged in publick, and declared my innocence. After that it hath been made apparent, that what passed betwixt the late Duke of Norfolk and my self, was treated, approved, and signed by those who held the first place in your Councels. After so long a time that I have always submitted to the Orders which were prescribed for my captivity, I do behold my self to be dayly persecuted in my own person, and in the persons of my servants, and totally hinders, not onely from releiving the pressing necessities of my Son, but from receiving the least knowledge of his condition.

This is that, MADAM, which makes me once more to beseech you, by the dolorous Passion of our Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, that I may have permission to depart your Kingdome, to assist my dear Son, and to find some comfort for my poor body, travelled with continual sorrows; and, with all liberty of conscience, to prepare my soul for God, who hourly doth call for it.

Your Prisons have destroyed my body, there is no more left for my Enemies to satiate their vengeance. My soul is still entire, which you neither can, nor ought to captivate. Allow it some place to breath more freely after its own safety, which a thousand times I do more desire, then all the greatness in the world. What Honour can you receive to see me stifled in your presence, and to fall at the feet of my Enemies? Do you not consider, that in this extremity, if by your means (although late) I shall be rescued from their hands, that you shall oblige me, and all mine, and especially my Son, whom most of all you may assure your own.

I must beseech you, that I may understand your intentions concerning this, and that you will not remit me to the discretion of any other, but your own. In the mean time, I shall demand two things; the one, That being ready to depart this World, I may be suffered to have with me some man of honour of the Church, to instruct and perfect me in my Religion, in which I am resolved to live and die. The other, That I may have two maids in my Chamber, to attend me in my sickness, protesting before God, they are most necessary for me, to keep me from the shame of the simple people. Grant me then these Petitions, for the honour of God, and let it appear that my Enemies have not so much credit with you, as to exercise their vengeance and cruelty in a thing of so small a consequence.

Reassume the marks of your ancient good nature, Oblige your own to your self. Grant me that contentment before I die, as to see all things remitted betwixt you and my self, to the end that my soul, being inlarged from my body, it be not constrained to lay open her groans before God, for the injuries which you have suffered to be done unto me upon earth; But on the contrary, that departing from this captivity in peace and concord, it may with all content repair to him, whom I most humbly beseech to inspire You, to condescend to my most just Requests.

Sheffield: November 22. 1581.

Your most desolate, most near, and most affectionate Kinswoman,
QUEEN MARY.

11. May we not affirm that these Remonstrances, and that these words were of power to soften the heart of a Tyger, and yet they made no impression on her barbarous soul, who being born by a crime, could not afterwards live but by iniquity.

A parallel on both Queens.

Dear Reader, it is true, that we are possessed with an amazement on the consideration of the particulars of this History; And it may be you have the curiosity to draw open the curtain of the Sanctuary, and enter into the secrets of the Divine Providence, and in the travers of so much shade and darkness, to discover, why two Queens of so different qualities, were so indifferently handled, as it were, by the blind conduct of Chance. How came it about, that nothing but calamity did follow the good Queen, and all good fortune seemed not to be, but onely for the bad one? I will parallel the one with the other, and although Queen Elizabeth be dead, out of the communion of the true Church, and in many considerations had extremely undervalued and offended France, yet I will not so rudely speak of her, as she hath been charactered by the eloquent pens of Monsieur, the Cardinal of Peron, and Monsieur du Vair, but content my self to speak of that onely, which may be collected from the History written by Cambden, her own Historiographer.

Queen Mary was high and glorious in her birth, both by the Father and the Mother. Queen Elizabeth did come into the world by a crime and a scandal, who made all Christendome to groan. It is true indeed, she was the daughter of a King, but of a licentious King, and of a wanton mother, whose head the King did cause to be cut off, for her unchastness. The one from five years of age was brought up in France, with so much piety, gravity, and honour, that nothing more could be added or desired. The other had a licentious Education under the bad Example of her licentious parents. The one had an excellent, an active, and a clear spirit, resembling the quality of the Sun. The other was of a crafty, malignant, and a sullen Nature, resembling the condition of a Corner. The one was experienced in the knowledge of tongues and sciences, as much as was necessary for an honest Lady, who ought not to appear too learned. The other gave her self to such a vanity of study, that oftentimes she committed some extravagances; as when she undertook to translate the five Books of the Consolation of Boëtius, to comfort her self on the Conversion of Henry the Fourth. The one did speak and write with an extraordinary clearness, and an accurate smoothness. The other in her expressions was harsh, and did much perplex her thoughts, as may appear in a subscription of a Letter, written with her own hand, and directed to Henry the Fourth, after his Conversion. Vostre sœur, si ce soit a la virille, avec nouvelle, Je n'ay que faire, Elizabeth R. which is in English, Your Sister, if it be after the old fashion, with the new, I have nothing but to do, Elizabeth R. I leave to the most liberal Interpreter, to divine what she meaneth by it. The one had a generous, free, and a credulous heart. The other was malicious, obſtinate, and deceitful. The one loved honour, to which her condition had obliged her. The other had a furious and bloody Ambition, and ſpared none, to improve the intereſt of her Greatneſs. The one retained an admirable conſtancy in her ancient Religion, by reaſon whereof, though ſhe was outrageouſly perſecuted, yet ſhe omitted nothing in her Devotion. The other did put on Religion as ſhe did her maſk, making her ſelf a Heretick amongſt Hereticks, and a Catholick amongſt Catholicks; for when in the reign of her Siſter Mary, ſhe made a high and ſolemn profeſſion of the Roman Faith, ſhe afterwards counterfeited her belief, and betrayed that character to authorize Hereſie and Rebellion againſt the Church. The one feared God, and finding her ſelf the Relict of Francis the Second, at 17 years of age, ſhe had rather ſtoop to the marriage yoke, to give life unto a King, then to live inordinately, and under the veil of Widowhood, to conceal her ſecret wantonneſs. The other, who had not ſo ſtrict a conſcience, did find a way to reconcile Ambition and Love, and lived not married, and not a Maid, and though I am unwilling to believe, that ſhe lived ſo ſalt and melting a life, as ſome have affirmed, yet I cannot deny but that ſhe had her Favourites and her Minions, which Cambden her own Hiſtoriographer doth not conceal. The one ſtudied for the advancement of Virtue; the other for the advancement only of vain reputation. The one held forth a generous liberty in all her actions; the other painted her life, and covered her vices, with great pretences, ſhe extremely feared the cenſure of Poſterity, which made her with ſo much artifice to indear unto her the ableſt men of forreign Countries, and entertained mercenary Quils to encreaſe her glory, thinking by that means to conceal her defects, and blind the eys of mankind. Wherefore we ought not to give too much belief to ſome Hiſtorians, though otherwiſe men of eſteem, who deliver many and great praiſes, having received many and great Preſents. Men of that quality are always credulous enough, and are not accuſtomed to bark at thoſe who do feed them with bread. The one was very religious in her promiſes, the other was captious and inconſtant; and this moſt viſibly ſhe made apparent to the Duke of Alenson, brother to Henry the Third of France, who was come into England to eſpouſe her; and though the Contract of the Marriage was confirmed, both on the one ſide, and the other, and though the marriage Ring was given, yet ſhe broke all for the Capriciouſneſs of one night, and to obey the crys of ſome Maids of Honour, who beſought her that ſhe would not marry. The one was full of bounty to her poor Subjects, to whom ſhe could not do all the good ſhe deſired, by reaſon of the Rebellions that were ſtirred up in her Kingdom; the other was careful enough, not to tax her Subjects with Impoſts or with Subſidies, which cauſed her to be beloved of her people, who in all the virtues of a Prince, do cheriſh nothing more then a moderation in their Subſidies: the one was indued with an extreme ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, which ſometimes did ſeem to lie too open and defenceleſs, as when without ſeeing juſtice done, ſhe pardoned great Crimes, which tended to the diminution of her Authority. The other was naturally cruel, a lover of blood, and one who horribly tormented the Catholicks, and too eaſily would bring the heads of her Greatones upon the Scaffold, to obtain the honour and title of being juſt among popular Spirits. To conclude, one reigned like a Dove, and the other like a Bird of prey. It is a horrible thing to read the Hiſtory of her Reign, written by her Admirers, where inſtead of the Contemplation of Virtues, and of Beauties, you ſhall obſerve in every page the Rages of Accuſers, bloudy Judgments, Proſcriptions, Maſſacres, which I alledge not in any diſparagement to the Nation, which I love with a true Chriſtian Charity, but to the ignominy and the ſhame of Hereſie. It ſeems to me when I read the Life of Elizabeth, that I enter into the Country of the Anthropophagi, where I behold nothing but men drawn upon ſledges, Hang-men tearing out of bowels, and dividing carkaſes into quarters, which are ſtill dropping bloud, and hanging in the moſt remarkable places of the City, as the Tapiſtry of the antient cruelty of the Puritans. I aſſure my ſelf that thoſe who are now in Authority under ſo gracious a Prince, do reflect upon it with as much horrour as my ſelf, and by their moderation will endeavour to wipe away the ſtains of ſo bloody a Time.

Who is he then that is not amazed to ſee Virtue ſo forſaken, and the beſt Queen in the world to lead ſo tempeſtuous a life, perſecuted in her Eſtate, in her body, in her honour, in her own perſon, in the perſon of her friends, diſpoiled, outraged, diſhonoured, torn by bloody calumnies, drawn to unjuſt Tribunals, locked up in ſo many Priſons, abandoned by thoſe moſt near unto her, and ſacrificed by her kindred, to the vengeance of her Enemies, and that in ſo Tragical a manner, and by ſo barbarous a hand? And how comes it to paſs, that the other, being laden with Crimes, did mount on the Throne by ways unexpected, and did continue there by uncontrouled power, and reigned, as if ſhe had all good Fortune at her own commandment? Wealth and Honour were always on her ſide. Delight and Joy ſeemed only to be ordained for her. Whatſoever ſhe undertook, did thrive, all her thoughts were proſperous, the Earth and the Sea did obey her, the Winds and the Tempeſts did follow her Standards. Some would affirm, that this is no marvel at all, but only the effect of a cunning and politick Council, compoſed of the ſons of darkneſs, who are more proper to inherit the felicities of this World, then the Children of the light. But we muſt conſider, that this is the common condition both of the good and the evil, to find out the cauſe in which the Underſtanding of man doth loſe it ſelf. David curiouſly endeavouring to diſcover the reaſon, in the beginning did conceive himſelf to be a Philoſopher; but in the end acknowledged, that the conſideration thereof did make him to become a Beaſt. The Aſtrologers do affirm, that Elizabeth came into the World under the Sign of Virgo, which doth promiſe Empires and Honours; and that the Queen of Scotland was born under Sagitarius, which doth threaten women with affliction and a bloody Death. The Machivilians do maintain, that ſhe ſhould accommodate her ſelf to the Religion of her Country, and that in the oppoſing of that Torrent, ſhe ruined her Affairs. The Politicians do impute it to the eaſineſs of her gentle Nature. Others do blame the counſel which ſhe entertained, to marry her own Subjects. And ſome have looked upon her, as Job's falſe Friends did look on him, and reported him to lie on the Dung-hil for his ſinnes. But having throughly conſidered on it, I do obſerve that in theſe two Queens God would repreſent the two Cities of Sion and Babylon, bylon, the two wayes of the juſt, and the unjuſt, and the eſtate of this preſent world, and of the world to come. He hath given to Elizabeth the bread of Dogs, to reſerve for Mary the Manna of Angels. In one he hath recompenſed ſome moral virtues with temporal bleſſings, to make the other to enter into the poſſeſſion of eternal happineſs. Elizabeth did reign, why ſo did Athalia. Elizabeth did perſecute the Prophets, why ſo did Jezabel. Elizabeth hath obtained Victories, why ſo did Tomyris the Queen of the Scythians. She hath lived in honour and delight, and ſo did Semiramis. She died a natural death, being full of years, ſo died the Herods and Tiberius, but following the track that ſhe did walk in; what ſhall we collect of her end, but as of that which Job ſpeaketh, concerning the Tomb of the wicked? They paſs away their life in delights, and deſcend in a moment unto hell.

Now God being pleaſed to raiſe Mary above all the greatneſs of this earth, and to renew in her the fruits of his Croſs, did permit that in the Age wherein ſhe lived, there ſhould be the moſt outrageous and bloudy perſecution, that was ever raiſed againſt the Church. He was pleaſed by the ſecret counſel of his Providence, that there ſhould be perſons of all ſorts which ſhould extol the Effects of his Paſſion. And there being already entred ſo many Prelates, Doctours, Confeſſours, Judges, Merchants, Labourers, and Artizans, he would now have Kings and Queens to enter alſo. Her Husband, Francis the Second, although a moſt juſt and innocent Prince, had already took part in this conflict of ſuffering Souls. His life being ſhortned (as it is thought) by the fury of the Huguenots, who did not ceaſe to perſecute him. It was now requiſite that his dear Spouſe ſhould undertake the myſtery of the Croſs alſo. And as ſhe had a moſt courageous ſoul, ſo God did put her in the front of the moſt violent perſecutions to ſuffer the greateſt torments and to obtain the richeſt Crowns.

The great ſecret of the Divine Providence.

Elizabeth's hatred to the Queen of Scotland.

The Prophet ſaith, That man is made as a piece of Imbroidery, which doth not manifeſt it ſelf in the lives of the juſt: for God doth uſe them as the Imbroiderer doth his ſtuffs of Velvet and of Satin, he takes them in pieces to make habilements for the beautifying of his Temple.

12. Elizabeth being now tranſported into Vengeance, and carried away by violent Counſels, is reſolved to put Mary to death. It is moſt certain that ſhe paſſionately deſired the death of this Queen, well underſtanding, that her Life was moſt appoſite to her moſt delicate Intereſts. She could not be ignorant that Mary Stuart had right to the Crown of England, and that ſhe uſurped it; ſhe could not be ignorant, that in a General Aſſembly of the States of England, ſhe was declared to be a Baſtard, as being derived from a Marriage made and conſummated againſt all Laws, both Divine and humane. She obſerved that her Throne did not ſubſiſt but by the Faction of Hereſie; and as her Crown was firſt eſtabliſhed by diſorder, ſo according to her Policy it muſt be cemented by bloud. She could not deny, but that the Queen of Scotland had a Title to the Crown, which inſenſibly might fall on the head of the Priſoner; and then that in a moment ſhe might change the whole face of the State. She obſerved her to be a Queen of a vaſt ſpirit, of an unſhaken Faith, and of an excellent Virtue, who had received the Unction of the Realm of Scotland, and who was Queen Dowager of the Kingdom of France, ſupported by the Pope, reverenced throughout all Chriſtendom, and regarded by the Catholicks as a ſacred ſtock, from which new branches of Religion ſhould ſpring, which no Ax of perſecution could cut down.

The Hereticks in England, who feared her as one that would puniſh their offences, and deſtroy their Fortunes, which they had builded on the ruins of Religion, had not a more earneſt deſire then to ſee her out of the world. All things conſpired to overthrow this poor Princeſs, and nothing remained but to give a colour to ſo bold a murder.

It ſo fell out, that in the laſt years of her afflicting impriſonment, a conſpiracy was plotted againſt the Eſtate, and the life of Elizabeth, as Cambden doth recite it.

Ballard an Engliſh Prieſt, who had more zeal to his Religion, then diſcretion to manage his enterprize, conſidered with himſelf how this woman had uſurped a Scepter, which did not appertain unto her. How ſhe had overthrown all the principles of the ancient Religion, how ſhe had kept in priſon an innocent Queen, for the ſpace of twenty years, uſing her with all manner of indignity, how ſhe continually practiſed new butcheries by the effuſion of the bloud of the Catholicks, he conceived it would be a work of Juſtice, to procure her death who held our purſes in her hand, and our liberty in a chain. But I will not approve of thoſe bloudy Counſels, which do provide a Remedy far worſe then the diſeaſe, and infinitely do trouble the Eſtate of Chriſtendom.

Nevertheleſs, he drew unto him many that were of his opinion, who did offer and devote themſelves to give this fatal blow. The chiefeſt amongſt them, was one Babington, who was deſcended of an Honourable Family, of a great ſpirit, and of a knowledge above his age, and very zealous on the Catholick Religion. His example made many others to imbark themſelves in that ſame dangerous deſign. Some propounded to themſelves the hopes of a great reward, others were carried on by glory, and ſome were tranſported to it by a hate to evil doers. It is no way to be believed (as I ſhall make it appear) that the Queen of Scotland, had any hand in the deſign. For, beſides the tenderneſs of her conſcience, ſhe had a wiſdom exerciſed by long experience, which made her eaſily to apprehend the weakneſs of that party, who were young men, heady, and inconſiderable, who had not learned to conceal a ſecret, which is the firſt knot that confirmeth great affairs. They carried their hearts on their lips, and being not content to make a noiſe of their deſign in Taverns, they cauſed it to be painted in a Table, with devices to it, as the Authours of liberty, and in fooliſh vanity did ſhow it to one another. Babington could not contain it ſelf from writing to the Queen in priſon, and the Letter being brought to the hands of her Secretaries, Nau and Curles, they did not communicate it to their Miſtriſs, well knowing, that the witneſs of her unblemiſhed ſpirit, would never ſympathize with ſuch violent Counſels, but when they perceived that Babington in the ſaid letter had given information of the conference he had with Ballard, and that ſix Gentlemen were choſen to put the Tragical deſign in Execution, and that one hundred more were to releaſe the Queen from her impriſonment, they thought they would not neglect the occaſion, and therefore they wrote an anſwer to the Letter, making uſe of the Queens name, ſhe having no knowledge of it: In this Letter they praiſed Babington for his zeal zeal to the Catholick religion, and to the sacred person of their Lady, who was the supportress of it. They did advertise him to take consideration with him in this enterprise, and to make a strong association amongst them, who were to be the Actours and the Authours, and to attempt nothing before they had assurance of aid from forreign parts, and withall to stir up some new troubles in Ireland, before they gave this blow in England. They advised him to draw unto his party the Earl of Arundel, and his Brothers, and others named in the letter, they did also prescribe a means for the deliverance of the Queen, either by overturning one of her Caroaches at the gate, or by setting on fire some Rooms belonging to her Querries in the Castle, or to take her away, when shee took horse to refresh her self; in the conclusion, they did exhort him to promise great rewards to the six Gentlemen, and to all the rest.

Babington, presuming it was the Queen, who by this letter treated with him, became most vainly glorious, he incouraged his Companions, shewing the letter to the most apparent of them, and was inflamed with a desire to execute the design. They were so transported with the vanity of it, that though they did shut their eyes against the danger, yet they did open their mouths to discover the secret, which was communicated to so many of their accomplices, that the multitude of the conspiratours did make abortive the conspiracy. They declared it to one Gifford, a pernicious and a luxurious man, who being charged with a Commission to keep safe their letters, did carry them all to Walsingham, the Secretary to the Queen of England, who opened them, and sounding the whole progress of their designs, did with much dexterity make them fast again. The last written by Babington, with the answer of the Secretaries, in the name of Queen Mary, was carried to Elizabeth, and to her Counsel who shewed an exceeding joy for the discovery. She caused the conspiratours to be apprehended, and Babington among the foremost, who being demanded the Question, did immediately confess that he had treated with the Queen of Scotland on that subject, in which he spoke truly as he thought, though he did not speak the truth.

After they were all examined and condemned, they were executed with most cruel punishments, the extremity whereof did strike a horrour into those who did condemn them.

The Proceſs against the Queen of Scotland.

13. It was so decreed, that a passage must be made through the entrails of many bodies, to come unto Queen Maries bloud. Shee that knew of nothing what was done, did continue very quiet in the languishment of her captivity, when behold, she suddenly found her self confined to a close imprisonment, her Guards doubled, her Secretaries apprehended, her papers taken away, and her Coyn confiscated, with a labouring expectation she did attend to know the reason of it, when behold a letter from the Queen of England, which imparted that she had given a Commission to her Counsellers of Estate, to hear her in judgment upon Fact, with which she was accused. Having read it, with a Majestick countenance, and a spirit full of the height of understanding, she spake to those that gave it her.

I Am much afflicted that my most dear Sister the Queen, hath been so ill informed of me, and that having been so many years most strictly guarded, and withall nummed in my limbs, the many fair conditions which I have offered for my liberty, have been always neglected, and my self abandoned. I have sufficiently advertised her of divers dangers, and yet she never would believe me, but hath always undervalued me, although I am most near unto her in bloud. I have too truly foreseen that any accident that did arrive, either within or without this Kingdome, would be interpreted to proceed from me, and that I should be made guilty enough, because I am so miserable. As for his letter, I do look upon it as a strange thing, that any Queen should command me, as her Subject, to appear in judgment. I am of my self an absolute Queen, and will do nothing to the prejudice of Royal Majesty, my courage is not yet abated, nor will I ever stoop unworthily under my calamity.

Her answer was drawn up in writing, which in these terms she had pronounced, and the same day the Chancellour, and the Treasurer came to her, and declared what power they had given them in their Commission, and desired her gently to hear the Facts with which she was charged, otherwise they both could, and would proceed against her for contempt. To which she made answer, That she was no Subject, and that she had rather die a thousand times, then by such an acknowledgment to bring a prejudice to Royal Majesty. She admonished them, if after having condemned her before hand, they came now unto her to make a semblance of observing some formality in Justice, to consult with their own consciences, and to remember, that the Theatre of the world is of a larger extent then England. The Commissioners did not cease to insist, and represent unto her the Tenour of their Commission, with their own Names. On which she demanded by what Law they would proceed against her, the Canon Law, or the Civil Law, and because she knew very well that they were no great Lawyers, she conceived it would be requisite that some should be sent for from the Universities in Europe. They replied, That she should be tried by the Civil Law of England, in which they were sufficiently experienced. But she, who well observed, that they would intangle her with a new Law on purpose against her, made answer; you are gallant Gentlemen, and can make what Laws you please, but I am not bound to submit unto them, since you your selves in another case refuse to be subjected to the Salick Law of France. Your Law hath no more of Example, then your proceeding hath of Justice.

On this, Hatton, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen of England, advanced himself, and said unto her: You are accused for conspiring the ruine of our Mistris, who is an anointed Queen. Your degree is not exempted to answer for such a Crime, neither by the Law of Nations nor of nature. If you are innocent, you are unjust to your Reputation to indeavour to evade the judgment. The Queen will be very glad that you can justifie your self, for she hath assured me, that she never in the world received more disconent, then to find you charged with this accusation. Forbear this vain consideration of Royalty, which at this present serves for nothing. Cause the suspitions to cease, and wipe away the stain, which otherwise will cleave for ever to your reputation. She replied, I refuse not to answer before the States of the Realm being lawfully called, because I have been acknowledged to be a presumed Heir of the Kingdom. Then will I speak, not as a subject, but in another nature, without submitting my self to the new Ordinance of your Commission, which is known to be nothing else but a

Malicious

Malicious Net, made to inwrap my innocence. The Treasurer on this, did interrupt her, and said: We will then proceed to the contempt, to which she made answer; Examine your own consciences, and provide for your Honours, and so God render to you, and your Children, as you shall do, in the judgment.

The next morning, she called one of the Commissioners, and demanded if her Protestation were committed to writing. And if it were, she would justifie her self without any prejudice to the Royal Dignity. Whereupon the Commissioners did presently assemble themselves in the Chamber of presence, where they prepared a Scaffold, on the upper end whereof, was the Seat-Royal under a Cloath of State, to represent the Majesty of Queen Elizabeth, and on the one side of it a Chair of Crimson-Velvet prepared for her. The courageous Queen did enter with a modest and an assured countenance amongst the stern Lords, thirsting after her bloud, and took her place. Bromley the Chancellour, turning towards her, did speak in these words:

The most illustrious Queen of England, being assured, not without an extreme anguish of spirit, that you have conspired the destruction of her, of the Realm of England, and of Religion, to quit her self of her duty, and not to be found wanting to God, her self, and her people, hath without any malice of heart established those Commissioners to hear the things of which you are accused, how you will resolve them, and shew your innocency.

This man who had spoken ill enough, had the discretion to speak but little: And immediately as he had given the signal, the perverse Officers, who were more then fourty in number, did throw themselves upon her like so many Mastives on a prey, propounding a thousand captious questions to surprize her, but the generous AMAZON did shake them off with an incredible vivacity. In the end, all things were reduced to the Letter of Babington, in which he gave her notice of the conspiracy, and to the answer which she made to it, exhorting him to pursue his Design, but most of all to the dispositions of her own Secretaries, who gave assurances that she did dictate the said Letter, as also other Letters to forreign Princes, to invade England with Arms. They did press her on these falsities, which seemed to carry some probability with them, but she did answer invincibly to them, as most clearly may appear by those terms, which I have drawn from her several answers, and tied them together to give more light to her Apology, wherein the clearness of her understanding and her judgment is most remarkable.

The invincible Apology of the Queen.

IF the Queen, my Sister, hath given you a Commission to see Justice done, it is reasonable that you should begin it, rather by the easing of my sufferings, then by the oppressing of my innocence. I came into England, to implore succour against the Rebellion of my Subjects. My Bloud, Alliance, Sex, Neighbourhood, and the Title which I bear of a Queen, did promise me all satisfaction, and here I have met with my greatest affliction. This is the twentieth year that I have been detained Prisoner, without cause, without reason, without mercy (and which is more) without hope. I am no Subject of your Mistrisses, but a free and an absolute Queen, and ought not to make answer but to God alone, the Sovereign Judge of my Actions, or bring any prejudice to the character of Royal Majesty, either in my Son, the King of Scotland, or his Successours, nor other Sovereign Princes of the earth. This is the Protestation which I have made, and which I repeat again in your presence, before I make any answer to the Crimes which are imposed on me.

The blackest of all the Calumnies, do charge me for having conspired the Death of my most dear Cosin; and after many circumventions, all the proofs are reduced to the Letter of Babington, the Deposition of my Secretaries, and my Sollicitations made to forreign Princes to invade England with Arms. I will answer effectually to all these Articles, and make the justice of my Cause most clearly appear to those, who shall without passion look upon it. And in the first place, I swear and protest, that I never saw this Babington, who is made the principal in this Charge, I never received any Letter from him, neither had he any Letter from me. I have always abhorred these violent and black counsels, which tended to the ruine of Queen Elizabeth, and I am ready to produce Letters from those, who having had some evil enterprize, have excused themselves, that they have discovered nothing to me, because they were assured that my spirit was opposite to such Designs. I could not know what Babington or his Accomplices have done, being a Prisoner, he might write what he pleased, but I am certain that I never saw nor heard of any Letter to me. And if there be found any Answer written by me to those things, which never so much as came into my imagination, it is an abominable forgery. We live not in an Age, nor a Realm, that is to learn the trade to deceive. I am informed that Walsingham, one amongst you, who hath conspired my death, and the death of my Son, doth make use of such Artifices, and hath counterfeited a Letter from me, in answer to that of Babington's, which he intercepted. The other innocently believed it, and took his oath that it came from me, but all this is no more then one simple conjecture. There should be a million of witnesses, more clear then the rays of the Sun, to impeach a Sovereign Queen, who comprehends within her Authority so many millions of lives. And a man unknown, a man half dead, is believed against me, who spake all that he knew, and that he knew not, to deliver himself from the horrible cruelties of his Examiners. Let them produce but one Letter of my hand, one shadow of the crime, and I will yield my self convinced. I speak it in the sincerity of my heart, and of the tears of my eys, I would not conquer a Kingdom with the bloud of the vilest person picked out of the scum of the people, much less with the bloud of a Queen. I will never make a shipwrack of my Soul, in conspiring the ruin of a person, to whom I have vowed so much honour and friendship.

For my Secretaries, I did always take them for honest men: if they do charge me, and accuse me in their Depositions, to have dictated an Answer to Babington's Letter, they have committed two great faults, the first in violating the Oath which they have made to be secret and faithful to their Mistris. The second, in inventing so detestable a Calumny against her, to whom they ow all Reverence and Fidelity. In a manner all the belief that you draw from them, doth amount to no more, then that it comes from perfidious men. O good God, In what a desperate condition is the Majesty and the safety of Princes, if they depend upon the Writings and the Witnesses of their their Secretaries, in affairs of so high a consequence. How many are of them, who prostitute themselves to the uncertainty of riches? How many of them for fear onely, do comply with the menaces of the great-ones. They are men of Fortune, who follow the ebb and flow of Inconstancy. If those poor men have taken their Oaths, as you say, it was onely to deliver themselves from the horrour of your torments, and put all upon the crowned head of a Queen, which they thought was inaccessible to your Commissions.

But what Lawyers are you, to put Babington to death without bringing him before me face to face? To open his mouth by torments to tell a lie, and then to shut it up for ever against the Truth? If my Secretaries are yet alive, let them come into my presence, and I assure my self that they will not persist in that Deposition, which you object against me. Doth it not easily appear, that you proceed here on a bad Rule, and that you borrow these poor Formalities, to give some slight tincture to your pre-judgings?

I never did dictate any thing to my servants, but what Nature did suggest unto me, for the recovering of my liberty. This is the third Objection of your Process. And I demand of you, if I have not committed a great crime, to desire a benefit which every common voice doth teach us, which the laws do approve, which all men do practise, which Nature prompts the Nightingales, and every little Bird unto, that are imprisoned in their Cages: what can he do less that sees himself in irons, but implore the assistance of his friends, and desire, that some strong hand of mercy might open the prison for him. I confess I have had the desire of liberty, but I deny that I sought the effect thereof by that means which you alledge. It is a strange thing that a Prisoner, all whose actions are spied into, and every step she treads is counted, should do the affair which great Sovereigns, though of a free and most absolute power, could not remove. So many years are now passed, since I have been, as it were, in the chains of miserable captivity; yet neither the offers which I have made, nor the assurances which I have given, nor the increase of my sickness, nor the declining of my age, could move my Sister to my inlargement. Have I not offered to contract a strict Friendship with her, to cherish her, to respect her above all the Princes in Christendom, to forget all offences, to acknowledge her the true and legitimate Queen of England, submitting all my Rights to the benefit of her peace, neither to pretend to, nor take any part of the Crown during her life, and to remove both the Title and the Arms of the Kingdom of England, which I did attribute to my self by the commandment of Henry the Second, King of France. And yet all these submissions have prevailed nothing for my Deliverance. Am I so much to be blamed, if I have desired forreign Princes, my Friends, and my Allies, to draw me out from the depth of these miseries? And yet neither have, nor was ever willing to confirm into the hands of the King of Spain, the Right which he pretended to the Crown of England, although he hath been angry with me concerning it; but I have given respect unto my Sister so far, that I have neglected both my life and liberty, to satisfie her interests, and have delighted my self with the prayers of Esther, and not with the sword of Judith. But I now speak and declare, that since England is inequitable and so unkind unto me, that I neither ought, nor will misprise the aid of other Kings.

I have here sincerely declared my thoughts and my counsels to you on this Accusation; and if Right and Equity must give way to Power, and Force must oppress the Truth amongst men, I do appeal to the living God, who hath an absolute Empire of command over Elizabeth and my self. I swear unto you by God, and protest unto you on my honour, that for this long time, I have had my thoughts on no Kingdome, but onely that of Heaven, which I look on as the haven after my long sufferings. I believe I have now satisfied all your Objections: and you know indeed in your own conscience, that nothing doth charge me, but my birth, nor render me guilty but my Religion. But I will not deny, that to which by Gods goodness I am born, nor remove the character which I received in the day of my Baptism. I have lived, and I will die a Catholick. It is the crime alone, for which I need no Advocate to defend me, in which I desire all the world to be my witnesse, and fear not the severest Judges.

The poor Princess did mingle these words with her tears, foreseeing the persecution of her friends, and considering how barbarously her Royal Dignity was exposed to the Advocates of the Palace, who did all seem to have sworn her death. However in their consciences they were touched to the quick, because that what she represented, was most true, even by the report of the Hereticks themselves, as it appeareth in the Book of Cambden, who hath wrote the Life of Elizabeth, and who doth not deny, but that Walsingham did open and make up the letters again, which Gifford brought him, counterfeiting in them what he thought good. And he himself confesseth, that it was the judgment of the most rational men, that the Secretaries of the Queen of Scotland, were seduced and corrupted with mony. And it is certain, that they demanded a Recompence of Walsingham, who told them, that they ought to content themselves with their lives: And added, that in condemning their Mistriss without producing the Witnesses, they had not proceeded according to the Rules of Justice. Observe here the judgment of the Huguenots themselves, her most cruel Enemies: I speak of those who have some sparks of a good conscience, and not of those Incendiaries, who write Rapsodies full of ignorance and folly. All this may serve for an invincible proof of her innocence; but her evil Judges, who had sold themselves to iniquity, did not cease to proceed further, even to the Sentence of Condemnation, which they carried to the Queen of England, and was presented to the Parliament for the publication of it.

Camden pag. 493.

Amazum-sium absen-sium, qui pretio cor-rupti vide-bantur, te-stimonia op-pressa est.

The unjust judgment.

Thither Elizabeth did come in person, with a studied Speech, where she gave thanks to God for the Deliverance from this danger, and thanks to her Subjects for the affection to their Queen. Afterwards, coming to the work in hand, she shewed her self to be extremely afflicted for the Queen of Scotland, that a Person of her Sex, Estate, and Bloud, should be convicted to have conspired against her: Adding, that she was most willing to pardon her, and to abandon her own life, if it would render the affairs of England more flourishing; but in this effect she would neither prejudice her self, nor the good of her Kingdom.

In this action she came with a heart full of vengeance, however she would put upon it the reputation of Sweetness and of Clemency, imitating the Herods and Tiberius Cæsar, who never did worse, then when they spake best and laughed in their hearts, hearts, when they diſtilled the tears of Crocodiles from their eyes. With joyned hands ſhe deſired that her Parliament would but demand that thing of her, which moſt willingly ſhe would not grant. Sometimes ſhe would flatter them with the Reſpect and cordial Affections they did bear her, on purpoſe to incite them to purſue this buſineſs. Sometimes ſhe ſeemed to be weary of their too much zeal: Sometimes ſhe ſaid, ſhe would preſerve her ſelf: And ſometimes ſhe ſaid, ſhe would abandon her own preſervation, to exerciſe her clemency. Her ſpirit, which was greatly given to diſſimulation, made never more leaps, nor danced more Rounds then in this buſineſs. And to ſpeak the truth, ſhe perplexed her ſelf in her own labyrinth, and endeavouring too much to hide her ſelf, ſhe laid her ſelf more open, ſaying, unto thoſe who demanded the death of the Queen of Scotland:

I pray and conjure you to content your ſelf with an Anſwer without an Anſwer, I approve your judgment and comprehend the reaſons, but I pray you excuſe the fearful and the doubtful thought which doth torment me, and take in good part the gracious affection which I bear you; and this Anſwer, if it be of that worth as you eſteem it for an anſwer, If I ſay I will not do what you demand, peradventure I ſhall ſay more then I think: If that I will do it, I ſhall precipitate my ſelf to my ruine, whom you are willing to preſerve

In the end the ſentence of Death was confirmed by the Authority of Parliament, and Beal was ſent to the Queen of Scotland, to carry her the news of her mournful Condemnation, and to acquaint her, that the Eſtates demanded the Execution to be diſpatched for Juſtice, Security, and Neceſſity.

Her great heart was no way dejected at this ſo violent a Rigour, and damnable Injuſtice, but lifting up her eyes and her hands to Heaven, ſhe gave thanks to God, demanding immediately a Prieſt to adminiſter to her the Sacrament, and to diſpoſe her to dy. Paulet, who had the guard of her, did uſe her after this, moſt barbarouſly, commanding the Officers of her houſe to beat down the cloth of State that was in her chamber, but when he obſerved that no man would touch it, and that they onely anſwered him by tears and lamentations, which would have ſoftened the heart of any man, he performed the Execution by the Guard, and took from the poor Priſoner all the marks of Royalty, to make her behold her Funeral alive, and to make her heart to bleed with a mortal wound, before the bloud were drawn from the veins of her body by the hands of the Hang-man. But Elizabeth did yet defer the Execution, whether it were for the fear of forreign Princes being not able to ſee clear enough into their power and protection, or whether it were to gain the imaginary Reputation of Mercy, or whether by degrees ſhe would conſume this poor ſacrifice by a ſmall fire, prolonging the languors of her impriſonment. The other was reſolved to write unto her, not in a baſe and begging ſtile to crave her life, but to demand an honeſt Burial. Behold her letters to that effect.

Executable indignity.

MADAM

I Give thanks to God with all my heart, who by the Sentence of Death, hath been pleaſed to put an end to the tedious pilgrimage of my life. I deſire not that it may be prolonged, having had too long a time to try the bitterneſs of it. I onely beſeech your Majeſty, that ſince I am to expect no favour from ſome zealous Miniſters of State, who hold the firſt place in your Councils, I may receive from You onely, and from no other, theſe following favours.

In the firſt place I deſire, that ſince it is allowed me to hope for a Burial in England, according to the Solemnities of the Roman Church, practiſed by the ancient Kings, your Anceſtours and mine; and that in Scotland they have forced & violated the Aſhes of my Grand-fathers, that my Body (when my Adverſaries ſhall be ſatiated with my innocent bloud) may be carried by my own ſervants, into ſome holy Land; and above all, if it may be, into France, to be there interred where the Bones of the Queen, my moſt honoured Mother, are lodged, to the end my poor body, which knew no reſt, whiles joyned to my ſoul, might now find reſt, being ſeparated from it.

Secondly, I beſeech Your Majeſty (in the apprehenſion which I have of the tyranny of thoſe, to Whoſe power You abandon me) that I may not ſuffer in any private place, but in the view of my ſervants and other people, who may give a teſtimony of my faith, and of my obedience to the true Church, and defend the remnant of my life, and my laſt ſighs, againſt the falſe Reports which my Adverſaries may contrive againſt me.

In the third place, I require that my ſervants, who have attended on me with great fidelity, during ſo many afflictions, may have free leave to retire where they pleaſe and enjoy thoſe ſmall legacies, which in my laſt will my poverty hath bequeathed to them.

I conjure You, Madam, by the Bloud of Jeſus Chriſt, by the nearneſs of our conſanguinity, by the Memory of Henry the ſeventh, our common Father, and by the title of a Queen, which I carry to my Grave; not to deny me theſe reaſonable Demands, but by one word under Your hand, to grant me an aſſurance of them, and I ſhall dy, as I have lived,

Your moſt affectionate Siſter and Priſoner,

QUEEN MARY

It is uncertain whether this Letter came to the hands of Elizabeth, becauſe no Anſwer can be found unto it, whether it were that thoſe next unto her did conceal it from her, or whether through the hardneſs of her heart ſhe did diſſemble it.

The vain endeavour to delay the death.

In the mean time King James employed himſelf for the Deliverance of his Mother, the Ambaſſadours from France, Monſieur de la Mote Aigron, and Monſieur del Aubiſpine, were commanded thither upon that and other occaſions, and Monſieur de Belieurs did there alſo carry himſelf with great Wiſdom, Courage and Fidelity, as may appear by his grave Remonſtrance, which is to be read in the Hiſtory of France. Howſoever, the Arreſt of Death was ſuſpended for three months, until ſuch time that the clamours of the Lutherans and Puritans, did cauſe the Thunder to fall down upon that hand, which deſired nothing more, then to ſtrike home the blow.

The more adviſed did remonſtrate unto her, That it was without example, to commit a Lady, the Queen of France and Scotland, and the neareſt Kinſwoman ſhe had in the world, into the hands of a Hang-man: A Queen, which was not a priſoner of War, but her Gueſt, whom ſhe had called and invited into her Kingdom, and ſent unto her aſſurances of her fidelity. That ſhe ought to conſider, that what was done, proceeded from her Secretaries, and not from her. That if that after twenty years impriſonment, ſhe ſhould have conſented to be taken from it by force, it did not deſerve to be punished with Death. That if she should cause her to dy, it would open a wound, fromwhence there would issue such abundance of bloud, that many Ages could not stanch it. That Italy, France, and Spain, and all the Christian Kingdoms of the world would be offended at it, and that she should bring upon her Kingdom the Arms of Christendom, who would be glad of that pretence, to invade her Kingdom. That it would be a most remarkable affront to her Son James, and all his Race, who could not but be mindful of it. That it would incense the spirits of her Kingdom, and render them unreconcileable to her. And in the end, that it was to be feared that Heaven would arm it self against so bloudy a Design. That she should use the miserable (and especially a Queen who came into her Countrey for protection) with more Reverence. That she should hazard much in her death, but could lose nothing by her life, seeing she had so many Guards, Prisons, Bars, and Walls to secure her if she had an intent to enterprise against the State.

But the insolent Ministers did incessantly cry out, That she must put an end to her Imprisonment, by putting an end unto her Life. That the Queen ought to remember, that she had usurped her Titles and her Name, and sometimes caused her self to be proclamed Queen of England and of Scotland, and that Sovereigns never pardoned those, who did so far intrench upon their Authority. That the life of Elizabeth and Mary were incompatible. That the onely means to take away all pretences from the Catholicks, was to cut off this root, which would make all her hopes to perish. That King James was instructed in their Religion, and would rather look after the advancement of his own State, then take vengeance for the Death of his Mother. That forreign Princes were too much perplexed with the difficulties of their own affairs, and took care, rather to defend their own, then to invade her Kingdom. That her Cousin, the Duke of Guise, was in a bad condition in France; and that Henry the Third would be very careful how he did espouse her quarrels. And if other Princes were so hardy to undertake it, they were to understand, that England had a deep ditch about it. That Queen Elizabeth was mortal, and if she should dy, there was not that calamity to be conceived, which both Religion & the State would not suffer under the reign of Mary, in the revenge of her Imprisonment, and other injuries she had received. That she could not but remember, that great personages did write things well done on the sand; but did engrave their Discontents in Brass. The Preachers made it to be a work of Religion, with their absurd Allegations out of the Bible, which they did corrupt to their bloudy meaning. And the Lawyers, as ignorant as the Ministers, were absurd, did produce some Histories for the punishment of Kings, which were altogether impertinent.

But there needed not so much labour to perswade a Woman, who had in her so much vanity, as once in her life, to make a Princess head to fly upon a Scaffold, and who did not remember, that in the Reign of Queen Mary, being her self accused of offending the Estate, and expecting her sentence of death, she did so much fear the Axes of the Hang-men in England, that she was resolved to petition to her Sister to send for an Executioner to France, to cut off her head. Now was the Commandment given for her death, and it was signified to the poor Victim, who for a long time, was prepared for this Sacrifice.

Some passionate writers, do endeavour to divert this Crime from the reputation of Elizabeth, taking their ground on a Letter which she wrote to the Queen of Scotland, in which by a shameful perfidiousness, she doth write, That her spirit was tormented with an incomparable sorrow, by reason of the lamentable event, which was arrived against her will; and that she had not a soul so base, as either by terrour to fear to do what was just, or by cowardize to deny it, after it was done.

But who doth not see that this is to mock, and to traduce the story, and the belief of mankind; Davison, her Secretary, who managed this sad affair, as the true instrument of her malice, doth express in his Attestation, reported in the most faithful Memorials of England by Cambden; that after the departure of the French Ambassadour, sent to prevent the Execution, she commanded him to shew the Instrument for putting the Queen of Scotland to death, which being done, she most readily signed it with her own hand, and commanded him to see it sealed with the Great Seal; and smiling, she added some few words, that she blamed Paulet and Drury, who guarded the Prisoner, for not delivering her from that pain. Elizabeth entirely culpable of the death of Queen Mary.

It is true, that in the morning she sent one named Killigrew, to Davison, to forbid to put that command in Execution, whether it were that her Remorse of Conscience had put her into some frights, her sleeps being ordinarily disturbed with horrible Dreams, which did represent unto her the images of her Crimes, or whether it were an artifice to procure her the reputation of being merciful, in killing with so much treachery. The Secretary came to her in the field, and declared to her, that the Order for the Queen of Scotland's death, was now finished and sealed, on which she put on the countenance of displeasure, and told him, that by the Counsel of wise men, one might find out other expedients, by which it is believed, that she intended poison. Nevertheless, she now was commanded that the Execution should be delayed, And as Davison presented himself to her three dayes afterward, demanding of her if her Majesty had changed her advice, she answered, No, and was angry with Paulet for not enterprising boldly enough the last of the Crimes; And said moreover, That she would find others who would do it, for the love they did bear unto her. On which, the other did remonstrate, that she must think well of him, for otherwise she would ruine Men of great Merit with their posterity. She still persisted and on the very same day of the Execution, she did chide the Secretary for being so slow in advancing her Commands, who as soon as he had discovered the affair, the evil Counsellours did pursue the expedition with incredible heat; for they sent Beal, a Capital Enemy of the Catholicks, with letters directed to certain Lords, in which, power was given them to proceed unto the Massacre; who immediately repairing to the Castle of Fotheringhey, where the Queen was prisoner, they caused her to rise from her bed, where the indisposition of her body had laid her, and having read unto her their Commission, they did advertise her, that she must dy on the morning following.

16. She received this without changing of her countenance, and said:

That

Her death and miraculous constancy.

That she did not think that the Queen, her Sister, would have brought it to that extremity; But since such was her pleasure, death was most agreeable to her, and that a Soul was not worthy of celestial and eternal joyes, whose body could not endure the stroke of the Hang-man. For the rest, she appealed to Heaven and Earth, who were the witnesses of her Innocence; adding, that the onely Consolation which she received in a spectacle so ignominious, was, that she died for the Religion of her Fathers, she beseeched God to increase her constancy to the measure of her afflictions, and to welcome the death she was to suffer for the expiation of her sins.

After she spake these words, she besought the Commissioners to permit her to confer with her Confessour, which by a barbarous cruelty was refused, a cruelty which is not exercised on the worst of all offenders; and in the place, for a Directour of her conscience, they gave her for her comforters the Bishop and the Dean of Peterborough whom with horrour she rejected, saying, That God should be her Comforter. The Earl of Kent, who was one of the Commissioners, and most hot in the persecution of her, told her: Your life will be the death, and your death will be the life of our Religion. Declaring in that sufficiently the cause of her death; whereupon she gave thanks to God, that she was judged by her Enemies themselves, to be judged an instrument capable to restore the antient Religion in England. In this particular she desired, that the Protestants had rather blamed her effects, then her designs.

After the Lords were retired, she began to provide for her last day, as if she had deliberated on some voyage; and this she did with so much devotion, prudence and courage, that a Religious man, who hath had all his Meditations on death for thirty years together, could not have performed it with greater Justice. And in the first place, she commanded that supper should be dispatched, to advise of her affairs; and according to her custom, supping very soberly, she entertained herself on a good discourse, with a marvellous tranquillity of mind. And amongst other things, turning herself to Burgon, her Physitian, she demanded of him, if he did not observe how great was the power of the Truth, seeing the sentence of her death did import, that she was condemned for having conspired against Elizabeth; and the Earl of Kent did signify that she died for the apprehension which they had, that she should be the death of the false Religion, which would be rather her glory, then a punishment.

At the end of supper, she drank to all Servants with a grave and modest chearfulness on which they all kneeled down, and mingled so many tears with their wine, that it was lamentable to behold. As soon as their sobs had given liberty to their words, they asked her pardon for not performing those services, which her Majesty did merit; and she (although she was the best Mistris that ever was under heaven) desired all the world to pardon her defects. She comforted them with an invincible courage, and commanded them to wipe away their tears, & to rejoyce, because she should now depart from an abyss of misery; and assured them, that she never would forget them, neither before God, nor men.

After supper, she worte three Letters, one to the King of France, one to the Duke of Guise, and the third, unto her Confessor. Behold, the Letter in its own terms, which she wrote unto King Henry the Third.

SIR,

A Letter unto Henry the Third.

GOD, as with all humility I am bound to believe, having permitted, that for the expiation of my sins, I should cast my self into the Arms of this Queen, my Cousin, having endured for above twenty years the afflictions of imprisonment, I am in the end, by her, and her Estates condemned unto death. I have demanded that they should restore the papers which they have taken from me, the better to perfect my last Will and Testament; and that according to my desire, my body should be transported into your Kingdom, where I have had the Honour to be a Queen, your Sister, and ancient Allie; but as my sufferings are without comfort, so my requests are without answer. This day after dinner they signified unto me the sentence to be executed the next day about seven of the clock in the morning, as the most guilty offender in the world. I cannot give you the discourse at large of what is passed, It shall please your Majesty to believe my Physitian, and my servants, whome I conceive to be worthy of credence. I am wholly disposed unto death, which in this Innocence I shall receive with as much mispriſion, as I have attended it with patience. The Right, which my birth doth give me to the realm of England, and the Catholick Religion, are the causes of my Condemnation, although they disguise them, as much as they are able, by their Calumnies. They have taken from me my Almoner, and deprived me of the consolation of the Sacrament, which I intended at my death, pressing me with all violence of importunity, to receive the assistance and the Doctrine of their Ministers, but I will never do any thing that shall be unworthy of my Birth, or my Religion. These, who shall conveigh unto you the last sighs of my life, shall assure you of my constancy. It remains that I beseech you (since you have always protested to have loved me) to render to me the proofs of your charity, to pray to God for a most Christian Queen, who dieth a Catholick, as she hath lived, and to command, that some reward may be given to my dear Servants, for I depart this world, deprived of all worldly goods. As for my Son, I recommend him to you as far as he shall deserve, for I cannot answer for him. I have assumed the boldness to send you two stones, which are very rare for health, which I wish you may finde perfect and happy in a long life; you shall receive them from your most affectionate Sister-in-Law, who dieth in giving you the last testimonies of her heart. I recommend again my desolate Servants to you, and If your majesty shall bestow on me, wherewith to found a little Covent, and alms requisite to it for some who shall pray for me, you shall send my Soul unto God, enriched with more merits. This I, beseech you for the honour of Jesus Christ, whom near unto my death I pray unto for you, in the quality

SIR,

Your most affectionate

Sister-in-Law

QUEEN MARY.

I am of opinion, that the Letter, which made its addres to the Duke of Guise, was of the same substance. The Letter to her Confessour did import the Combats she had suffered for Religion, and the Zeal, which did transport her to die in the Catholick Faith, and that most cruelly she had been denied to make her last will, or to have her body transported, or to have permission to confess her ſelf. In defect whereof ſhe doth confeſs her ſins in General, as ſhe had intended to rehearſe them to him in particular. She deſired him to pray and to watch that night in ſpirit with her, and to ſend her his abſolution, and to preſcribe unto her the prayers which he thought moſt proper for her for that Night, and for the Morning following, adding, that if ſhe could ſee him at the hour of her ſuffering, ſhe would kneel down and take her leave of him, with a deſire of his Benediction. This being done, ſhe took a Re-view of her Teſtament, and cauſed the Inventory of her Goods to be read, and wrote down the Names of thoſe, to whom ſhe had beſtowed her Wardrope; ſhe alſo diſtributed mony to ſome with her own hand, afterwards being retired, ſhe ſpent the reſt of the Night in Watching and prayer. Others affirm, that having ſaid her Prayers, ſhe threw herſelf upon the Bed, and ſlept ſome hours very quietly, to make herſelf more ſtrong for the next days conflict. Afterwards awaking, ſhe began to enter into an Agony; and her naked Knees being humbled on the Ground, ſhe did read that Paſſion, to encourage herſelf to her laſt combat, mingling almoſt already her Tears and her Blood, with the Tears and Blood of her beſt Beloved: She paſſed many hours in Meditations, until ſhe had wearied two of her ſervants, whom ſhe commanded to take their reſt.

Her laſt day, which was on the twenty eighth of February, in the Year 1587. and on the eighteenth of February according to the Engliſh account, the Sun beginning to riſe, ſhe did put on thoſe habiliments, which ſhe did uſuall wear on Feſtival days, and having again aſſembled her Servants, ſhe cauſed her Teſtament to be read unto them, and deſired them to take in good part the ſmall Legacies which ſhe had given them, becauſe the condition of her Eſtate did not permit her to bequeath them greater. She gave them, all her laſt Farewell, exhorting them to the fear and love of their Creatour, to the preſervation of their Religion, and of concord amongſt themſelves, and deſired them to pray for the ſafety of her poor Soul. In the end ſhe kiſſed all the women, and permitted all the men to kiſs her hand. The Hall was filled with Cries, and Lamentations, and Sighs, and Sobs, and followed almoſt with an inundation of Tears, which they could not wipe away. But as ſhe had all her thought advanced to Heaven, ſhe retired herſelf again into her Oratory, where ſhe continued a long time, imploring the Grace of God with Sighs, and with the Groanings of a Dove, until that Thomas Andrews Lieutenant of that County, did ſignifie unto her that it was time to come forth.

She ſuddenly obeyed him, and came forth in a poſture full of Majeſty, and with a joyful Countenance. Her habit was moſt modeſt, her head was covered with a veyl, which hung down beneath her ſhoulders; She had a Chaplet at her Girdle, and an Ivory Crucifix in her hand. The Commiſſioners received her in the Gallery, where they did attend her. And Melvin her Steward did preſent himſelf before her, and weeping fell on his knees to underſtand her laſt commands.

Weep not, ſhe ſaid, but rather rejoyce, for this day you ſhall ſee Mary Stuart delivered from all her ſorrows. I conjure you to acquaint my Son, that I have always lived, and do die in the Catholick Religion, and that I do exhort him with all my heart to preſerve the Faith of his Anceſtours, to love Juſtice and to maintain his people in peace, and to enterpriſe nothing againſt the Queen of England. I have committed nothing againſt the Realm of Scotland, and I have alwayes loved the Kingdom of France. God pardon thoſe that do thirſt after my bloud, as the Hart panteth after the fountain of waters. Thou, O Lord, who art truth it ſelf, and ſoundeſt the deepeſt ſecrets of my heart, thou doſt know how much I have deſired peace, and the Union of the two Realms of England and Scotland.

Her Royal heart growing tender on her Son, on the conſideration of the cruelties and the perſecutions of the Catholick Church, and on the Indignities which moſt innocently ſhe ſuffered, her eyes poured down ſome tears of compaſſion, which ſhe ſuddenly wiped away. Then turning to the Lords, ſhe deſired that her poor Servants might, after her death, be uſed with humanity, that they might be ſuffered to enjoy thoſe poor Legacies which ſhe had given them in her Teſtament, that they might be ſuffered to aſſiſt her at her death, and afterwards be ſent ſafe into their Countryes upon the publick faith. The Inhumanity of the Earl of Kent would not permit that her own Servants ſhould aſſiſt her, and ſaid, They would but ſerve to increaſe Superſtition, but ſhe replyed; Fear it not, theſe poor miſerable creatures deſire nothing more then to give me my laſt Farewel, and I am confident that my ſiſter Elizabeth would not have refuſed me ſo ſmal a courteſie, ſeeing the Honour of my ſex demandeth that my ſervants ſhould be preſent. I am her near kinſwoman, Grand-child to Henry the eight, and Queen Dowager of France, beſides I have received the Unction of Queen of Scotland, if you will not grant this courteſie to one of my quality, let me have it at leaſt for the tenderneſs of the heart of men. On this conſideration five or ſix of her ordinary Servants, were permitted to accompany her to the place of Execution, to which ſhe now was going.

This divine Queen, whom France had ſeen to walk in ſuch ſtate and Triumph at the pomp of her marriage, when ſhe was followed with all the glory of that Kingdom, doth now alas go with this poor train to render her neck unto the Hangman. She came into the Hall hung round about with blacks, and aſcended the Scaffold, which was covered with the ſame livery, to accompliſh this laſt Act of her long Tragedy. What eyes of furies were not ſtruck blind at the aſpect of this face, in which the dying Graces did ſhoot for the laſt light of their ſhining Glories.

As ſoon as ſhe was ſate in a chair prepared for that purpoſe, one Beal did read the Command, and the outrageous Sentence of her death, which ſhe heard very peaceably, ſuppreſſing all the ſtrugglings of Nature, to abandon her ſelf to Grace in the imitation of her Saviour. At laſt Fletcher, the Dean of Peterborough, one of her evil Counſellours did preſent himſelf before her, and made a Pedantical Diſcourſe, on the life paſſed, the life preſent, and the life to come, undertaking, according to his power, to pervert her in this her laſt conflict. This was the moſt ſenſible to her of all her afflictions, at the laſt minute of her life to hear the ſtudied ſpeech of an impertinent and audacious Miniſter, wherefore ſhe oftentimes interrupted him, and beſought him not to importune her, aſſuring him, that ſhe was confirmed in the faith of the ancient Catholick and Roman Church, and was ready to ſhed her laſt bloud for it. Nevertheleſs this this infamous Doctour did not ceaſe to perſecute her with his Remonſtrances unto the ſhades of Death.

She looked round about the Hall, if ſhe could diſcover her Confeſſor, to demand of him the abſolution of her ſins, but he was ſo buſie that he could not be found. A poor Maid belonging to her, having thruſt her ſelf with all her force into the Croud, as ſoon as ſhe was got through them, and beheld her Miſtriſs between two Hang-men, did break forth into a loud cry, which troubled thoſe who were about the Queen to aſſiſt her. But the Queen, who had a ſpirit preſent on all occaſions, made a ſign unto her with her hand, that ſhe ſhould hold her peace, if ſhe had not a mind to be forced thence. The Lords then made a ſemblance as if they would pray for her, but ſhe thanked them heartily for their good will, ſaying, that it would be taken as a crime to communicate in prayers with them. Then turning to the multitude, who were about three hundred perſons, ſhe thus expreſſed her ſelf.

It is a new ſpectacle, to behold a Queen brought to dy upon a Scaffold. I have not learned to undreſs, to unveil my ſelf, and to put off the Royal Ornaments in ſo great a Company, and to have two Hang-men in the place of the Grooms of my Chamber. But we muſt ſubmit to what heaven is pleaſed to have done, and obey the Decrees of the Divine Providence.

I proteſt before the face of the living God, that I never attempted againſt the Life or Eſtate of my Couſin, neither have I committed any thing worthy of this uſage. If it be imputed to my Religion, I eſteem my ſelf moſt happy to ſhed even the laſt drop of my life for it. I put all my confidence in him, whom I ſee repreſented on this Croſs, which I hold in my hand, and I promiſe and aſſure my ſelf, that this temporal Death ſuffered for his Name, ſhall be a beginning to me of Eternal life, with the Angels and moſt happy Souls, who ſhall receive my bloud, and repreſent it before the face of God, in the remiſſion of all my Offences.

There was now a floud in every ey, and amongſt all her Enemies, there were not above four who were able to contain their tears. The Hang-man clothed in black velvet, fell down on his knees, and did demand her pardon, which ſhe moſt willingly granted, and not to him onely, but to all her perſecutours.

After theſe words, ſhe kneeled down her ſelf, praying aloud in Latin, and invoked the moſt holy Mother of God, and the triumphant Company of Saints to aſſiſt her. She repeated her moſt fervent prayers for the Church, for her Kingdom, for France, for her ſon, for her cruel murtherers, for England, for her Judges, and for her Executioner, recommending into the hands of the Saviour of the world her ſpirit, purified as well by love, as by affliction. The laſt words of her Prayers were theſe, As thy arms, Lord Jeſus, were ſtretched forth on the Croſs, ſo receive me into the ſtretched forth arms of thy mercy.

She unceſſantly kiſſed a Crucifix which ſhe had in her hand, whereat, one that ſtood by, being offended at the honour which ſhe gave unto the Croſs, told her, That ſhe ſhould carry it in her heart, to whom ſhe ſuddenly made anſwer; Both in my heart, and in my hand. After this ſhe diſpoſed her ſelf to the Block. The Executioner would have taken off her Gown, but ſhe repelled him, and deſired, that that office might be performed for her by her own maids who approched to her, to prepare her for the ſtroke of death. And ſhe her ſelf did accommodate them in it, as diligently as ſhe could, and laid open her neck and throat, more white then Alabaſter, & too much alas diſcovered for ſo lamentable a Subject. This being done, ſhe ſigned her own Attendants with the ſign of Croſs, kiſſing them, & with a ſhort ſmile, did bid them farewel, to ſhew, that ſhe died as comfortably as conſtantly, making no more reſiſtance, then the flower doth againſt the hand that doth gather it.

Thoſe poor creatures did weep moſt bitterly, & with their ſighs and ſobs could have cleaved the rocks, when the Queen reproved them, ſaying: Nay, what do you mean? Have I anſwered for your conſtancy, & that your grief ſhould not be importunate, and do you ſuffer your ſelves to be thus tranſported with lamentation, when I am going to exchange a temporal Kingdom, full of miſery, for an everlaſting Empire, filled with felicity?

It was diſcovered that ſhe had a Croſs about her of great value, which ſhe intended to have beſtowed on one of her neereſt friends, promiſing the Executioner to recompenſe him ſome other way; but this enemy of the Croſs did force it from her, to ſatisfy his avarice. And as ſhe had her eyes blinded, and was applying her ſelf to the block, ſhe began the Pſalm In te Domine ſperavi. In thee, Lord, have I hoped: and amongſt thoſe ſacred words, In manus tuas, into thy hands; which ſhe again and again, and divers times repeated: the Executioner trembling, and indiſpoſed, made one ſtroke with his Ax, and inſtead of her neck, the Ax fell higher, and cutting off ſome part of her Coyf, it made a grievous wound on the hinder part of her head, whereupon readily diſpatching two ſtrokes more, the Executioner took up the head from the body, and ſhewed it openly, all pale, and bloudy, as it was, yet ſtill carrying in her eclipſed eyes the attractives of that brave Soul, which now did ceaſe to animate her body, and with a horrible voice he pronounced, Long live Queen Elizabeth, and ſo let the enemies of the Goſpel periſh, which words the Dean repeated, and the Earl of Kent applauded, when all the world beſides them were in tears.

The bloud was collected in ſilver Baſons, and the Corps was laid forth on the Scaffold. Her poor Maids drew near unto her, deſiring that they might be permitted to diveſt her, and to bury her with their own hands. But the furious Earl did drive them out of the Hall, and cauſed the ſacred body to be carryed into a Chamber of the Caſtle, where it was locked up. He alſo ordered, that the Cloath and Boards ſhould be burnt, that were purpled with the bloud of this Martyr, as if there were any element in the world that was able to take away ſo celeſtial a tincture. Theſe two Virgins did not ceaſe to follow with their eyes the body of their Miſtriſs, looking upon her as well as they could, through the clefts of the door, as ſhe ſtill lay bloudy, and but half covered. They waited there like two Magdalens at the Sepulcher, until ſuch time as ſhe was interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, where all the beſt ſort of men, as long as it was allowed, did repair to let fall their tears, and lay forth their ſighs, upon her Tomb. The news being brought to London, all the bells did ring for joy, to convey the tidings of it to cruel Elizabeth, who did conceal her ſelf, rather for ſhame then grief, although ſhe counterfeited to be extremely touched for the Death of her kinswoman. And in effects ſhe often felt the remorſe of Conſcience, and had horrible Dreams; which did make her to cry out in the night, and to wake her Maids of Honour with her affrights.

17. As

17. As long as Truth, or Virtue, or Men ſhall continue upon the Earth, that Wound ſhall bleed; as long as there ſhall be Eyes or Tears in this Vale of miſerie, there ſhall be Tears Diſtilled on theſe Royal Aſhes; and the Piety of the living, ſhall never ceaſe with full hands to ſtrew Lilies and Violets and Roſes on her Tomb. Mary, whom Heaven abſolveſt, doth now commence an eternal Proceſs againſt Elizabeth, ſhe ſhall be brought before as many Tribunals, as there are reaſonable Spirits, and ſhall daily be condemned; without ending of her miſery, becauſe ſhe put no end to her injuſtice.

It ſeemeth that God did expreſly give her a long Life, as to Cain, to Herod, to Tiberius, and other Tyrants, to fill up the meaſure of her Iniquity, to poſſeſs a Bloody Scepter amongſt Jealouſies, Affrights, and Defiances, and to ſee her Hell alive, when at laſt, ſtooping to the impotency of Age, and ſlighted by her own creatures, ſhe would often complain, that all the world did abandon her, and that ſhe had not one left, in whom ſhe might repoſe her confidence.

God hath dried up her Root on Earth, and made her die childleſs: He hath placed on her Throne the blood of Mary, who at this day doth hold the Crown of England and of Scotland.

Great GOD, if it be permitted to enter into the Cloud of thy great Myſteries, and the Secrets which thou haſt concealed from our Eyes, Is it not from this blood we ſhall ſee one day a Flower to ariſe, the moſt Illuſtrious of the Poſterity, who between his Hands ſhall bring forth the Golden Age, who ſhall make the Antient Piety to triumph, and on his Royal Shoulders ſhall carry it even into the Throne of Glory, who ſhall render Divine Honour to the Aſhes of his Mother, and about her Tomb ſhall make the Cypreſs Trees to grow, that ſhall advance unto the Stars her Honoured Name, which they ſhall wear Engraved on their Leaves?

Elizabeth ſhall then be but a Spectre of Horrour, and her Pernicious Counſellers ſhall appear round about her, as the pale Shades in the center of Darkneſs.

England ſhall awake from her long Lethargie, and with veneration ſhall look on her whom ſhe hath diſhonoured with ſo much fury.

Incomparable Mary, we ſay no more that Providence hath been a Step-mother, and that ſhe hath uſed you with too much rigour and violence. She hath cauſed you to enter in a Garden, covered with Palms and Laurels, which you have bedewed with your Tears, manured with your afflictions, enobled with your Combats, and honoured with your Blood. She hath mounted you on a Scaffold, where you have acted the laſt and moſt Glorious Tragedy, that was ever repreſented in the world by your Sex, or in your condition. The Angels (O Divine Princeſs) from the portals of Heaven did with admiration contemplate your Combat, they encouraged your Conſtancy, they ſang your Praiſes, and with emulation they prepared for you your everlaſting Crowns.

The heart of a Woman againſt an hundred Leopards: The heart of a Diamond againſt a thouſand Hammers, which never turned for all their violence, which never could be tempted with the glitterings of Honour, which always did temper with Gall the moſt delicious contentments of this life, to follow her Jesus, her wounded Jesus, her Jesus crucified for her.

The moſt Catholick Queen in the world, who honoured nothing more then Churches and Prieſts and Altars, to live twenty years, as it were, without a Church, without a Prieſt, and without an Altar; to make in her ſelf a Temple of her Body, an Altar of her Heart, and a Sacrifice of her Blood; nay, what ſhall I ſay, in a Death ſo abandoned, to be her ſelf the Altar, to be her ſelf the Prieſt, and her ſelf the Sacrifice? What Virgin hath ſeen the twentieth year of her Captivity? What Martyr hath ſanctified ſo many priſons? Who hath ever made experience of ſo many Deaths in one? Who hath ever ſeen Death to come with a more willing foot? And who hath indeer'd it with a greater joy? Who hath managed it with wiſdom? And who hath accompliſhed it with greater glory? Your fair Name, O Mary, borne on the Wings of Triumph and Renown, doth paſs through Sea and Land, is an object of Veneration to the people, and of Ornament unto Heaven, where your Soul with advantage doth rejoyce in the pleaſures of eternal happineſs.

Look down fair Soul, and behold your Iſlands and your Realms, with thoſe Eys enlightned with the Beams of the Face of God. Conſider the waves of the Ocean, which ceaſe not to carry the Memory of your Deeds to the ends of the Earth, pardon your Subjects, and waſh away the ſtain, which the effuſion of that generous blood hath made, ſince you had rather be a Meſſenger of Reconciliation, then to be the bearer of Vengeance.

O Great and Illuſtrious Britany, Is it poſſible that this blood hath yet wrought nothing on the hardneſs of thy heart, and that thou doſt ſtill delight, by force of Arms, to fight againſt heaven, to oppoſe thy own ſafety, and to ſhut the gate againſt thy own happineſs? Where is that glory of thy Chriſtianiſm, which heretofore did make thee to be lookt upon, as on a land of Benediction, which opened her liberal breaſts, to give ſo many Doctours to Europe, ſo many Lights of Learning to the Church, ſo many Examples of Piety to all Chriſtendom, and ſo many Confeſſours unto Paradiſe? Thy Kings, by a Pious violence, have forced their way to Heaven, and their people have followed their foot-ſteps. There was nothing ſpoken of thee, but obedience to the Church of Rome, of Saints, of Reliques, of Piety, of Combats, of Virtue, and of Crowns. And ſince the Devil of Luſt and Rebellion, raiſed from the moſt black Abyſs, hath ſeized on the ſoul of a miſerable King, thou haſt ſullied thy perfection, thou haſt deſtroyed thy Sanctuary, the lamentable Reliques whereof, are now ſpread over all the world, and the ſacred Stones of thy Temples, groaning amongſt the Nations, do attend the day of the Juſtice of God, and the Re-union of the hearts of thy people, in the performance of his ſervice. What haſt thou done with the Cradle of Conſtantine, and of Saint Helena, who were born with thee, to give Laws unto all Chriſtendom? What haſt thou done with thoſe precious Stones which compoſed that Diadem, the Beams whereof did ſparkle with admiration in the Eyes of all the people in the world? Return, O Shunamite, return: Return, fair Iſland, to thy firſt beginning, the hand of God is not ſhortned, his Arms all day are ſtretched forth to receive thee. If the inſolent hands of Hereſie have made them bars, which have been planted for so many years, do not think but the hands of true piety will tear away the disorders, which protect themselves in the night of so corrupted an Age. Feign not to thy self imaginary horrours, and overthrowings of Estates by the Inquisitions and Thunders of Rome. The beams of the Sun will make the Manna to melt, which no power can destroy. The blood of this immortal Queen, shall break the Diamond in pieces, & one day work those great effects, which we our selves cannot believe, nor our posterity sufficiently admire.

It is in your veins, most mighty Monarch of Great Britain, where still her blood doth run. That cruel Axe which made three Crowns to fall with one head, hath not yet poured it all out, it doth preserve it self in your body, and in the body of your Posterity, animated with the Spirt of Mary, and imprinted with the image of her goodness. It is she who hath given you so temperate a Spirit, such attractive inclinations, such royal Virtues, and so triumphant a Majesty, It is she who uniteth you with the Queen, your dear Spouse, with a will so cordial and with a love so perfect, and makes your marriage as a continual Sacrifice of the Antients, whose offerings that were presented, had no gall at all in them. The Queen of Scotland, your Grand-mother who was given unto France, and France hath rendred you a Princess according to the heart of God and according to your own heart, a Blossom of our Lilies, the Daughter of a King, the Sister of a King, the Wife of a King, Royal in her blood, Royal in her Religion, Royal in her Piety, in her Prudence, and Royal in her Courage. She enters into your cares, she partakes of your troubles. She conspires with your Designs, her spirit turneth unto yours, and yours continually is ready to meet with hers. They are two clockes excellently ordered, which at every hour of the Day do answer one another.

Great Majesties of Britaine, carry the same yoak in the service of God, and the piety of your Ancestours, and as you have but one heart, maintain also but one Religion. Establish that which your Grand-mother of everlasting memory, hath practised by her Virtues, demonstrated by her Examples, honoured by her Constancy, and sealed with her Blood.

CARDINAL POOL.

NExt unto Boetius, I will insert Cardinal Pool, one of the most excellent Men of the Age before us, who being chief of the Council in the Realm of England, under Queen Mary, did know so well to marry the Interests of State, to the Interests of God; that rendring himself the Restorer of Religion, he repaired the Ruins of the Kingdom, which were fallen into a horrible desolation.

His birth and Education.

His Birth most high and illustrious, made him a near Kinsman to the King of Great Britain as well by the Father's side, as by the Mother's. His spirit did equal his Nobility, but his Virtue did exceed them both, and proved him to be the wisest and the most moderate person in all the Clergy. The care of his good Mother, did with great advantage improve his more innocent and tender years, and omitted nothing that might either enlighten his understanding in the knowledg of learning, or inflame his heart with a generous heat after gallant actions.

His love of solitude

In his most tender age, he testified a Divine Attraction, which made him to eschew all commerce of company, and secretly did inspire him with the love of Solitude. He did delight in the Country life, where the pureness of the Air, the aspect of the Stars, the ennammel of the Meadows, the covert of the Woods, the veins of the Waters, and other objects, did prepare him as many Degrees to mount up to God, as he did there behold Beauties in the discovered breasts of Nature.

It was for this, that he made his first studies near unto the House of the reverend Fathers of the Charthers, whose conversation he loved more then all the pleasures in the world, which occasioned a certain tincture of Devotion, and of probitie to pass into his manners, which continued with him all his life. From thence he removed to the Universities in England, where he gave most admirable proofes of his Capacity.

His Vertue yels.

On the approach of the twentieth year of his age, he travelled into Italy, where he beheld the wonders of Rome, and had a taste of the rarest spirits in that Age, some whereof did afterwards live with him, and did much conduce to fill his spirit with the height of learning, which made him to be admired by all, and the rather, because it no way diminished the holy heats of his Devotion.

Having travelled into forein Countryes, for the space of five years, he returned into England, where he was looked upon as a man slid down from Heaven, whose excellent Qualities did promise him the fullness of glory.

His return to England

But he suddenly observed the Affairs of the Kingdom to be greatly perplexed, by reason of the horrible Divorce, which Henry the Eight resolved on, who endeavoured at once to separate himself from his wife, and from the Church of God. He much desired, that Pool who was famous for knowledge and integrity, should approve his intention, to the end that finding no assistance from Truth, he might beg some apparence from the opinions of men.

The Combat in his spirit.

This was no small temptation to this young Prelate, who was not altogether so austere as to distast all honour of preferment, nor so little versed in Court, as not to look on the King, as the Original from whence it flowed. He a long time consulted with himself to finde a mean, which might make his conscience to accord with the will of the King. His integrity which was to him as another Birth, did dispute in his heart with the Interest of his Fortune, and he sought after the means to temper them into one. One day he thought he had found it, and addressed himself to the Court, to expose his advice unto the King, which was an advice more pleasing then just; and he had then a care that the liberty of his words, should not hinder the pretences to his dignity.

O who is he that is able to counsel a King in his passion: If you alledge unto him too much of Justice, you hazard your Fortune. If you comply unto him with too much Gentleness, you do betray your heart. The words of a Prince are the furnace which doth prove you, where you may behold some to burn and to consume away like straw, and others to come forth purified like Gold.

The spirit of God did seize on the heart and the tongue of this wise Counsellour, he forgot all the worldly and flattering reasons he had prepared, to open onely his eyes unto the Truth.

He took part with God.

How Sir, (said he unto the King) to labour a divorce from Queen Katharine, after so many years of your Marriage, who hath brought you issue to succeed you in the Crown. It is true, that she was given a Spouse to your elder Brother, but he dyed in his youth before his Marriage was consummated. And you have espoused the Queen in the face of the Church, with a Dispensation as authentical as the Pope could give, and which he granted, with your consent, at the request of the King your Father of glorious Memory; And since your Majesty hath had a secret Repugnance, caused by a respect to him, to whom you owe your Birth, that can bring no prejudice to the publick Faith, nor to the consummation of a Marriage followed by such fruits and Benedictions, as ordinarily do attend that mutual commerce.

Alas Sir, Your Majesty hath consecrated its Reign by so many Royal Virtues, and Excellent Examples, which have acquired you the Love and Admiration of Christendom, will it now eclipse so pure a Life, and so Triumphant a Reputation, by a stain which cannot be washed away, but by the effusion of the blood of all your Realm. Your Majesty hath sacrificed both its Scepter and its Pen, by the obedience which it hath rendred to the holy See, and by the Book which it hath made in the Defence of the Church. Cannot it honestly cast off those Lawes, which it hath authorized by a publick Testimony? What will your people say, who have so just an apprehension of Religion? What will forein Princes say, who have conceived so high an Opinion of your Merit? Those who do counsel you to that Divorce, are the most Capital Enemies of your glory, who do draw upon you the indignation of God, the censure of the Soveraign Priest, the Arms of a great Estate, Who being offended at this affront, will conjure your ruine.

That which hath driven you to it, is onely a passion of youth, which ought to be moderated, it is bad Counsel, from which you should retire your self, it is a mischief, which you should labour to avoid. In this case, the Advice which doth least please you, will be the best. The precipitation of so hazardous an Act, can bring nothing but repentance. This I speak unto your Majesty, being driven to it by the fervent zeal which I have unto the safety of its Soul, and by the tender respect which I have alwayes borne to your Royal Person. I must beseech it, that I may not be surprized in so important an affair, as this Marriage is, which had his Ordinance in heaven, and its happinesse on earth.

This was boldly spoken by a Man, who saw that in accomodating his humour to the King, he incontinently entred into the possession of the richest benefits of the Kingdom, and that crossing his design, he exposed his Liberty, his Estate, his life to most apparent danger. Nevertheless, he had the constancy to make him this grave Remonstrance, without following the Example of those, which flatter all evil actions, and make Divinity to speak that, which the interest of their Fortunes doth suggest unto them.

Henry the Eight was no way softned at this so grave an Oration; but on the contrary, he had a most earnest desire to arrest his Cousin Pool, and to put him to death, which had been put in Execution, if the hand of God had not withheld the blow.

Henry the Eight grown more hardened.

He very well observed, that the heart of the King was empoysoned with lust and choler, even to the Despair of all Remedy. Wherefore not long after, finding his opportunity he asked leave of the King under some pretence to go out of the Kingdom, and did abandon himself to a willing banishment, because he would not offend his conscience. He came into France, and stayed sometime in Avignon, from thence he travelled to Padua, and from Padua to Venice, where he was acknowledged and esteemed for one of the chiefest men of Christendom, and renowned for excellent qualities.

Pool banished himself.

In the end, God being pleased to demonstrate that there is nothing lost in serving him, and that honours are not onely for them who by a politick suppleness do accommodate themselves unto the times and the lusts of great men, stirred up the spirit of Paul the Third, a great lover of learned men, who made him Cardinal, with approbation of all the world. So that forsaking a Bishoprick in England, for the satisfying of his conscience, and the defence of the truth, he obtained by his merit so high a place of Eminence in the Church, which all the Crimes of a conscience prostituted to evils, could never procure unto them.

Pool made Cardinal.

Henry

Henry, who had already declared war against God and all his Saints by his divorce, was inflamed with choler by reason of the retreat and the promotion of this holy man, causing him to be proscribed over all England, and promising fifty thousand Crowns to him who should bring him to him; and having understood that the Pope had made him his Delegate into France and Flanders, he did importune the French King, by all manner of solicitation to deliver him into his hands. But the brave Prince, although it was directly against his Interest, would do nothing that was against his generous mind, and received the Cardinal with all courtesie and fidelity, because he would not offend the Pope; howsoever he would not suffer him to continue long in France, because he would not exasperate the King of England, for he had great use of his assistance in the war which he made against the Emperour.

Pool was then constrained to repair to Flanders, where he was charitably received by Cardinal Everard, Bishop of Cambray, and he continued there sometimes, attending the disposition of the Pope. But Henry understanding that he was retired into that Province, did again kindle his coals, and that in so violent a heat, that he promised the Flemings to entertain four thousand men in pay for ten Months in favour of the Emperour against the French, if they would abandon the Cardinal to his discretion. Howsoever, he found none that would favour his violence, which did so incense him, that he caused the Countess of Salisbury to be arrested. She was Mother to the Cardinal, and Daughter to the Duke of Clarence, Brother to Edward the Fourth. She was accused for having received a Letter from her Son, and for having worn about her neck the figure of the five wounds of our Saviour, on which he commanded that a Process should proceed against her, which was performed accordingly; and the perverse and abominable Judges, who made all their proceedings to comply with the mercilesse fury of their Prince, did condemn her to death and caused her head to be cut off upon a Scaffold, where she gave incomparable demonstrations of her piety and constancy. Her dear Son, who did love and respect her with all the tenderness of affection, was extremely afflicted at it, and could find no comfort but in the order of God's providence, and in the glory of her death which was pretious before God.

After this the Legate was called back to Rome, and after he had informed Paul the Third of the misery of the people of Christendom, who incessantly groaned under the calamity of war, kindled betwixt the two principal Crowns, he did contribute the uttermost of his endeavour to provide a remedy for it.

This good Pope was courteous, liberal, magnificent, well versed in Letters, and above all, a great lover of Astrology. It seemeth that the Harmony of Celestial bodies, with which his spirit was so delicately transported, did touch his Soul with a desire to make a like harmony on earth. He was passionate for the peace of Christian Princes, and as he well understood the great capacity of Cardinal Pool, joyned with the Royal-bloud, which gave him a more ful authority, he did not delay to send him with a most Authentical Commission to mediate an Accord betwixt the two Kings.

The holy Prelate undertook this business with great courage, being carried to it as well by his own inclination as by election. He failed not to represent unto their puissances all reasons both Divine and Humane, which might move them to an Accord for the Glory of God, for the glory of their own Monarchies, and for the safety of their people. But as he found in the ear of Henry the Eighth a Devil of lust, which obstructed all the force of reason which was presented to him to divert his passion; so he found in the spirit of these two Monarchs a horrible jealousie of Estate, which stopped all entrance to his saving Counsels. The time was not yet come, and it was to row against the wind and tide, to press that business any further. He was constrained to return to Rome where the Pope gave him Commission to go to Wittenburgh, where he continued certain years, delighting in the fruits of a sweet tranquillity.

In the end, the Council of Trent being already assembled to extirpate Heresies, and remedy the disorders, with which its venomous Contagion had infected the brest of Christendom, he was chosen to be President thereof, which place for some time he executed, to the admiration of his knowledge, and the universal approbation of his zeal.

He is considered on to be Pope

But when Paul the Third, having exceeded the age of fourscore years, did pay the tribute common to the condition of the living, he was obliged to return to Rome, where all the world did cast their eys on him to make him the head of the Church. All things seemed to conspire to his election, his age, his bloud, his virtue, his knowledge, his great experience in Affairs, the general affection of all, which did pass almost to veneration. It was only himself that resisted his own Fortune, because he would not assist himself, and permitted nothing of a submiss softness, to over-act his generosity; neither in that nature would he be a Suppliant, although it were for the chiefest Miter in the world. The Nephews of Paul the Third, who as yet possessed the most high Authority of Affairs, considering the faithfulness of the great services which he had rendred their Uncle, did perswade him with importunity to this chief Bishoprick of the world. And as the Conclave was assembled, and the Decision of the great business did approach unto maturity; they came at night into his Chamber to speak with him concerning his promotion, and to offer themselves to his service to prefer unto him that Sovereign Dignity: But he shewed so little complacence to their discourse, that in stead of making endearments and submissions, of which they who pretend to honour, are always excessively prodigal, he made answer to them: That God was the God of light, and that the affair which they came about, ought not to be treated on in darkness.

That one word did rebate the edge of their spirits, and on the morning following, the good Fortune, which for two Months together did look directly on Cardinal Pool, did slack its foot at the dismission of the Nephew Cardinals, and Julius the Third was chosen Pope, a person of much renown, and a great Lawyer.

He retireth again into solitude.

Pool his Competitour, well understanding that it was not expedient to reside under the eys of a Potentate, to whom the power over Christendom was secretly preferred, retired to Mentz into a Monastery of Saint Benets, where he enjoyed the delights of rest, to which his inclinations carried him, exercising his Devotion to the heighth, and recreating himself with good Letters which he always loved.

But God, who by his means was pleased to bring about the greatest revolution of Estate, as Europe ever saw, did cause occasions to arise to draw him from that ſolitude to return again to his great imployments.

It is neceſſary in this place, to make mention of the condition of the affairs in England, to behold virtue in the day of its own brightneſs; and to conſider how Providence, guarding her dear Pool, as the apple of her eye, did reſerve him for a time, which made him the true Peace-maker of that Nation.

The Eſtate of England

For this effect it came to paſs, that Henry the Eighth having reigned eighteen years in Schiſm, leading a life profuſe in luxury, ravenous in avarice, impious in Sacriledge, cruel in maſſacres, covered over with ordures, blood, and infamy, did fall ſick of a languiſhing diſeaſe, which gave him the leiſure to have ſome thoughts on the other world.

The death of Henry the Eighth

It is true, that the affrighting Images of his Crimes, and the ſhades of the dead, which ſeemed to beſiege his bed, and perpetually to trouble his repoſe, did bring many pangs and remorſes to him. Inſomuch, that having called ſome Biſhops to his aſſiſtance, he teſtified a deſire to reconcile himſelf unto the Church, and ſought after the means thereof. But they, who before were terrified with the fury of his actions, which were more then barbarous, fearing that he ſpoke not that, but only to ſound them, and that he would not ſeal to their Counſels, which they ſhould ſuggeſt unto him, peradventure with the effuſion of their bloud, did gently adviſe him, without ſhewing him the endeavours and the effects of true repentance, and without declaring to him the ſatisfactions which he ought to God, and to his Neighbours for the enormities of ſo many Crimes. He was content to erect the Church of the Cordeliers, and commanded that Maſs ſhould there be publickly celebrated, which was performed to the great joy of the Catholicks, which yet remained in that horrible Havock. To this Church he annexed an Hoſpital and ſome other appurtenances, and left for all a thouſand Crowns of yearly Revenue.

As he perceived that his life began to abandon him, he demanded the Communion, which he received, making a ſhow as if he would riſe himſelf; but the Biſhop told him that his weakneſs did excuſe him from that Ceremony: he made anſwer, that if he ſhould proſtrate himſelf on the Earth, to receive ſo Divine a Majeſty, he ſhould not humble himſelf according to his duty. He by his will ordained that his Son Edward, who was born of Jane Seimor, ſhould ſucceed him; and in the caſe of death, that Mary the Daughter of Queen Katharine, ſhould be the Inheritreſs of the Crown; and if that ſhe ſhould fail, that his Daughter Elizabeth (although a Baſtard) ſhould fill her place, and poſſeſs the Kingdom. On the approaches of death he called for wine; and thoſe who were next unto his bed, did conceive that he oftentimes did repeat the word Monks, and that he ſaid, as in deſpair, I have loſt all.

This is that which moſt truly can be affirmed of him; for it is a very bad ſign to behold a man to dy in the Honour of his Royal Dignity and by a peaceable death, who had torn in pieces JESUS CHRIST, who had divided the Church into Schiſms, who of the ſix Queens that he eſpouſed, had killed four of them, who had maſſacred two Cardinals, three Arch-Biſhops, eighteen Biſhops, twelve great Earls, Prieſts, and Religious Men without number, and of his people without end; who had robbed all the Churches of his Kingdom, deſtroyed the Divine Worſhip, oppreſſed a million of Innocents, and in one word, who had aſſaſſinated mercy it ſelf.

Howſoever he wanted not Flatterers, who preſumed to ſay and write, that his wiſdom had given a good order to his affairs, and that he happily departed this world, not conſidering what S. Auguſtine doth affirm, that all the penitencies of thoſe who have lived in great diſorders, and who only do convert themſelves at the end of their life, being preſſed to it by the extremity of their diſeaſe, ought to be extremely ſuſpected, becauſe they do not forſake their ſins, but their ſins do forſake them.

It was obſerved indeed, that at his Death this King did teſtifie a repentance of his ſavage and inordinate life; but we cannot obſerve the great and exemplary ſatisfactions which were due to the expiation of ſo many abominable ſins. King Antiochus made ſubmiſſions of another nature, and ordered notable reſtitutions, to recompenſe the dammages which he had cauſed to the people of the Jews, nevertheleſs he was rejected of God, by reaſon of his bloudy life, and the Gates of the Temple of mercy were ſhut againſt him for all eternity. The foundation of a ſmall Hoſpital which Henry cauſed at his Death, was not ſufficient to recompenſe the injuries of ſo many Churches which he had pillag'd, nor of ſo much goods of his Subjects as he had forced from them, ſeeing we know by the words of the wiſe man. That to make a benefit of the ſubſtance of the poor, is to ſacrifice a Son before the eyes of his Father. Eccleſ. 34.

The Reign of Edward. His Uncle Seimor ſpoileth all.

He had by his Teſtament ordained many Tutors to his Son, who were able to have made as many Tyrants; but Seimor, Uncle by the Mothers ſide to the deceaſed King, gaining the favour of the principal of the Lords of the Realm, whom he had corrupted with mony and great preſents, did cauſe himſelf to be proclaimed Protectour and Regent. He took a great poſſeſſion on little Edward the Son of Henry, Heir to the Crown, whom he brought up in Schiſm and Hereſie, againſt the intentions of the Father. This furious man immediately began his Regency with ſo much inſolence, that he almoſt made the Reign of Henry the Eighth to be forgotten, he fomented the poiſon, which he had conceived under him, he did uſe the Catholicks moſt unworthily, and did cut off the head of his own Brother by a jealouſie of women. But as he had made himſelf inſupportable; ſo it came to paſs, that the affairs of War, which he had enterprized againſt the French, did fall out unfortunately for him. Dudley, one of the chieſeſt of the Lords, drawing a party to him, did accuſe him of Treaſon, and cauſed his head to be cut off on the ſame Scaffold, where before he had taken off the head of his own Brother. This death was followed with great fears, and horrible commotions for the Regency, which preſently after was extinguiſhed by the death of the young King Edward.

The Qualities and death of King Edward.

This poor Prince was rather plucked with pincers from his mothers womb, then born, and he could not come into the world without giving death to her, who conceived him. He was ſaid to have none of the comelieſt bodies; He ſpake ſeven languages at fifteen years of age, and in his diſcourſe did teſtifie a rare knowledge of all thoſe ſciences, which were moſt worthy of a King. It ſeemeth that death did advance it ſelf to raviſh his ſpirit from his body, which did awake too early, and was too forward for his age; for he died in his ſixteen year, having not had the time throughly to underſtand himſelf, and to ſee by what courſe he ſhould ſway his Scepter or his life.

Cardan

Cardan, who was employed no less then one hundred hours to make his Horoscope, did easily observe in the stars, the incommodities of his body, and disasters of his person; but he could no way attain to the period of his life, which is of the secrets reserved in the knowledge, and in the method of God.

All England was extremely corrupted in her faith under the Regency of this Seymour, & the Ladies of the Court were inveloped in the errours of the time. He found none but the Lady Mary, daughter to Henry the Eight, and Katharine, which continued in the Religion of their Grand-fathers; and though she was tempted and sollicited on all sides: yet she would not suffer her self to be surprized with a new Faith, but with a vigorous force, did roar against all the the torrents of Opinions, and the overflowing disorders which reigned in that age.

It was for this, that God did cause her to mount on the Throne of his own Tower, and gave her the grace to be both the restorer of Religion and the State, by the assistance of this Cardinal.

Mary the lawfull heir is troubled, and Jane is chosen Queen by Faction.

As soon as Edward was dead, not without suspition of poison, Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, who was then most mighty in power, and had newly married his Son to the Lady Jane, issued from the bloud Royall, conceived himself strong enough to begin the Regency of England, the better afterwards to usurp the Crown. He caused his Daughter-in-Law to be proclaimed Queen of England, and seized on the Tower of London, and gave order for the apprehending of Queen Mary. But the generous Princess, being advertised of the attempt, did take horse in the time of night, and secured her self in a place of strength, and conjured all her good Servants to assemble themselves, to defend her person and her right.

It is to be admired, that persevering in the true Religion, contrary to that of the great ones of the Kingdom, at the same time when she conceived her self abandoned, and her cause most deplorable, that she should behold the principal of the Nobility, and Gentry, and Commonalty, to fall down before her, and to offer her their obedience and their Arms, to take the possession of the Crown.

She marched immediately to London, in the middle of her Army apparelled in a Gown of Velvet of a violet colour, and mounted on a white horse. She entred into the City with great applauses of her Subjects, and surprised the Duke, and caused him to deliver his Daughter-in-Law into her hands.

It was a spectacle worthy observation, to consider the Inconstancy of these worldly affairs, and to look on that person, who but yesterday promised to himself to force the whole Kingdom under the power of his Laws, to tremble now at the fear of death pronounced by his Judges, who condemned him to be drawn upon a Hurdle, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. The Queen sent him Catholick Divines to convert him, to whom he gave ear, and abjuring Heresie, he embraced the Catholick Religion, which was the occasion, that the Queen did moderate the Sentence of the Execution, and was contented, that his head onely should be cut off with his sons, who was the husband of Jane. This miserable Lady from a high Tower, where she was prisoner, beheld the body of her dear husband without a head, at the sight whereof she fell down into a swoun, and being a little recovered, she melted into tears, and did fetch from her heart so many, and so deep sighs, that they seemed to be able, not onely to mollifie the hearts of men, but to cleave the Rocks asunder.

The Execution of the Lady Jane.

There was a long deliberation concerning her Fact, because the Queen had an inclination to pardon her, observing her to be both young, fair, knowing, and of a delicate temper, and one who had not offended, but by the violent suggestions of her Father-in-law, and of her husband, who had put the Crown upon her head. But the Judges did remonstrate, that it was of a most dangerous consequence, to suffer that person to continue alive, who had carried the Title of a Sovereign, and that one day it might give a new fire to the enterprizes of the Remainder of her Faction. On these considerations the Sentence of death was pronounced, which she received with a Constancy, admirable in her Sex and age. A Doctour was sent unto her, to reduce her to the Catholick Religion, which at the first she refused, alledging, That she had too little time to think on an Affair of that importance. Which being reported to the Queen, she deferred the execution for certain dayes, to instruct her at more leisure, so that she was gained to God, and continued to the last hour of her life in such tranquillity of mind, that a little before she came out of prison, to go to her Execution, she wrote divers Sentences in Greek, Latine, and English, on the contempt of Death, and when on the Scaffold it was represented to her, that she should die by the sword, which (according to the custom of that Country) is accounted a nobler kind of Execution, then to die by the Axe: she said, That she would die by that Axe which was yet discoloured with her husbands bloud, and courageously she tendered her neck to the Hang-man, drawing tears from her self, and the hearts from all those that did behold her. O most unfortunate Ambition, that hast made so young a Princess a sacrifice of Death, who for the excellency of her spirit, might have been another Minerva, or at least the tenth of the Muses.

Behold the strange Revolutions, which did prepare the way to Cardinal Pool, for the performance of those high Designs, which God had committed to his Conduct. Queen Mary did incontinently make void all the Sentences which had been pronounced against him, and called him back into England, to which place in a short time he came, as if he had been carried on the shoulders of all honest men. The Pope made him his Legate, and gave him full power to ordain and execute all things, which he should conceive necessary for the glory of God, and the establishment of the true Religion.

Pool travels to the Reducement of England to the ancient Faith.

He travelled to this Work with incomparable wisdome, and with a zeal invincible. He well perceived, that to restore Religion by arms, was to undertake a most laborious, if not an infinite work, which would open all the veins in England, and draw drie as well their purses, as their bloud, and cover the Kingdome with the calamities of civils wars, which would continue for many Ages. He resolved to put his good Counsels in execution with gentleness, which others propounded to perform with all violence.

The course he held.

And in the first place he had recourse to Prayers, to Mortifications, to Vows, and to Devotions, which he performed in secret, and which he particularly recommended to all holy minds, who breathed after the restoring of the ancient Religion.

In the second place, he entred into the heart, and possessed himself with the inclinations of Queen Mary, whom he found throughly disposed, and animated by a generous spur, for the glory of God, and the felicity of her Kingdom, which kept her always exercised on that high thought, and comprehended in it the safety of all that Nation.

In the last, he more and more encouraged all the Catholicks, by the desires of their repose of conscience, and by the liberty of their Functions, in the exercise of spiritual things.

In the third place, he treated with those who were in an errour, with the Spirit of Compassion, of Sweetness and Bounty, complying with them in what he could in Civil Affairs, and endeavouring to take from them the apprehension which they had conceived to themselves, that the Change of Religion would ruine their Fortunes, and the establishment of their Houses. He caused a report to be spread by many remarkable and grave Personages, that he came not to take away their temporal Goods, but to give them spiritual blessings. And as concerning the goods of the Church, which many Great men had usurped in that general Confusion of Affairs, he said, he would compose it in the best way that Love and Candour could prescribe him.

Fourthly, He did wisely foresee, that with sweetness he should also bring in Authority, which might ruine the resistences of those men, if any should appear to oppose so saving a work. On which he had recourse to the greatest Potentates in Europe, whom he secretly affected to this Enterprize. He had been before employed on the Peace between Francis the First, and Charles the Fifth. He did apprehend, and attract the spirits of them both with wonderful dexterity; for having dived into the heart of the Emperour, and finding the seeds of the Design, which afterwards did discover themselves, having been dismissed of the Empire, and embraced a solitary life, he wrought upon him with the recital of his great actions, and the Conquests he had obtained, and told him, That all those strong agitations of his spirit were but as so many lines which ought to tend to the center of Rest, that he ought not to weary and torment his good Fortune. That it was a great gift of God, to confine his thoughts on true glory, without attending the tide of the Affairs of the World. That it was the duty of an Emperour, to endeavour the Peace of Christendom, and an incomparable honour to accomplish it. He touched his heart so directly with these Demonstrations, that he opened it, and the Emperour declared to him, That he had a great desire to that Divine Peace, and would embrace all reasonable Conditions that should conduce unto it.

After that he had effected this, he made no delay to address himself to the most Christian King, and knowing that he was puissantly generous, he wrought upon him by the glory of the great Wars he had sustained, and the immortal Actions of Valour, which he produced, that by his invincible courage he had at the last wearied the most puissant Potentate in Europe, who had him in admiration, and desired nothing more then to hold a fair correspondence with him. That a fair peace should be an inestimable benefit to them both, which should give rest unto their Consciences, and pull down a blessing from on high upon their persons, and be a great comfort to their Subjects, who were overcharged with the continuation of the War. In the end, he did demonstrate to him how extraordinarily he was beloved of his people, who did attend this Effect of his goodness, by which he should crown his Valour with all happiness and abundance in his Kingdom. The King took fire at this Discourse, and the Cardinal most vigorously did blow it up, and did remonstrate, That two so great Monarchs, who were made for Heaven, ought not so greedily to hold unto their interests on earth; and that they had nothing now to wish, but to part their Affairs, and to save their honour. And this indeed they afterwards performed, restoring willingly on both sides, all that they had conquered since the Ordinance of Reconciliation made by Paul the Third, who some years before did transport himself to Marseilles (although he was of a very great age) to pacifie the Affairs of Christendom.

This Accord being so happily atchieved by Cardinal Pool, he gained by it the approbation and applause of all Princes, who favoured the Catholick cause. He observed that the Emperour had his Son Philip to marry; and that there was nothing more expedient for the advancement of Religion, then to ally him to Queen Mary. He carried this Affair with such secrecy and dexterity, that the King of Spain was in England, and the Marriage published, before the Plot was discovered. By the counsel of Charles, Cardinal Pool did defer his entry into the Realm, until the Marriage was concluded, and then he entred with all assurances. The King himself came to meet him, and Queen Mary with all her people, received him with extasies of joy.

He incontinently did draw unto him the affection of all the principal Lords; and not long after, he counselled the King and Queen, to call an Assembly of the most remarkable persons in the Kingdom, to whom he spake thus in presence of their Majestics.

His speech to the States.

MADAM,

SInce it hath pleased God, after the Confusions of the late times, to shine upon us with his eys of Mercy, and at last to place upon the Throne, the true and faithful Inheritress of the Crown, who is so worthily espoused to one of the greatest Princes in all Christendom, we have a great Subject to satisfie our Discontents, and advance our hopes.

This Realm at this day doth imitate the Creation of the World, coming forth from its Chaos, and dark Abyss, to receive the favourable influences of the light. The day which by all good men hath been so passionately desired, so suspected by the wicked, so unlook'd for by the incredulous, and so attended by the afflicted, is at length arrived to destroy our death, and to make us new born in the life of the Children of God.

Behold the true Religion, which entreth with triumph into all the Cities of this Kingdom, from which Impiety and Fury had dispossessed her, she holds out her arms unto you, adorned with the Palms and the Crowns, with which your Ancestours have honoured her, she demands again the place, which from the first conversion, until the fury of these later times, she held with so much honour and satisfaction.

Will you yet banish her? Will you yet continue to persecute her? Can you endure that she should present before God her torn and her bloudy Robe, and complain again of the outrages of her Children?

My brethren, There is neither life nor salvation, but in this Faith, which shineth and speaketh in S. Peter's Chair; It is that which God hath given us by our glorious Father, S. Gregory the Great; it is that which our Fathers have embraced; it is that which they have defended by their Words, their Arms, and their Blond, which they have ſhed for the Honour of it. Nothing is left for thoſe to hope for, who are ſeparated from it, but the tempeſts of darkneſs, and the everlaſting chains of hell.

and

It is well known that the change of Faith proceeds from an infectious paſſion, which having poſſeſſed the heart of a poor Prince, hath cauſed theſe reproachable furies, and the inundations of blond, which hath covered the face of England. He hath at his death condemned that which before he approved. He by his laſt Teſtament deſtroyed that which before he had choſen; wherefore thoſe who have followed him in his Errour, may alſo follow him in his Repentance. The Peace, the Safety, the Abundance, the Felicity of the Kingdom, are ready to re-enter with the true Faith; which if you refuſe, I ſee the choler of God, and a thouſand calamities, that do threaten you. Return therefore, O Shunamite: Return, O fair Iſland, to thy firſt beginning; feign not to thy ſelf imaginary penalties, terrours and puniſhments, which are not prepared but for the obſtinate. The Sovereign Father of Chriſtendom, doth continually ſtretch forth his arms to thy obedience, and hath delegated me, as the Dove out of the Ark, to bring unto thee the Olive Bough, to pronounce Peace and Reconciliation to thee. This is the acceptable Hour, this is the Day of thy ſalvation. The Night, which hitherto hath covered thee, is at the end of her Courſe, and the Sun of Juſtice is riſen, to bring light unto thee. It is time to lay down the works of darkneſs, and to take up the Armour of Light, to the end that all the earth inhabited may take notice, that thou abhorreſt what is paſt, embraceſt what is preſent, and doſt totally put thy ſelf into the hands of God, for the time to come.

This Oration was attended with a wonderful approbation of all the Aſſembly, and the Cardinal being departed from the Council, the King and Queen commanded that they ſhould debate on this Propoſition, which was preſently taken into conſideration, and it was reſolved, that the Ancient Religion ſhould be eſtabliſhed. The Chancellour made this reſolution known unto the people, and did powerfully exhort them to follow the examples, which were conformable to the advice of the King and Queen, and the moſt eminent Perſonages in the Kingdom. This diſcourſe was revived with a general applauſe for the advancement of the Catholick Faith. In the end, he demanded that they would teſtifie their reſolution in a Petition to the King and Queen & mediate for a reconciliation to the Cardinal, Legate of the holy See, which incontinently was done, the Paper was preſented, and openly read, their Majeſties did confirm it, both by their Authorities and their Prayers, and humbled themſelves on their knees with their Grandees, and all the people, demanding mercy; whereupon an authentick abſolution was given by the Legate, the Bels did ring in all the Churches, Te Deum was ſung. All places were filled with the cries of joys, as people infranchiſed, and comming out of the gates of hell. After this, King Philip was obliged to go into Flanders, by reaſon of the retreat of the Emperour his Father. Pool was left chief of the Counſellours with Queen Mary, who did wonders for the good of Religion, and of the State. It is true that Cranmer, and other turbulent and ſeditious ſpirits, were puniſhed; but ſo great a moderation was uſed, that the Benefices, and the Revenues of the Church, did continue in the hands of thoſe who did hold them of the King, without diſturbing them on that innovation: all things were continued that might any way be ſuffered, not ſo much as changing any thing in Marriages, becauſe they would not enſnare their ſpirits. The heart of the Queen and of her Miniſters did think on nothing more, then to eſtabliſh Religion, to entertain the holy See, to render juſtice, to comfort the people, to procure peace and reſt, to multiply the abundance of the Kingdom.

They did begin again the Golden Age, when after the reign of five years and odd months, they were both in one day taken out of the world by ſickneſs, which did oppreſs with grief all honeſt men, and did bury with them in one Tomb, the happineſs and ſafety of that Kingdom.

O Providence! not to be dived into by humane reaſon, what vail haſt thou caſt on our Counſels, and our Works? What might we have not hoped from ſuch beginnings? What wiſdom would not have concluded, that felicity had crowned for ever the enterprizes of this Cardinal? An affair ſo well conducted, a negotiation ſo happy, a buſineſs of State, and the greateſt that was ever in any Kingdom whatſoever, ought it not to carry his progreſs unto eternity? Where are the fine plots of policy? Where are the Arms that in ſo ſmall a time have ever wrought ſo great an effect? The Chariots of the Romans, which covered with Lawrels, did march on the heads of Kings, did not make their ways remarkable, but by ſtormings of Towns, by Flames and Maſſacres But behold here many millions of men ſtruck down, and raiſed again, with one only ſpeech, ſo many legions of ſouls converted with a ſoft ſweetneſs, the face of a Kingdom totally changed in one moment, and made the happieſt that any Ages have ſeen. And after all this, to find the inexorable Trenchant of Death, to ſap in one day the two great pillars of Eſtate, and ruinate the houſe of God, which ſhould have reached to the imperial heaven.

O how true is it, that there are the ſtrokes of Fate! that is to ſay, an Order of the ſecret purpoſe of God, which is as concealed as inevitable, nothing can divert, nothing can delay it. The counſels of the wiſe are here blinded, their addreſſes are loſt, their activity troubled, their patience tried, and all their reaſons confounded.

Poor Britain, God gave thee theſe two Great Lights, not to enjoy them, but as they paſſed by, to behold them. Thou art ſoiled with ſacriledges and impieties, thou art red with the bloud of the Martyrs. The ſins of Henry are not yet expiated, and the ignominious paſſions of his life, are puniſhed by the permiſſion of the Errour. The Powers of darkneſs have their times determined by God, they will abate nothing of their periods, if the invincible hand of the Sovereign Judge doth not ſtop their courſes by his abſolute Authority. It pertaineth to God only, to know and appoint the times of Puniſhment and mercy; and there is nothing more expedient for man, then to ſubmit to his Laws, to obey his Decrees, to reverence his Chaſtiſements, and to adore the Hand that ſtrikes him.

THE ANGEL OF PEACE TO ALL CHRISTIAN PRINCES.

THE ANGEL OF PEACE TO ALL CHRISTIAN PRINCES.

IF it be lawful (greateſt Princes) to interrupt your Highneſſes, I will appear for the Cauſe of God, the Angel of Peace, the Miniſter of Concord and Union, the Interpreter of Truth, the Mean and Solicitour of Salvation. I am not that terrible and dreadful meſſenger who injected terrours and ſcourges into David, aſtoniſhed with Divine Prodigies. I am not liſted in that number which utterly overwhelmed the City of Pentapolis, almoſt drowned before in the inundation of their Impieties. I rain not Sulphure, I do not brandiſh Flames, I dart no Thunderbolts; but with a mild, temperate, and gentle amenity, I exhibit thoſe Olive-branches which the direful contagion of Warrs hath not yet blaſted. I come from the converſation of thoſe who at the Nativity of our Jeſus, Sang Anthems of Peace to Good-willing men. Deſpiſe not the Augur of Glad-tydings, contemne not the Hyperaſpiſt of Truth, who ſpeaketh unto you before God in Chriſt.

It is the concernment of the whole Chriſtian World, moſt pious Princes, which I addreſs unto you; it is your intereſt which I urge and inculcate both by wiſhes and writings; it is the Profeſſion of God which I require; and indeed of great importance, as having diverſe times ſummoned, yea enforced the Prieſts from the Altars, the Virgins from the Monaſteries, and the Anachorets from the Woods, that of the mute it might make Oratours and Agitatours of the retired. God the Arbitratour and Accompliſher of all things, who calleth thoſe things which are not as if they were; he formeth and prepareth the mouths of infants, giveth Wiſdome to the imprudent; to yeild to him is victory; to conteſt with him is ſucceſſleſs oppoſition. Appetite infuſeth Eloquence, and neceſſity not ſeldome makes a ſouldier. To be ſilent amidſt the articulated movings of the oppreſſed is unlawful, and to ſit ſtill amidſt the wounds of Military men as unconcerned, is highly and juſtly reproveable That hand that is not officious to the ſuffering world deſerves an amputation.

I ſhall not diſoblige the ſupplicated engagment of your patience (excellent Princes) with unimporting reaſons. I ſhall not abuſe your ſenſes with unappertaining figments, but by a pleaſant proſpect I ſhall ſhew you that Glory which you aim at through fields flowing with bloud, through the flames of collucent Cities, and through many doubtful circulations and diverticles. Condeſcend therefore to give me an allowance of diſcourſe concerning the nature of War and Peace, and of the Right of Chriſtian Princes in each of them. For upon this foundation I conceive I can build firm and ſatisfactory Arguments whereby to ſecure your Dignity, and to ſettle the Peoples ſafety.

It was a ſpeech well becoming the Wiſdome of the Ancients, that this world, in whoſe circumference all things are contained, is as it were a great Volume of the Deity, wherein life and death are as the beginning and the end: but the middle Pages are perpetually turned over backwards and forwards. That which life and Death bring to paſs in the nature of things, the ſame doth Peace and War in the Nation of all Kingdomes and Empires. And indeed Life is a certain portion of the Divine Eternity, which being firſt diffuſed in the Divine Nature, and afterwards ſtreaming into the ſea, and penetrating into the earth and our World, doth contemperate by an eſpouſal and connexion of bodies and ſouls wonderful and almoſt Divine Agreements. But when there is a ſolution of this undervalued continuity, when this harmony is diſturbed and broken, it ſuddenly vaniſheth by the irreſiſtable neceſſity of death, greedily depopulating all things under his dominion.

In like manner Peace, the greateſt and moſt excellent gift of the Divine Indulgence, reconciles and apportions a kinde of temperature in the wills of men, from whence floweth the moſt active vigour of all functions in the Body Politick; as, the alacrity of minds, the rewarded ſedulity of Provinces, the faithful plenty of the Countrey, the ſecurity of travelling, the opulency of Kingdoms, and the accumulation of all temporal bleſſings. But when Concord is diſſipated, and the alarms of War beſieged men's ears, preſently there inſueth a convulſion and direful decay of all the members, and Audacity finding it ſelf diſengaged from the mulcts and penalties of the Laws, runneth headlong into all variety of miſchief; the moſt Sacred things are violenced, and the moſt Profane are licenced, the nocent and the the innocent are involved in the expectation of a ſad and promiſcuous cataſtrophe, and bonefires are made of Cities not to be quenched but with the bloud of miſerable Chriſtians

He that will tax his own leiſure but with the cheap expence of conſidering our mortality, will ſo much ſcruple theſe effects to be the actions of men, that he may be eaſily ſeduced to believe that Hell hath loſt ſome priſoners, or that ſome troops of furies have broken the chains of darkneſs, and in a humane ſhape deluded men with ſuch enormous villanies.

My higheſt obedience (moſt excellent Princes) is due to truth, and that obligation prompts me to proclaim this judgement, That contentions and War have not had any ingreſs into the Church of God; but by clandeſtine and undermining Policies, Diſcipline reſiſting, and Conſcience ſtanding agaſt at the monſtrous object. And indeed Paul exclaimeth againſt contentions; Brother (ſaith he) goeth to law with brother, and that under Infidels: Now therefore there is altogether an infirmity in you, in that you go to law one with another. Why rather ſuffer you not wrong? Why rather ſuſtain you not fraud? But ye your ſelves do wrong and exerciſe fraud and that to your brethren.

What do we hear? an Edict publiſhed by an Apoſtle inveſted with thunder and lightning. I beſeech the reviſitation of your thoughts, what would he imagine were he lent again unto the world by providence, that then wanted patience to ſee a controverſie about a field perhaps, or a houſe, and ſhould now behold, among thoſe that claim the title of the Faithful, Enſign againſt Enſign, Nation againſt Nation, and not a Houſe, not a City, not a Province, but the whole Chriſtian world precipitated into ſlaughters, rapes, and priviledged plunders; would he countenance ſuch an inhumane ſpectacle with a Declaration of allowance? or would he perſwade men to the violations of the Law of Nature, and dictate encouragements to ruine and rapine?

But Tertullian alſo is very ſtrict in this point, and peradventure too rigid, whilſt he ſaith that our Lord, by that injunction to Peter to ſheath his ſword diſarmed all Chriſtian Souldiers. This in my judgement deſerves a cenſure of extreme ſeverity, if he conclude all warfare to be criminal: this were to deſtroy the innocent in a deteſtation of the guilty, ſhould we perpetrate corrupt actions upon the order of the cruel, and the petulancy of luxuriant villains. What would Chriſtianity then be, but a prey to the inſatiable, and a laughing-ſtock to the inſolent? if it were not lawful to revenge unfaithful injuries with a juſt retaliation? If it were not lawful to defend Churches from Sacrilege, Widows and Orphans from oppreſſions, and diſintereſſed perſons from ruine? 'Tis a raſh determination that bloweth off the victorious Laurels of ſo many Chriſtian Kings with ſuch a blind and precipitate Whirlewind of words. Juſtly therefore are the Manichees obnoxious to a ſpiritual Outlawry from the Church, whilſt I know not whether they more impudently aſſert innocence, or more blameably diſarm it.

All Ages concur in the juſtification of Warr againſt Infidels, but the intermingled contentions of the Faithful have been always reprehended, and never impartially tolerated. Be pleaſed to take a review of an old inſtrument; There were many and bitter diſcords among the Jews, many tumults mults, many wars, but ever against those that had abandoned the true Religion, and collapsed into foul Idolatry and the worship of the Gentiles. The Israelites indeed upon the division of the Tribes fought against the Benjamites with a fierce war and an infinite destruction, but this was rather the fury of grief, rushing into arms for the revenge of a woman violated with prodigious lust, then any destinated opposition, or just controversie for the enlargement of their territories. The magnanimity of David could scarce be induced to a just resistance of his son Absolon, forcing his way unto his Fathers Throne through the bloud and carcasses of many Citizens, till Joab had obstinately dissipated that languidness of his gentle mind, so detestable an undertaking was it for those who were brethren by the bonds of Nature and Religion, to forfeit all civil respects to the rage of War.

If you please to consult the first times of the Christian Emperours, you shall find Constantine opposing his forces against Julian; but not till he became the desertour of Christ, and the Standard-bearer of Impiety. You shall also find Theodosius the Great, levying his utmost strength against Maximus, Eugenius and Argobastus: but his quarrel was with most perfidious Tyrants, who under the veil of Religion laboured to hide flagitious and damnable excesses. You shall scarce meet with any Prince in the more innocent times, who took up armes to be embrewed in Christian bloud, but upon the most deliberate and important causes. And indeed Baronius doth excellently observe, that the Crosse was opposed to the Crosse in Arms in the War which Constantius raised against Magnentius. A horrible wickedness (saith he) and not to be attempted but by a Christian Tyrant, a dissembler of Religion, and an Heretical Emperour.

I am not ignorant that Augustine hath handled this subject and question against Faustus, and that he hath established the equity of Christian arms upon the foundation of the Gospel, because John in so exemplary a rigour of life perswaded not the souldiers, inquiring after the means of their salvation, to cast away their weapons, but to be contented with their pay, and to strike no man. Because also the Apostle not without cause saith, That Princes bear not the sword in vain. But if it be lawful to yield our assent to the approbation of his judgement, we shall find that all those darts were ejaculated against the mad phrensies of the Manichees, who would have Christians to abstain from the sword, and to bear the most cruel injuries of treacherous Infidels unrepelled, unrevenged. He would not therefore either cherish the severity, or irritate the power of Christian Princes in an unlawful war against their brethren: for in the same place he exclaimeth, a desire of doing violence, a cruel preparation of mind to revenge, an implacable mind, a barbarous lust to rebel, a secret speculation of Lordly dominion, and other such as these, are the causes which are justly culpable in the Warrs.

Now who are they according to the opinion of S. Augustine, that consociate themselves and their adherents in an unjust War? First, they that are hurried into Arms by a blinde violence of spirit, not so much for love of Justice, as a greedines of revenge. Who being provoked by some injury, inhumanely and unmeasurably rave and rage, abborring all attonement, and refusing by the authority of an incensed reason to chide out their Passions, those petulant and contentious inmates: In the second place, they who endeavour a Rebellion against their lawful Sovereign, and casting off the yoke of their Allegiance, precipitate themselves into all licentious enormities. Finally, they who out of a sole desire of Ruling involve and mingle the Kingdoms of their neighbours in commotions and intestine discords, and that they may extend their Empire, open a passage to their ambitious expectations by all designs either violent or fraudulent.

Consider now (best Princes) what a proclivity there is in such, to boil with indignation and displeasure, to burn with paroxysms of envy and exacerbations of revenge; yea, and to be tickled with an apprehension of purchasing or amplifying a Kingdom. How obvious it is the reins being let loose to transcend the just limits, how easie a matter to counterfeit Justice, to pretend necessity, and now to trample upon those Laws which before were so much outwardly reverenced; you will undoubtedly find it true, that it is more easie to take up, then to moderate and temper Arms.

But that I may not detain you long, Aquinas requireth three things to the justification or legitimation of a Warr: the Authority of the Prince, a just Cause, and a right Intention, whereunto other Divines have added warrantable Reasons to obtain the end; it is absolutely unlawful therefore for private men to appear in Arms for the prosecution of their own right though in judgement. This God hath delegated unto Princes, that that might happen seldome which must needs be violent. To the Lords of the earth we may say with Seneca, I am he that God hath chosen out of so many men that I might be his Vicegerent upon earth. I am the supreme Arbiter of life and death unto the Nations. It is in the hand of my power to dispose the lot of their conditions to all my people. These millions of swords that guard my peace, shall at the least intimation of my pleasure be all unsheathed. What Cities shall perish, and which shall flourish, is my jurisdiction.

To be able to put all these things in execution is indeed a great matter, but to forbear the pursuance of them, unless necessity require it, is far more divine. It is a lawful wish, that he to whom all things are lawful, would confine his will to the practice onely of lawful things. The right of the Sword is not extended when it devolveth into the Protection of one, but is rather restrained. One hand is stretched forth, that all may be bound; affairs are managed by the wisdom of a paucity, lest the temerity of the whole multitude should precitate them into a promiscuous destruction. The parsimony even of the meanest bloud is to be praised. No man is more unjustly invested with a superiority over others, then he that is prodigal of their lives though in a just emergence. Those thunderbolts must be slowly shot, which the wounded persons can reverence. Let Kings therefore beware lest they glorifie themselves by that faculty wherewith God hath entrusted them, and abuse it to outward pomp, rather then exercise it to the advantage of good men. Let the fear of misdemeanours and obliquities banish all fierceness from them; and let them esteem it the greatest impotence to boast a Priviledge of Injustice, or a power to hurt.

The cause of the war must first be balanced by an accurate examination, lest the affections obtain precedence over Equity and Reason, lest iniquity be predominant in the better part, and force and fury comply to cheat the world under the specious title of Injustice. I am both sad and ashamed to consider with my self what frivolous occasions have prevailed with many whereon to ground a war. The Trojan war, that common Sepulchre of Asia and Europe, flamed out from the impetuous flagrancies of a noble Whore. By a thousand ships she was redemanded, and for her that had lost all modesty, vast numbers of gallant Heroes lost their neglected lives. So many chast lay open to the lust of the enemies, that an unchaste might be restored. Alexander being yet a child, was reprehended by his Tutour for his profusion of Frankincense in his Sacrifices to the Gods, but being arrived to mans estate, that he might wash away this admonition of his Master, he invadeth Arabia, and there the second time offereth up Sacrifice for the conquest of the Countrey. The Egyptians for a slain Cat rose up in arms again the Romans, and fourty destroyed many thousand men. Caligula with a mighty noise of armed men, and a great preparation of all Military ornaments hasteneth to the Ocean, there to gather cockles. The Romans being contumeliously upbraided with this ridiculous Expedition, conspired, and almost effected the utter ruine of the scoffing Tarentians. The people of Alexandria rebelled against Gallienus because of a sottish contention between the Master and the servant concerning the elegancy & neatness of a pair of shoes. And to omit many examples which I could commemorate, William of England sirnamed the Conquerour, who was victorious over all men but himself, revenged a pleasant conceit of Maximus the Prince with innumerable destructions. The Conquerour was of a corpulent habit, & his belly was somewhat prominent thorow a plenty of Hydropick humours, wherefore when Philip the King of France heard of the nature of his disease, We will allow him time (saith he) to provide for his lying in, which by the busk of his belly appeareth to be near at hand. The Conquerour being mad with fury replyed, that he would rise up after his delivery and kindle five hundred fires in France to adorn his up-sitting. Nor was he unmindful of his resolution, for presently upon his recovery he entred France with a stupendious army, wholly addicting himself by fire, famine, and horrible slaughters, to the satisfaction of his revenge. Shall we suppose that he playes and trifles with the bloud of men, who upon such slight provocations can enterprise such mournful Tragedies? May we suppose those people miserable with whom the scoffs of furious men must be expiated with such a direful destruction?

No man ought to believe himself or another concerning the cause of a war, but let him weigh it with the exquisite prudence of the principal men, whose advices are the more fruitful of truth, the less they are espoused to affection. A right intention must necessarily be coveted to a just Cause, and all these things are estimated by a sober and moderate conclusion, or a justifiable end. Be such a thought eternally banished frō the head and heart of a Christian Prince, that he should array himself in a Military posture to oblige some light affections of a luxuriant mind; that he should run on slaughters, command the burning of towns, prosecute and seem to rejoyce in devastations, that he should destroy, he should extinguish and bury his own glory in the overthrow of others. This is the indelible ignominy of Centaures and the Lapithe, who in warring seek nothing but War. The wisest Kings through tumults and intestine jarrs have made a progress unto Justice, Equity, and Concord, & being themselves in Arms have sacrificed undesigning vows to Peace. They think of an Enemy as a Physician sometimes of his patient that he must be recovered by corrosives and sharp remedies. Oh that he would have been cured with a diet, or asswaged with fomentations! But when against the Law and Right of Nations he hath persisted in his obstinacy, and contemned the reiterated offers of composing the present differences, then you must bind, then you must cut, then you must burn him, yet all this to restore, not to exterminate him.

And all things composed, behold like the scourge of a deadly and destructive War, a Northern tempest rageth in the miseries of Germany, there they wallow in bloud, and in their night-marches they are conducted by the hideous light of burning Cities, some few making a resistance, and all men being astonished at the feral prodigy. The Altars are polluted with sacrifice, Virgins with rapes, the chains of Church men are heard louder and further then the drums of their persecutours; holy things are prophaned, and the abomination of desolation is consummated, their very King who had appointed them thither, being either ignorant of those outrages, or unconsenting.

Now can any man conceive that this was devised by a Christian mind? Can it be imagined that he who hath any reverence unto, or sense of Religion can give such directions? It is not credible: such a monster could not have been brought forth had not hell conceived, the bottomeless pit exhaling the fuliginous vapours, and the devils themselves torturing mens minds into such uncouth diversities. All things cannot properly have a reflected reference unto men. The Privado's and Ministers of Princes are not at all times to be accused, as though they had cast off all humanity, and covered themselves with brutish cruelty. There are certein vagabond and deceitful spirits destinated to revenge, who being themselves lost in misery, cease not to comfort their malice by driving others into a participation of those miseries, which reason (greatest Princes) ought so much the more to invite, yea to admonish you to leagues of Peace, because our Omnipotent God in his secret counsel hath determined to subdue Satan by your hands, and to cast him under your feet.

The highest circumspection and vigilancy are therefore requisite, least matter be suppeditated to the Devil who altogether watcheth for destruction from the affections and vices of men. Jealousie, that tinder of Kingdomes and Nations easily taketh fire, if it be fomented onely with an animal wisdome, and be not mixed with the prudence of the Saints. They who are addicted to one part, say, that the Spaniards do too much expose their power to Envy, that it is hateful unto Equalls, terrible to inferiours, and if not prevented, destructive unto all. There is amongst them (say they) such an epidemical itch after Domination, such intentive and indefatigable cares of their ambition, such a luxurious wit to enlarge their Empire, so vast a Catalogue of Kingdoms and Titles as provokes the emulous, terrifieth their neighbours, and pricketh even those that are removed from them by intervalls of distance. They apprehend the Dignity of one to presage the danger of all. They conjecture that the extent of his jurisdiction bodeth an unattempted servitude to all Kingdoms; they fear whatsoever the Land provideth, and whatsoever Monsters the sea nourisheth. Greedy Domination that could never yet overcome it self, when it hath once been cherished by Fortune, it unlearneth nature, and forgetteth moderation. Moreover, the temperature of the Nations, as they report, is fiery, hot and dry, swelling with pride, patient of hunger, and well enduring labour, thirsty after glory, prone to admire it self, and apt to continue the virtue and valour of other Nations. I produce not these things as the emanations of my own judgement, which for the present is addicted to no Nation but comprehendeth all in Christ, but I commemorate the vulgar reports, and such things as are openly bruted by many, which if they were suppresst by a removal of their causes, it could cut off the occasions of many controversies.

The French on the other side, as they write who have had knowledge of them, although they are forward to dart reproaches against others, unable to endure them, and most impatient of contempt, yet they know they are of that Nation whereof it was said,

——— Animóque superſunt
Jam propè poſt animam.

They boast that they filled the world with the fame of their Arms, before the Spaniards could redeem themselves from the diuturnal servitude of the Goths and Vandals. That they have managed the Empire of the East and West, that they have vanquished Constantinople by assault, restored Jerusalem to Christ, and Rome to the Pope seven times deprived of it by his enemies. They affirm that the Gospel was first preached unto them, that the primigenial adoption of the Sons of God was given to them, that they have advanced Learning in all Christian Kingdoms, the whole world almost becoming Students of our Academy at their Paris; in a word, they think they have nothing to be contemned; they are more apt to desire Admirers, then able to dispence with Contemners. From hence it comes to passe, that both the Nations being prodigal in the accumulations of their own, and envious of the others glory; such flames have of late been kindled, as will, it may be feared, become unquenchable. Would to God that that Charity which is diffused in us by the spirit, would suffocate these superseminated tares of Contentions; Oh that it would cut off the occasions of these inhumane strivings! then should we have fewer anxieties, and more supportable labours of heart, knowing by what remedies we might resist so pestilent an evil.

This is frequently augmented by the servants and favourites of Princes, whilst with a familiar, but a direfull glory to the greatest Empires; they desire to boast the power of their Lords; they display all their offensive strength and ability to hurt; they presse a secret beneficence, and whilst they proceed in these ambitious circulations, nay, whilst they bewray a fear, and discover in themselves a caution, by that very sedulity and caution they provoke things not to be feared, and act things not to be tolerated.

Here I appeal to you great Masters of Policy and Participatours of hidden Counsels. I speak more willingly to you then to your Fortunes. Consider how much God hath given you, and how much he requireth of you. You sit as Gods among men the Arbiters of mankind, what shall be each mans lot is the verdict of your Dispensations. What good things Felicity intendeth to each individual person, she pronounceth by your mouths, what Navies must be prepared, what Warrs must be prosecuted, what Cities destroyed, what Nations depopulated, are the ambiguous effects of your opinions. You are judges of the fortunes and bloud of men, and of your behaviours and existimation men are Judges. God the discerner of all things judgeth of your head at the terrible and inevitable audite. Every one beholdeth many things by the deception of his own sense, uttereth many things from the dictates of affection. I cannot believe what is reported, that so eminent persons blest with such admirable wits, adorned with the glorious gift of prudence, and conscious of this frailty of humane affairs, can think themselves seated in that heigth, to measure all things by the circle of their own advantage, that publick plenty should quit the preheminence to their private profit, that all things should be serviceable to their amplitude, that they should dispose their trust according to the level coyl of love, hatred, and ambition, and that they should sacrifice the bloud of the people to their Fortunes: that they therefore love Warrs, and are affected with Divisions and Confusions, hoping thereby to purchase to themselves more beneficial or honourable commands, to close with an opportunity of treasuring up large summs of money, and by the necessity of their Ministration to wed themselves to a more faithfull office, or to leap into an authority of a more hopefull permanency; but goodness forbid that such sordid, earthly, and narrow cares should be the dishonourable employment of such capacious souls.

I rather believe that you are incited by emulous anhelations after your Master's glory, whereof you have ever been most zealous; ever prepared to retaliate his injuries, to assert his Majesty, and to dilate his Empire, but I beseech you by the immortal God, and by so many beloved pledges of your Kingdoms, to take heed and diligently to beware, least a supervehement appetite of Glory make them averse from the right pursuit of Glory. You follow Glory by a muddy search, but now all mortal men desire it by a clear acquist. Consider where there is the greatest splendour of celestial virtues, either in the loud cracks of thunder possessing all men with sudden fear, and when fires and thunderbolts are promiscuously hurl'd about; or in a fair day the air being defecated and serene, and the pleasure of the light dispelling sadnesse from mens hearts? hitherto you have made the power of your Lords sufficiently fearfull, now render it sweet and make it amiable, for therein onely it is invincible. This is not the greatness of Princes to be alwayes encompassed with the terrours of his armed men, and buried in warlike preparations, with a fiery mouth to be alwayes denouncing the cruelties of torments and tortures, to condemn these men to fetters, those to the sword, perpetually to carry about him fire and darts, to make his progress through smoaking Cities, over the trampled bodies of half dead men, and to exhaust all things least they should be exhausted. How much more glorious is it like a fortunate Comet to prevent and exceed the hopes of all men with causes of rejoycing? To repair things ruinous and disordered, to convey glad tidings of consolation to the pensive soul, to recollect things scattered, and to re-unite things divided. By this heavenly solicitude many Kings lending their succour, not sending their terrour unto the labouring world, have attained unto solid and unshaken honour. What forbiddeth you to follow? what retardeth your emulation? There is one rock which is often to be feared, unto which the cares and cogitations of some Politick men, who differ much from your Piety, do cleave. They think if the administrations of the Publick should be regulated by the Law of God, and the judgement of pious men, they would become base, low, and unesteemed, they would be exposed to prey and direption; and is he penitent? I insult not; doth he crave audience? I grant access; doth he submit his neck? my mercy shall meet his submission. At the destruction of Canna, Hannibal was heard to say, Miles, parce ferro: Marcellus wished he could quench the flames of burning Syracusa with his tears: Titus with erected hands and eyes to heaven, wept over the prostrate carcasses of the Jews. What should be then the most decent and laudable behaviour of a Christian King towards a subdued and almost suppliant Enemy? Should he strut with pride? Should he inebriate himself with passion? Or should he strengthen his fury to an utter desolation? The more generous beasts abhorre this practice. Vast and inexorable wraths should not cohabit with royal minds; many things are to be pardoned to humane frailty, many things to ignorance, something truly to affection, but all things to repentance. It behoves him to preserve many, even to the prejudice of their obstinate or erroneous wit, neither are all those to be heard that are resolved to perish. Errour illaqueates some men, and Opinion sets the complection upon the procedures of most men; others are ensnared by the counsels of a treacherous vigilancy; and some there are who have no fault but their fortune. His pardon he will extend and communicate to many, whosoever can really desire to obtain from God his own pardon.

Further I add, that those reasons which are produced as subservient to the attainment of a just end, ought themselves also to be legitimate, otherwise the foundations may be firm, yet the superstructures may totter. That is not good which is not well done, the means we use must be as innocent and unreprovable as our meaning. That which knoweth no mediocrity, I know not how to term a virtue. A depraved intention by a kind of contagious force ever infected the most austere and sacred conduct of affairs; subdolous inventions also and crafty Artificers shade and eclipse the beauty of sincere intentions. Grosse and scandalous is their errour, who having proposed to themselves some laudable mark, are little solicitous of the arrows they shoot. They who have trusted to this footing have (many of them) slipt, and dasht themselves against such a rock of absurdities as hath endangered their brains. I shall instance in those who have thought that health might be innocently purchased from the Devils themselves by the virtue of Magical forms, and that this is the safety which the Divine Oracles pronounce we may acquire from our enemies. But Paul is peremptory in the confutation hereof, saying, That evil must not be done that good may come thereof. No man is mercifull by theefts, nor charitable by surreptious gains; no innocent person seeketh convalescence by wicked accommodations. To go to warr is lawfull, to kill is lawfull when you are backt with the Authority of your Prince, and seconded with a just Cause; but on the contrary, to do injustice is never not unlawfull. We may incline and bow the ears of the Deity to a condescendence, but we may not solicite hell for Auxiliaries: we may not contemerate things sacred, nor violate the divine Charters of the Church; we may not subvert Religion nor contaminate chastity; we must not attempt facinorous art, nor invade the lives of Princes with poniards or venomous potions; we ought not to destroy Military Discipline by transgressing the Rights of Warfare, nor adventure upon certain villains to promote a desperate ambition. That warr ceaseth to be just (however pretended to have a just beginning) when the future events are intermixed with palpable injustice; and being well begun if they degenerate into evil progressions, they ought speedily to have an end.

We are faln by degrees (greatest Princes) upon the matter intended, of which it is your part to judge, and from sound deliberations to provide for the felicity of Christians both temporal and eternal. Your Authority is, or ought to be unquestioned, and your dispositions of minde and intentions, what can they be in good Princes, but unsuspected: but the cause is perplexed and involved, yet the Reasons that seem to conspire the end are violent. A fierce and cruel warr is carried on among you, exercised in the besieging of Cities, acquainted with destructions, terrible for its monstrous spreadings, under which the Church laboureth, the wishes of the oppressed evaporate into sighs, and the convulsed world mourneth; it hath not proceeded in an ordinary way, nor is it continued after a humane manner. Sift out (if you please) the causes, and weigh diligently with your selves the occasions of such an amazing tumult.

If at any time we behold things natural acting within the limits of their prescriptions, this doth not elevate our considerations to a wonder: but when we see them irritated by some vehement impetuosity, or the determined confinements of Nature's Law to be perverted, we suspect some hidden force within, which suddenly bursteth forth and is circumfused, from whence such various motions do arise. As often as we see the windes to be ordinarily stirred, we either judge it to be some breath or exhalation; or we conjecture, that the air hath a natural faculty to move its self, lest it should become dull and torpid in an inagitable Globe: but as often as we behold boisterous tempests to arise by the sharp and violent conflicts of the winds, which compell vast trees from their roots, and level strong built houses with the ground, which devour whole navies, and shake the foundations of the world, we ascribe these to the airy Principalities dissipated through the regions of the Earth. In like manner, when warrs are managed among men in their accustomed forms, we attribute these to the ambitious designs of men, to cholerick temperaments, and to the easie impatience of an objected contumely: but if they exceed proportion and example also, we suspect that there is some undiscovered origin of evils transcending our understandings and astonishing our senses.

He that will duely and sadly weigh the matter, will confesse this of such a cruel warr; for it is not actuated with a civil minde, neither hath it those decencies and Military Ornaments which are wont to accompany great mindes, but it is tainted with a virulent malignity which devoureth both parts, and creeping as it were with a slow contabescence,

it eats up all things; the Countryes are in a mourning estate, the Cities are dejected, the Bloud of gallant men is prodigally wasted, the choicest flowers of the Nobility are destinated to butchery and the shambles of prevailing Rebels, private Gentlemen are despoiled of almost all their goods, complaints are universal and dayly multiplied against Taxes and Exactions, which are the aliment that pampers this prodigious pastime. But no force of treasure is comparable to the greedinesse of the exactours themselves, those gluttons of oppression. The riches of a few men causeth a penury amongst all men; the odious rejoycings of the unjust are saginated with the tears of the miserable. Who is the Architect, the Contriver, the Artizan of all these evils? King Lewis (say they) is the Authour of the Warr. But can a Prince so pious, so chaste, so perpetually cloathed with the fear of God, raise such storms, cause such tempests? Whilst he lived, he dayly lifted up undefiled hands to Heaven, was frequently conversant in holy Mysteries, and a common Father of such an exemplary and chastised conscience, that he could not forgive himself the least contamination, till he had craved mercy from his God and wash'd away his pollution with the Sacramental Bloud: he fought by necessity, he overcame by valour; he was magnanimous in Resolution, famous in Warr, and forward in Peace. Who therefore can conceive that horrid and bloudy Counsels tending to the destruction of the whole Christian world, could have had either a conception in, or a welcome into that religious sacrary of his heart? Who can imagine that hatred and grudges, that displeasures and revenge could finde an entertainment in his breast. But perhaps the Emperour delights in dissentions, and nourisheth his fancy with the turbulency of Christian affairs. Judgement forbid that any man should believe this; for he is a Prince accomplished with the best endowments, and compounded of equity and ingenuity, vivacity of spirit and solidity of wisdome. What can be more agreeable to him then with the gentle hand of a Pacificatour to quiet his Germany shaken with such a dreadfull inundation of Warrs?

What? is the King of Spain then the disturber? No man can prove, that who hath the most intimate acquaintance with the sense and apprehensions of that great King. For (he if any other) hath a Christian minde, a pleasant wit, more prone to love and concord, then disposed to quarrels and controversies. There is nothing of fierceness or immoderation in him, nothing of malevolence and despight; he is carefull to enjoy his own greatnesse, careless to exercise an unjust domination.

From whence then floweth all this sea of bloud, if no anger lodgeth in celestial minds? Who seeth not, that it happens not by humane designment, but that it was hatch'd in Tophet; and the Mali Genii of the Nations have cherished it to this formidable growth, that they might blast our flourishing estate, abate our plenty, and undermine our happinesse. The affairs of Christendom were too potent, when the Factions of Hereticks were overthrown: it was their machination to turn our swords reaking with the bloud of our enemies, into our own bowels. They raised the commotions in Italy at Mantua, and they broached all the Warrs in Germany; they have engaged by a malignant enmity, the principal Crowns of Christian Fame in an implacable Warr, raging with ineffable destructions, the Church mourning, Infidels and carnal men rejoycing, and hell it self triumphing.

In the great vicissitudes of things there hath often intervened a bad minde, which vitiateth the counsels, or retardeth the good determinations of Princes, and diverteth them from taking a right aim at Glory. Scarce had they saluted the skirts of his Dominions; but, being exagitated by factious whirlwinds, the good King recrowned with triumphant Laurels is called into Italy; the Alpes must be penetrated in the depth of winter, a journey must be forced through rocks, concealed with snow and lined with armed men, the opposite forces must be intermingled, and battels fought upon all disadvantages; which difficulties being conquered by a wonderfull courage, and an equal felicity, and therefore they devise and trust to other arts of gubernation then God hath prescribed, as if he saw not enough or were careless of his people. They excogitate new, subtle, and crafty wayes of procedure, whereby to augment their own, and entangle the estates of others, and if they can, to intermingle and endanger all. They conceive it to be the part of a King to minde themselves alone, to guard and watch the safety of themselves alone, to referr all things to themselves, and to make their way to ample and royal profits, if any opposition come in their way, over the carcasses of their subjects. That truth and falshood know no distinction but with reference to our profit, unto which all the lives of all our actions must be concentrick, and that whatsoever is profitable is onely unlawfull among fools, that an humble and timorous Conscience is too importunate in the method of high Counsels. That subjects should be taught to exercise Religion with a scrupulous tenderness, that Princes must practise it, or upon it for advantage. That solid virtue is an hinderance if not lawfull, 'tis the shadow and resemblance of it that it is commodious; that honesty is praised, yet freezeth; that nothing is unlawful to Kings, that is magnificent for the Kingdoms.

This is not, that I may use the words of the Apostle, This is not that wisdom which descendeth from above, but earthly, carnal, diabolical, which imposeth upon minds bewitched, and involveth Kingdoms in a miserable destruction. Farr different (Excellent Princes) is your reiglement, and vastly opposite is your understanding to these infernal notions. For were it committed to your care to manage the Affairs not of a Christian Empire, but to govern the Kingdom of the Saracens; yet this Doctrine would occur from the very Books and Institutes of Heathenish Legislators, that craft is pernicious to those that turn the globe of Government: that this is humble, and base, and alwayes hatefull, seldom, and never long together advantageous. Whereupon Thucidides, the most scientifical Politician, saith, That a Common-wealth is better governed and more prosperously by moderate men, and such as have an indifferent wit, then by the acute and such as are superabundantly industrious. But yet should you act the parts of men exiled from God, and lawless in the world; yet according to humane sense and as is believed, no unprofitable craft, excuse were due to them who have the overseeing of many things, which concern all men. But now seeing that you perceive that your Empires are continued to you chiefly by those things by which they began, who seeth not that Christian Kingdoms are established in Faith, Justice, and Lenity, and that they are subſubverted by Impiety, Injuſtice and Cruelty? Who obſerves not that thoſe men who ſtray from the Canons of heavenly Wiſdom precipitate themſelves into devious enormities and caliginous obſervations?

Conſult if you pleaſe the whole body of Hiſtory, and conſider what have been the exits of Tiberians and Herodians, you ſhall finde this to be the pedigree of their everlaſting Reproach; firſt, a ſubdolous and wily minde, a life full of thorny cares and dawning jealouſies, brittle and fugitive hopes, certain fears, uncertain counſels, deaths full of calamity, long puniſhments, fleeting pleaſures, poſterity, either none, or of no continuance. But on the other ſide if you pleaſe to contemplate the Records of Chriſtian Princes, who have governed their Kingdoms with ſincerity of minde, with gentleneſſe of hand with a prudent moderation, and an invincible integrity, through ſo many croſſe accidents, temptations, and diſcouragements of humane affairs, you may behold Hero's beloved of their own, feared by their Enemies, to have lived ſafe in felicity and accumulated glories, and to have left behind them acceptable pledges of their own virtues for many generations. Therefore caſting away the counſels of ſuch an impious and execrable Warr, overcoming the charges of ambition with the comforts of a valiant modeſty, and repreſſing irregular deſires by charity, let us make our Addreſſes to God the Founder of Safety, and the reconciler of Diviſions; for when we deſpair he can repair, our extremity is the criſis of his opportunity.

But what is it that hath diſobliged the deſires, fruſtrated the expectations of all men, and almoſt tired out the oppreſſive ſighs of the mourning Church with ſuch tedious diſappointments? Is it Honour? Is it Wealth? Truly if Honour, it is that which hath miniſtred not the weakeſt influence unto the vehement inducements of this Warr; an opinion of contempt ſhould now be caſhiered, when the fierce oppoſitions of two potent Kingdoms are engaged. What affluence can out-age the plenty which either of them may juſtly boaſt? What is more admirable then their Power? What more undaunted then their Valour? Fortitude, in a cauſe ſo miſerable, is indeed rather to be lamented then deſired; worthy the compelled praiſes of of an Enemy, or the doleſull experience of a Saracen; but being exerciſed in a mutual diſcord among Chriſtians, moſt undervalued when beſt extolled, a Spaniard hath no reaſon to contemne a French-man, nor a French-man to deſpiſe a Spaniard; yet either of them hath his advantages whereon to build a wiſh, that their united ſtrength might be exhibited in a more juſt conteſtation, and a better fate.

If the queſtion be concerning your Propriety, it is a buſineſſe ſo perplexed, that Archeſilaus hath long agone determined, that it can never be determined; ſo that if we contend about the Rights of Kingdoms, Cities, and Families we ſhall prove his words to be full of truth, who called it the confuſion of things and fortunes, neceſſarily teeming with eternal jarrs, and endleſſe diſagreements about the aſſertions. And if all things ſhould be tranſacted according to the rigour of Juſtice, we ſhould neither have a King, nor a rich man remaining. If any man therefore were poſſeſſed of whatſoever the ſagacity of his wit could ſuggeſt unto his wiſhes, whatſoever opinion could fancy, or appetite imagine, let him plead that immenſe and perplexed Charter of Kingdoms from Nembrotus who firſt impoſed the yoke upon free necks, let him derive it downward through the labyrinthed Succeſſions of ſo many Ages, or let him calculate upwards digging up his Grand-father, and Great-grand-father's Great-grand-father, till by the ſearch of ſo many Sepulchers he hath wearied the tenacious memory of the deſirous, and confounded the prudence of the skilfull: what will he meet with at length but a ſuppeditation of freſh diſcord, and fuel for new fires of tumult? Who can be the arbitratour, who the judge to compoſe ſuch great differences as will reſult from ſuch involved cauſes?

The Lord would not divide the inheritance between the Brethren: he that appointed meaſure to the Heavens, ſet bounds to the ſea, and preſcribed a proportion to all the Elements, even he refuſed to divide the Lamb between the kinſmen, being confirmed, that the avarice of men was contentious and implacable. Therefore if Chriſt himſelf ſhould now deſcend from Heaven, neither would he judge and determine your wealth, your intereſt, your propriety and fortunes; neither if he would, ſhould he by the umpirage of his impartial equity define all things according to your ſenſe and will.

What remaineth therefore, but that all Ages be worne out and waſted by infamous and degenerate Warr, the parts and factions being not unequally matched and both ſides moſt deſirous of their ends and intereſts? But is it ſo glorious and worthy an enterpriſe for ſuch great Princes, ſo pious, ſo majeſtical, and ſuch potent Lords of Sea and Land, to contend about one City, nay perhaps one Caſtle, and that too almoſt battered down by the Thunder-bolts of Warr? nay about the very duſt and rubbage, and all this with deadly enmity which can be profitable to none, but hurtfull to many?

I underſtand, O ye wiſe and intelligent Counſellours to Princes, what anſwer you will return to this, that your Intereſt is herein concerned, and your Honour engaged, leſt the propriety of your Maſters ſhould be diminiſhed by that League which the whole world expecteth. But I now leave that to be diſcuſſed by your prudence and equity, whether the whole Chriſtian world ſhould be endangered in their fortunes, lives, bloud, ſalvation, and deſtruction of all things, to give a Miniſter of State, a King's Servant an aſſurance of ſome featbery and airy fame and perhaps deepeſt rooted in his own opinion? What ſhould ſuch elevated ſouls as yours have for the object of their wiſhes, but that all things ſhould have a ſweet and peaceable compoſure to the advantage both of Kings and Kingdoms? But if you pleaſe, ponder this choice, whether it be not far better for the Prince's Honour, and the utility of his State, to remit ſomewhat of that tenacity of ſpirit, and indeclinable rigour of minde, then to ſubject and expoſe all things to the violence of fire, and to the advantage of plunderers and murthering thieves? But perhaps you imagine that it is better for Kingdoms to ſuffer direptions and devaſtations, then ruine: but what elſe is devaſtation then a direfull perdition? 'Tis a miſerable comfort to deſtroy, that you may not be deſtroyed, and to take the burning of Cities to be felicities compared with rapine; as if you ſhould ſuppoſe it to be ſome goodly thing to dy, to avoid death. That body is not loſt that may be preſerved by the ſparing of a ſingle nail. In a great and flouriſhing Kingdom, nothing nothing doth perish if a small Town or a Castle be surrendred thereby to purchase a general peace and lasting tranquility. Ministers of State lose nothing of their Fame, if they be reputed the fortunate Peace-makers of the World, rather then the Fire-brands of a Kingdom, and State-barrettours. How many of this tenacious obstinacy and destructive circumspection have the unfortunate people blasted with execrations and defamed with reproaches, because by litigious juglings they had deluded the world into an universal equipage of sorrow and complaint, rather conniving at the destruction of all things, then that they, in the most speechless calamity, would part with a toy of Honour to revive a perishing State.

But if any among you shall lend an ear of favourable regard to the complaints of the whole Christian world, and shall stretch out a protecting hand, and shall immolate the resignation of a narrow interest to the Divinity of a general preservation, doubtless Heaven it self shall be besieged for an accumulation of blessings upon him. The present Age shall pay tributes of Benevolence to his Person, and Posterity shall refresh the memory of his Virtues with a reverential gratitude. The people will celebrate his praises, and look upon him as the Saviour of their Country, a beneficent Patriot, and will flock to behold him as the salutary and propitious Planet of their felicity.

This glorious burthen (Greatest Princes) lieth upon your shoulders, you must command, act, enact, and perfect; you must use your servants as the instruments of their publick good. Truly, If you are at leisure to hear that, which without an indelible stain of negligence you cannot refuse to hear, I shall make it evident that the substance of my perswasions, is but the Eccho of the voice of God, indeed, the Law and Commandment of God; that your preservation and propriety is comprehended in it, and that the Edicts of Heaven and the conflicts of all good men's hearts do wonderfully conspire and point to it. And first consider, whether you that have so long resisted Christ the Peace-maker, may not seem to war against God, rather then to contend with men. For he is our Peace, and hath made of both one; in him he was pleased that all the fulness of the Godhead should inhabit; and that all things should be reconciled to himself by him; and that through the Bloud of his Cross our peace should be purchased. Upon his ingress into the World he brought Peace. His flesh he suffered to be direfully and inhumanely rent and wounded, but his bones which by so many hidden and intricate connexions represent the Church, he would have untouched; intimating his most vehement desires thereby, that his Elect should be consociated in an indissoluble tye of concord. And indeed in the Old Testament the high Priest went not into the Sanctum Sanctorum but with Pomegranates fastned to the skirts of his Garments, which insinuateth unto us that strict Society and agreement of the Saints one among another.

When Christ had triumphed over Death he saluteth his Disciples with that sweet and amiable name of Peace; with this the Apostles beautifie the entrance into their Epistles: with this the Just are delighted, this lapsed men implore, and by this the Angels triumph. For (saith S. Augustine) Peace is the serenity of the Mind, the tranquility of the Soul, the glew of Concord, the cement of Affection, the fellowship of Charity: this is it which taketh away contentions, putteth an end to wars, trampleth down the proud, affecteth the humble, reconcileth the litigant, is delightsom unto all, full of benignity to all, cannot be extolled, cannot be puffed up, seeketh no unjust possession, vindicateth no propriety, teacheth to love that which it knoweth not how to heal. And saith Nazianzen, Ubi non est pax, non est mundus. It is not a world without peace. For according to Simeon it consisteth in three things, or to say better, subsisteth by three things, Verity, Justice, and Peace. Blessed are the Peacemakers, for they shall be called the Sons of God, saith the voice of Truth. Behold the Adoption and the Name of the Sons of God, whereof so many Kings and Emperours have been competitours in desire, is not promised to subdued Nations, not bequeathed to stormed and burnt Cities, not legacied to a desolate world, but to such as reverence Peace and compose the variances of Princes by leagues & treaties.

Are you not sometimes possessed (best Princes) with a trembling fear, when you reach out your hands at the Altar, when you appear at and participate those holy Mysteries, lest if you put not a period to these Wars, the Angels of Peace bitterly weeping should divert their eys from you; lest the voice of Christ should cry aloud to you from the Temple, and as often as you ask peace and pardon with the Church, so often he should answer, What hast thou to do with Peace? Thou kissest my Head and kickest my Members. You flatter me with prayers, and persecute me with swords. You have the voice of Jacob, but you have the hands of Esau. While you kindle Bonefires of outward congratulation and thankfulness to me, you make Bonefires of Cities, and exhibit sad emblems of your inflamed minds to the world. You smell of Incense, and by your means whole Towns are turned into smoak, and whilest you present your self a Suppliant before me, you play the Warriour before the world. Your weapons reak not with the bloud of Turks but Brethren. So many miserable men are slaughtered by thy command, and the bloud of those is shed by thee for whom I shed my bloud. Whilest you cry to me, thousands of VVidows and Orphans cry to behold those carkasses which now can no more answer to the names of Husband and Father. VVhilest you here erect Altars to me, you elsewhere offer your vows to your own lusts; you do not sacrifice but sin, whilest these things are acted by your command, or tolerated by your connivence. Bend your mind and not your knees, deceive not the world without a laborious hypocrisie, and make no false boastings of the portion of my spirit, but manacle your own passions, and tame your own deceitful spirits, and if you wil have pardon, pardon.

Many things (Great Princes) at the beginning are to be pardoned to errour, & many things to a mind agitated with a shew or a guess of injury. If some Wars be just, if some be necessary, yet whilest they are protracted, they cease to be what they were, they lose their innocence by the verydiuturnity and whilst they increase in fury, they decrease in cause & reputation. Take heed lest our most merciful Lord be offended with the long continuance and the lasting malignity of your undertakings. You are not gnorant with what security our Saviour enjoyned a removal of all scandals from his Kingdom, dooming the authours of them to have a Mill-stone tied about their necks and their bodies cast into the Sea. I shall not indeed be a rigid interpreter of Prince's actions, or pass a speedy condemnation upon them.

But yet we must beware lest so many calamities and funerals spread further by the very contagion of the hatred, lest the minds of all pious people be offended, and the scoffing tongues of the wicked be sharpned against our Religion. The Gentiles in time past were amazed at the Charity of the Christians to see how they loved one another, to see how they had a mutual contention of desires to die for one another. They who wanted the advantage of Faith were allured with the admiration of their virtues. They expected not any prophane mixtures nor base designs from him who had devoted himself to brotherly kindness. But now should the Heathen behold brother against brother, what else could be the sad harmony of their jubilations, but, see how they destroy one another; see how they butcher one another; see how they prosecute and persecute one another with endless hatred. Either they are without Christ, or Christ is without Peace. It is a hard saying, yet hath it more of truth then wonder. The cause of God suffereth diminution in these discords; The Church mourneth for many and horrid things, either the Religion we profess accuseth our errours, or we the Professours accuse our Religion. By us Infidels insult over the Elect, the Prophane over the godly, the Jews over Christ, and Barbarians over the Church. If our honour be cheap in our own valuation, why do we betray the Honour of God? why do we batter his Inheritance?

Moreover, to what short consideration is it not evident, that Christian Dissentions have been alwayes the occasion of Heathenish rejoycings? Whilst our own Armies are conflicting one with the other, the Turks have taken Rhodes from us, and usurped Constantinople. May we not think it a miraculous indulgence of our merciful God, to divert so potent and cruel an enemy from our destruction by engaging him in the Persian War? But this is much to be feared, lest if such whirlwinds of wrath continue amongst us, he should fly upon the torn and scattered remainder of our Kingdoms with fury and violence. It is also to be feared lest the Providence being so often provoked by our renewed injuries should cast us out as a prey to the roaring and the ravenous Lion. The greatest Empires have been often lost in ruine for the same causes, and the same offences, and the wicked Kings have been subjected to a Forreign Domination, their Posterity hath been cut off, and all their glories have vanished into a reproachful scoff. What constant glories have they possessed, what dry deaths hath the check of Providence allowed them, by whose means it hath come to pass, that the Kingdom of Christ hath devolved into the hands and power of the Saracens?

Add to these things (O you Princes!) the unregarded grievances of your Subjects, and the laborious servitude of your people. Necessity compels you to devour your own members, that you get into your grasp the members of another. Such a numerous people as the omnipotent God hath delegated to your care and piety, that they should be kneaded and compounded into one substantial felicity by Peace and Concord, by holy Laws and religious adoration of the Deity, are either exposed as unfortunate and succourless oblations to the fury of their enemies, or groan under the pressures of taxations, and are tilted in their fortunes by the unappeased and insatiable avarice of exactours. Those who have escaped the Sword, Famine depopulates by lingring deaths, or else they live oppressed under some tyrannous calamity. They are sequestred from light and conversation; they have neither Country nor habitation, neither rest, nor food. Fecundity, the most desired blessing of their former hopes, is now both hated and feared, because they cannot leave an inheritance of good things to their children; they would not propagate them to become heirs of misery. That life which they have been careful to preserve amidst so many dangers, they now detest, as unprofitable to you, uncomfortable to themselves. To be plundred of all things at once is their deliberate wish, lest every day they should be plundred. But in the mean time they are infested with a diversity of evils, the amission of all things, & the capitation of each particular thing: an Excise upon every thing, an undoubted property in nothing. They fall under the cruel command of necessity, where they are neither permitted to live with the honest, nor to die with the quiet: they are made gazing stocks to others, and are formidable to themselves; whilst their estates perish to themselves, their affections are lessened to you, which formerly adorned and confirmed your Crowns with loyal valour.

Consider (Greatest Princes) that next to the Honour and Worship of God, the most supreme Law that binds you, is the safety of the People. It was once the speech of a valiant Emperour, Non mihi sed exercitui fitis: You are not so much born for your selves as for your Subjects. Their cares if you be wise must be your crosses, their oppressions your burdens, their miseries your infelicities, and their discouragements your complaints. What doth it advantage disconsolate men to be defended from the expectations of a greedy enemy by being rifled & impoverish'd by those of his own Nation; He is a miserable Pastour from whom the tutelary Gods of the flock require more things then wolves can devour.

But this is the soul of misfortune, the estate being exhausted, the mind is dejected, and the virtues are disheartned; the Laws are silent among Swords, the Blasphemer and the Hypocrite have the uncontrolled liberty of speaking; Sword-men licentiously swagger, Robbers and Plunderers are the only Ranters; Murderers are the merry-men, and all variety of lust is predominant; the beauty of Churches is disgraced and sullied with Sacrilegious hands; Altars are overthrown; Justice is vilipended, and Injustice blusheth in Scarlet Robes; Religion fainteth; Piety languisheth, Charity is counted scandalous; and not only all things are perverted, but perverse things are neglected, as if it were expedient that things should be so, necessity that fruitful mother of impieties so commanding.

And if you will reflect upon your own affairs, I beseech you (Princes) among so many Funerals of War, what can be pleasant to you? You must stir the Earth, add disquiet to the Sea, and by many dangers you must arrive at greater danger. Death that is obvious to every person, must be sought for by hard labours; no erroneous or reproveable course indeed, if a happy Peace were unfeignedly pursued. Many things are unfaithful at home, infested abroad; great Armies are hard to raise, costly to maintain, easie to be destroyed, the fate of Battels is common, and the chance of War uncertain. Prosperity doth not satisfie, adversity striketh with a steep wounding dart, and pierceth the very heart. Many times victories themselves are the seeds of new contentions, the brooding of new sorrows. It is not lawful for them that are up to keep their ſtation, nor for thoſe that were overcome to lie ſtill. Diſcords increaſe with a prodigious fertility being once begun, and many times the conquered draw the Conquerours, and an inconcocted exceſs of fortune obſtructeth all their glories, all things are intermixt with fear that depend upon expectation. Many times fallacious events delude well-grounded hopes, and horrid Cataſtrophe's befall the deſperate. The ingreſſes of War are troubleſome, the progreſſes doubtfull, the egreſſes commonly deplorable. Many is exhauſted to make good the baſſles of force by undermining fraud; loſt Commanders are lamented, to whom nothing was wanting but immortality. Cypreſs diſappoints the Laurel, and Funerals are diſtinguiſhed by Palms. The Conquerours ſtand over the ruines of the oppreſſed, being themſelves waſted by the expence of bloud and ſtrength, and nearer to their Tombs then Triumphs. You would believe that a Kingdom were deſtroyed, did you not believe that the enemies were deſtroyed. How much better were it for Peace-makers to make uſe of the indulgence of Fortune, rather then ſo often to provoke the departures of the Fates againſt your ſelves.

Certainly, if there be any conſideration of the value of a Chriſtian Title, if there be any commiſeration of humanity, the afflicted condition of all Nations that fight for Chriſt ought to move you. And it muſt needs be an object full of bitter anguiſh to ſee a Nation worried to ruine by fraternal diſcords, which Chriſt hath eſpouſed to himſelf by a peculiar Election. Germany that mother of fruitfulneſs, that advancer of Learning, and ſhop of War, is now full of mourning, the Country being unmanured, many gallant Cities being to be ſought where the Cities themſelves flouriſhed, ſo many men being ſlain, ſo much wealth conſumed, ſo many Churches demoliſhed, is now the miſerable mirth of Fortune dancing in her aſhes. Lotharingia overcame Jeruſalem with calamities, and brought upon her more then all barbarity could execute, or all miſery could undergo. The Low-Countries are alarm'd with an anniverſary contention, and is drawing on among the ſlow Funerals. A hidden poiſon hath invaded England, and engaged her in a blind and unexpected War. Spain ſo long victorious, ſo long free from jars and tumult, alwayes impatient of ſlavery, and a ſtranger to want, is aſſaulted to the very throat. Fear hath journied over the Alps and poſſeſſed Rome. Fury hath diſordered Italy, and unleſs the Princes by prudent Counſels and ſagacity of wit had re-compoſed the diſtractions, it was juſtly to be feared that when they had made a ſolitude they would have called that Peace. What is undiſturbed? what is not miſerable? Si tu victrix provincia ploras: If thou O France mourneſt which haſt ſo often triumphed over thine enemies, and in a deep ſenſe of miſery groaneſt to feel the darts pulled out of thine own bowels which muſt be thrown againſt others. What do barren Laurels profit ſuch as are ſick and languiſhing among the rapines of their goods and eſtates? To what purpoſe is it to hold flowers to the noſtrils when the body is waſted and parched with ſuch violent fevers? It is a malignant kind of ſolace for one man to compute his felicity by the increaſe of another's grief. Nothing is ſafe, nothing pleaſant amidſt ſuch calamities, where the worſt of evils is the rejoycing. The whole head is ſick, and the whole heart is heavy, from the ſole of the foot unto the crown of the head, there is nothing whole therein, but wounds, and ſwelling, and ſores full of corruption, they have not been wrapped, nor bound up, nor mollified with oil.

If the ſame man who is powerfull in the conduct of this worlds affairs, and can dive into the ſecret of theſe controverſies, could in a clear proſpective behold the Chriſtian world gaſping under ſo many direfull perplexities, doubtleſs it would pierce his ſoul, and he would condemne himſelf of cruelty did he not procure her reſtauration. Hard are thoſe ears that bow not at theſe conſiderations, harder are thoſe eyes that can behold them without ſome moiſt teſtimonies of ſorrow.

I ſhall tell you (Beſt Princes) that which chiefly concerneth your intereſt, I ſhall ſhew you that which comprehendeth both the augmentation and the glory of your Dignity. I wiſh your Kingdomes ſettled upon foundations as firm as rocks: I wiſh your Cities may continue obedient; all your Subjects obſequious; and all things calm and even in your domeſticall negotiations. Yet it is well worth a ſerious fear, leſt thoſe people who are apprehenſive of their hard condition under Kings, and ſee the neighbouring Common-wealths enjoy ſo much lenity and freedom, do begin to hate Monarchy, and (which is abſolutely unlawfull) conſpire to withdraw their Obedience, that they may acquire a redemption from their evils by the temptation of Liberty.

These things were written long ſince, which of late have been verified by many ſad events.

Certainly it is very unequal and unjuſt that at this day Common-wealths alone ſhould inherit peace and plenty, and Chriſtian Kingdomes ſhould labour under generall convulſions, and be waſted with unheard of lacerations. The rigorous ſtrictneſs of Empire, the tuning of the ſtrings too high in Government doth ſometimes crack them and diſſolve great Empires, a hard ſervitude hath not ſeldome inſtructed a Nation into Liberty. When the inquinated times of the Hebrew Kings were paſt, and the Jews were now returned from a long Captivity, there aroſe in them an averſation to Kingly Government; and almoſt for five hundred years no man durſt think of a Diadem before Ariſtobulus, who rather uſurped then received it; neither was it eſtabliſhed upon a firm baſis, for his unfortunate poſterity did not long enjoy it.

Cecrops reigned in Athens in the dayes of Moſes, whom ſeventeen Kings ſucceeded, ſome grew inſolent, ſome negligent, and theſe perpetuall Governours were dethroned: for when it was obſerved that the diuturnity of Regall Power flattered them into a ſecurity of their exceſſes, the Government was reduced to ten years continuance.

These were Magiſtrates in office like unto the Tribunes among the Romans, and the Spartans, and Lacedemonians uſed to appeal from the King to them, as did the Romans from the Conſuls to the Tribunes. At the firſt they were choſen like our Parliament men, to be adviſers about affairs and aſſiſtants to the King, but in a ſhort time their authority overtopped the King's power.

The Kings of Sparta alſo luxuriating in their glories, and made wanton by felicity, were ſoon diſmantled of them both. Lycurgus tempered the Scepter by a wiſe inſtitution of 28 men called Senatours. Afterwards to this number of the Senatours there was added the Ephori with too much priviledge againſt Kings, and hateſull to all men.

Rome from the beginning was governed by Kings, the laſt whereof (which were the two Tarquins) ruling that warlike Nation with pride and petulancy, by great force and perpetuall diſgrace they were expelled from their Magiſtracy, leaving almoſt an everlaſting odium againſt the Regiment of Kings.

It would be too impertinent to reckon up the Antient times, we our ſelves have ſeen in our dayes how many a rigid domination hath ſacrificed to the Peoples fury, who having endured all things, have have learned from thence to dare to attempt all things, and those Kingdoms which for a long time they suffered under, they have at length usurped by cruel and lasting Wars. Far be it from your Subjects to entertain any such perversity of thought, and far from you also be contempt and rigour, lest the Divine hand bring to pass that which few fear, none dare attempt, and all abhor. Transmit therefore (O ye Princes!) comfort to the wearisom, and peace to the troubled, upon which all wishes are bent, in which all people are blessed.

Behold at length there is given unto us by the singular gift of God a good Pope, a man of blameless life, of consummated understanding, of a great mind, and extremely zealous; he is as the Wiseman said, As the Rain-bow that is bright in the fair clouds. This is he, whom after so many storms, so many tempests, and such a deluge of Christian blood, God seems to exhibit as a Restorer of things, a Peacemaker to the World, an Avenger of Evils, and a Bestower of Blessings. And indeed this is not done by humane counsel, but by the gubernative reason of God, which is his Providence, that he might demonstrate to the world by no vain auguries, that to this man as to the Patriarch Noah, the tops of the Mountains should appear, the waters of strife, and the clouds of contention being dried up. This I suppose is that Dove with silver wings, and whose hinder parts glittered as the purest Gold, whereof the Prophet spake.

Innocentius hath ever shined brighter then Silver by the candour and uprightness of his mind, but now the latter parts of his life promise a golden Age unto the World. He doth not sit idle amidst the complaints and mournings of the Church, he doth not revel in an uncircumspect and lazy greatness, but with unwearied pains, and a mind always vigilant, he is intent upon illustrious cares for Christ, and aimeth at the Consolation of mankind. The amiable name of Pamphilius is delightful unto all men, and delightful is the name of Innocentius so often consecrated to the salvation of men.

Innocentius the First, extinguished Alaricus boasting himself in the prey of the Roman Empire with his Prayers, and by his splendour re-beautified the face of the eternal City when it was infuscated with the sooty vapours of a brutish War.

Innocentius the Second, dissipated the Schism of the counterfeit Anacletus; and with the co-assistance of S. Bernard, composed the Christian World when it was dis united with great discords.

A pure white Dove fore-shewed the inauguration of Innocent the Third, by flying to his side: without doubt designing the solicitous endeavours whereby he laboured to consociate all Christian Princes by firm Leagues one with another, and to exasperate them against the common Enemy of Religion.

Innocentius the Fourth came to Lyons, that he might reconcile the irregular tumults in the Church, and that by his Authority he might remove Frederick the Emperour that fomented many things and disturbed all things.

Innocentius the Fifth, was no sooner crowned, but presently he addicteth his mind to pacifie the Cities of Italy, and being by such pious determinations immortal in glory, he spent his short Pontificate in a Fatherly care of his people.

Innocentius the Sixth, when the flame of a destructive War devoured France and England, stood stoutly for the House of God, and with a great spirit laboured for Peace with John and Edward, at that time the Kings of the Nations.

Innocentius the Seventh, mounted not otherwise to this pitch of supreme Dignity, but by a faithful endeavour constantly transacted to reconcile the Princes, and appease the Cities of Italy, which a malignant force of discord had precipitated into imminent destruction.

Innocentius the Eighth, was most desirous of Peace among Christian Princes, and could not without some motions of impatience see any go to War but upon the most important and importunate causes.

Innocentius the Ninth, when before his Pontificate he was the Apostolical Nuntio of Gregory the Fourteenth, staying six years among the Venetians, conjoyned them both in Arms and Armies with the Pope, and Philip the Second King of Spain, and irritated them against the Turk: whereupon that most famous Victory of Nanpactus broke the boldness of the Saracens, and after a wonderful manner improved the conduct of Christian Affairs.

O how is the name of the Innocent born and consecrated unto Peace! Oh joyful appellation unto Christians! The Tenth will accomplish what the Nine have attempted, so much the greater, as this number is the more noble.

Go on thou Dove of Innocence, display thy silver wings, fly over both Earth and Sea, view the World, shew forth in all places the Celestial Olive, give Peace so ambitiously desired, and by such constant expectations wished; giue Peace I say so often cill'd for, and to be implor'd of thee the Anointed of the Lord, or else at this time it must be despaired of.

What remaineth (Greatest Princes) but that you grant that to our Petitions which you have hitherto denied to our Reasons: Whatsoever restraineth passion, whatsoever can appease an armed man in fury, doth now run towards you in one troop, that so it may be honourable for you to be thus intreated, and shameful for you not to yield to these intreaties.

Behold the Pope the Pastour and Parent of the whole Church stretcheth out friendly hands unto you; and when he might command, intreats you; almost forgetting that he is the Pope, he becomes an humble Suppliant. A man dear to Heaven, and born for great Enterprises, Worthy in all places to bear the Felicities of the World about him, amidst all his exalted Prosperities is your Petitioner, that Divine wit equal to his heighth, feels a colluctation with these burthens, and in a vigorous and circumspect old Age is grieved by you. The bowels of a Father are urged, who is as often fruitful in the Generation of children, as he desires those Children to be reconciled to Peace. Be ashamed not to hear him, whose Predecessour, Attila would hear. He is full of days, honour his grey hairs; he is a Father, acknowledge his Charity: he is the Pope, be observant of his Dignity. God forbid that he like meek Jacob should be compelled to say, Simeon and Levi are brethren in iniquity. Let not my Soule participate of their counsels, and in their company let not my glory come. Cursed be their Fury, because it is obstinate, and their indignation because it is cruel.

The whole Church lamenteth with her Pope, in times past triumphing, now deformed, full of filth, now bedewed and almost drowned in tears, and tired under cares and sorrows. He beseecheth you, that that you would not suffer the Amorites and the Moabites to insult in your destructions. Prevent the petulancy of such an Objection, that even Barbarians did reverence him, and yet he had Parricides to his sons. How often have we seen the Priests at Jubilees prostrate in the Sanctuary with Ejulations? How often have we beheld Religious Persons wearying the Altars with unwearied Prayers? How often have we seen the well-disposed Virgins imploring the aid of Heaven by frequent sighs? How often have we gladly beheld the Devout Multitude crouding the Church to pour forth their wishes? Of what quality and complexion is that rigour, that, which God avert, will not hear the whole World? How is the metal of their Souls compounded, that would make Heaven iron unto us, and almost noxious, whilst it either seemeth not to hear, or what it heareth to contemn.

To be never free from Wars they think is either for the Publick profit, or for their own: If for the Publick, let them hear Saint Augustine crying out, that Felicity acquired by Martial Exploits is alwayes a brittle perishable Beauty; and whether it receive the tincture and complexion from Civil or Hostil blood: yet it is the blood of man, which is alwayes mixt with a benighting paleness, or darksome fear, and a cruel desire. And again, that all humane Affairs are then seated in the best station of Felicity, when small Kingdomes are joyful in Concord, Piety, and Unity of Religion. And in a third place he hath this excellent saying, without doubt it is better to have the friendship of a good Neighbour, then to subdue a contentious bad Neighbour. They are evil wishes to desire to have whom you hate, or whom you fear, as he may prove whom you overcome. If they judge it profitable for themselves to prolong the War, truly they are most unjust, who place the tears of a torn and ragged World amongst their Felicities; most miserable of all men are they, who cannot be happy but by the miseries of other men.

He must needs be (saith Homer) without friend, without Affinity, without Law, and without God who is a Lover of War, rather by choice then chance, rather by will then necessity. He is the most poor also who is rich by the calamity of all men. How many who have alwayes been of a froward, contentious, and fighting wit, have themselves been tortured with those pains and furies which they raised against others? Achitophel, that busie Contriver of the Jewish War between the Father and the Son, paid himself the just wages of his traiterous Counsels with an infamous halter. The revenging hand of God fell upon Alcimus that traitour and fire-brand, and counterfeit Priest among the Jews. Alexander of Macedon, whilst he makes the end of one War the beginning of another, being impatient of rest, and ever greedy after new blood, whilst he thrusts his Souldiers into battels beyond the progress of the Sun, and the limits of the Sea, he perished by poison given by his Domesticks, to whom he began to grow odious for his excessive appetite to War. He was taken away (as they say) a green God, lest he should further vex the World with Arms, who should have obliged it by Benefits. Hannibal whilst he weaveth inextricable Webs of War, a dishonourable old age surpriseth him, solitude rejected him, society shunn'd him, therefore to shorten the date of these contempts, he ends his dayes by voluntary poison. The Romans that were Conquerours of the World, alwayes full, yet alwayes covetous, whilst they remove the Temple of Peace without their gates, they felt the hands of all men conspiring against them, and seven times was this Mistriss of Cities taken whereof Sybil had said, Ἴσχε ῥώμη ῥύμη, Rome shall be made a Village.

Cardinal Baronius cites a little Book written by Carolus Crassus the Emperour, of a Vision presented unto him three years before he reigned, wherein he declareth that he beheld in the infernal places many souls of Princes and Bishops, who had fomented Controversies and fed the rage of Wars, to be tormented with most dreadful pains. At the same time, as this most learned Cardinal writeth, Italy and France were agitated and afflicted with direful factions, but what was worse, and indeed monstrous, the Bishops and Abbats went forth armed to the battels, which execrable custome when it long prevailed in France, from thence it came to pass that the most flourishing Provinces were all laid waste with external and Civil Wars. But what was most detestable of all, these Churches-warriours are commended by the Writers of those times for this Ecclesiastical gallantry and Spiritual valour, when indeed they were rather to be abhorred as the violatours of the sacred Canons, despisers of their Order, and desertours of their Pastoral duty: thus Baronius.

Likewise Julian a Clergy-man was the Authour and Promotour of their Varvensian slaughter, which of all other was the most to be lamented by the Christian World, who when he had contributed his perswasions for a countenance of the War against the League, he exposed infinite Companies of our side to the insulting fury of the Turks, he himself being also slain with the young King of the Saracens. Thus Nemesis pursueth bloud-thirsty and contentious souls, not suffering those to be at rest, who solicited others into disorder who would have been at rest. A watchful eye abides in Heaven, ever active, never weary, who perpetually contemplates the deeds of men, and equally dispenseth to every one his deservings. They that were long happy receive their portion, and they who seem to be dismissed are only dilated. These things being put in so illustrious an example will they nothing move? will they effect nothing?

Will Brethren suffer themselves again to rush upon one anothers weapons? Or will you O Princes! and ye O Clergy-men! encourage Brethren to pull down tottering Kingdoms with more destructions? Wo and alas! Will Brethren, forgetful of their Covenant, forgetful of their Name, and unmindful of their Relations thus rage beyond the World, and kill those they cannot hate? But some will say, this reason of Bloud and Alliance is inconsiderable, and very unapt to procure a Peace: for Kings have Subjects, but Kinsmen and Consanguinity they have none. O cruel speech! O enemy of mankind! O parricide of nature! there must needs be a heap of gross impieties, where there is an oblivion of the greatest Charities. Where Christ is banished, and Love finds no habitation, there is either no Government, or such as borders upon ruine. The Turkish Empire that is established upon wickedness and cemented mented with bloud, may for a time subsist with wickedness, God appointing them to be the rods of his fury for our chastisement. Christian Empires which were rooted in Faith and Piety, and wanting the sap of Religion and Justice to nourish them, have abandoned themselves to the infamous counsels of Machiavilians, must unavoidably perish, so prepostorous a mind lodgeth not in pious Princes; the voyce of nature sometime or other will be heard, Christ will have a resurrection in the minds of all men, Charity will revive, and at length some Peace-maker will arise and atone the labouring world.

Now there hath shined round about us a most fortunate King, and a most sweet Infant born for the Peace of Kingdomes, and the worlds advantage. By how many Prayers was he obtained? and with what vehemence of soul was he solicited? how often hath he provoked our desires? how often hath he raised our hopes, and wasted them with delay when they were raised, and renewed them when they were wasted? Great things move slowly: He had done less, had he made more haste. He lay concealed from the inhabitants of the earth, in the secret Majesty of the Fates; but now by the Dictates of Heaven he is known unto us. He was fore-shewed unto us long before he was, and not being yet conceived, he filled the world with Prophecies, and designed his approaches by a prevolant fame. At length the desired Infant came forth in that month which they call the month of the Valiant, by the prerogative of a great mind. He was born when the Sun obtained the middle part of Virgo, or Astraa; for he was to govern the world with the moderation of Laws. He ascended with Lyra, being to make a harmony and consort of publick tranquillity. And if Scorpio did at the same time shew forth his sting, he threatned the Saracens, and promised the Idumean Palms to him that should be born, so often dignified by the Valour of his Ancestours. The heavenly habitations rejoyced at his birth, and the whole World welcomed the new-born Babe with joy. Now no man thought himself miserable at this happy birth; now no man thought himself happy whom that birth did not make so. Upon that day France wiped away all the soot of War, and shined clearly with refulgent ensigns of Peace. We had that day as many prosperities as bone-fires, and as many bone-fires as there are stars.

O Lewis, beloved of God, whom he seemeth to have regenerated in his Son that very moneth wherein he was born! O Ann! late indeed the mother of a son; yet alwayes a fortunate mother, in bringing forth a son not onely to her self, nor so much to her self as to all France. He hath much of his Father, and much of his Mother, and by this very confusion he maketh the Image of them both more gratefull and more amiable.

This new Isaac will make thee laugh, O France! and whom thou canst scarce hear speaking, hereafter thou shalt see comforting. How many chains will those tender hands burst asunder? How many prisons will they open? How many obscurities will those little eyes enlighten? How many monsters will the feet of this Infant subdue and trample on? Be silent ye waves, be silent ye tempests and rages of the sea at the beck of such a gentle Prince, and restore unto the world that serenity whereof you have deprived it. Ye Heavenly Powers lend him long unto the earth; and whom you have made so healthfull to the Nation, make him also lasting. Ye Fates keep off your hands, and touch not this child but to assist him. Let him transcend the years and actions of his Ancestours, and being born mortall, may he apprehend nothing but what is immortall. May he love, and desire to be beloved, ever fearing to be feared. Let the oppressed find him a deliverer; may the unjust feel him an avenger; may his enemies know him to be of a warlike spirit, and may his Subjects attest him to be of a peaceable mind. This Nativity ravisheth all my senses which I foretell shall be the beginning of an eternall Peace unto us. Look down from above, O Lewis upon such a son! Look upon him all ye Christian Kings as your little Nephew; give rest to wearied things; let arms be silent at the command of so great a Prince, so potent an Oratour, nor let the tumults of Warr rock this royall cradle.

To you again, (Great Princes) I wholly turn my self, by whatsoever is dear, I ask, by whatsoever is holy, I beseech you, give peace to them that beg it, or must beg without it; give tranquillity to the world sighing under so many severish miseries. Make it appear unto us that you chose rather to be the Pacificatours of the world, then the Subverters of your own Kingdoms. There is a story how in that fatall War between the English and the French, continued with lasting contentions and horrible slaughters, a pious Anachoret instigated thereunto by God, came unto the Courts of the two Princes, that he might compose these feral discords between them. But being slighted in the English Court, and negligently repulsed, this despised but not despicable Augur, pronounced many direfull accidents that should befall that Nation. But travelling to Charles of France, and finding him to be a Prince of a gentle wit, and inclined to conditions of Peace, he foretold, that the Kingdom being recovered he should have the Dolphin to be his successour, who as he was the child of many hearty desires, so he should prove the instrument of many joyfull enterprises. The prophecy is in part fulfilled with a prosperous event, so tenderly God loves the sons of Peace accumulated with affluence of all good things.

Who e're he be, let him beware that shall resist and strive against the peaceable wishes of all men: some grievous hand will fall upon him and his from Heaven: he shall meet with unhappy events in all his undertakings, his life shall be certainly troublesome, his death doubtfull. Best and greatest Princes, consider and think with your selves that what loss soever can be pretended to happen by this league of Peace, whatsoever can detract from your Honour or your Empire, is recompensed unto you in the most fortunate advantages of the whole Christian world. This is rich indeed, this is magnificent, this truly Royal and to be propagated to the memory of all Ages.

Remember that you are Christians and govern Christians: be you propitious like Gods unto men, if you desire that God should be propitious unto you. Whatsoever you enjoy of life is slippery and uncertain, and your Dignities are full of frailty; it is your Justice that hath reference to your Felicity, and it is your Virtue that links you to Eternity. There is a great and conspicuous Tribunall that expects you, there sits a Judge cloathed with purest light to summon you, unto whom the most secret things are revealed, whom the most involved and disguised actions cannot not

not deceive, nor can he be over-come by perversities. Before him must appear the Souls of Kings devested of Body, Fortunes, Empires; and be they just or unjust, they must be examined by a most clear light. There you shall hear the Edicts of the Supreme Deity, and the King of Kings thundering in your ears: the groans of the oppressed shall cry against you; the tears of the poor shall speak against you: the tutelary Gods will plead for their Altars which you have broken down, and all the Heavenly Militia will rise together against the contumacious. Endeavour ye Pious, and always invincible Princes, that those things which have been committed in prejudice of your wills by the uncontroulable licence of War, may be corrected by your Equity, that they may leave no aspersion upon your Reigns, no stain upon Reputations, no blot upon your Persons. Bring to pass that Justice and Peace may meet in mutual embracements, let them be carried with triumphal Pomp through your Kingdoms, and through your Cities; let them be borne upon the shoulders of the whole World unto a fixed and eternal Seat, that it perpetually may be lawful for us to worship and reverence them at the monuments of your Goodness, and the pledges of our Felicity.

Pax super Israel Dei.

FINIS.
